5. For the purpose of a practical homiletical treatment of the chapter it will of course be necessary to pay special regard to the shining clearness of this description of the Messiah, and through it to clear up the more obscure features of the prophetic vision, in so far as this may be possible and of practical utility. The Divine-human Messiah of Israel, the founder and ruler of the kingdom of God in the earth, the Saviour and Judge of the world (cf. John iv. 42; v. 27), is to be described in His relations toward the earthly world-power, which, passing through various forms and phases of development, finally reaches the diabolical rage of anti-Christianity, and rebels against Him; and his ultimate triumph over all His foes is to be displayed as a necessity, founded in the Divine economy of salvation. In this connection it will not be wise to enter upon a consideration of those phases in the development of the world-power, symbolized by the figure of the beasts, in their relation to the pre-Christian world-monarchies which are to be regarded as their historical counterparts, any farther than is imperatively necessary for the purpose of clearness. The ideal and fundamental thought of the prophecy, which substantially coincides with that of the image of the monarchies in chap. II. and may be expressed by the statement "that all the kingdoms of the earth must be put to shame" (cf. Rev. xi. 15; xii. 10) before the kingdom of the everlasting God (the Ancient of days, v. 9), and of His Anointed, must evidently be made prominent; but the details of its realization in the history of the world should receive only a subordinate attention, especially since none of the theories promulgated to the present time, which undertake to specify the particular kingdoms designated by the four beasts, can claim to be absolutely correct, and recourse must therefore be had to a choice between probabilities, or between interpretations, more or less plausible, of the mysterious hieroglyphic animal figures that "came up from the sea." For as merely the forms of the future world-monarchies were revealed to the prophet—sometimes indeed in surprisingly definite and exact outlines—but he was not made acquainted with their names; as their nature, but not their historic appearance was prefigured to him: so can no effort of scientific penetration on the part of exegetes succeed in establishing an exact correspondence between the character of these monarchies, as shadowed forth in prophetic images, and its actualization in the surging confusion of the life of nations during the course of the last pre-Christian century, and thus in stating, with mathematical exactness and certainty, which great world-kingdom subsequent to the captivity was intended by the Spirit of prophecy by each of the beasts seen by Daniel, what kings were represented by the ten horns of the fourth beast, what was the precise conception of the blasphemous course and anti-theocratic rage of the last horn, and whether, in point of fact, Antiochus Epiphanes conformed to it in all respects, or merely realized it generally and in substance. In view of these unavoidable obscurities and difficulties, the practical expositor, still more than the scientific exegete, is limited to a chaste, modest, and reserved course in the treatment of this prophecy as it applies to the history of nations and of the world. Instead of pursuing to particulars the interpretation of the series of monarchies in va. 4-7, or even of the succession of kings in v. 8, in the details of history, he will be able to present only examples of the wonderfully exact correspondence between the type and its historical antitype, or illustrative proofs of the generally unquestionable congruity between the visional and the actual succession of monarchies; and especially, instead of treating the fourth beast and its eleventh horn (in which the idea of the fourth beast attains its complete development, and which may, therefore, to a certain extent, be identified with the beast itself) as referring solely to the anti-Christian world-power in pre-Christian times, or also to the Roman supremacy with Herod or Nero as the representative of its anti-Christian character*—which would be wholly impractical and a grave offence against all the rules of sound homiletics;—instead of so one-sided an Old-Testament or typical interpretation of this beast, he will doubtless be obliged to deal prominently with that more unfettered, spiritual, and ideal mode of treatment, by which the fourth beast represents at the same time both type and antitype, thus including the world-power of the last times, which is inimical to God and Christ. Here also every one-sided interpretation, centring in a definite point of the history of the past, must be avoided, and the antichrist must not be found specifically in the Turkish nation (so Luther, Vorrede über den Proph. Daniel; Melancthon in the Kommentar, where, however, he also associates the pope; Calov.; M. Geier, etc.), nor in the pope (Luther in his exposition of chap. xi. and xii. and elsewhere frequently; also Brentius, Calvin, Zanchius, Cocceius, Buddens, Bengel, Roos, and recently, F. Brunn, in the little work, Ist der Papst der Antichrist? Dresden, 1868), nor in Napoleon I. or III. (cf. Leutwein, Das Thier war und ist nicht, etc., Ludwigswig, 1826), nor, most remarkable of all, in Count Bismarck as representing the Prussian State (thus, e.g., Groen van Priesteler; many clergymen of Württemberg in the year 1866, etc.), but his eschatological character as belonging to the final stage of mundane history must be retained. Cf. Lünemann, on 2 Thess. ii., p. 204 et seq.; Auberlen and Riggenbach on the same chapter, p. 117 et seq.; H. O. Köhler, Die Schriftwahrheit des Chiasmus, in Guericke's Zeitschr. für die luth. Theol. und Kirche, 1861, No. III., p. 459 et seq. (where the numerous writers in the Middle Ages are mentioned, who declared the pope to be the antichrist, e.g., bishop Arnulf of Orleans, 991; Honorius of Autun; John of Salisbury; Joachim v. Floris; Robert Groshead; Joh. Milioz; Matth. v. Janow; Gregory of Heimburg; the Waldenses; many Hussites, et.); S. Baring Gould, Curious Myths of the Middle Ages, London, 1886 (chap. 9, the Antichrist); H. W. Rinck, Die Lehre der Heiligen Schrift vom Antichrist, mit Berücksichtigung der Zeichen unserer Zeit, Elberfeld, 1867 [and many of the monographs cited at the close of the Introduction].

Since but few of the practical expositors of former times occupy the ground of this more free and spiritual interpretation, but rather are generally concerned to adapt the visions of the prophet to special events and appearances in modern history, or confine themselves to the work of disproving the interpretation which assumes that the chap. was a vatic. ex eventu, written by a pretended Daniel in the Maccabæan period (so many church fathers, e.g., Jerome, whose observations on this section aim solely to resist the tendency-critical attacks of Porphyry; among moderns, e.g., Hävernick), a thoroughly proper practical and homiletical treatment of the chapter, based on a solid exegetical foundation, can of course derive but little benefit from them. Nevertheless, we quote several observations on the more important passages.

On vs. 4-8, Melancthon: "Mirabili Dei consilio et voluntate Ecclesia subiecta est cruci. . . . Prædicant Prophetae et Apostoli, mundum pœnas daturum esse, quod post sparsum evangelium tyranni sariant in membra Christi, deinde et ab illis ipsis qui gubernant Ecclesiam, polluta sit Ecclesia idolis, falsis dogmatibus, pœricidiis sanctorum libidinibus." (To this, however, is added the one-sided and arbitrary remark, "Est ex his seminibus ortam esse pestem Mahometicam historia ostendit.") On v. 9, Calvin: "Solamus non posse a nobis Deum conspici qualis est, donec simus plane similes ei. . . . Deus certe neque solium aliquod occupat, neque rotis vehitur, sed non debemus imaginari Deum in sua essentia talem esse, qualis propheta suo et aliis sanctis patribus apparuit; sed induit subinde varias formas pro capitu hominum, quibus præsentia sua aliquod signum dare volebat."

On vs. 11, 12, the Tübinger Bibel: "In His eternal decree God has fixed a limit to every kingdom; beyond this it cannot go, and the Divine providence exerts a special agency to this end (Isa. xxxiii. 15)."

On v. 13 et seq., Luther (Von den letzten Worten Davids, in his Werke, vol. XXXI. p. 80 et seq.): "This eternity or eternal kingdom cannot be given to any evil creature, whether man or angel; for it is the power of God, and of God Himself. . . . Namely, the Father confers the everlasting power on the Son, and the Son receives it from the Father, and all this from all eternity. . . . At the same time, the Son is also a child, i.e., a real man and the Son of David, to whom such eternal power is given. Thus we see how the prophets properly regarded and understood the word 'eternal' when God says to David by the mouth of Nathan, 'I will place my and thy son in my eternal kingdom' (2 Sam. vii. 13, 16)."

On v. 25, Starke: "When crowned heads assail God with impious hands, and are not content with the honor of earthly gods, their respect and honor, dominion and glory, are taken from them by a common stroke; cf. Acts xii. 22 et seq."

2. The vision of the two world-kingdoms and their fall.

CHAP. VIII. 1-27.

- 1 In the third year of the reign of king Belshazzar a vision appeared unto me,
- 2 even unto me [I] Daniel, after that which appeared unto me at the first. And I saw in a vision (and it came to pass, when I saw, that I was at [in] Shushan in the palace [or, citadel], which is in the province of Elam); and I saw in a vision, and I was by [upon] the river of Ulai.
- 3 Then [And] I lifted up mine eyes and saw, and, behold, there stood before the river a [single] ram which [and he] had two horns, and the two horns were high;
- 4 but [the] one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last. I saw the ram pushing westward [sea-ward], and northward, and southward; so that [and] no beasts might [could] stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand; but [and] he did according to his will, and became great.
- 5 And as I was considering [then], behold, a he-goat came from the west, on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground [earth]: and the goat
- 6 had a notable [sightly] horn between his eyes. And he came to the ram that had [master of the] two horns, which I had seen standing before the river, and
- 7 ran unto him in the fury of his power. And I saw him come close unto the ram, and he was moved with choler against [towards] him, and smote the ram, and brake his two horns; and there was no power in the ram to stand before him, but he cast him down to the ground [earth], and stamped upon [trampled] him: and there was none that could deliver the ram out of his hand.

- 8 Therefore [And] the he-goat⁴ waxed [became] very⁵ great:⁶ and when [as] he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable
- 9 [slightly] ones,¹⁰ toward the four winds of heaven [the heavens]. And out of [the] one of them came forth a [single] little¹¹ horn which waxed [and it became] exceeding great,⁷ toward the south, and toward the east and toward the pleasant
- 10 land.¹² And it waxed [became] great,⁸ even to the host of heaven [the heavens]; and it cast down⁹ some of the host and of the stars to the ground [earth], and
- 11 stamped upon [trampled] them. Yea [And] he magnified himself¹³ even to the prince of the host, and by [from] him the daily [continual] sacrifice was taken
- 12 away,¹⁴ and the place of his sanctuary was cast down. And a host was [would be] given him against the daily [continual] sacrifice by reason of [in] transgression, and it [would] cast down the truth to the ground [earth]; and it practised [did], and prospered.
- 13 Then [And] I [quite] heard one saint [holy one] speaking, and another saint [one holy one] said unto that certain saint which spake [to so-and-so the one speaking], How long shall be the vision concerning [of] the daily [continual] sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation [desolating or astounding transgression], to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days [evening-mornings];¹⁵ then [and] shall the sanctuary be cleansed [sanctified].
- 15 And it came to pass, when I, even I Daniel, had seen the vision, and sought for the meaning [understanding], then, behold, there stood before me as the
- 16 appearance of a man [person]. And I heard a man's voice between the banks of Ulai, which [and he] called, and said, Gabriel, make this man to understand the
- 17 vision [appearance]. So [And] he came near where I stood;¹⁶ and when he came, I was afraid, and fell [quite] upon my face: but [and] he said unto me, Understand, O son of man; for [that] at [to] the time of the end shall be the
- 18 vision. Now [And], as he was speaking with me, I was in a deep sleep [stunned] on my face toward the ground [earth]: but [and] he touched me, and
- 19 set me [made me stand] upright.¹⁷ And he said, Behold, I will make thee know what shall be in the last end of the indignation: for at the time appointed the end shall be [it is to the time of the end].
- 20 The ram which thou sawest having [master of the] two horns are the kings of
- 21 Media and Persia. And the rough goat¹⁸ is the king of Græcia [Javan]; and the
- 22 great horn that is between his eyes [, that] is the first king. Now that being broken, whereas [And the broken one, and] four stood up for it, four kingdoms
- 23 shall stand up out of the nation, but [and] not in his power. And in the latter time of their kingdom, when [as] the transgressors are come to the full [have completed], a king of fierce countenance [strong (bold) of face], and understanding dark sentences [stratagems], shall stand up. And his power shall be
- 24 mighty, but not by his own power: and he shall destroy [or, corrupt] wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practise [do], and shall destroy [or, corrupt] the
- 25 mighty [ones] and the holy people [people of the holy ones]. And through [upon] his policy also [and] he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself¹⁹ in his heart, and by peace [in security] shall destroy [or, corrupt] many: he shall also [and he will] stand up against the Prince of
- 26 princes; but [and] he shall be broken without²⁰ hand. And the vision [appearance] of the evening and the morning which was told is true [, it is truth]: wherefore [and thou] shut thou up the vision; for it shall be for many days.
- 27 And I Daniel fainted,²¹ and was sick certain days: afterward [and] I rose up, and did the king's business [work]; and I was astonished at the vision [appearance], but [and] none understood it.

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Verses 1, 2. Time and place of the vision. In the third year of the reign of king Belshazzar; hence, shortly before the end of this king, who reigned but little more than two years (cf. Introd., § 8, note 3), and therefore not long after the incident recorded in chap. v., which revealed the Medo-Persian kingdom already rising with a threatening light above the political horizon of the Chaldean empire, as the heiress of Babylonia. Nebuchadnezzar's vision of the image and that of the four beasts and the Son of man (seen perhaps two years before the present date), as well as the vision of the Medo-Persian ram and the Græcian goat, described in the following verses, had already prepared Daniel, before he interpreted the mysterious writing on the wall of Belshazzar's banquet-hall, to see Medo-Persia standing on the arena of history as the leading world-power instead of Babylonia in the not distant future. The extent, however, to which recent political events, such as successes achieved by the Medes, or, what is more probable, the rise of the youthful Persian prince Cyrus and his victory over Astyages (B. C. 559, and therefore two years after the death of Nebuchadnezzar in 561, and shortly after the overthrow of his successor Belshazzar-Evilmerodach), may have been influential in inciting the prophet to the politico-religious meditations from which originated the vision of this chapter, cannot be positively decided, in view of the silence of the book with regard to such externally conditioning circumstances. The political situation must certainly not be apprehended as if the fall of the Babylonian empire were immediately impending, and the approach of the Medes under Darius were looked for shortly. Against this view, which is based on the familiar but incorrect interpretation of chap. v. 29 et seq., and which is still advocated by Hitzig, Ewald, etc., see supra, on that passage. —A vision appeared unto me . . . Daniel, after that which appeared unto me at the first; i.e., "after having seen, somewhat earlier, an important prophetic vision, another of a similar character appeared to me." This new vision, however, is not called a "dream" or a dream-vision, like that in chap. vii. 1, but simply a חֲזִוִּי, "vision, what has been seen;" cf. vs. 15, 26, and also חֲזִוִּי (vs. 16, 27; chap. x. 7; also Ex. iii. 3; Ezek. xliii. 3), which is often substituted for חֲזִוִּי. It is evident that the prophet was awake and conscious during this vision, from the language of the verses at the beginning and end of the section (vs. 2 and 27), and also from a comparison with the vision in chap. x., which is analogous in form (see especially vs. 7-10). —הַחֲזִוִּי, instead of חֲזִוִּי. On this apparently relative use of the article, cf. Ewald, Lehrb., § 335 a. —בְּתֹהֶמֶת, properly, "in the beginning," is here and in chap. ix. 21 equivalent to "formerly, before," and therefore = בְּרִאשִׁיתָהוּ, Isa. i. 26; Gen. xiii. 8, 4 (in both passages the two terms are employed as synonyms). The expression refers back to chap. vii., and especially to vii. 28.—Verse 2. And I saw in a vision; and it came to pass, when I saw, that I was at Shushan in the palace. וַיְהִי בְּרִאשִׁיתָהוּ indicates that he was merely visionally present at Shushan, or that in spirit he was transported to that Persian metropolis; but in the following words he describes its situation and locality in so realizing and exact a manner that his actual presence in or near that city becomes exceedingly probable. During his long official and semi-official service under Nebuchadnezzar he may have visited that region more than once (cf. supra, on iii. 12 and iv. 6). Like Josephus, a majority of the older translators, Luther, Grotius, etc., Bertholdt and Gesenius advocate the view that the words beginning with וַיְהִי are in parenthesis; but this is contrary to the Heb. usage and to the expression of the author, and consequently the view adopted by nearly all the modern expositors, which finds only a presence of Daniel in pneumatic at Shushan indicated by this language, is preferable. This destroys all foundation for the charge of Bertholdt, that the writer is guilty of anachronism in this instance, since Shushan was no longer subject to the Babylonian empire in the reign of Belshazzar, i.e., Nabonidus. Even prior to the fall of the Chaldean world-power Daniel was able to speak of the palace (or castle) of Shushan (with regard to בֵּירָה, Pers. būru, "a castle," Sanscr. bura, Gr. βύρις, cf. Gesenius and Dietrich, s. v.) as a centre of Persian power, and even, in a measure, as the heart of the Medo-Persian world-monarchy, because the city of Susa (Old-Pers. probably Shusa, now Shush—see Lassen, Zeitschr. für Kunde des Morgenl., VI. 47), together with its well-fortified castle, was, from the earliest times, a principal feature in the province of Elymais (which is indicated by the terms applied to it by Herodotus, e.g., Μεμνύσιον ὄρεν, Σοῖσα τὰ Μεμνύσια, etc.; see Herod., V. 53, 54; VII. 151; cf. Strabo, XV. 52 et seq.; Pausan., IV. 81, 5), and because the prominent and all-controlling part which that city would take under the direction of a native Persian prince could readily be foreseen, even before Cyrus should have solemnly declared it the capital of his empire, and before Darius Hystaspis should have enlarged and splendidly ornamented it as such (cf. Hävernick, on this passage).—Which is in the province of

* [If, however, Rawlinson's identification of Belshazzar with Nabonned's son and viceroy be correct, the Medo-Persian army was at this very time besieging Babylon, though with apparently little prospect of success; and the fall of the city must have followed shortly after this vision. Hence the first monarchy, the Chaldean, is here kept out of view, as if already a thing of the past.]

Elam. Kranichfeld observes correctly that "if this book had been written subsequent to the exile, Shushan would not have been located in Elam, but in Susiana" (cf. Füller, p. 190); for Elam (Gr. Ἐλμαίς, Sept. Αἰλάν) is the old-Heb. designation of the countries situated east of Babylon and the lower Tigris, which were inhabited from the earliest times by Shemites (see Gen. x. 22; xiv. 19; cf. Isa. xi. 11; xxi. 2; xxii. 6; Jer. xxv. 25, etc.), and it was not till the period of the Persian supremacy that the extended province of Elam was limited to the narrow strip between the Tigris and the Eulæus, or between the Persian satrapies of Babylonia and Susiana, by which arrangement the river Eulæus (see the notes immediately following) became the boundary between Elymais and Susiana, and the city of Susa was assigned to the latter province. Cf. Strabo, XV. 8, 12; XVI. 1, 17; Pliny, H. N., VI. 27: "Susianam ab Elymaide determinat omnis Eulæus." The expression עֵלַיִם הַיְּדֵי, "the province of Elam," does not by any means convey the idea of a Chaldean province of that name, whose capital was Susa, because the author conforms entirely to the ancient Heb. usage. Cf. Niebuhr, Gesch. Assurs und Babels, p. 198 et seq.; Vaihinger, in Herzog's Real-Encycl., Art. Elam.—And I was by the river of Ulai, i.e., on the banks of the Eulæus, which flowed on one side of the city of Susa, while the Choaspes (on which river the classics, as Herod., I. 183; V. 49, 52; Strab., XV. p. 738, etc., locate that town) probably bounded it on the other. Corresponding with this, the representation of a large city, lying between two rivers, on a bas-relief of Kuyunjik copied by Layard (Niniveh and Babylon, p. 452), was probably designed for Susa. The explorations of Loftus in the region of Shush in 1851 make it probable that the Eulæus itself was merely a fork or branch of the ancient Choaspes or modern Kerkhah, and that the latter stream was also occasionally called Eulæus (see Rödiger, Zeitschr. f. Kunde des Morgenl., XIII. 715 et seq.; Rütschi, in Herzog's Real-Encycl., art. Susa). The peculiar name אֵלַיִם, "stream, water-course," which is applied to the Ulai in this place and in vs. 8, 6, 16, appears likewise to indicate that it was not so much a single river as a stream which divided into two forks. The same idea was probably intended by the expression "between the Ulai," v. 16 (see on that passage).*

Verses 3, 4. The first leading feature of the vision: the Persian ram. And behold there stood before the river a ram. "Before it," i.e., probably, eastward from it, in case the branch of the river which flowed to the west of Susa is intended; for if Daniel did not stand in the castle of Shushan, he was at any rate close beside it, and therefore on the eastern bank of

* ["But why such a locality? Because the prophet's present vision begins with the Medo-Persian empire, and Shushan was to be its capital. And why on the river's bank? Not because the Jews were wont to build prayer-houses in such places, Acts xvi. 13; nor because Ezekiel had visions on the Chaboras, i. 1, 3; iii. 15, 35 al. (Leng.); nor because of the solitude of the place (Maurer); but simply, as I understand it, because the castle (בֵּיתִי) stood on the banks of the river. The mention of the river, however, would still be in a measure superfluous, were not this mention a preparation for what is said in ver. 16."—Stuart.]

that branch of the stream. If from this position he saw the ram standing before the river, the latter must likewise have been on the eastern bank. ["Daniel first sees one ram, אֶחָד, standing by the river. The אֶחָד (one) does not here stand for the indefinite article, but is a numeral in contradistinction to the two horns which the one ram has" (Keil). Rather it indicates a solitary ram, and not a member of a flock, as is usual with these gregarious animals. For every ram has of course two horns.] The vision symbolizes the Persian monarchy as a ram (and afterward the Græcian empire as a he-goat), in harmony with that mode of representation—which prevailed generally in the figurative language of O.-T. prophecy and accorded with Oriental modes of conception in general—by which princes, national sovereigns, or military leaders were typified under similar figures; cf. Isa. xiv. 9 ("all the great goats of the earth"), and as parallel with it, "all the kings of the heathen," Jer. l. 8; Ezek. xxxiv. 17; Zech. x. 8. From extra-Biblical sources, cf. Zendæ., part II., p. 273 et seq., in Klenker (Ised Behram appears "like a ram with clean feet and sharp-pointed horns"); Hamasa, p. 482, ed. Shultens; also the Iliad, xiii. 491–493; Cicero, de divin., I. 22, 14; Plutarch, Sulla, c. 27.* It is especially significant that Persia is represented as a male sheep, while the Macedonian-Greek empire is symbolized as a he-goat, in view of the contrast between the solid prosperity and even abundant wealth of the Persian monarchy, and the combative, rampant, and warlike nature of Macedonia. With similar propriety the preceding vision (chap. vii. 5 et seq.) employed the bear to represent the slow, clumsy, but enormous power of Medo-Persia, and the four-winged leopard to illustrate the fleetness and warlike spirit of the Macedonians. It is also possible that an indirect allusion to the eternal contrast between Medo-Persia, as a power which in a religious point of view approximated somewhat towards Shemitism and the Theocracy, and maintained friendly relations with them, and the Græcian empire, as being thoroughly heathen and fundamentally opposed to all monotheism, was implied in this representation; for the parallel descriptions in chapters ii. and vii. likewise describe the succeeding world-kingsdoms as in every

Cf. the prophetic dream relating to the murder of the brother of Brutus by Tarquin Superbus, and to the vengeance inflicted by Brutus for that deed, as narrated by Tarquin in Cicero, de divin., l. c.

"Vires t' in somnis pastor ad me adpellere

In Plutarch's Sylla the following is related, and treated as an omen of the defeat of the younger Marius and the consul Norbanus, which occurred soon afterwards: ὁ Κασσανίης περὶ τὸ ἥδαιον (? read Τίδαιον instead) ἵστος ἡνέκατος ὡφείλοντο δύο πρόβατο μεγάλα συμβεβημένοι, καὶ ταῦτα ἕκαστος καὶ πλάγροντες, ἃ συμβαίνει μαχησάμενος ἀνέβηται.—Cf. additional extracts from the classics and from the oriental literature which bear on this point in Hævernick.

case more degraded and abominable, in a religious and ethical light, than their predecessors (see Eth.-fund. principles, etc., on chap. ii. No. 8, a and b). He-goats serve elsewhere also as symbols of a violent, savage, and obstinately hostile disposition, while sheep (and consequently rams also) are distinguished by being more governable, and by evincing a more peaceful and mild nature, and thus are better adapted to typify what is ethically good and attractive. See Matt. xxv. 31-46, and cf. Lange on that passage, who observes against Meyer, and certainly with justice, that in this description of the last judgment, Christ does not represent the wicked under the symbol of goats because of the inferior value of that animal (Luke xv. 29), but because of its "incurable obstinacy" and ungovernable temper (Vol. I. of the New-Test. portion of this Bible work). Cf. also Piper, Christus der Weltrichter in the evangel. Kalender, 1853, p. 25.—Which had two horns; and the horns were high. The ram was therefore not impotent and defenceless, since the tall horns which he bore are symbols of great power, being the natural weapons of rams, both for offence and defence; cf. on chap. vii. 7, 24.—But one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last. The vision therefore represents the horns as still growing, and fixes the prophet's attention on the fact that the horn which comes up last excels the other in its powerful growth—a striking illustration of the well-known process of development by which the Persian nation became the head of the Medo-Persian world-empire after the time of Cyrus, as being the more powerful element in the confederacy, and thus able to compel the Median branch, though older, to assume the second place in power and dignity. Theodoret thinks that this passage refers to the expulsion of the dynasty of Cyrus by the later, but more powerful family of Darius Hystaspis; the ram, however, does not represent Persia only, but the combined Medo-Persia, as the angel expressly states in the interpretation v. 20, and as the parallel visions in chap. ii. 39 and vii. 5, when properly conceived and understood, compel us to suppose (see on that passage).—Verse 4. I saw the ram pushing westward, and northward, and southward. The "pushing" can only be intended to signify the assertion and extension of its power in a warlike manner; cf. chap. xi. 40; Psa. xlv. 6; Deut. xxxiii. 17; 1 Kings xxii. 11. In this place the pushing westward denotes more particularly the victories of Medo-Persia over Babylonia and the Lydian kingdom of Asia Minor; that toward the north, the expeditions for the conquest of Scythia, led by Cyrus and Darius; and that towards the south, the conquest of Egypt and Libya by Cambyse. The ram does not push eastward, because the east already belonged to the Medo-Persian empire, and no farther extension in that direction was to be expected. Hitzig remarks, with incredible absurdity: "The fourth quarter of the earth is here unnoticed. While the ram turns his head to the right or left, he may, without changing his position, push northward and southward, but not backwards; in that direction, moreover, he would assail Daniel himself, and afterward Susa"—as if there could have been any difficulty in the matter of changing the position of the ram, in case it became necessary to represent an extension of its power eastward, by the symbol of pushing in that direction!—So that no beasts might stand before him; literally, "and all beasts—they stood not before him." The imperfect לֹא יָמְדוּ expresses here, as often, the sense of "not being able to resist" (cf. Gesen., Lehrgeb., p. 773 et seq.). The verb in this place is masculine (unlike v. 22), because the writer has in his mind the kingdoms or monarchs symbolized by the הַיְּמִינִים. Cf. the similar enallage gen. in Job xv. 6; Hos. xiv. 1.—But he did according to his will and became great. וַיִּהְיֶה, properly, "and he made great," namely, his power, i.e., he became strong, mighty. Not "and he pretended to be great, gave himself boastful airs" (de Wette, van Ees, Ewald, etc.); for, as v. 25 shows, וַיִּהְיֶה never expresses the sense of boasting or concealed superciliousness when standing alone, as it does here and in v. 8, but only when joined with the particularizing בְּקִבְּבוֹ.† With regard to vs. 10 and 11 cf. infra, on those passages.

Verses 5-7. The Græcian he-goat and its victory over the Persian ram. And as I was considering, behold, a he-goat, etc. "Considering," וַיִּבְרֵן, as in v. 27. The he-goat with a single notable horn between the eyes—hence in its general appearance resembling one of the unicorns which are prominent in the drawings on the monuments of Nineveh, Babylon, and Persepolis—symbolizes the Macedonian-Hellenistic world-monarchy founded by Alexander the Great (whom the single great horn more directly represents, see v. 21), and at the same time the kingdoms of the Diadochi which emanated from it, as v. 8 indicates with all possible clearness by the growth of four new horns in the place of the great horn which was broken. This comprehensive animal symbol accordingly includes all that had been characterized separately in the two former visions of the world-monarchies, chapters ii. and vii., at first by the figure of two different parts of the body of the colossus, and afterward by the symbol of two beasts appearing in succession. This departure from the former mode of representation involves no questionable features whatever, inasmuch as this chapter follows a different train of ideas in many other respects as well, and the advocates of the interpretation of the fourth beast in chap. vii. (and of the legs of clay and iron intermingled,

* ["He did push toward the east—not because . . . the Medo-Persians themselves came from the east (Von Leng., Kran.); nor yet because the conquests of the Persians did not stretch toward the east (Häv.), for Cyrus and Darius subdued nations to the east of Persia, even as far as to the Indus, but because, for the unfolding of the Medo-Persian monarchy as a world-power, its conquests in the east were subordinate, and therefore are not mentioned. The pushing toward the three world-regions corresponds to the three ribs of the bear, ch. vii. 5, and intimates that the Medo-Persian world-kingdom, in spite of the irresistibility of its arms, did not extend its power into all the regions of the world."—Kell.]

ii. 8. Flushed with success, we know from all quarters that the Persians assumed a haughty position; so Croesus (in Herod. i. 69), Περσας . . . ὑψηλοῖς, and so Æschylus (Pers. 796) ὑψηλοῦς αἶψαν.—Stuart.] in chap. ii.), which differs from ours, must not be permitted to urge their view to the exclusion of our own, because they also are compelled to acknowledge that the present vision combines in one two features which are there found separately, so that the one Medo-Persian ram in this place corresponds to the two beasts in the former vision, which, in their judgment, represent Media and Persia (cf. supra).—Came from the west on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground; therefore, with great swiftness, as if flying, or as if borne on the wings of the storm. Cf. the description of the leopard in chap. vii. 6, and the statement respecting Alexander the Great, in 1 Mac. i. 8: διηλθεν εως ακραυ της γης; also Isa. xli. 2 et seq.; Hos. xiii. 7; Hab. i. 6, 8, and other descriptions relating to conquerors of earlier times.—And the goat had a notable horn between his eyes. קרן חזקה does not signify a "horn of vision" (Hofmann, Weiss. und Erfüllung, I. 292), but rather a "notable horn," as the parallel קרן חזקה in vs. 8 and 21 shows, and as the ancient versions already declare (Theod.: κίρας θεωρητικόν; Vulg.: cornu insigne, etc.); cf. אֵשׁ מְרִאָה, 2 Sam. xxiii. 21; also Targ., Esth. ii. 2; Gen. xii. 11.—Verse 6. And he came to the ram that had two horns. The Arabs term Alexander the Great "the two-horned one," because he was represented on coins, etc., as the son of Jupiter Ammon, wearing two horns on his head. The fact that, on the contrary, the Medo-Persian empire which he conquered is represented as a double-horned ram, indicates with sufficient clearness that the symbolic visions of this chapter did not originate with a pseudo-Daniel, who prophesied subsequent to the event. Cf. Kranichfeld on this passage, where he justly rejects Hitzig's opinion that we have here merely an "accidental analogy" to the Arabian idea.—And ran unto him in the fury of his power; properly, in the heat of his power, i.e., in the irresistible rage (חמה) of which he was capable by reason of his mighty power. Hävernick is not exactly correct when he reads "full of a fierce desire for battle;" nor are De Wette, Von Lengerke, etc., in their version, "in his mighty rage."—Verse 7. And I saw him come close unto the ram. The manner in which Alexander the Great, at the head of the Macedonian forces, put an end to the Medo-Persian empire, corresponds in the main with this description of the assault by the goat upon the ram, which resulted in the breaking of the two horns of the latter (i.e., the power of Media and of Persia), but still not so exactly as to suggest a sketching ex eventu of that event. The figurative description is especially defective in not containing any tolerably clear indication of the fact that several vigorous blows by the ram, which were inflicted at different points (the first at Granicus, the next at Issus, and the final one in the neighborhood of Susa and the Euleus river), were required to break and destroy the Persian power. A Maocabean pseudo-Daniel would hardly have escaped the temptation to introduce more tangible allusions to these features.

Verses 8-12. The little horn which grew from the goat, and its violence against the Most High and His sanctuary. And the goat waxed very great. Here again קָדַר does not signify "to pretend to greatness," but "to become great, to develop mightily." * זר מאד, "unto excess," as in Gen. xxvii. 33; 1 Kings i. 4; Isa. lxiv. 8.—And when he was (or, "had become") strong, the great horn was broken. כִּפְצוֹ, when the height of his "becoming great" was reached, when his power was at its climax. Think of Alexander's expeditions to Bactria, Sogdiana, and India, which were soon followed by his death. The "breaking of the great horn," however, does not refer simply to Alexander's death, but also to the division of the dominion and disruption of the unity of the realm immediately consequent on the decease of that monarch.—And for it came up four notable ones. קוֹזִים is properly in apposition with אַרְבַּע, "conspicuousness, four," or also an adverbial accusative, "in conspicuousness, in a notable manner;" cf. supra, on v. 5. Each of the separate powers is therefore still important, although each receives but a fourth of the power and greatness of the original collective empire.—Toward the four winds of heaven. This addition alludes to the centrifugal principle, tending to division and separation, which after Alexander's death (not after the battle of Ipsus, as Hitzig prefers) seized on the Macedonian-Hellenistic world-monarchy, in which the centralizing principle had hitherto prevailed. The number of the horns appears to be based on the number of the winds, and to be a standing symbolic expression which is found in other writers also (cf. Jer. xlix. 36; Zech. ii. 10; vi. 5; Job i. 19). It is at any rate of symbolic significance, referring to the separation and parting of the empire toward all quarters of the world; and it is therefore not admissible to seek four particular kingdoms which should be denoted by the four horns growing towards the four quarters of the earth, as those of Cassander (Macedon), Lysimachus (Thrace and Asia Minor), Seleucus (Syria, Babylonia, and Persia), and Ptolemy (Egypt).† Both the opponents and the advocates of the genuineness of this book, since Porphyry and Jerome, are agreed in this specializing interpretation of the four horns, by which the kingdoms of the four Diadochi, who have been mentioned, are obtained (cf. in addition Hävernick, Hitzig, Ewald, and Kamphausen, on the passage). But they do not consider (1) that not the battle of Ipsus, but the death of Alexander, the monarch who founded the empire, is given as the terminus a quo at which the growth of the "four horns" begins; (2) that in point of fact the number of the great empires of the Diadochi Cassander, Lysimachus, etc., was limited to four during a period even more brief than that during which the empire was a unit under Alexander; (3) that the enumeration of four such empires even immediately subsequent to the battle of Ipsus

† [Yet Daniel says explicitly that the four horns are four kingdoms (ver. 23), and the coincidence is too striking and minute to be accidental. There were indeed originally five of the Diadochi, but they so soon resolved themselves into four that this temporary pentarchy is disregarded.]

might be assailed as being inexact, inasmuch as Demetrius, the son of Antigonus whom those kings had conquered, stood upon the scene of action (as ruler of the sea, and lord of Phœnicia, Cyprus, Athens, etc.), as well as the independent rulers of the Achæmenidæ who governed Pontus, Armenia, and Cappadocia; (4) that the parallel visions in chap. ii. and vii. appear to indicate a division of the original empire into two kingdoms (the "two legs" of the colossus, chap. ii. 33, 40 et seq.), or into ten (cf. Bleek's interpretation of the ten horns, chap. vii. 7) instead of four. Among modern expositors Kranichfeld advocates the correct view by laying the principal stress on the symbolic idea of a "dispersion to the four winds," and contenting himself with observing in relation to the bearing of this prophecy upon the four empires of the Diadochi in question, that "the prophetic idea is verified formally also, by events suggesting its fulfilment which were connected with the four kingdoms of the Diadochi in the Macedonian realm."—Verse 9. And out of one of them came forth a little horn. קַלְעִיָּה, literally, "out of littleness, in a small way," an adverbial conception of similar formation as קָטַן בְּכֵן קָטַן, in chap. ii. 8, 47 (see on those passages). On the masculine forms מִקְטַן and קָטַן cf. the similar constructions ad sensum in v. 4 (קָטַן מִקְטַן) and v. 11 (קָטַן מִקְטַן).—The horn from which the horn "sprouting in a diminutive manner" comes forth has its historical counterpart in the kingdom of the Seleucidæ; the little horn which sprouts or branches forth from it—after the manner of the prongs in the antlers of a deer—finds, like that in chap. vii. 8, its most pregnant historical illustration in the most godless offspring of that dynasty, Antiochus Epiphanes. The little horn, however, was certainly not intended to represent Epiphanes only and exclusively, as the description shows that immediately follows, which relates to the predecessors of Epiphanes also, especially to Antiochus the Great, and perhaps even suggests a reference to Seleucus Nicator and his expeditions to Persia and India in search of conquest.—Which waxed exceeding great toward the south and toward the east. It is usual to apply this to the wars of Ant. Epiphanes against Egypt (1 Macc. i. 18 et seq.; cf. infra. Dan. xi. 23 et seq.), against the countries beyond the Euphrates, Armenia and Elymais (1 Macc. i. 31, 37; vi. 1 et seq.; cf. Appian., Syr., c. 45, 66), and against the Jews under the leadership of the Asmonæans. But Syria derived no "exceeding greatness under that tyrant from these wars; the קָטַן מִקְטַן may be far more appropriately applied to the former extensions of the power of the Seleucidæ under Sel. Nicator and Antiochus the Great (whose conquests toward the west are not noticed, probably because of their transient character). Moreover, in case the reference to the undertakings of Epiphanes that have been mentioned could be established, the prophecy would be so direct in its application, that it would be hardly possible to defend its origin during the captivity with Daniel.* It is better, therefore, to be content with the more general, and, so to speak, collective or genealogical interpretation of the "little horn," by which it signifies, more immediately, the anti-theocratic or anti-Christian governing power in the empire of the Seleucidæ merely, the power of the "transgressors," who are clearly distinguished in like manner in v. 23 from Ant. Epiphanes as the most concentrated expression of the anti-theistic principle (see on that passage). Cf. also Kranichfeld, who, while assenting to this general idea of the little horn, seeks to explain the circumstance that the growth of this horn toward the west is not mentioned, by assuming that "the Grecian horn as such is conceived as being in the west and as operating from thence," and that therefore the author "would naturally describe it as asserting its power only in the regions which lay southward and eastward from Javan."—And toward the pleasant land. יְהוּדָה, properly, "the ornament;" here equivalent to אֶרֶץ יְהוּדָה (chap. xi. 16, 41), i.e., the valued, precious land, the blessed land, the land of Israel; cf. Jer. iii. 19; Ezek. xx. 6, 15; Zech. vii. 14; Ps. cvi. 24. "Palestine is here noticed as a third land between the south and the east, as, in a different connection, in Isa. xix. 23 et seq., it is located between the once hostile Egypt and Assyria."†—Verse 10. And it waxed great, even to the host of heaven. The "becoming great" is here no longer to be taken in the strict and proper objective sense, but is subjective, an impious presumption, a conceited pride whose greatness reached to the host of heaven; cf. v. 25. The "host of heaven," however, is doubtless a figurative expression, referring in strong eulogistic phrase to Israel, the community of saints, who constitute "the Lord's host" on earth, even as the glittering stars form His host in the sky; cf. Gen. xv. 5; xxii. 17; Num. xxiv. 17; also Ex. vii. 4; xii. 41; and further, the name Jehovah Sabaoth, which probably designates God in a two-fold sense, namely, as the "Lord of hosts," with reference to the starry host, and also to people of Israel, the host of His earthly servants and elect ones. The figurative designation of Israel as the "host of heaven" was probably caused by the designed assonance between אֲרָצָה and יְהוּדָה, the latter of which had just been employed to characterize the land of Israel.‡—And it cast down (some) of the host and of the stars to the ground. The copula before וְ

† A later Rabbinical interpretation conceives יְהוּדָה in the sense of "gazelle," and refers this designation partly to its beauty, and partly to its peculiarity to extend its borders, when inhabited, like the skin of a gazelle, but to shrink when uninhabited (Taanith, 69 a).

‡ ["The comparison of the saints to the host of heaven has its root in this, that God, the king of Israel, is called the God of hosts, and by the אֲרָצָה (hosts) are generally to be understood the stars or angels; but the tribes of Israel also, who were led by God out of Egypt, are called 'the hosts of Jehovah' (Exod. vii. 4; xii. 41)."]—Kell.

הַבֹּרֶךְ is explicative (= namely), and serves to introduce an explanatory clause, intended to sustain the force of the figure presented in the preceding sentence while applying the term אֶבֶר—which is not metaphorical in itself—to the host of Israel, and thus to strengthen the conception of the impious character of the attempt.—And stamped upon them, namely, the members of the people of God; cf. v. 18 and chap. vii. 21, 25. The manner in which this part of the prophetic vision was fulfilled under Ant. Epiphanes is recorded in 1 Macc. i. 24; 30, 37; ii. 38. Cf. the reference expressly to this prophecy in 2 Macc. ix. 10.—Verse 11. Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of the host. The masculine הַנְּקִיר is used because the foe who is typified by the horn is intended; cf. xi. 36.—The “prince of the host” is of course not identical with him who is mentioned in Josh. v. 14 (who is probably identical with Michael, Dan. x. 13), but the Most High God Himself, to whom v. 25 refers as the “Prince of princes.” Cf. chap. vii. 8, 20, 25; xi. 36.—And by him the daily sacrifice was taken away. The enemy of God’s people, who is symbolized by the horn, must be regarded as the agent of the two passive verbs הִדָּח and הִשָּׁבַח (for which Hitzig, following the Keri and the versions, unnecessarily desires to substitute the actives הִדָּח and הִשָּׁבַח), “the daily” (Gr. ἐνδελειχισμός), designates, as is shown by the mention of “the place of his sanctuary” immediately afterward, the daily service in the temple, and more particularly, probably the daily morning and evening sacrifices, the עֹלֶה תָּמִיד, Num. xxviii. 3; 1 Chron. xvi. 40; 2 Chron. xxix. 7. Cf. the rabbinical usage which expresses this idea also by הִדָּח simply; cf. also infra, on v. 14.—The events in the history of the theocracy immediately prior to the Christian era, which fulfilled this prophecy in a measure, are narrated in 1 Macc. i. 39, 45 et seq.; iii. 45.—Verse 12. And a host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression; rather, “and war is raised against the daily sacrifice, with outrage.” The imperf. verbs הִדָּח and הִשָּׁבַח are not, indeed, präterites (Hitzig), but they are not used in a strictly future sense (Ewald, Lehrb., p. 829 et seq.). They denote, rather, the idea that the predicted course of conduct accords with the Divine decree, or that it is ordained or permitted by God, thus corresponding to chap. vii. 14, 17, or supra, v. 4. This sense is most readily expressed in the English by the present tense.—הִדָּח does not signify “the host is given up, or devoted to ruin” (De Wette, Von Lengerke, Hävernick, Kranichfeld, etc.), but, “a war is carried on, a warlike expedition is begun, a campaign is undertaken” (cf. Isa. xl. 2). The correct view was already entertained by Jerome, Luther, etc., and among moderns by Hitzig, Kamphausen, and Ewald, the latter of whom justly notices the contrast between אֶבֶר here and the same word in v. 10, where it stands in a different sense, and therefore translates,

“and the compulsion of a host is imposed on the daily.” His idea is that compulsion is employed for the purpose of introducing idolatrous worship in place of the service of the true God, and particularly, compulsion to service in the host, so that “host stands opposed to host, serfdom to the true service (of God), coercion to freedom.”—In imitation of Theodotion (καὶ ἰδὼν ἐπὶ τοῦ θυλάκου ἀπαρτία), Bertholdt makes the very uncalled-for proposition of rejecting אֶבֶר from the text, and then reading שָׁבַח. שָׁבַח unquestionably indicates the method of making war upon the daily sacrifice; it stands sensus obfectivo, to designate the outrageous heathen idolatry or sacrificial service, which superseded the worship belonging to the true faith. The same feature occurs in v. 13, where אֶבֶר is added, to strengthen the idea.*—And it cast (“casts”) down the truth to the ground. The subject of הִשָּׁבַח (for which Hitzig, following the Septuagint, Theodot., and Syr., prefers to read הִדָּח) is the הָרֶן, which is last mentioned in v. 10, and which forms the principal feature of the entire description before us. The "truth" (אֱמֻנָה, Theodot., δικαιοσύνη) to be cast down by this "horn" is the true religion, the objective truth of God, which is revealed in the law and the prophets (cf. Psa. xix. 10; xxx. 10; also Dan. ix. 13). V. 14 shows that its being cast down, like that of the daily sacrifice, shall continue but for a brief period.—And it practised and prospered; rather, "and it accomplishes this, and prospers," namely, because of the Divine permission. The words, and indeed the verse as a whole, serve to recapitulate and gather together the preceding statements.

Verses 13, 14. A question, concerning the duration of the oppression of the truth, and the answer to this question. Then I heard one saint speaking. This speaking angel (for אֱמֻנָה here signifies an angel, cf. אֱמֻנָה, chap. iv. 10, and also Deut. xxxiii. 2; Job v. 1; xv. 5; Psa. lxxxix. 6, 8; Zech. xiv. 1) enters into the vision here described without previous notice, because the prophet conceives of the whole scene as surrounded by angels, similar to chap. vii. 10; cf. v. 16, and analogous features (perhaps in imitation of this passage) in the night visions of Zechariah, e.g., Zech. i. 9 et seq., 13 et seq.; ii. 2, 5, 7; iii. 1 et seq.; iv. 1 et seq. The prophet does not state what the angel, who is introduced in this mysterious and dream-like manner, said at first, evidently because he does not know, i.e., because, although he has heard him speak, he has not understood his words. He saw, therefore, two angels, who were engaged in conversing with each other, and heard one of them say something which he failed to understand; the question, however, which the other addressed to the first speaker was so clearly apprehended by the prophet that he was able to repeat it in the latter half of this verse. Ewald puts it, correctly: "Thus, at the first moment of silence after that speech, he suddenly hears one angel ask another, with whom he is conversing," etc. Hitzig, Kamphausen, etc., on the other hand, are arbitrary: "The second angel addressed the speaker, by directing an inquiry in the interest of Daniel to him (v. 13 b), by replying to which the other angel became for the first time a speaker." According to this the greater part of v. 13 would be a logical parenthesis, and the words "and he said unto me" at the beginning of v. 14 would serve simply to resume the introductory words of v. 13; the language of the writer, however, does not accord with this view. His evident aim is to repeat what he has overheard of a conversation between two angels; otherwise the most simple course for him would have been to address the inquiry concerning the duration of the tribulation to the angel in person, as in chap. vii. 16, which is, in other respects, an analogous case.—How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice. "The vision," i.e., the subject of the vision, which is here more specially indicated by the two genitives that follow, viz.: אֱמֻנָה וְהַזֶּהֱבֵה. The anxious question as to "how long?" (cf. Isa. vi. 11) is caused by the fearful and alarming character of the profanation and destruction, as seen in the vision of the prophet.—And the transgression of desolation; rather, "and the horrible transgression." אֲשֶׁר, the partic. of אֲשֶׁר, "to be astonished," and then "to be desolate or laid waste," certainly expresses the idea of the "horrible or monstrous" (Lat. horrendus), whether the intransitive sense of "being astounded," or, in accord with Ezek. xxxvi. 3, the less general transitive sense of "laying waste," be regarded as the radical meaning; cf. on chap. ix. 27. In the latter case it would probably be necessary to translate the participle as a substantive in apposition; "and (of) the transgressor, the destroyer;"* but in the former case also, where the adjective sense "horrible" (Ewald) or "astounding" (Kranichfeld) is chosen, the participle must be regarded as a kind of appositional supplement to אֱמֻנָה, to which it is therefore added without the article (as in Ezek. xxxix. 27). The expression אֲשֶׁר אֱמֻנָה, instead of which אֲשֶׁר אֱמֻנָה might have been expected (cf. xi. 31), produces a solemn emphasis, which warrants the urgent question that is proposed.—To give both the sanctuary (rather, "the most sacred thing") and the host to be trodden under foot, i.e., to give both the holy sacrifice (the central point of worship) and the community of the saints of the Most High (cf. vii. 13, 22, 27), the partakers of the theocratic covenant, to be trodden under foot (thus Ewald, correctly). [The grammatical construction of the latter clause of the verse seems to be that אֱמֻנָה and אֲשֶׁר אֱמֻנָה are all in dependence upon הָיָה, like אֲשֶׁר אֱמֻנָה preceding. "How long shall be . . . (the) giving, and (the) sanctuary, and (the) host (to be) trampled." אֲשֶׁר אֱמֻנָה thus qualifies all the last three nouns, the latter two directly as an adj., and the former as an equivalent for the infin.] "The expression adds nothing that is new to the former statements, but simply repeats the comprehensive estimate of the condition of the Jewish religion referred to, and the outrage committed against it, in the light of the idea that they are permitted by a superior Providence; and, in point of fact, the only object of the question is to recapitulate what has already been said. The asyndetic connection accords with the abrupt conciseness of the description, and the disjunctive וְ before אֲשֶׁר אֱמֻנָה and אֲשֶׁר אֱמֻנָה, added to the lack of conjunctions, is suited to its poetic character (note also the omission of articles). Consequently, everything that Hitzig regards as objectionable in this place, and that he urges against the traditional pointing for the purpose of removing הָיָה to the preceding clause, arises naturally from the subject itself. Moreover, the explanation of הָיָה by Hitzig, 'to permit the horrible transgression to go on,' has no parallel, neither in v. 12, nor in Isa.

* [Stuart, on the other hand, strongly contends for the passive sense of אֲשֶׁר אֱמֻנָה here, "equivalent to which ought to be laid waste or destroyed," as being sustained not only by the intransitive force of the root, but by the distinctive use of the transitive אֲשֶׁר אֱמֻנָה in ch. ix. 27. Kell takes substantially the same view.]

x. 6, where, like the synonymous לַעֲשׂוֹת , 'to make into something,' it is joined to a double accusative; and when Hitzig takes לֵב at first in the sense of 'to permit,' and immediately afterward makes it signify 'to make into something,' the artificial zeugma certainly does not diminish the imaginary difficulty which, in view of the disjunctive vav, he discovers in the vav that is not prefixed to לֵב , (Kranichfeld.)—Verse 14. And he said unto me. Thus all the MSS., which read וַיֹּאמֶר , while the ancient translators, and among modern expositors, Bertholdt, Dereser, Hitzig, Ewald, etc., prefer וַיִּשָּׁאֵר . The latter form certainly seems to accord better with the contents of v. 13, since it is supposed that the $\text{מַלְאָכִים הַשְּׁנַיִם}$ (cf. Ruth iv. 1) who says what follows, would address it to the other angel, who inquires of him; but it is conceivable, on both logical and psychological grounds, that the witness to the conversation of the angels would represent the information conveyed in the reply to the angel's question as imparted to himself, because he was still more interested in that information than was the inquirer. Accordingly, he substitutes himself for the angel, because the interest felt by him in equal measure justifies him in identifying himself to some extent with the questioner.—Unto two-thousand and three-hundred days ("evening-mornings"); then shall the sanctuary be cleansed (rather, "justified"). The "justifying of the sanctuary" is the re-consecration of the desecrated sanctuary and its services (which were permitted to be trodden under foot), which is accomplished by the renewal of the daily sacrifices. וַיִּצְדָּק consequently denotes a being justified by that work, and, in its position at the head of the apodosis to the antecedent clause beginning with the connective וַעַד , expresses to some extent the sense of the fut. exactum. The material justification or renewal of the perfection of the host, according to v. 13, the second of the objects exposed to being "trodden under foot," is conceived of as essentially coincident with that of the sanctuary, or as immediately involved in it, and for that reason is not expressly mentioned. The neglect to mention the host does not warrant the conclusion reached by Hitzig, under reference to 1 Macc. v. 2 et seq., that the author intended to point out that its state of being trodden under foot was to be more protracted, while that of the sanctuary was to cease at an earlier date.—The duration of the period which is to precede the re-dedication of the sanctuary, is again indicated by a mystically indefinite and equivocal limitation of time, as in chap. vii. 25. The 2,300 evening-mornings ($\text{עֶרְבַּיִם בֹּקְרִיִּים$) cannot be intended to signify so many days (as Bertholdt, Hävernicks, v. Lengerke, etc., assume), for although the several days are, in Gen. i. 5 et seq., divided into the two parts which represent them, עֶרֶב and בֹּקֶר , they are not numbered accordingly; and the Gr. συνήμερον , which is often adduced in comparison, is the less adapted to serve as an analogy or ground of probability for the signification of evening-morning as synonymous with "day," as $\text{עֶרְבַּיִם בֹּקְרִיִּים}$ can hardly be regarded as a compound word (on the analogy of לַיְלָה), but is, on the contrary, an asyndeton, arising from the poetic brevity of expression in this section (similar to $\text{וַיִּשָּׁאֵר עַד הַיּוֹם}$ in v. 13), which, so far from being a "current phrase" or "stereotyped formula," occurs only in this place as a designation of time. The limitation of the expression in this sense to this passage indicates, with an almost absolute certainty, that עֶרֶב and בֹּקֶר do not signify the corresponding periods of the day, but rather the sacrifices required to be offered in them. The whole prophecy relates principally to the $\text{עֶרְבַּיִם בֹּקְרִיִּים}$, to which the passage under consideration assigns an especially prominent position; but as, according to Ex. xxix. 41 (cf. infra, chap. ix. 21), this consists of a מִזְבֵּחַ עֶרֶב and a מִזְבֵּחַ בֹּקֶר , the terms "evening" and "morning" in this place clearly denote the evening and morning sacrifices, or, if it be preferred, the times at which they were offered. "Morning" and "evening" are therefore to be counted separately; * and thus the period indicated by the author covers 1,150 days instead of 2,300. This period is nearly equivalent to the three and a half years in chap. vii. 25, while, on the other hand, the later numbers of 1,290 and 1,335 days (chap. xii. 11 et seq.) exceed the medium of three and a half years but little. How this discrepancy in the limits assigned to the duration of the time of anti-Christian persecution and oppression is to be explained, and, in particular, how the number in this place is to be interpreted, is of course very uncertain, and must always remain undecided. In general, those expositors of the truth who always come nearest to the sense of the prophetic author, will regard the present number 1,150 as a designed narrowing, and the numbers 1,290 and 1,335 as a designed extension or overstepping of the limit of three and a half years, and seek to establish a conformity to law both in the narrowing and the extension of that period. If it is assumed that this book limits the year to 360 days (or to twelve months of thirty days each) besides five intercalated days, amounting in all have no copula or conjunction between them; it would therefore seem to be a popular mode of compound expression, like that of the Greek συνήμερον (2 Cor. xi. 25), in order to designate the whole of a day. Compare Gen. i., where the evening and morning constitute respectively day the first, day the second, etc.; for it seems plain that the phraseology before us is derived from this source. In other words, $\text{עֶרְבַּיִם בֹּקְרִיִּים}$, as here employed, may be admitted to contain an allusion to the morning and evening sacrifices, and thus the phrase virtually becomes a kind of substitution for $\text{מִזְבֵּחַ עֶרֶב וּמִזְבֵּחַ בֹּקֶר}$, which is generic, and includes both the morning and the evening sacrifice."—Stuart. "That in ver. 26 $\text{עֶרְבַּיִם בֹּקְרִיִּים}$ (the evening and the morning) stands for the phrase in question, does not prove that the evening and morning are reckoned separately, but only that evening-morning is a period of time consisting of evening and morning. When the Hebrews wish to express separately day and night, the component parts of a day of a week, then the number of both is expressed. Thus they say, e.g., forty days and forty nights (Gen. vii. 4, 12; Exod. xxiv. 18; 1 Kings xix. 8), or three days and three nights (Jonah ii. 1; Matt. xii. 40), but not eighty or six days and nights, when they wish to speak of forty or three full days."—Edw.] to 365 days, it will be found (1) that the whole number of 1,277 days, which are necessary to cover the period of three and a half years, is decreased by 127 days, or something more than four months, by the number 1,150; (2) that the number 1,290 adds twelve days or about half a month to 1,277 days or three and a half years; and (3) that the number 1,335 adds fifty-eight days, or nearly two months, to the period of three and a half years. A certain conformity to law is evident from these figures, inasmuch as the two months by which the three and a half years are extended in the last number, are added to the shorter period of three years in the first (i.e., to 1,095 days); or, in other words, in the one case the prophet regards the period of three and a half years as extended by two months, in the other (in the present passage) as shortened by four months. These prophetic limitations of time correspond generally to the events of the primary historical fulfilment of this vision in the Maccabean era of oppression and revolt, without being chronologically covered by them. It has already been shown, on chap. vii. 25, that the interval between the abrogation of the daily sacrifices by Epiphanes (1 Macc. i. 54) and the reconsecration of the sanctuary by Judas Maccabæus (ibid. iv. 52) amounted to three years and ten days, or 1,105 days, thus covering forty-five days or one and a half months less than 1,150 days, as here stated. But if, on the other hand, the arrival in Judæa of Appollonius, the commissioner of tribute (1 Macc. i. 29), is taken as the starting-point of the calculation (as Hitzig does), a result of three and a quarter years to the rededication of the temple is obtained, with tolerable exactness, which amounts at least to from one to one and a half months more than 1,150 days. A comparison of the larger periods of 1,290 and 1,335 days with the circumstances of the era of the religious persecution by Antiochus, as recorded in the books of Maccabees, leads to still more unsatisfactory results (cf. infra, on chap. xii. 11 et seq.). Hence, nothing more definite than a general or approximate correspondence between the predicted periods and their historical counterparts can be looked for; or, what amounts to the same thing, the prophetically-ideal value of the numbers in question must be recognized. Cf. the remarks in the Eth.-fund. principles, etc., No. 1, respecting the necessity that the predictions of any prophet which involve numbers should be only approximately fulfilled. — All the expositors of this passage, whether upholding or denying the composition of Daniel's prophecies during the captivity, are in the end obliged to assume a merely approximate correspondence of the number 1,150 to the periods of the Maccabean era of persecution. Among the former class, the view we have presented comes nearest to that of Delitzsch (p. 280), who holds that, "for reasons which our knowledge of history does not permit us to recognise," the prophet's estimate of the period of something more than three years, from the 15th Chisleu 145 æ. Sel. to the 25th Chisleu 148, is "somewhat inadequate;" and also to that of Kranichfeld (p. 300 et seq.), who diverges from us on the mode of estimating the duration of the years in question, but is wholly agreed on the general principle. His opinion is that here, as well as elsewhere in the book,

Daniel estimated the year at twelve months of thirty days each, intercalating a month of thirty days every third year. This results in exactly 1,290 days for 3½ years, but leaves a discrepancy of forty days between 1,150 days and three years or 1,110 days. With regard to this difference he then observes: "It is equally in harmony with the very general employment of the number forty in the theocratic representations of times of severe trial and sifting (e.g., Gen. vii. 4, 12, 17; Num. xiv. 33, 34; Ezek. iv. 6; xxix. 11 et seq.; 1 Kings xix. 8; Matt. vi. 1 et seq.), and with the author's general usage which employs numbers in an ideal sense (cf. on iv. 13; vii. 25), as well as with the context more especially, that precisely this number should be found in combination with the final half-time. Consequently the amount 1,110 + 40 results as substantially identical with the more direct measurement of the three and a half times in chap. xii. 11; and this discrepancy within the book itself becomes no more strange than that, for instance, which represents the same kingdom at one time as divided into two parts, at another as falling into ten, and again (see supra, on v. 8) as separating into four, in all of which descriptions the same fundamental idea prevails, although presented under different forms." We cannot adopt this estimate of the 1,150 days, by which they are made to consist of 1,110 + 40 days, because it seems too artificial upon the whole, and because the opinion on which it rests, that Daniel added an intercalary month of thirty days to every third year of 360 days, seems to be untenable, and to conflict with the 1,260 days or forty-two months of the Apocalypse, which, beyond all question, are synonymous with the three and a half years of this book (cf. Auberlen, Daniel, etc., pp. 185, 286 et seq.). — Among those who deny the genuineness of this book, Ewald approaches our method of reckoning, upon the whole, inasmuch as he supposes that the author constantly assigns 365 days to the year; and he consequently extends the 1,290 days over three and a half years + one-half month, and the 1,335 days over three and a half years + two months; but he departs from our view in arbitrarily reducing the number 2,300 to 2,230, so as to obtain only 1,115 days, or three years + one month, instead of 1,150 (p. 463). In opposition to such critical violence, Hilgenfeld, Kamphausen, etc., retain the reading 2,300 in the text, reckon the 1,150 days backwards from the dedication of the temple on the 25th Chisleu 148, and accept some unknown event as marking the beginning of the 1,150 days, since they exceed the period to the 15th Chisleu 145 by forty days. Hitzig thinks that only 1,105 days elapsed between the 15th Chisleu 145 and the 25th Chisleu 148, instead of 1,110, and therefore forty-five less than 2,300 evening-mornings, and that this difference of one and a half months "belongs to the interval between the abrogation of the דָּבָר (1 Macc. i. 45) and the introduction of the $\beta\delta\epsilon\lambda\gamma\mu\alpha$ $\epsilon\pi\eta\rho\mu\acute{o}\sigma\epsilon\omega\varsigma$ (ibid. v. 54)." A hasty glance at the description of these incidents in 1 Maccabees will be sufficient to show that this interval of exactly forty-five days between the interdict of the daily sacrifices and the erection of the statue of Zeus in the temple is wholly imaginary. Moreover, the critic contradicts himself, since he employs all his acuteness to prove, on chap. vii. 25, that the Antiochian persecution began at least a quarter of a year, or more than three months, before the 15th Chisleu 145, while he finds it proper in this place to place the abrogation of the לִשְׁמִיטָה , or the beginning of the same period of oppression, only one and a half months earlier than this date.—While the representatives of the opinion that the 2,300 evening-mornings are but half as many days, fail to establish an exact correspondence between the prophecy and its fulfilment, those expositors who regard the language as designating 2,300 days succeed no better. Bertholdt and Hävernicks go three years beyond the time of Antiochus, to the defeat of Nicanor (1 Mac. vii. 43, 49), and assign to that period 2,271 days; the 29 days which, accordingly, are still lacking, are placed by Bertholdt at the close of the period, as an interval between that victory and the consequent celebration of the triumph, while Hävernicks would prefer to assign them to the beginning, prior to the 15th Chisleu 145 (in opposition to both, see Hitzig, p. 136). On the other hand, Dereser, Von Lengerke, Wieseler (Die 70 Jahrwochen, etc., p. 110 et seq.), and Von Hofmann (Weissagung und Erfüllung, I, 295 et seq.) go back to the year 143 æ. Sel. in reckoning the entire period of about six years—Dereser and Hofmann calculating from the 25th Chisleu 148 (the day of the dedication of the temple), and Von Lengerke and Wieseler from the death of Ant. Epiphanes in the month of Shebat 148. The former are thus carried back to the summer of the year 142 in fixing the date of the beginning of the apostasy of the Jews who were seduced by Antiochus, Von Lengerke to Sivan, or the third month, and Wieseler only to the feast of tabernacles in the same year, 142. Wieseler himself afterwards recognized the untenable character of this method of reckoning, and therefore acknowledged his conversion to the exegetically more correct view entertained by a majority of moderns, which estimates only 1,150 days, in his subsequent essay in the Gött. Gelehrten-Anzeigen, 1846.* [The author, the rights of the sanctuary shall be effectually restored, its claims shall be vindicated. This was done when Judas Maccabæus, after the three and a half years in which all temple rites had been suspended, and heathen sacrifices had been offered there, made a thorough expurgation of everything pertaining to the temple, and restored its entire services. This was on the 25th of Dec., 165 B. C., just three years from the time when swine's flesh was first offered there by Antiochus. We have then the terminus ad quem of the 2,300 days; and it is not difficult, therefore, to find the terminus a quo. These days, at thirty in a month (which is clearly the prophetic mode of reckoning), make six years, four months, and twenty days. Dec. 26th of 171 makes six years, and the four months and twenty days will bring the time to the latter half of July in the same year, i.e., 171 B. C. During this year, Menelaus, the high-priest appointed by Antiochus on the ground of a proffered bribe, rifled the temple of many of the treasures to pay that bribe, and in this transaction he was assisted by his brother Lysimachus. The regular and lawful high-priest, Onias III., who had been removed, severely reproveth this sacrilege committed by his brethren; and afterward, through fear of them, fled for refuge to Daphne, an asylum near Antioch, it will be perceived, ignores that class of interpreters, quite common in this country and Great Britain, but comparatively rare in Germany, who understand by the days in question so many years, and generally apply the prophecy to the continuance of the papal supremacy. There is, however, a great discrepancy among these interpreters as to the point of time from which to date the period spoken of, as well as some diversity as to its length, whether 2,300 years or only 1,150 years, although the majority prefer the latter. It would be a tedious, and, in our opinion, a bootless task, to follow them into all the details of their historical investigations, computations, and comparisons. Others, adopting the same substitution of years for "days," apply the prophecy to the rise and sway of Mohammedanism, and make out the requisite dates as best they can. It is an adequate answer to all these interpretations to say that such a meaning of the word day has no sufficient—if any—warrant in Scripture use, and certainly is not hinted at in this entire passage. A calm but fundamental refutation of the theory in question is given by Tregelles, Remarks on Daniel (Lond., 1864, 5th ed.), p. 110 et seq. It is also abundantly met by Stuart in his Commentary on the Apocalypse, II. 459 seq. Elliott, the strongest advocate of this theory, admits (Horæ Apocalypticæ, II. 965) that it was unknown till the close of the fourteenth century, when it was first broached by Walter Brute. It came into vogue with the Reformation, and owes its prevalence, not to any sound exegetical support, but to the in Syria. Thence he was allured by the false promises of Menelaus, and perditionally murdered by the king's lieutenant, Andronicus. See the whole story in 2 Mac. iv. 27 seq. The Jews at Jerusalem, incensed by the violent death of their lawful high-priest, and by the sacrilegious robberies of Menelaus and Lysimachus, became tumultuous, and a severe contest took place between them and the adherents of those who committed the robbery, in which the patriotic Jews at last gained the victory, and Lysimachus was slain at the treasury. This was the first contest that took place between the friends of Antiochus and the adherents to the Hebrew laws and usages. The whole of it was occasioned by the baseness of Antiochus in accepting bribes for bestowing the office of high-priest on those who had no just claim to it. The payment of the bribes occasioned the robbing of the temple and the sacrilege committed there; and this was the commencement of that long series of oppression, persecution, and bloodshed which took place in the sequel under Antiochus.

"We have, indeed, no data in ancient history by which the very day, or even month, connected with the transactions above related can be exactly ascertained. But the year is certain; and, as the time seems to be definite in our text, the fair presumption is, that the outbreak of the populace and the battle that followed constitutes the terminus a quo of the 2,300 days. See Frolich, Annales Reg. Syr., p. 46; and also Usher's Chronol., . . . As to the difference between the time here, viz., 2,300 days, and the three and a half years in vii. 25, if the reader narrowly inspects the latter, he will perceive that the time there specified has relation to the period during which Antiochus entirely prohibited the Jewish religion in every shape. This period, as is well known, corresponds with historical facts. In the passage before us a more extensive series of events is comprised, as vs. 10-12 indicate. They begin with assaults on the priesthood (which we have seen to be matter of fact, as stated above), and end with the desecration and prostration of all that is sacred and holy. It is unnecessary to show that each of the things described belongs to each and every part of the 2,300 days. Enough that the events are successive, and spread over the time specified in our text. The trampling down or degradation of the priesthood and the sanctuary commenced the whole series of oppression and persecution, and this, with most aggravated acts of sacrilege and blasphemy, was also the consummation of the tyrant's outrages." Cowles gives a similar explanation in detail, Commentary, p. 378 et seq.]

Verses 15-19. Preparatory to the interpretation of the vision of the ram and the he-goat. And . . . when I . . . sought for the meaning, namely, of the entire vision that was seen. The seeking was purely subjective, and not expressed in the form of a question addressed to the angel (Von Leng.), nor in a silent prayer to God (Hävernicks).—Behold, there stood before me (one), as the appearance of a man, i.e., appearing like a man. The expression "behold, there stood," etc., indicates the startling and extraordinary character of the apparition, which argued something terrible and superhuman (cf. Job iv. 16); the בְּנֵי אֱלֹהִים then follows to denote the encouraging effect produced on the seer by the manlike appearance of the form. The term בְּנֵי is employed instead of אֱלֹהִים or אֱלֹהִים, doubtless in allusion to the name of the angel, which is given below, in v. 16; see on that passage, and cf. chap. ix. 21, where the same angel is designated as "the man Gabriel," but where his super-human nature is also very clearly implied (in his "flying").—Verse 16. And I heard a man's voice between (the) Ulai, i.e., between the two branches of the Eulæus; cf. supra, on v. 2. בְּנֵי does not stand for בְּנֵי, as if the voice only, and not also the listener, were stationed between the Ulai; nor does אֱלֹהִים signify "between the banks of the Ulai" (against Von Lengerke, Hitzig, etc.).—Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision. בְּנֵי אֱלֹהִים, i.e., "man of God," or also "man-god" (according to Ewald, "a God who kindly condescends to man"), is the name of one of the principal angels or angel-princes (cf. Luke i. 19), one of the ἀρχάγγελοι or אֲרִיִּים (chap. x. 13 et seq.), whose number is fixed at seven in Rev. viii. 2 (οἱ ἑπτὰ ἄγγελοι, οἱ ἐνώπιον τοῦ θεοῦ ἑστῆκασιν), equal to that of the amēshaspendas, who stand beside Ormuzd as a divine council, according to the ancient religious books of Parseeism. The Scriptural archangels, however, of whom another, Michael, is mentioned hereafter in this book, are not to be regarded as identical with the Amēshaspentas of Parseeism; for (1) the number seven in the latter case is obtained only by adding Ormuzd himself to six others; (2) they are not represented as angels or servants of God, but as being themselves divine, and as governing determined portions of creation in that character, e.g., Bohumano (Bohman) governs the sky, Ardihsht the fire, Sapandomad the earth, etc.; (3) the names of the amēshaspendas are as thoroughly Persian or Aryan in their character as those of the Scriptural archangel, so far as they occur in the Holy Bible (namely, Gabriel and Michael, and Raphael in the Apocrypha, Tob. iii. 25; xii. 12 et seq.) are specifically Shemitic, and bear, by virtue of the ending ל in each case, a thoroughly monotheistic character; (4) the attempts to establish the identity of individual amēshaspendas with individual archangels of the Bible must be regarded, without exception, as failures; e.g., the supposed recognition of Chordad (Haur-vatat) in the Apocalyptic "angel of the waters," Rev. xvi. 5 (Hitzig; also Hilgenfeld, Das Judenthum im pers. Zeitalter, in the Zeitschr. f. wissenschaftl. Theologie, 1866, No. 4), the proposed identifying of Gabriel with Croasha and of Michael with Bohman (by Alex. Kohut, Ueber die jüdische Angelologie und Dämonologie in ihrer Abhängigkeit vom Parsismus, in Abhandlungen der Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellschaft, vol. IV. No. 8). Cf. Haneberg, in Rensch's Theolog. Literaturtbl., 1837, No. 3, p. 72; also Döllinger, Heidenthum und Judenthum, p. 361; M. Haug, Essays on the sacred language, writings, and religion of the Parsees, Bombay, 1862.—Ewald appears inclined to regard Gabriel not as one of the superior angels, but as occupying an intermediate or inferior rank, since he designates the "man's voice" which calls to him as that of a still higher angel. This assumption, however, is unnecessary; it is conceivable that an angel of equal rank may have given him this direction, or, if this should not be preferred, that God Himself, giving a human sound to His voice that He might be heard by Daniel, addressed the angel.—It must remain undecided whether the "man's voice" is to be considered as belonging to the former of the בְּנֵי אֱלֹהִים who were speaking together in v. 18, while Gabriel is to be identified with the questioner in that place (as Hitzig supposes), since the author has not definitely indicated such an identity.—Verse 17. So he came near where I stood; literally, "beside my standing" (cf. v. 18). Luther renders it, "and he came hard by me."—And when (or "as") he came, I was afraid, and fell upon my face. Cf. chap. x. 9; Ezek. i. 28; xliii. 3; Rev. i. 17.—Understand, O son of man (—this address is probably modelled after Ezekiel—); for at the time of the end shall be the vision; rather, "for the vision is for the final time," i.e., it refers to the final period of earthly history; cf. v. 19 b. 26. [But these verses do not warrant this interpretation. See below.] The words are not designed to comfort, but to direct attention to the impressive and alarming nature of the prophecy, in which, according to the following context, they are successful.—Verse 18. Now as he was speaking with me, I was in a deep sleep on my face toward the ground; rather, "and while he was speaking with me, I fell stunned upon my face to the ground." Not until this repeated falling down in terror did the "benumbing" or Divine ἐκστασις take place, as the immediate presence of God for the purpose of imparting to the prophet a highly important revelation, was not realized until then. Cf. the case of Moses (Ex. xxxiii. 20), Isaiah (Isa. vi. 5), Peter, John, and James, on the mount of transfiguration (Luke ix. 32), Paul and his companions near Damascus (Acts ix. 4; xxii. 7; xxvi. 12), etc.—But he touched me, and set me upright. Cf. x. 10 et seq.; Neh. ix. 8, etc.—Verse 19. Behold . . . what shall be in the last end or the indignation, namely, of the Divine indignation upon the godless world (the ὀργὴ μεγάλη, 1 Macc. i. 64; cf. Rom. ii. 5; Isa. x. 5, 25; xxvi. 20; Jer. l. 5), which naturally will be manifested most strongly toward the close of human history, when the tares of wickedness shall flourish most luxuriantly (see v. 23 and Matt. xiii. 30, 39; cf. Matt. xxiv. 9 et seq.). For this reason the last times shall constitute a period of great tribulation and woes (ὀλιγοίς, ὀλίγοις—Matt. xxiv. 7 et seq.).—For at the time appointed the end shall be; rather, “for it relates to the point of time of the end.” The subject here, as in v. 17 b, is the vision (הַחֲזוֹן), or rather its contents, which, according to this assurance from the angel, refers to the מוֹדֵד הַכֶּזֶב, the determined point of time of the end.” *

Verses 20–26. The interpretation of the vision. On v. 20, cf. supra, on v. 3; concerning v. 21, on v. 5.—The king of Græcia; properly, of Javan (יָוָן). By this term the Hebrews designated all the Hellenic lands and peoples, because the Ionians (Homer, Ἰάονες) dwelt in the eastern portions of Hellas, and through their colonies in Asia Minor were the first to become acquainted with the Asiatics. The Egyptians, ancient Persians, and Indians appear likewise to have constantly denominated the whole body of Græcian nations as Ionians or Jaonians; Æschylus and Aristophanes, at least, introduce Persians as employing the term Ἰάονες instead of Ἑλλήνες. Cf. generally, Knobel, Völkertafel, p. 78 et seq.—Verse 22. Now that being broken, whereas four stood up for it; rather, “and that which was broken, and in whose stead four stood up.” It should have read, properly, “and concerning this, that it (the great horn) was broken, and that in its stead four stood up;” but instead of this, וְהָיָה כְּהָרִים אֲרֻבָּה, stands abruptly at the beginning (cf. vii. 17), and the echaotic וְהָיָה כְּהָרִים אֲרֻבָּה, “and four stood up,” etc., is subordinate to that

term in its absolute position.—Four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation; רַבְּמַלְכֵיהֶם, an archaism (Gen. xxx. 38; 1 Sam. vi. 12), that here seems to be renewed under the influence of the Chaldee element.—But not in his power. The suffix in בְּכֹחוֹ does not refer back to לְבָנָיו, but to הַמֶּלֶךְ in v. 21 b. The power of the first great Græcian conqueror shall not descend to the kingdoms which spring from his empire; they shall not equal him, neither singly, nor all taken together.—Verse 23. And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, namely, of the measure of their wicked plans and actions; cf. the same elliptic usage of הָיָה in chap. ix. 24 Keri, and in addition Gen. xv. 16; 2 Macc. vi. 14; Matt. xxiii. 32; 1 Thess. ii. 16. The פְּעֻרֵים who are here charged with “filling the measure of their sins” are not the Israelites who have forsaken Jehovah and His law (Dereser, Von Lengerke, Kranichfeld), but, without doubt, the enemies of God's people, the heathen oppressors of the saints of the Most High; for the term פְּעֻרֵים alludes with sufficient clearness to פְּעֻרֵים in va. 6, 12, and 13. For the opinion that this does not probably refer to the servants and abettors of Antiochus Epiphanes, but rather to his predecessors, see supra, on v. 9.—A king of fierce (rather, “insolent”) countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up. וְהָיָה כְּהָרִים אֲרֻבָּה, properly, “of hard countenance” (cf. Dent. xxviii. 50; Isa. xix. 4). The predicate probably refers chiefly to the blasphemous sayings of the tyrant, see chap. vii. 8 et seq. The following predicate, מְבָרֵךְ חֲדָדוֹת, “versed in riddles,” denotes his art of cunning dissimulation, by which he is able to conceal his purposes from both friend and foe; cf. v. 25, and xi. 21, 27.—Verse 24. And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power. The implied thought is, “but by Divine permission;” cf. va. 12 and 13, and also Isa. x. 5 et seq.; 1 Sam. ii. 9, etc.—It is incorrect to supply, with Dereser, Von Lengerke, etc., an antithesis to “not by his own power,” so that it will read “but by his cunning.” וְהָיָה כְּהָרִים אֲרֻבָּה is a litotes, which, exactly similar to the expression “without hand” (chap. ii. 34 and infra, v. 25), alludes to the superhuman providence of God as compared to human power, which is never more than impotence.—And he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper; וְהָיָה כְּהָרִים אֲרֻבָּה, an adverb, as in Job xxxvii. 5. For what remains, cf. supra, v. 12 b.—And shall destroy the mighty (ones) and the holy people. The וְהָיָה כְּהָרִים אֲרֻבָּה is explicative; it is designed to denote more particularly the respects in which the king shall prosper. The “mighty ones” are the warlike enemies over whom he shall triumph, and to them are added, by way of contrast, the

* [Stuart and Keil, on the contrary, strongly maintain that “the transgressors” here are not the heathen, but the apostate Jews, whose sin will be visited by the indignation of God; and this seems to be more appropriate to the whole connection.]

"nation of saints" (cf. vii. 18, 22), as unwarlike opponents. In the opinion of Hitzig, Ewald, etc., the שְׁמִינִיּוֹת are the three pretenders to the crown whom Epiphanes was compelled to depose; but not one of these deserved to be called a mighty one, not even the usurper Heliodorus; see supra, on chap. vii. 8, 25.*—Verse 25. And through (rather, "according to") his policy he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand. עַל-שָׂכְלוֹ is probably not "by reason of," but "according to his cunning;" cf. Psa. cx. 4; Esth. ix. 26, etc. This expression, in an absolute position at the beginning, is connected with the principal sentence which follows by an emphatic וְ; cf. Gesenius, Thesaur., p. 396 a. יִהְיֶה is not transitive (Hitzig, et al.), as if the following מְרִימָה were its accusative, but probably intransitive, despite the fem. מְרִימָה; cf. Isa. liii. 10.—"In (or with) his hand" (cf. Isa. xlv. 20), considered as the outward sphere of action, seems intended to form an antithesis to the following "in his heart." Concerning וְיִכְרֹם and the signification of וְיִכְרֹם which results from it, cf. supra, on v. 4.—And by peace shall destroy many; rather, "and unawares shall destroy many." וְיִכְרֹם does not exactly signify "in the midst of profound peace" (Job xv. 21), but more indefinitely, "with suddenness, by a malignant surprise," an illustration of the malice and dissimulation practised by this tyrant, which were already mentioned in v. 23. The circumstance that it is recorded of Antiochus Epiphanes, in 1 Macc. i. 30, καὶ ἐπέπεσεν ἐπὶ τὴν πόλιν ἐξάπνῃ, proves nothing in favor of a vañic. ex senili, beyond the fact that malignant and sudden surprises are necessarily practised by every warlike foe of cruel disposition. *["In the רַבִּים (many) are comprehended 'the mighty (one) and the holy people' (ver. 24).—Kell.].—He shall also stand up against the Prince of princes, etc. Cf. v. 11. and with regard to the being "broken without hand," cf. chap. ii. 34; also Job xxxiv. 20 and Lam. iv. 6. It is not necessary to seek a definite reference to the death of Epiphanes by sickness or extraordinary accident in this passage, instead of permitting him to fall on the battle-field, or by the hand of a murderer (against Bertholdt, Von Lengerke, Hävernicks, etc.).†—Verse 26. And the vision of the evening and the morning which was told, namely, in v. 14. Since the observation in that place respecting the 2,300 evening-mornings was really a מִשְׁמַע, and not a מְרִימָה, the words וְאִשְׁרֵי נְאֻמֵּי רִגְוֹ seem to refer back to the genitive וְאִשְׁרֵי רִגְוֹ instead of to the Stat. constr. (thus Hitzig). Words and things told, however, form the subject of visions in other cases also (cf. Isa. ii. 1; Am. i. 1; Hab. ii. 1, etc.); and the remark concerning the 2,300 evening-mornings may consequently be termed a "vision" in this instance.—Is true (rather "truth"), i.e., it is correct, deserves to be credited, inasmuch as 2,300 evening-mornings must elapse before the end of the period of affliction. That period is thus determined as an extended one, which shall not soon reach its close. On מִשְׁמַע, cf. chap. x. 1; xi. 2; also xii. 7; Jer. xxvi. 15; xxviii. 9; Rev. xix. 9; xxi. 5; xxii. 6.—Wherefore shut thou up the vision; rather, "and thou, conceal the vision," i.e., do not publish it, do not be anxious to spread a report concerning it. וְהָרַם is not equivalent to וְהָרַם, "to seal up" (Theodotion, Hävernicks, Von Lengerke); for "sealing" is added to the mere "concealing" in chap. xii. 4, as a strengthening term.—For it shall be for many days, i.e., it (the vision) shall retain its prophetic value for a long period, it does not relate to a near, but to a distant future; cf. chap. xii. 4, 9. As the direction to conceal the vision is here based on the consideration that a long period must elapse before it shall be fulfilled, so, on the contrary, the prophet is directed, in Rev. xxii. 10, not to seal what has been revealed to him, because the time of its fulfilment is near. Notice the difference between the Old-Testament seer, who is far removed from the final future, and only sees it primarily in types (e.g., instead of beholding the antichrist he only sees his forerunner Epiphanes), and the New-Testament prophet, who beholds the events of the last times in the history of the world much nearer at hand, and is therefore not obliged to conceal the prophecies relating to them, especially since he addresses a community composed exclusively of θεοδιδάκτοι (Isa. liv. 8; John vi. 45; cf. 1 John ii. 20, 27).

Verse 27. The effect of the vision upon the prophet. And I Daniel fainted, and was sick (certain) days. Cf. vii. 28, and especially chap. ii. 1, in relation to וְנִיחֵי.—Afterward I rose up, namely, from the sick-bed. This formal statement by the prophet cannot be regarded as extraordinary, since not only the vision as such (i.e., by reason of its startling character), but also the fasting which preceded it (cf. chap. ix. 3; x. 2 et seq.), comes under consideration as the cause of the complete exhaustion which followed.—And did the king's business. Concerning the extent to which Daniel might have transacted official business for the king in the reign of Belshazzar, without being personally known to him, see on chap. v. 7.—And was astonished at (rather, "dumb concerning")

* ["שְׁמִינִיּוֹת does not here signify many, numerous, many individual Israelites (Von Leng., Maurer, Kliefoth [Stuart]), partly because in ver. 26 רַבִּים stands for that, partly because of the קְדוּשָׁה, by which we are to understand the people of Israel."—Kell.]

† ["The language is adapted to the symbol, namely, the little horn. The meaning is, totally destroyed. Facts correspond. According to history, Antiochus, after marching into Persia, and robbing the temple at Elymais, was driven away by popular tumult; and on his return back towards Syria, he was met with the news of the total defeat of his army in Judaea, and of the restoration of the temple services there. Polybius (XXXI. 11) says of him, that 'he fell mad (δαιμονιῆρας) and died'; 1 Macc. vi. 8 relates that he fell sick of grief for his losses; Appian (De reb. Syr., LXVI.) says simply: φθίνας ἐλαυνήσας. Various shades are given to the picture by the different writers; e.g., in 1 Macc. vi. 8 seq., which narrates his penitent confessions. But these have a strong tinge of Jewish coloring. So much is undoubtedly true, viz., that he perished suddenly by a violent sickness, during which he probably fell into a state of mania. He died, therefore, without violence by the hand of man, and so as to make a deep impression of perishing by a peculiar visitation of God."—Stuart.] the vision, but ("and") none understood (rather, "became aware of") it; usually rendered, "none understood it," or, "and to me there was no understanding. I did not understand it" (thus Maurer, Hitzig, Kranichfeld, Kamphausen, etc., under comparison with chap. xii. 8). Since, however, the obvious design is to state what Daniel did "to conceal" the vision, the signification of "not noticing, not learning" seems to be the only logical and suitable one for לֹא יָדָעָה in this passage; cf. on this interpretation, vs. 5, 17; Job xxviii. 23; Isa. xxviii. 19, etc.

ETHICO-FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES RELATED TO THE HISTORY OF SALVATION, APOLOGE-TICAL REMARKS, AND HOMILETICAL SUG-GESTIONS.

1. The principal difficulty to be met with in this section relates to the concrete number of 1150 days or 2300 evening-mornings, in v. 14, and in its failure to agree with the three and a half years of the preceding vision (chap. vii. 25). If simply the idea was to be expressed that the period of tribulation should expire in something less than three and a half years, why did the author not permit the angel to say, "even before three and a half years shall have passed," etc.? Or why did he not select really a round number, as 1200 days (to denote 1277, which amount exactly to three and a half years)? Or why did he not pursue the course adopted by the New-Test. apocalypticist, who substituted forty-two months for forty-two and a half, and hence 1260 days for 1277 (see Rev. xi. 2; xii. 6; xiii. 5)?—This strange feature admits of a correct explanation, only when it is remembered that prophecies relating to time are necessarily and unavoidably of a symbolic-concrete character, and that for this reason, no exact correspondence, or mechanically precise agreement of the prophetic numbers with the extent of the periods in which they are realized, can be expected. Neither the seventy years of being forgotten and of ruin which Isaiah predicted for the Tyrians (chap. xxv. 15-18), nor the seventy years of captivity in Babylon, which Jeremiah (chap. xxv. 11, et seq.; xxix. 10 et seq.) foretold to the Israelites of his time, were fulfilled with literal exactness* (cf. infra. on chap. ix.); and as the "two days" (יָמֵי) during which Israel's state of death or the period of its affliction was to continue, according to Hos. vi. 2, have primarily an ideal-symbolic value only, so the "three days and three nights," which were to be spent by the prophet in the belly of the great fish, according to Jon. ii. 1, were, in like manner, not an exact number, amounting to precisely seventy-two hours (cf. Kleinert on that passage)—and yet both these prophetic numbers were designed to foretell the resurrection of the Saviour on the third day, i.e., after two whole nights and one entire day.* The prophets are accustomed to employ concrete conceptions of time, and to clothe them in definite form. This form might arise from any incident or event, most of which can no longer be discovered; but their relation to the duration of the events which fulfil the prophecy must as certainly be a merely approximate agreement, and not mathematically exact, as the manner in which God secures the fulfilment of the prophecies uttered by holy men through the Spirit, is in nowise a matter entrusted to man, but belongs only to the God who brings the predictions to pass (cf. 2 Pet. i. 20 et seq.)† The predictions of the prophets in the Church during the Middle Ages and in modern times (e.g., St. Hildegard, Joachim, the Parisian professor Nicholas Oresmius, who, in 1364, foretold the great papal schism, which actually broke out in 1378; Huss and Savonarola, who predicted the Reformation; the Lutheran Michael Stiefel of Jena († 1507); the astrologer Nostradamus († 1566); and finally J. A. Benzel and Jung-Stilling) might be substantially treated in the same manner, so far as they assume a numerically exact, or definitely chronological form.‡ The partial non-agreement of their predictions with the points of time or periods of the future in which they were to be realized does not destroy their character as genuine prophecies, or disprove that they were employed in a superior and heavenly calling; but the approximate agreement or partial coincidence of their vaticinations with the facts of fulfilment and their chronological relations, does not warrant a suspicion that they were forged subsequently to the beginning of their fulfilment, any more than the approximate agreement of either the 1150 days or the three and a half years, etc., in the prophecy before us, with the epochs of the Maccabean history will justify the pseudo-Daniel tendency-hypothesis.

2. While the slight difference between the prophetic number and the events connected with its realization, discussed above, belongs undoubtedly to the category of those "slight discrepancies" which, according to M. v. Niebuhr,

* [The "three days and three nights" in question are an exact expression according to Hebrew usage, which includes both extremes in all such periods.]

† Cf. Tholuck Die Propheten und ihre Weissagungen: eine apologetisch-hermeneutische Studie (Gotha, 1860), p. 115 et seq., where the remark is made concerning the seventy years of Jeremiah, considered as being a designation of time that agreed, generally at least, with the duration of the captivity. "Can any means of escaping this conclusion be discovered? Only that one, which, among others, Ewald has not despised, viz., to regard the number seventy as a round number, and therefore = 'a long time.' . . . Is then, round number really = long time in the Oriental use of language? The master of Old-Test. language will certainly not attempt to deny that it rather denotes an 'approximate limitation of time!' . . . Such numbers are clearly approximate, e.g., in Am. ii. 4, where it is said, 'For three transgressions of Judah and for four, I will not turn away,' etc.; Mic. v. 6, 'Then shall we raise against him seven shepherds and eight principal men'; cf. Hos. vi. 2. In like manner a desolation of forty years is predicted for Egypt, by Ezekiel, in chap. xxix. 11, 12, which is, indeed, a round number of probable reckoning, but is, at the same time, an approximate number, namely, 36 or 37," etc. [But these conventional numbers in a general statement are very different from those obviously given as chronological data.]

‡ In relation to the prophets of the Christian era, above referred to, and also with regard to several others, cf. the interesting statements in Splittgerber, Schicksal und Tod, etc. (Halle, 1866), p. 238-253. [But sound theologians—indeed, accurate observers merely—would certainly place all these pseudo-predictions on a very different level from those of the prophets of Scripture.]

"must excite our awe, instead of begetting a doubt of the truth of the prophecy, or shaking our confidence in the chronology of ancient history" (Geschichte Assurs und Babels, p. 90), the relation between the character of the history of nations and kingdoms as described in the vision under consideration, and the condition of Israel during the era of oppression and revolt in the Maccabean age, which corresponds to it as a primary historical fulfilment, is such, that it unconditionally forbids the idea that the vision is a prophecy ex eventu, and was composed to favor a tendency. There is no complete and thorough correspondence between prophecy and fulfilment, that could favor the suspicion of its composition under such circumstances and for such a purpose; on the contrary, the discrepancies are so numerous, that to trace historical facts which shall correspond in every case to the particular features of the prophetic vision, involves the greatest uncertainty and difficulty. Bertholdt and v. Lengerke assume that the chapter was written shortly after the death of Antiochus Epiphanes; Hitzig, that it was composed shortly before that event; Bleek (Jahrb. für deutsche Theologie, 1860, No. 1, p. 57), that it was framed at least about that time. "According to this, the section was at any rate composed at a time when the Jews had already demonstrated their superiority in arms over the troops of the tyrant. At the same time, these bloody feats of arms, which formed the basis of all the hopes that animated the newly-awakened national consciousness of the Jews, are not mentioned with a single word. As in chap. vii. the heathen oppressor triumphs in battle over the holy people to the end of the three and a half times, so in this selection the host and sanctuary are represented as being trodden under foot until the close of the period mentioned in v. 14. Even the restoration of the sanctuary (v. 14), which might at least indirectly be interpreted as consequent on a warlike triumph of the Jews, is, in v. 25, referred only to a theocratic judgment imposed directly by God, and not to a national victory. The latter, indeed, is directly excluded. The great deeds of the oppressor only are spoken of, and his overthrow $\overline{\text{וְיִשְׁמְרוּ}}$ is immediately connected with them. Every real foundation for the opinion that this section originated at that juncture which was marked by the triumphs over Apollonius and Seron, over Gorgias and Lysias, dearly bought as they were with the blood of the people, is thus taken away, since the situation described in the chapter, testifies only to defeat down to the time of restoring the temple, and denotes a disposition which looked for help only from a supernatural agency" (Kranichfeld, p. 286 et seq.).—Remarkable as is this total silence respecting the national revolt, which was so successfully introduced, when the author is regarded as a Maccabean pseudo-Daniel, it is no less difficult to understand why, if the vision was recorded soon after the death of Antiochus, the Messianic hopes which must have been connected with that death, should not be mentioned with a single word. The only tolerable explanation of this fact is that the death of the oppressor (his "being broken without hand," v. 25) was future to the writer, as much so as everything else. Even the restoration of the temple-service, which had been abolished, is clearly placed in the future by the description in v. 14, and does not appear as an incident in the past experience of the prophet. The only comfort offered by him in the entire section has no relation to the sufferings of the present or the past, but to tribulations belonging to the far-distant future.

3. The only circumstance which seems seriously to favor the theory of a Maccabean composition is the express mention of Javan in v. 21, as the world-power from which the impious oppressor of Israel should come forth (preceded, however, by a number of anti-theistic kingdoms [v. 22] and wicked sovereigns [v. 23]). But this circumstance also loses its apparent character, as disproving the origin of the chapter during the captivity, and becomes decidedly more intelligible, as soon as we remember the frequent contact of the orientals with Hellenic civilization and culture, as well as with Gracian military art and bravery, which began even before the time of Nebuchadnezzar (see Introd. § 7, Note 2). Let it also be remembered that the ancient prophecy by Balaam (Num. xxiv.), which threatened destruction to the Assyrians and Hebrews through "ships from Chittim," i.e., through Greek invasions from the sea (cf. supra, on chap. ii.), must have been known to Daniel, even if it had originated as late as the age of Salmanser and Sennacherib, and afterward been incorporated with the early history in the Pentateuch. There is no lack of natural indications arising from the events of current history, which might suggest to a seer of the period of the exile, that precisely the distant nation of the Greeks would become a threatening rival, and eventually, a victorious opponent of the Persian power and greatness, and which might also awaken in him a presentiment of the internally divided and disunited, and therefore transient character of the future empire of the Greeks. The definite character of the predictions respecting the development of that Javanic empire is certainly marvellous and inexplicable, unless referred to the Divine Spirit of prophecy; but it is scarcely more wonderful than the equally definite character of Balaam's prophecy, which likewise related to the Greeks, or than the surprising clearness and confidence with which Amos foretold that the Israel of his day should "go into captivity beyond Damascus" (chap. v. 27), or Isaiah was able to predict that the successors of Hezekiah should be led into captivity at Babylon (chap. xxxix. 6 et seq.; 2 Kings xx. 17 et seq.), or Jeremiah could describe to his contemporaries the overthrow of Babylon by the Medo-Persians! Cf. also Kranichfeld, p. 128 et seq.

4. The real and fundamental Messianic feature of this section, and, at the same time, the thought which is pre-eminently adapted to practical homiletical treatment, is that already noticed in the exegesis of vs. 19 and 23, according to which the moral degradation and the wickedness of the world-power in its hostility to God becomes more excessive with each stage through which that power passes in its development, until it reaches its climax, when God interferes to judge and deliver—thus bringing it, in its character as an oppressive, pseudo-prophetic antichristianity, into the strongest contrast with the transparent light and holiness of the Messiah and the community of His saints, who are born of God. This thought is also presented by the Saviour in the parable which describes the tares as growing together with the good seed in the field, and as ripening for the harvest at the judgment (Matt. xiii. 30 et seq.); it is the same Messianic truth and necessity to which he refers in the former half of his oratio eschatologica in thoroughly prophetic language (Matt. xxiv. 5 et seq.); it is the fundamental thought of all apocalyptic prophecy, of all prophecy relating to the future history of empires, as the analogous sections in 2 Thess. and the book of Revelation show with sufficient clearness. The goats triumph over the more harmless rams in the last times; the place of the weaker horns that arise against the Lord is supplied by others who succeed each other in constantly increasing strength. The "great power" of the enemy is reinforced by "great cunning," which increases with the lapse of time; and his insolence is joined to craft which steadily develops, and to malignant dissimulation (cf. vs. 23-25), until, through the instigation of the great arch-enemy, who is ever the same, nation rises against nation, and kingdom against kingdom. To increase the need and oppression of the righteous, many false prophets arise and practice their deceitful arts, and because iniquity abounds, the love of many waxes cold (Matt. xxiv. 7 et seq., 11 et seq.).—If all this, considered as the real fundamental idea of the visional representation, be duly regarded, the jejune character of this section, which at first sight seems to offer nothing that possesses practical value, or that is available for homiletical purposes, will speedily disappear; and as the danger of feeling that only unimportant features, such as the animal-symbols (vs. 3-7) or the doctrine of angels (vs. 13-18), are here presented, becomes less, the preacher will find the energetic warning and promise by the Saviour, "But he that endureth to the end shall be saved," available as an encouraging and hortatory theme that covers the ground of the whole chapter. This forms the pregnant and solemn expression of the New Testament, which marks the consoling and elevating Messianic back-ground in which the discouraging and stormy scene of the chapter is laid, but which here appears but for a brief moment in the concluding words of v. 19, like the cheering sun at evening against the border of the stormy cloud.

5. Special homiletical suggestions relating to separate passages:

On v. 8 et seq., Melancthon: "Aliquoties dictum est, ad quid prosit tenere predicationes de serie monarchiarum et omnium temporum usque ad extremum judicium? Est Ecclesia hac doctrina et consolationis opus, ne inter tot afflictiones et scandala desperet. Est etiam admonitione opus, ut causas cogitemus afflictionum. . . . Ha atroces comminationes exarscunt nos, ut minus diligentiores in conservanda puritate doctrine et in vita, ne Deus sinat exoriri majores tenebras."—The Tübing. Bib.: "How uncertain is the glory and majesty of the kingdoms of earth! 8. The vision of the seventy weeks of years.

CHAP. IX. 1-27.

- 1 In the first year of [to] Darius, the son of Ahasuerus, of the seed of the Medes
- 2 [Media], which [who] was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans; in the first year of [to] his reign, I Daniel understood by [the] books the number of the years, whereof [which] the word of the Lord [Jehovah] came [was] to Jeremiah the prophet, that he would accomplish [for fulfilling] seventy years in [for] 3 the desolations of Jerusalem. And I set [gave] my face unto the Lord God, to seek¹ by prayer and supplications, with fasting, and sackcloth, and ashes.

- 4 And I prayed ^a unto the Lord [Jehovah] my God, and made my confession, and said, ^a O Lord, the great and dreadful God, keeping the covenant and mercy^a
- 5 to them that love him, and to them that keep his commandments; we have sinned, and have committed iniquity, and have done wickedly, and have rebelled, even by [and there has been a] departing from thy precepts [commandments],
- 6 and from thy judgments; neither have we [and we have not] hearkened unto thy servants the prophets, which [who] spake in thy name to our kings, our
- 7 princes, and our fathers, and to all the people of the land. O Lord, righteousness belongeth unto thee; but [and] unto us confusion [shame] of faces,^a as at this day; to the men [man] of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and unto all Israel, that are near, and that are far off, through [in] all the countries [lands] whither [where] thou hast driven them, because of [in] their trespass [treachery] that they have trespassed [done treacherously] against [with] thee.
- 8 O Lord, to us belongeth confusion [shame] of face [faces], to our kings, to our princes, and to our fathers, because we [or, we who] have sinned against [to] thee. To the Lord our God belong mercies^a and forgivenesses,^a though [for] we
- 10 have rebelled against [with] him; neither have we [and we have not] obeyed the voice of the Lord [Jehovah] our God, to walk in his laws, which he set [gave] before us by [the hand of] his servants the prophets.
- 11 Yea, [And] all Israel have transgressed thy law, even by [and there has been a] departing, that they might not [so as not at all to] obey thy voice; therefore [and] the curse is [has] poured upon us, and the oath that is written in the law
- 12 of Moses the servant of God, because we have sinned against [to] him. And he hath confirmed his words, which he spake against us, and against our judges that judged us, by bringing [to bring] upon us a^a great evil; for [, which] under the whole heaven [heavens] hath not been done as [it] hath been done
- 13 upon [in] Jerusalem. As it is written in the law of Moses, [as to] all this evil [, it] is [has] come upon us; yet [and] made we not our prayer before [we besought not the face of] the Lord [Jehovah] our God, that we might [to] turn
- 14 from our iniquities, and understand [become wise in] thy truth. Therefore [And] hath the Lord [Jehovah] watched upon the evil, and brought it upon us; for the Lord [Jehovah] our God is righteous in [upon] all his works which he doeth [has done]; for [and] we obeyed not his voice.
- 15 And now, O Lord our God, that hast brought thy people forth out of the land of Egypt with a mighty hand, and hast gotten [made for] thee renown [a name],
- 16 as at this day; we have sinned, we have done wickedly. O Lord, according to [in] all thy righteousness [righteousnesses], I beseech thee, let thine anger and thy fury be turned away [return] from thy city Jerusalem, thy holy mountain [the mountain of thy sanctuary]; because for [in] our sins, and for [in] the iniquities of our fathers, Jerusalem and thy people are become [are for] a reproach to
- 17 all that are about us. Now, therefore [And now], O our God, hear [hearken to] the prayer of thy servant, and [to] his supplications, and cause thy face to shine upon
- 18 thy sanctuary that is desolate, for the Lord's sake. O my God, incline thine ear, and hear; open thine eyes, and behold [see] our desolations, and the city which is called by the name [upon which thy name has been called]: for we do not present^a our supplications before thee for [upon] our righteousness, but [for it is] for [upon] thy great mercies. O Lord, hear; O Lord, forgive; O Lord, hearken, and do; defer not: for thine own sake, O my God; for thy city and thy people are called by thy name [thy name has been called upon thy city and upon thy people].
- 20 And while I was [And I was yet] speaking, and praying, and confessing my sin and the sin of my people Israel, and presenting my supplication before the Lord [Jehovah] my God for the holy mountain [upon the mountain of the sanctuary]
- 21 of my God; yea, while I was [and I was yet] speaking in prayer,^a even [and, i.e., then] the man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision at [in] the beginning, being caused to fly swiftly, touched [reached] me about the time of the evening
- 22 oblation. And he informed me, and talked [spoke] with me, and said, O
- 23 Daniel, I am [have] now come forth to give thee skill and^a understanding. At [In] the beginning of thy supplications the commandment [word] came [went] forth, and I am [have] come to show thee; for thou art greatly beloved,* therefore [and] understand [in] the matter [word], and consider [have understanding in] the vision [appearance].

- 24 Seventy weeks [sevens] are determined* upon thy people and upon thy holy city [the city of thy sanctuary], to finish the transgression, and to make an end of [seal up] sins, and to make reconciliation for [cover] iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy [holy of holies]. Know, therefore [And thou shalt know], and understand [be wise], that from the going forth of the commandment [word] to restore [return] and to build Jerusalem, unto the Messiah the Prince, shall be seven weeks [sevens], and threescore and two weeks [sevens]: the street shall be built again, and the wall [trench], even [and, i.e., but] in troublous [trouble of the] times. And after [the] threescore and two weeks [sevens] shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself [and there shall be nothing to him]: and the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof [or, his end] shall be with a [the] flood, and unto [till] the end of the war desolations are determined [there is a decision of desolations]. And he shall confirm the covenant with [to] many for one week [seven]: and in the midst [half] of the week [seven] he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for [upon] the overspreading [wing] of abominations he shall make it desolate [there shall be a desolator], even [and] until the consummation, and that determined [decided], shall be poured [it shall pour] upon the desolate.

GRAMMATICAL NOTES.

[וַיִּשְׁמַע] used absolutely here, may be taken in the sense of overslipping, which it often bears, or we may supply "information" from the context.—¹ The form is very intensive. [וַיִּשְׁמַעֲךָ], denoting extreme earnestness.—² Not only is this verb, like the others, emphatic, but the pronoun added gives it a reflexive reference, like the Hithp. of the other verbs, i.e., for myself.—³ The art. prefixed = thy, our, his, my, etc.—⁴ The indef. art. here injures the sense by really making the noun definite.—⁵ Literally, let fall, i.e., rest or base.—⁶ Literally, to make thee wise as to.—⁷ Literally, delights.—⁸ The verb being in the singular indicates the unity or singleness of this entire period.]

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Verses 1-3. The time of the penitential prayer which led to the vision, and the occasion which inspired it. In the first year of Darius, the son of Ahasuerus. Concerning both Darius the Mede and his father Ahasuerus (Theodot., Sept., Vulg., "Assuerus") or Astyages, see the Introd. § 8, note 4. The point of time referred to in the text belongs to a period later than that of the vision in the preceding chapter by more than twenty years, or about B.C. 537;* cf. on chap. v. 30 and vi. 1.—Of the seed of the Medes. The nationality of the new ruler is noticed, because the subject of the prayer which follows, and also of the prophecy respecting the seventy weeks of years vouchsafed in consequence, was conditioned by the circumstance that at the time when this incident transpired in the experience of Daniel, he was a Medo-Persian subject, and hence, had seen the second world-power of his former vision replace the first. The overthrow of Babylon by the Median king would naturally lead him to meditate on the question concerning the time of the restoration of Jerusalem and the realization of the further theocratic hopes connected with that event. In the nature of the case, such meditations would connect themselves at once with Jeremiah's prophecy relating to the seventy years which were to elapse, before Jerusalem, the desolate, should be restored; and such a reference was unavoidable in the case of a vir desideriorum (see v. 23. Vulg.), like Daniel, who searched the Scriptures.

—Which was made king. The passive [וַיִּשְׁמַעֲךָ] denotes that he did not become king over the Chaldean realm in the ordinary way and by right of inheritance, but that he reached the throne in an extraordinary and violent manner, through the agency of the victorious Persian army (led by his nephew, Cyrus).—Verse 2. I Daniel, understood (or "observed") in books the number of years, i.e., I gave attention to that question, meditated upon it. With regard to [וַיִּשְׁמַעֲךָ], a shortened Hiphil-form like [וַיִּשְׁמַעֲךָ], chap. x. 1, or like [וַיִּשְׁמַעֲךָ], for [וַיִּשְׁמַעֲךָ], Job. xxxiii. 13, cf. Ewald, Lehrb. § 127 a, 1*—The construction with an accusative is similar to chap. x. 1; Prov. vii. 7; xxiii. 1. Von Lengerke renders it incorrectly, "I sought understanding in the books, in the number," etc., as if [וַיִּשְׁמַעֲךָ] were here construed with [וַיִּשְׁמַעֲךָ], as in v. 23, and this [וַיִּשְׁמַעֲךָ] were then dropped before the more definite [וַיִּשְׁמַעֲךָ].—The "books" (or "writings," [וְסֵפֶר]) derstood); cf. Prov. vii. 7. Neither the placing of [וַיִּשְׁמַעֲךָ] (by books) first, nor the Athnach under this word, contravenes this view; for the object is placed after 'by books' because a further definition is annexed to it; and the sepa-

in which Daniel observed the number seventy, and thus made it the subject of his meditations, were, according to the context, those which would engage the attention of a captive, be familiar and adapted to him. They did not probably include the whole collection of O.-T. writings, the Torah, Nebim, and Kethubim (as v. Lengerke, Hitzig, Ewald, and other defenders of the Maccabæan origin of the book suppose), nor were they limited to the letter of Jeremiah (Jer. xxix., although the plural ספריים might, without difficulty, designate a single letter; cf. Jer. xxix. 25; 2 Kings xix. 14) which contained the prophecy concerning the seventy years, but they were simply a collection of prophetic writings which Daniel had at command. It cannot be decided how great the extent of this collection was. Perhaps it was confined merely to prophecies by Jeremiah—possibly including only those which are now contained in chapters xxv. and xxix. (to which Wieseler, Die 70 Wochen, etc., p. 4, limits the ספריים, as being the particular rolls of writing in which these oracles of Jeremiah were recorded), or extending to a larger number, or even comprehending all that are now found in the book of Jeremiah. Perhaps it comprehended a larger circle of prophetic and other writings, similar to the private collection which Jeremiah already must have owned (cf. Hengstenberg, Beiträge, etc., p. 33 et seq.). It is likely of itself that the Pentateuch was included among the sacred books belonging to Daniel, although no positive evidence of that fact can be derived from vs. 11 and 13 of this chapter; for the mention of the ספריים in those passages does not prove that the prophet classed them among the ספריים which are here referred to.*—To what passage in Jeremiah's prophecies, then, does Daniel allude? Chiefly and primarily, no doubt, to chap. xxv., from which the term הריבוי, "ruins," is evidently borrowed (see Jer. xxv. 9, 11); but likewise to chap. xxix., the 10th verse of which clearly refers back to chap. xxv. 11 et seq., and with which our prophet was doubtless as well acquainted as with the former.—Whereof the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah the prophet. אשר, "whereof, in regard to which" (namely, years); cf. the use of אשר in the same sense in chap. viii. 26. יְרֵמְיָהּ, as found also in Ezra i. 1, and in chapters xxvii.—xxix. in the book of Jeremiah itself, is the later form of the name.—That he would accomplish seventy year—in the desolation of Jerusalem; or, "that seventy years should be full in the ruins," etc. הריבוי, "ruins, desolate condition;" cf. Lev. xxvi. 31; Ezek. xxxvi. 10, 33; xxxviii.

ration of the object from the verb by the Athnach is justified by this consideration, that the passage contains two statements, viz., that Daniel studied the Scriptures, and that his study was directed to the number of the years, etc."—Kell.

*["ספריים, ῥὰ βιβλία, is not synonymous with הספריים, αἱ βιβλίαι, but denotes only writings in the plural, yet does not say that these writings already formed a recognized collection, so that from this expression nothing can be concluded regarding the formation of the O.-T. canon."—Kell.]

12, etc. Our prophet, as appears in v. 25 a, regards the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, in the year B.C. 587, as the terminus a quo of the seventy years of desolation, while, on the other hand, Jeremiah uttered his prophecy relating to the seventy years (Jer. xxvi. cf. xxix. 1 et seq.) as early as the "fourth year of Jehoiakim," i.e., B.C. 605, or 19 years before that date, and accordingly seemed to favor the method which reckoned the seventy years from the first conquest of Judæa by Nebuchadnezzar, and ended them with Cyrus (606-536).* When and how the end of the seventy years should be realized, was therefore a question which would engage his special attention when the Chaldean monarchy was supplanted by the Medo-Persian.†—Verse 8. And I set my face unto the Lord God, i.e., probably, heavenward (cf. Gen. xxi. 17; 1 Kings viii. 22; John xvii. 3); for the turning of his face toward Jerusalem or the site of the temple (cf. vi. 11), would certainly not be disregarded in this instance, when about to pray for the restoration of the city and temple. The name יְהוָה is used here to designate God (instead of יהיה, which is found in several MSS.), as in chap. i. 2; Ezra x. 3; Neh. i. 11; iv. 8, and as in several places in the prayer itself, v. 4 et seq.—To seek by prayer and supplications; rather, "to seek prayer," etc. Prayer is conceived of as an operation of the Divine Spirit (cf. Zech. xii. 10; Rom. viii. 26), which must be sought after or elicited from within, by means of fasting, putting on mourning garments, etc.; cf. 2 Sam. vii. 27; xii. 16; Ezra ix. 3; Eccles. xxxiv. 21; Luke ii. 37, etc. Upon this subject see my Geschichte der Askese, p. 136 et seq. תְּפִלָּה is "prayer" generally considered (Psa. lxx. 3), while תְּפִלָּתוֹ, like תְּפִלָּה, v. 20, is "prayer for mercy, importunate, moving prayer."

Verses 4-19. Daniel's prayer. In order to justly appreciate the impressive beauty of this prayer, and to understand its plan and aim, cf. Ewald, p. 430 et seq.: "The motives that led him to pray are scarcely indicated in the introductory statements, vs. 1-3, and must be discovered in the nature of the circumstances. He had long been deeply afflicted because the sufferings of his people were protracted during so long a period, and thus found and meditated on those passages from Jeremiah in the Bible (?); but the difficulty of understanding the Divine meaning of the number, redoubled his grief. He comprehended, however, that if the period of Israel's punishment at the hand of God was so protracted, and the mystery relating to himself and the whole nation was so hard to solve, it must be charged solely to the consequences of the former grossly wayward course of the people as a whole, and in this concurrence of the most incongruous emotions he sought and found the proper plea to present before God. He does not plead for ability merely to solve this numerical riddle—the entire prayer contains no allusion to this; and what, indeed, is a mere number in the sight of God? The mystery of the number is oppressive to the heart of this individual supplicant who prays for light, and likewise to the whole nation, only because of other and entirely different errors, darknesses, and faults; and not until this supplicant has put forth all the powers of his soul in wrestling with God for the removal of those general sins, can he hope that the next uncertainty which bows him down and troubles him shall be dispelled by a gracious ray from the original source of all light. Thus the moving stream of this deeply agitated prayer gushes forth from a profound sense that only when the most earnest desire for renewed purification, forgiveness, and elevation at the hand of God shall take possession of the people as a whole, can Divine help be expected for the desolations of Jerusalem, for which after all Daniel also pleads. His words, resulting from the oppressive darkness of the present and from a further retrospect of all former history relating to this state, thus become at first the expression of a true confession, and then of genuine confidence and supplication. They become a sincere confession in view of the present, vs. 4-10, but still more so, vs. 11-14, in consequence of a retrospect of all former history, which is the more proper in this connection, because the blame for this exceeding great destruction and disintegration dates back, in the first instance, to the older times; but in vs. 15-19 the trustful prayer and supplication for mercy become gradually more fervent (at first in the name of the whole people, v. 15 et seq., but ultimately in the name of the individual supplicant himself, v. 17 et seq.), until they cease, so to speak, in disconnected sighs, and as if exhausted with the last glow of the fire (v. 19).—However appropriate we may find this analysis to be in general,* we are nevertheless obliged to enter a decided protest against the presumption of a Maccabæan composition of the prayer, which forms its background. The proof of this presumption is found by Ewald, Hitzig, v. Lengerke, etc., in the similarity between this prayer and the penitential prayer found in Ezra ix. 6 et seq.; Neh. i. 5-11 and ix. 6 et seq., Bar. i. 14-ii. 19, which unquestionably exists, and which they believe indicates the imitation of those passages by an alleged pseudo-Daniel, who lived at a much later time. The points of contact referred to, however, are in part merely indirect and accidental, such as sprang naturally from the general type of thought produced by the period of the captivity and the age immediately subsequent to it. Other features belonging to them in common are more specific and direct; but in these cases the prayer before us must be regarded as the original, instead of the others (as, e.g., בְּשֵׁם הָאֱלֹהִים, vs. 7, 8, cf. Ezra ix. 7; כְּלִירוֹתָי, v. 9, cf. Neh. ix. 17; also the combination “our kings, princes, fathers, and all the people of the land,” v. 6, which is exactly repeated in Neh. ix. 32, and again in ix. 34, where [as here in v. 8] “all the people of the land” is omitted, etc.). The more verbose and diffuse style of these prayers, and especially of those found in Nehemiah and Baruch, is of itself sufficient to arouse the suspicion at a glance, that Daniel’s prayer, with its comprehensive brevity and freshness, must be the original (cf. particularly Zundel, Kritische Unterz., etc., p. 191, whose exposition has not been controverted in a single feature by anything adduced by Ewald, p. 485). The fact, moreover, that it represents the sufferings of Israel as deserved, but does not allude with a syllable to the damnable character of the human agent who executed the Divine punishment, nor yet to the raging of Israel’s oppressors, which still continued, and to the Divine judgment which was certainly impending over them—all this is surely not conformable to the idea that this section is a compilation made in imitation of older models and dating as late as the Maccabæan age. “It is certainly conceivable that an author writing in the midst of the sufferings of the Maccabæan period, might occasionally avail himself of the opportunity to remind the people that their affliction was partly deserved, because of their general sinful conduct toward the God of their fathers, and thus attempt to remove their bitterness of heart in view of the fact that God had permitted such misery to come upon them. But it does not seem natural that he should fail to strengthen the courage of his nation by a direct reference, to say nothing of a passing allusion, to the excessive wickedness of the course of the persecuting despot, the μαρὸς, at a juncture when they took their stand upon the ground of that very law of their fathers for which they suffered. Still more unnatural is it that here, where practical encouragement was needed in a time of decisive and terrible conflicts, he should neglect this for the mere purpose of keeping up a conformity to the prayers of Ezra and Nehemiah, which originated in circumstances of a totally different character and involved a reference to the earlier fact of the conquest and destruction of Jerusalem” (Kranichfeld). Cf. in addition the remarks in the Intro. § 6, respecting the relation of the book of Daniel to the writings of the period subsequent to the captivity, which refer to it; and also the exposition of the several passages.

† [Keil combats at length the notion of Bleek and Ewald that it was Daniel's uncertainty regarding the termination of the seventy years which moved him to prayer.]

Verses 4-10. The introduction. A penitential confession of sin in the name of the people. And I prayed . . . made my confession, and said. הִתְחַוֵּיתִי, “to confess, acknowledge,” as in v. 20; Ezra x. 1.—O Lord, the great and dreadful God, keeping the covenant and mercy. The same address to the mighty and terrible God, but who is good and merciful when His conditions are met, occurs also in Neh. i. 5; with this difference only, that the article is carelessly omitted before הַיְיָ, the second object of

* Cf. the similar, but more simple analysis by Melancthon which is adduced below, in connection with the homiletical suggestions. It divides the whole prayer into the two parts (1) of the confessio (vs. 4-14) and (2) of the consolatio (vs. 15-19).

הַיְיָ, in the latter passage, while in the present instance and in Neh. ix. 32 and Deut. vii. 9, it is retained.—Verse 5. We have sinned, and have committed iniquity, and have done

wickedly, and have rebelled. Properly, "and sinned and rebelled," for the וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ is probably to be retained; its omission from several MSS. is explained from the desire to assimilate this passage to the parallels vs. 15 and 1 Kings viii. 47. The Hiphil וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ , "to sin, do wickedly," is used instead of the more usual וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ ; cf. xi. 32; Neh. ix. 33; Psa. cvi. 6.—By departing from thy precepts and from thy judgments. The infinitive וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ is used as a continuation of the וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ , as in v. 11; cf. Neh. ix. 8, 13; Esth. iii. 13; ix. 1, 12, 16; vi. 9, etc.—Verse 6. The prophets, which spake in thy name to our kings, our princes, and our fathers, etc. The "fathers" in this place and in v. 8, as well as in Jer. xiv. 17, 21, denote the ancestors of the Israel of that day, including all but those who were of royal and princely blood; cf. the comprehensive "and to all the people of the land," which immediately follows. The same language occurs in Neh. ix. 32, where, however, the "prophets and priests" are also specially included, between the princes and the fathers—an extension which clearly reveals the thought of a later age, and which appears the more superfluous, inasmuch as both prophets and priests might unquestionably be comprehended in the term "fathers" (cf. Judg. xvii. 10; xviii. 19).—Verse 7. O Lord, righteousness belongeth unto thee, but unto us confusion of faces, i.e., the confusion which depicts itself on the face (by blushing) because of our sin and the consequent disgrace and tribulation; cf. the familiar use of וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ , and the passage Ezra ix. 7, which paraphrases the thought here presented.—As at this day (so from time immemorial). In וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ does not indicate the indefinite temporal sense of "about, at" (as v. Lengerke, Hävernick, etc., think), but that of comparison, as always in this form of speech; cf. v. 15; Neh. ix. 10; Jer. xxv. 18, etc. Consequently the expression of God's righteousness and the contrasted being put to shame or disgrace of Israel are both described as having always been apparent and as being still evident.—To the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem. Vs. 16-18, which represent Jerusalem as being in ruins, show clearly that this reference is not to inhabitants of Jerusalem who were contemporary with the prophet (Bertoldt, v. Lengerke, Stähelin, etc.).—Verse 8. O Lord, to us belongeth confusion of face, etc. cf. Jer. iii. 25; xiv. 20; Neh. ix. 34, etc.—Verse 9. Though (rather "for") we have rebelled against him. וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ , as in v. 5. The clause with וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ serves to explain why the mercy and forgiveness of God (וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ ; cf. Neh. ix. 17, and וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ , Psa. cxxx. 4) are referred to, namely, because the children of Israel need mercy, etc., before all else, since they are guilty of rebellion against God. The thought is still farther developed in the following verse.—Verse 10. Neither (rather "and we") have we obeyed the voice of the Lord our God, to walk in his laws; cf. Jer. xiv. 23; 1 Kings viii. 61; Luke i. 6 etc. The וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ here mentioned differ from the וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ of the next verse merely in the form of the word, the latter comprehending the commandments, i.e., the several manifestations of God's will in a united whole. The prophets accordingly appear as the guardians, teachers, and enforcers of the law; cf. Isa. xxi. 11, where the term וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ is applied to them; Jer. vi. 17; Ezek. xxxiii. 2; Mic. vii. 4, etc., which designate them by וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ .

Verses 11-14. *Continuation. References to the past history of the nation. Therefore the curse is poured upon us, and the oath. As in other places the anger of God (Jer. xlii. 18; xlii. 6; 2 Chron. xii. 7; xxxiv. 21, etc.), so here the curse which represents it, is characterized as, so to speak, a fiery hail (Gen. xix. 24; Ex. ix. 33; Nah. i. 6) which is poured out on the sinner. It is, moreover, not a simple curse, but stands connected with an oath, which supports and strengthens it; cf. Num. v. 21; Neh. x. 30; Psa. xcvi. 11; Heb. iii. 11, 18; vi. 17.—That is written in the law of Moses the servant of God. Lev. xxvi. 14 et seq.; Deut. xxviii. 15 et seq.; xxix. 19. Concerning the designation as the servant of God, cf. Ex. iv. 10; xiv. 31; Num. xi. 11; xii. 7; Josh. i. 2; Heb. iii. 5. See also v. 5, where the same predicate is applied to the prophets.—Verse 12. And he hath confirmed his words, which he spake. וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ , usually "to raise up," here signifies "to preserve intact, to maintain, to confirm in act;" cf. Num. xxx. 14, 15.—Instead of וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ the Keri has וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ , referring back to the curse, v. 11; but all the ancient versions and also the parallels Neh. ix. 8; Bar. ii. 8 support the plural.—Against us, and against our judges; literally "over us," etc. וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ , a comprehensive term denoting "our superiors" generally; cf. Psa. ii. 10; cxlviii. 11, and above, vs. 6 and 8, the separation of this idea into "kings and princes."—By bringing upon us a great evil, etc.; rather, "that he would bring upon us," etc.; cf. Lam. i. 12; ii. 17; Ezek. v. 9, etc.—Verse 13. As it is written in the law of Moses, all this evil is come upon us; rather, "as all this evil is written in the law of Moses, that is come," etc.† וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ before וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ serves to introduce the subject, as in 2 Kings x. 6; Jer. xiv. 4; Ezek. xlv. 3.‡ Concerning וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ cf. Isa. xiv. 24 b.—Yet made we not our prayer before the Lord our God; rather, "yet conciliated we not the face of the Lord," etc.,—who prepares for our just punishment. It appears from the following verse that this neglect of propitiating his anger, hence an obstinate and hardened persistence in sin, was the immediate cause that brought misfortune to the nation. With regard to וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ which literally signifies "to stroke one's face, to smooth its stern furrows," cf. Ex. xxxii. 11; 1 Sam. xiii. 12; 1 Kings xiii. 6, etc.—That we might (or "should") turn from our iniquities, and understand (or "observe") thy truth.

* ["The confession of sin divides itself into two sections. Vers. 4-10 state the transgression and the guilt, while vers. 11-14 refer to the punishment from God for this guilt. Ver. 3 forms the introduction."]—Keil

† [Against this construction, however, is the difference in gender of וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ and וַיִּשְׁכָּנוּ .]

‡ [The subject, however, is here rather "stated absolutely as concerns all this evil, thus it has come upon us."—Keil.]

The truth of God which was not observed by the people is His immutability, by virtue of which He actually permits the punishment threatened against the sinner to be inflicted—hence His faithful adherence to His pledges from a negative point of view, which is identical with His punitive justice (cf. 1 John i. 9). Hitzig's adoption of a hendiadys, "that observing thy faithfulness, we should turn from our sins," is unnecessary.—Verse 14. Therefore hath the Lord watched upon the evil, i.e., "He cared for it, was concerned about it;" cf. Jer. i. 12; xlv. 27.—For the Lord our God is righteous in all his works which he doeth; literally, "on the ground of all his works" (אֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה); cf. Neh. ix. 38. אֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה, "which he doeth," is aorist, like Jon. i. 14 (not pret., "which he has done").—For (rather "and") we obeyed not his voice, i.e., despite that we obeyed not; cf. the similar expression, with וְלֹא וְנָן, in v. 13.

Verses 15-19. Conclusion. The petition itself in its intensity and importunity, which increase from sentence to sentence. That hast brought thy people forth out of the land of Egypt with a mighty hand; a glorious and striking proof of the grace and mercy which God formerly manifested towards his people; cf. Ex. xx. 2, etc.; Psa. cv.; cxiv. etc.—And hast gotten thee renown, as at this day, i.e., by that wonderful act of deliverance hast acquired renown that continues to this day; cf. Jer. xxxii. 20; Neh. i. 10; ix. 10.—Verse 16. O Lord, according to all thy righteousness . . . let thine anger . . . be turned away, i.e., according to the displays of thy righteousness. צְדִיקוֹתָ, whether it is to be regarded as the plural of צְדִיקָה, as a majority hold, or as the plural of a singular צְדִיק, which is Hitzig's view (cf. Isa. xli. 10; xlii. 6, 21), certainly denotes "proofs of righteousness," and not of mercy; but it is decidedly erroneous, and involves a gross weakening of the sense of the Scriptures, to assign the meaning "mercy" to the Old-Test term "righteousness," in a single instance.—From thy city Jerusalem, thy holy mountain. The opposition is the more appropriate, as in Daniel's time nothing remained of Jerusalem but its site, its mountain.—Jerusalem . . . (are become) a reproach to all that are about us; cf. Psa. lxxix. 4.—Verse 17. Now therefore, O our God, hear. שְׁמָע is a conclusion from v. 16 b, and does not serve to resume v. 15.—The prayer of thy servant, and his supplications. Daniel applies the designation צְדִיק to himself in full consciousness of the mediatorial position occupied by him, as by Moses and the earlier prophets (cf. vs. 11, 5).—Cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary that is desolate. The ruined temple here takes the place of the city and the mountain which were mentioned before, indicating that the prayer constantly increases in fervor and importunity, and addresses*

God with motives whose effective character steadily grows stronger.—For the Lord's sake, i.e., for thine own sake, for thy name's sake (v. 19). The noun is repeated, to the neglect of the pronoun, for the sake of emphasis, as in Gen. xix. 24, and as often in the usage of the New Test., e.g., Rom. xv. 5, 6; Eph. ii. 21, etc.—Verse 18. O my God, incline thine ear, and hear; open thine eyes, etc. The Kethib עֲקָרָה is to be retained, in opposition to the Niphalizing Keri עָקָר; cf. v. 19; Psa. xli. 5; Isa. vii. 11; xxxii. 11.—The thought of the phrase "incline thine ear" (cf. Psa. lxxxviii. 3; lxxxvi. 1; cii. 3; cxvi. 2, etc.), is also frequently expressed in the plural, "thine ears," e.g., Psa. cxxx. 2; cf. Isa. lix. 1; Ezek. viii. 18; Psa. xxxiv. 16; 1 Pet. iii. 12; Jas. v. 4. Luther's translation generally disregards this distinction, and in almost every instance employs the plural, even where the original has the singular.—And behold our desolations (שְׁמָמוֹת), as in v. 26, instead of the former הִרְבֵּית, v. 2; cf. Isa. lxi. 4) and the city which is called by thy name, literally, "upon which thy name is called;" cf. Jer. vii. 10; xxv. 29; xxxiv. 15; Psa. xlviii. 3, 9, etc.—For we do not present (lit. "lay down") our supplications before thee for our righteousness. On the expression לִפְנֵי הוֹר, "to lay down or pour out supplications at one's feet," cf. v. 20; Jer. xxxviii. 20. ["The expression is derived from the custom of falling down before God in prayer."—Kell.] On the thought cf. Isa. lvii. 12; lviii. 2; Neh. ix. 19, 27, 31, etc.—Verse 19. O Lord, hear; O Lord, forgive; O Lord, hearken, etc. The two-fold repetition of the name Adonai, "Lord," denotes the highly importunate and almost uncontrollable character which the prayer assumes at the close; cf. Isa. vi. 8; Jer. vii. 4; xxii. 29.—And do it, defer not. It cannot be proved that Daniel intended to refer to the long delay attendant on the fulfilment of Jeremiah's prophecy of the seventy weeks by the expression "defer not" (cf. Psa. xl. 18; lxx. 6), as Ewald thinks. The expression is not sufficiently definite for this; and at any rate, nothing in favor of the Maccabean origin of this passage can be deduced from it.—For thine own sake, O my God; for thy city and thy people are called by thy name. The explanatory clause "for . . . are called by thy name," implies that צְדִיקוֹתָ is equivalent to לִפְנֵי שְׁמִי (Isa. xlviii. 9; Psa. xxiii. 8; xxv. 11), and therefore signifies, "for the sake of thy honor, of thy renown" (cf. on v. 18).

Verses 20-23. Arrival of the angel Gabriel, who was sent from God to interpret Jeremiah's prophecy of the seventy weeks. And while I was speaking, and praying, etc. This does not mean, "before I ceased praying"—for the prayer had evidently reached its conclusion with v. 19—but rather, "I was concluding my remarks, I was just speaking the last words," etc. Cf. Isa. xxviii. 4.—My supplication . . . for the holy mountain of my God; properly, "on the basis (or ground) of the holy mountain." The preposition עַל, by virtue of its fundamental meaning "over," may signify "against" (v. 12)

as well as "for." According to vs. 16 and 17 the "holy mountain" includes the "holy city" (Matt. iv. 5) and the temple.—Verse 21. Yea (lit., "and"), while I was (yet) speaking in prayer; rhetorical epanalepsis or brief repetition, designed to favor the connection.—Even (or "and") the man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning (or "formerly"), a reference to chap. viii. 15 et seq., where the designation of the angel as a "man" was explained as being derived from his human form. Concerning בְּהֵיכָל see on chap. viii. 1.—Being caused to fly swiftly; rather, "come to me with flying speed." The expression בְּהֵיכָל is difficult. The rendering, "wearied with an extended (or rapid) course," which is adopted by Ibn Ezra, Gesenius, etc. (substantially also by Kranichfeld, "very weary") appears to be supported by the circumstance that the same root עָרָה, which always signifies "to weary, become exhausted," lies at the bottom of both words. The sense of "being wearied," however, will not apply to angels generally, nor is it appropriate in the present instance, where the בְּהֵיכָל of the following verse clearly alludes to the rapidity of the angel's coming. This rapid approach does not indicate that he ran swiftly (Hävernick, v. Lengerke, etc.), but denotes hasty flying, with lightning speed, as may be seen (1) from the root עָרָה, which is unquestionably related to עָרָה, "to fly," and therefore may involve that idea; (2) from the testimony of the ancient versions, which unanimously express the idea of flying rapidly (Sept. τάχιστα; Theodotion, πετόμενος; Vulg., cito volans, and also Syrus); (3) from the fact that the Scriptures frequently represent the angels as flying—a trait which is not confined to the New Test. (Rev. xiv. 6), but is found in the Old Test. also, as Isa. vi. 2 et seq.; Judg. xiii. 20; Psa. civ. 4, etc., demonstrate, despite the assertion to the contrary of Hitzig, Hävernick, and others (cf. also Matt. xxviii. 3 etc.).*—About the time of the evening oblation, or about sundown (Num. xxviii. 4). This theocratic and Levitical designation of time finds a simple explanation in the prophet's yearning recollection of the sacrifice that was offered at that hour in the temple-worship, and therefore does not in any way militate against the belief that this chapter originated during the captivity. It is to hasten, and that it bears this signification here; but the usage of the word does not sustain this sense. Under these circumstances we can probably do no better than, with our author, to abide by the interpretation of the old translators, and regard both terms either as directly from עָרָה or from עָרָה a cognate of that root.]

no more remarkable, as uttered by the captive Daniel in the reign of Darius Medus, than it would be if a Christian youth of the Middle Ages who had fallen into the power of the Saracens, should, after being separated from scenes of Christian worship for many years, still have spoken of matins, or vespers, or the completorium. Cf. supra, on chap. vi. 11.—Verse 22. And he informed me, or "gave me to understand." Thus it is rendered, correctly, by most expositors; cf. בְּהֵיכָל in chap. viii. 16. Hitzig's version, "and he became aware"—namely that the time of evening sacrifice was not yet past, and therefore that Daniel had just finished his evening prayer—is entirely too forced.—I am now come forth, namely from God, before whom Gabriel usually stands (Luke i. 19; cf. also Job i. 12). That he should now come forth (בְּהֵיכָל like John xiv. 11) denotes that Daniel's importunate prayer had caused his being sent; cf. the next verse.—Verse 23. At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment (rather, "a word") came forth, i.e., a decree (בְּהֵיכָל, as in Job iv. 12; Isa. ix. 7, etc.) intended to comfort and encourage thee (and consequently to answer thy prayer). It was not "a commandment," for this could only have been laid on the angel, and not on Daniel, who is nevertheless exhorted "to attend to the word" (בְּהֵיכָל). Hitzig renders it correctly, "a decree, an oracle, which is recorded verbally in vs. 24-27."—For thou art greatly beloved. בְּהֵיכָל, synonymous with אִישׁ־בְּהֵיכָל, "man of costlinesses, of joys," i.e., well-beloved, a favorite (Luther, "beloved man, beloved and precious"; Ewald, "a loved sweet one"). The "vir desideriorum" of Jerome is misleading; for בְּהֵיכָל certainly does not relate to the prophet's anxiety to understand the mysteries of God ("quod pro desiderio tuo Dei secreta audire merearis, et esse conscius futurorum"). With far greater correctness Jerome himself compares, in remarks immediately preceding, the predicate בְּהֵיכָל, "the favorite of God," which was applied to Solomon (2 Sam. xii. 25); and several moderns have also adduced the cognomen of Titus, "amor et delicia generis humani," with equal justice.—Therefore understand thou (or "observe") the matter ("word"), and consider the vision. "The transition from בְּהֵיכָל to בְּהֵיכָל denotes a slight variation of meaning in the fundamental idea. The difference is not greater than exists between בְּהֵיכָל itself and בְּהֵיכָל, the latter of which = רְאוּן, 'revelation,' the substance or soul of the spoken word" (Hitzig).†

† בְּהֵיכָל stands not for revelation, but is the vision, the appearance of the angel by whom the word of God was communicated to the prophet. בְּהֵיכָל is accordingly not the contents of the word spoken, but the form of its communication to Daniel. To both—the word and the form of its revelation—Daniel must give heed. This revelation was, moreover, not communicated to him in a vision, but while in his natural consciousness."—Kell.]

Verses 24-27. The interpretation of the seventy weeks of years. Seventy weeks are determined. Literally, are "cut off;" for this is the proper meaning of קָטַעַ, in like manner as קָרַעַ primarily signifies "to cut, to sharpen to a point," and then "to conclude, determine;" cf. Job xiv. 5; Isa. x. 22; 1 Kings xx. 40. The Vulgate, influenced by εκοβοβωθσαν, Matt. xxiv. 22, has "abbreviata sunt," which conflicts with the context. Hitzig, on the contrary, is correct when he rejects the idea of "dividing" into two sections, which might seem to accord with v. 25 et seq., and instead applies the cutting off to the "sum of the time" as a whole, in consequence of which he paraphrases, "a section of time (consisting) of seventy years is appointed."—The construction is the familiar one of the impersonal passive with an accusative (cf. Gen. xxxv. 26; Ex. xiii. 7; Isa. xxi. 2; also supra, on v. 13). Entirely too artificial is the view which Wieseler adopts, that קָטַעַ in v. 23 is the subject, while the seventy weeks form the predicate—"the word is cut off at seventy weeks." This view is opposed further, by the fact that קָטַעַ cannot in this place denote the idea of "being abbreviated."—שִׁבְעִים שָׁבָעִים, "seventy weeks." This cannot possibly denote seventy weeks in the ordinary sense, or 490 days; for the number has an obvious relation to the seventy years of Jeremiah, v. 2, and the brief limit of 490 days is not suited to serve as a mystical paraphrase of the period of three and a half years. Moreover, according to the descriptions in chapters vii. and viii., the three and a half years were throughout a period of suffering and oppression, while in v. 25 et seq. the latter and more extended subdivision (amounting to sixty-two weeks) of the seventy weeks is characterized as being comparatively free from sufferings. Finally, the three and a half years evidently reappear in v. 27, in the form of the "half-week" during which the sacrifices and oblations were to cease, etc.; and this undeniable identity of the small fraction at the end of the seventy weeks with the three and a half years of tribulation, heretofore described, removes it beyond the reach of doubt that the seventy weeks are to be regarded as seventy weeks of years, and therefore as an amplification of the seventy years of Jeremiah. Such a prophetic or mystical transformation of the seventy years into as many periods of seven years each is not unparalleled in the usage of the ancients; cf., e.g., the remarks of Mark Varro, in Aul. Gellius, N. A. III., 10: "Se jam undecim annorum hebdomadem ingressum esse et ad eum diem septuaginta hebdomadas librorum conscripsisse;" also Aristotle, Polit., VII. 16; Censorin., de die natali, C. 14. It was, however, peculiarly adapted to the prophet's purpose, and was especially intelligible to his readers, inasmuch as the Mosaic law (Lev. xxv. 2, 4 et seq.; xxvi. 34, 35, 43; cf. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21) had designated every seventh year as a sabbath of the land, and had introduced the custom of dividing the years into hebdomads, which thus became familiar to every individual in the Jewish nation during all subsequent ages. The thought that instead of seventy years seven times seventy were to elapse before the theocracy should be restored in all its power and significance, and that, consequently, an extended period of delay should precede the advent of the Messianic era, is "an integral feature in the mode of conception which prevails throughout the book" (Kranichfeld). It should also be observed that the idea weeks, as the principal idea, is placed before the numerical idea for emphasis: "weeks (of years, not simple years), seventy in number, are determined," etc. The masculine form of the noun occurs also in chap. x. 2, 3; cf. Gen. xxix. 27 et seq.; Lev. xii. 5.*—Upon thy people and upon thy holy city. "Thy" is used in the sense of "near thy heart, dear and precious unto thee;" cf. v. 20; chap. xii. 1. As the people of Jehovah (v. 19) is also Daniel's people (v. 20), so is Jerusalem his city, his favorite city. It may have been, in addition, his native place; but this circumstance cannot be determined from this passage; see the Introd. § 2, at the beginning. The predicate "holy" was deserved by Jerusalem, even when in ruins, and without regard to the length of the period during which it was desolate, since by virtue of all its history in the past, and in view of its importance for God's kingdom in the future, it was absolutely "the holy city," cf. vs. 16-20; Isa. lii. 1; Matt. iv. 5.—To finish the transgression and to make an end of sins. The infinitives with לְ which follow, to the end of the verse, "direct attention, with a view to comfort, to the blessed experiences connected with the close of the period in which the people and the city were then languishing," thus denoting from the outset that the vision is concerned with the realization of the Messianic hopes of Israel, in the time when "Zion's warfare" shall be accomplished (Isa. xl. 2 et seq.)—in short, that the prophetic remarks of the angel acquire a Messianic character from this point.—Theodot., Hengstenb., v. Leng., Wiesel., Kranichf., etc., punctuate the Kethib לְכַלֵּם הַפֶּשַׁע, and read "to seal up the transgression," which, according to v. Leng., signifies "to forgive the transgression," and according to Kranichfeld, means "to hinder or restrain the sin." The former rendering, however, would lead to an unsuitable tautology with לְכַלֵּם; and the idea of "restraining (cohibere) sin" would be more properly expressed by צָרַר; cf. Job xiv. 17; Hos. xiii. 2. The idea of "restraining," moreover, has not been presented by a single one of the more ancient translators, not even by Theodotus. It is better, therefore, to read לְכַלֵּם with a majority of moderns, and to regard this as standing for לְמַלֵּא, expressive of the idea of completing or filling up. This view is also supported by the parallel לְהַחֲיוֹת, as it should be read, with the Keri and all the ancient versions, excepting that of Theodotus; cf. chap. viii. 28; Isa. xvi. 4; xxxiii. 1, etc.

The "making full of sin," i.e., of the measure of sin, is substantially identical with the finishing of the transgression, from which it differs only in expressing the idea more forcibly. The Kethib וְלִמְחָה (similarly Theodotion also: τὴν ἀπαργισίαν ἀμαρτίας) is decisively rejected by the single fact that וְלִמְחָה, "and to seal up," is repeated in this passage, and in a sense that differs materially from what it would bear in the former half of the verse. It is certainly possible to refer (with Kranichfeld) to chap. vi. 18; xii. 4; Deut. xxxii. 34; Job ix. 7; xxxvii. 7, in support of this rendering, which would perhaps add to וְלִמְחָה, "to seal up, to hinder," the idea of a still more effective sealing up or of a more complete banishment. The sense of "filling up," however, which is secured by chap. viii. 23, and by which the language of the whole verse gains a harmonious variety and multifor- mity, is far more likely to prove correct; and, in addition, the substitution of וְלִמְחָה for וְלִמְחָה in the preceding line would, in and of itself, be an exceedingly probable error on the part of a copyist, which might be easily comprehended.—To make reconciliation (rather "expiation") for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righte- ousness. These closely united members stand related to each other as antecedent and conclu- sion, or as a negative and a positive statement of the same fact. They form the central point of the acts of gracious blessing wrought by God, and both are introduced alike by the two infinitive clauses which precede, and appear to be conjoined and brought to a common conclusion by those which follow. According to this, three pairs of actions, or three double numbers, were designed in this verse, as Gesenius, Mau- rer, and Hitzig correctly observe; and for this reason the disjunctive accent $\dot{\text{~}}$ seems less suit- able after וְלִמְחָה than it would have been after וְלִמְחָה. The intimate collocation of וְלִמְחָה with וְלִמְחָה is warranted, further, by the fact that, without doubt, God is regarded as the efficient cause of both these results, and particularly of the "expiation" (literally "cover- ing over") of sin; cf. Psa. xxxii. 2; lxx. 4, etc.—Righteousness, which is a characteristic of the Messianic period in other prophecies also (cf. Isa. liii. 11; Jer. xxxiii. 15 et seq.; Mal. iii. 20), is here described as "everlasting," in harmony with the eternal character of Messiah's kingdom (cf. chap. ii. 44; vii. 18. 27; Isa. li. 5-8). It is of course not to be limited to the sphere of a merely external (Levitical and theo- cratic) righteousness, as even Hitzig acknowl- edges, when he observes that external righteou- sness cannot be regarded as separate from inter- nal in any case.—And to seal up vision and prophet (marg.), and to anoint the most holy (rather, "a holy of holies"). The relation be- tween these final members of the whole series of Messianic results to be secured is that of the internal to the external, of the ethical to the ritual, or of religion to worship. Kranich- feld's remark is incorrect, when he observes that the third pair in the gracious series occupies an inverse relation to the first, in view of its form, inasmuch as the latter proceeds from the antecedent to the consequent, while that method is here reversed (namely, the sealing of prophecy precedes the anointing of the most Holy).^{*} But Hitzig, Bleek, etc., are no less at fault, when they assume that the anointing of the most Holy is mentioned after the sealing of prophecy, and at the end of the entire series, because it had not been foretold by Jeremiah, while the other features had, directly or indirectly, formed the subject of the Messianic promises with that prophet. The opinion that the "sealing of vision and prophet" denotes specifically the con- firmation of Jeremiah's prophecy respecting the seventy years (as v. Lengerke, Wieseler, Kamp- hausen, etc., also hold) in chap. xxv. and xxix. is wholly untenable, since the terms וְלִמְחָה and וְלִמְחָה, without the article, evidently do not refer to any particular prophet or prophecy, but rather to the prophetic institution and its visions relating to the prospective salvation in general. The idea is, that everything in the form of prophetic visions and predictions which had been produced in the course of theocratic develop- ment from the time of Moses (וְלִמְחָה and וְלִמְחָה) are collective and general; of. chap. xi. 14) should receive "sealing," i.e., Divine confirma- tion and recognition, in the form of actual fulfilment (cf. 1 Kings xxi. 8; Esth. viii. 8).[†] Jeremiah's prophecy cannot be intended, either exclusively, or even by way of pre-eminence (as Ewald thinks), because it does not mention the expiation of sin and the establishing of everlasting Messianic righteousness, which nevertheless are here particularly emphasized. The sense is clearly general, similar to that found in New- Test. passages like Acts iii. 19; x. 43; 2 Cor. i. 20, etc.—The prospect of an "anointing of the most Holy," which is presented at the close, or

rests on a false construction of the individual members, especially of the first two passages. Rather we have two three-membered sentences before us. This appears evident from the arrangement of the six statements, i.e., that the first three statements treat of the taking away of sin, and thus of the bringing in of everlasting righteousness, with its consequences, and thus of the positive deliverance, and in such a manner that in both clauses the three members stand in reciprocal relation to each other; the fourth statement corresponds to the first, the fifth to the second, the sixth to the third—the second and the fifth present even the same verb וְלִמְחָה.—Kell. It is not necessary, however, to assume that these results were all to await the expiration of this entire period; they were only to be in the process of taking place during or after it; in a word, this was to be the final period of the Jewish economy, in or at the end of which all these consummations were to take place.]

rather of a most Holy (קֹדֶשׁ קָדִים, without the article) is evidently a solemn act of worship, which is substantially equivalent to the restoration of the theocratic worship as a whole. It is the anointing with oil or theocratic consecration of the sacrificial altar of the New Covenant, of the Messianic community of the redeemed, the pure sanctuary, which shall no more be profaned, that, according to chap. viii. 14 (cf. vii. 25; ix. 17), shall take the place of the desecrated and defiled altar of the Old Dispensation. From Lev. viii. 11, comp. with Ezek. xliii. 20, 26, where a consecration of the altar of burnt-offerings by means of an act of anointing is described (in Lev., l. c., with oil, in Ezek., l. c., with the blood of the sacrifice), and also from Ex. xxix. 37; xxx. 29; xl. 10, where the sacrificial altar is expressly designated as the קֹדֶשׁ קָדִים, it is evident that the altar of sacrifice is here intended, instead of the holy of holies in the temple at large, or even the Messiah himself (sanctus sanctorum), as Syrus, the Vulgate, and others suppose.—The prophecy under consideration has been twice fulfilled,—at first externally and in a literal sense, by the actual restoration of the Old-Test. services in the temple with their bloody offerings of animals, which came to pass three years after they had been interrupted by Antiochus Epiphanes in the Maccabean age (1 Macc. iv. 54–59),* and afterward in the antitype by the historical introduction of the more perfect sanctuary and worship of the New Covenant, which were likewise foretold by the prophet Zechariah (chap. iii. 9) and whose sacrificial altar is Christ, having become such through the cross which he anointed and consecrated by his own exalted priestly sacrifice and blood.†

Verse 25. Know therefore and understand. This exhortation is intended to introduce the more detailed explanation of the relation of the seventy year-weeks to the yet unexpired seventy years, and also to the subject of the earlier theocratic promises which follows. It directs the notice of both the hearer and the reader to the importance of the disclosures now to be made, and to the duty of subjecting them to serious and thoughtful consideration; cf. ὁ ἀγαπῶν ὑμᾶς νοεῖτω, Matt. xxiv. 15.—From the going forth of the commandment (or “word”) to restore and to build Jerusalem, unto the Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks;

* [Kell justly objects to this interpretation of the fulfilment that “it is opposed by the actual fact, that neither in the consecration of Zerubbabel’s temple, nor at the reconsecration of the altar of burnt-offering desecrated by Antiochus, is mention made of any anointing. According to the definite, uniform tradition of the Jews, the holy anointing oil did not exist during the time of the second temple.” The term “anoint,” however, may here be taken in the metaphorical sense of rededicating.]

† [Kell likewise, after adducing several exegetical reasons against the interpretation of “most holy” here as referring to the temple, altar, or any of the sacred utensils, finally concludes that “the reference is to the anointing of a new sanctuary, temple, or most holy place.” This, however, makes the whole expression metaphorical, while all the associated phrases are taken in a sense more or less literal. It seems to us that the rejection of the old reference of the language here to the Messiah, on the ground of the absence of the article, is rather hasty; for surely the words may justly be rendered “to anoint a most holy” (one as well as thing), and thus really refer to the inauguration of the Head of the New Dispensation. The expression is doubtless to be explained in conformity with the similar phraseology of the verses immediately following.]

rather, “unto an anointed one, a prince,” etc. The expression מָלְאךְ דָּבָר corresponds to מָלְאךְ

דָּבָר at the beginning of the angel’s remarks, and therefore probably denotes the promulgation of a Divine decree rather than of a royal edict (as Dereser, Hävernicks, Weigl, etc., conceive with reference to the edict of Artaxerxes Longimanus, which commanded that the rebuilding of Jerusalem should be commenced).

The latter idea would require that מָלְאךְ should be connected with דָּבָר, in order to its clear expression; and the observation of Hitzig is probably correct: “Gabriel could not speak so objectively, and with composure, of the decree of a heathen king that would imply his right to dispose of the holy city; such a decree would no more be a דָּבָר in the mind of a theocrat than the confederacy in Isa. viii. 12 would be a קִשְׁפָּר.”—Moreover, דָּבָר cannot denote a decree at all, but rather a prophetic statement, an oracle, which in this instance promises the restoration of Jerusalem. This Divine prediction concerning the rebuilding of the holy city cannot differ materially from the repeated prophecy by Jeremiah (chap. xxv. and xxix.), which foretold the desolation of Jerusalem during seventy years, and the subsequent restoration of the exiles and punishment of their Chaldean oppressors. Although the restoration of the theocracy, and especially the rebuilding of Jerusalem, are not expressly mentioned in the latter prophecies, these features are yet implicitly included in the prediction, chap. xxv. 12 et seq., concerning the judicial visitation of the Chaldeans and the re-adoption of Israel; and in chap. xxix. 10 the gracious visitation of the Jews is described directly as a restoration to their place, i.e., their country. It is not necessary, therefore, to seek for a prophecy by Jeremiah that predicts the rebuilding of Jerusalem in more literal and explicit terms. If such a passage be found in Jer. xxx. 18, or xxxi. 38 (Hitzig, Ewald, Bleek, Kamphausen, etc.), it is nevertheless unnecessary to assume that Daniel here refers only to that prophecy (which was probably composed after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, B.C. 588, according to chap. xxxi. 5 et seq.). It is more probable that our prophet made no chronological distinction between Jer. xxix. (a letter composed about B.C. 598) and the more extended prophecy in chap. xxx. and xxxi. They (and also chap. xxv.) were probably regarded by him as belonging, upon the whole, to the same period and the same circle of prophecies, namely, that of the overthrow of the kingdom of Judah which covered eighteen to twenty years, beginning with the first conquest of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, or B.C. 605, and ending with the destruction of the city in B.C. 588. His starting-point for the calculation of the seventy years thus naturally became uncertain and vacillating, and for that very reason became the inciting cause of the prophecy under consideration. See supra, on v. 2.*—It would conflict with the

* [Few will be disposed to adopt an interpretation that comes to so vague a conclusion, when the very object of these added verses is evidently to furnish a definite general usage to take מְשִׁיחַ in an adverbial sense and to connect it with the following verb, so as to obtain the sense "to build Jerusalem again," since only שָׁנָה in the Kal is used to designate our "again" (rursus, iterum) in other places (and also here, in the latter half of the verse). Wieseler's rendering, "to lead back," i.e., the people, is opposed in part by the harshness of such an objective supplement, and partly by the impossibility of showing that this passage refers directly and exclusively back to Jer. xxix. 10, where מְשִׁיחַ certainly occurs in the sense of "to lead back." The second half of the verse, moreover, refers only to a rebuilding of the city (בְּנֵינָהּ וּבְנֵינָהּ), and not to a reductio populi exulis, which is decisive in favor of a restoration, i.e., of bringing back out of the state of desolation; cf. Ezek. xvi. 55.—Who is designated by מְשִׁיחַ, the "anointed one, the prince" (or, as it may be rendered with equal correctness, the "anointed prince;" cf. Ewald, Lehrb., p. 741), in the sense of the prophet? Certainly not the Messiah of Israel in an immediate and primary sense, as the Jewish and orthodox exegesis has generally held, down to the latest time. He would scarcely have been referred to as "an anointed prince" without the article; nor would Daniel have introduced Him after the brief interval contained in the first seven of the seventy year-weeks, since he always places the advent of the Messiah in the distant future, when the fourth and last world-kingdom shall fall—which is especially apparent in chapters ii. and vii.* The reference is probably to a prince contemporary with Daniel and already well known, who was destined to exert a powerful influence in favor of the theocracy, and to fulfil the special Divine purpose relating to the Israel of that day (about forty-nine or fifty years after the destruction of Jerusalem)—hence, without doubt, to Cyrus, who is designated as Jehovah's Mashiach in Isa. xlviii. 1 also. Cf. Kranichfeld, p. 327: "Rather, the person referred to appears as a different prince, who has a theocratic dominion, and is endowed with the spirit of Jehovah for his calling; cf. 1 Sam. xvi. 18 et seq.; x. 1, 6 et seq. But since the special mention of the feature of anointing in the case of the ordinary, i.e., non-Messianic national kings who came in contact with Israel would be strange, it is proper to search for a heathen prince, who became prominent as the promoter of the theocracy, and especially so, because of his relation to the Messianic hopes before referred to. As such a one, and unique in this respect, the theocratic literature conceives of Korah, the victor from the east who effected the return of Israel from the exile. He is expressly designated in Isa. xlv. 1 as the Mashiach of Jehovah. He appears in the first year of the reign of Darius Medus over Babylon, therefore at the time of the vision, and was then at least the victorious leader of the armies of Darius. We are compelled to decide for him, in interpreting the מְשִׁיחַ of Daniel's description. He was regarded as the executor of the will of Jehovah already referred to, agreeably to the description which immediately follows, and in harmony with the theocratic hopes which Israel based on him. Having realized other prophetic expectations, the author regarded him as the agent who should bring about the restoration and the rebuilding of Jerusalem; and consequently, the writer expressly confirms these expectations, since he merely separates from them the direct Messianic idea, which he finds himself obliged to refer to a more distant future, in view of the course of political events."*—The "Mashiach Nagid," chronological determination of the period spoken of. Kell, although no advocate of a strict literal fulfilment of this passage, justly remarks that "all such references (to Jeremiah) are excluded by the fact that the angel names the commandment for the restoration of Jerusalem as the terminus a quo for the seventy weeks, and could thus only mean a word of God whose going forth was somewhere determined, or could be determined, just as the appearance of the Anointed Prince is named as the termination of the seventy weeks. Accordingly, 'the going forth of the commandment to restore,' etc., must be a factum coming into visibility, the time of which could without difficulty be known—a word from God respecting the restoration of Jerusalem, which went forth by means of a man at a definite time, and received an observable historical execution." This last remark effectually disposes of the author's exegesis regarding מְשִׁיחַ here.]

* [This last argument is certainly out of place, for Daniel does not place the personage in question at an interval of only seven weeks, but of seven and sixty-two weeks, i.e., all but at the close of the entire period of the prophecy. So likewise in the next verse. As to the objection against the reference to the Messiah, both here and in the following and preceding verses, on the ground of the absence of the article, this is greatly, if not wholly, made up by the construction of the noun with an adjunct, which in Hebrew often makes a word really definite, so that the article is readily dispensed with. Indeed, the simple term מְשִׁיחַ, Messiah, even anathorous, is so emphatic that none but the Great Prophet of Deut. xviii. 18 (where מְשִׁיחַ is in like manner rendered definite only by the adjunct term) can well be thought of. Accordingly, those interpreters who have forsaken this old and widely-accepted reference, have signally failed to adduce any other historical personage to whom it can be fitly applied.]

* [Kell's remarks on this point seem to us so satisfactory that we transcribe them in full. "The words מְשִׁיחַ נָגִיד are not to be translated an anointed one, a prince (Bertholdt); for מְשִׁיחַ cannot be an adjective to נָגִיד, because in Hebr. the adjective is placed after the substantive, with few exceptions, which are inapplicable to this case; cf. in Ewald's Lehrb., § 298 d. Nor can מְשִׁיחַ be a participle: an a prince (is) anointed (Stendel), but it is a noun, and נָגִיד is connected with it by apposition; an anointed one (who is at the same time) a prince. According to the O. T., kings and priests, and only these, were anointed. Since then, מְשִׁיחַ is brought forward as the principal designation, we may not by נָגִיד think of a priest-prince, but only of a prince of the people; nor by מְשִׁיחַ of a king, but only of a priest; and by מְשִׁיחַ נָגִיד we must understand a person who, first and specially, is a priest, and in addition is a prince of the people, a king. The separation of the two words in ver. 26, where נָגִיד is acknowledged as meaning a prince of the people, leads to the same conclusion. This priest-king can neither be Zerubbabel (according to many old interpreters), nor Ezra (Stendel), nor Onias III. (Wieseler); for Zerubbabel the prince was not anointed, and the priest Ezra and the high-priest Onias were not princes of the people. Nor can Cyrus be meant here, as Saadian, Gaon., Bertholdt, Von Lengerke, Manrer, Ewald, Hitzig, Kranichfeld, and others, think, by a reference to Isa. xlv. 1; for, supposing it to be the case that Daniel had reason from Isa. xlv. 1 to call Cyrus מְשִׁיחַ—which is doubted, since from his epithet מְשִׁיחַ, His (Jehovah's) anointed, which Isaiah uses of Cyrus, it does not follow, of course, that he accordingly, is in himself merely a type of the Messiah, corresponding to the person introduced in Isa. xlv., but is not Christ Himself (correctly rendered by Saad., Gaon., Bertholdt, Von Leng., Hitzig, Bleek, Kamph., etc., with the exception, however, that they generally reject the typical Messianic sense as well as the direct reference to Christ). This typical forerunner of Christ, the first restorer of the theocracy in the age of Daniel itself, is placed by the prophet at the close of the first cycle of seven Sabbatic years, and hence after the expiration of the first jubilee-period which had elapsed since the prophetic activity of Jeremiah, while he assigns sixty-two additional weeks of years (or nearly nine jubilee-periods) to the interval of tribulation that announced and prepared for the coming of the genuine antitypical Christ.* Several expositors attempt to substantiate the direct Messianic interpretation of מְשִׁיחַ בְּנֵי, by placing the seven weeks referred to in this passage after the sixty-two weeks which follow (Von Hofmann, Wieseler in the Göttinger Gelehrten-Anzeigen, 1846, Delitzsch, etc.), and thus "reckon on the contents of the seventy backward;" but if Daniel had preferred this order he would certainly have noticed the sixty-two weeks first and the seven weeks afterwards, and, moreover, the one week in v. 27 cannot be suitably provided for. Finally, all that has been heretofore observed against the direct Messianic interpretation of that expression, militates against their view. Upon the whole, cf. the "history of the exposition" in appendix to exeget. remarks.—And three-score and two weeks; the street should be named מְשִׁיחַ—the title ought at least to have been מְשִׁיחַ בְּנֵי, מְשִׁיחַ being an adjective following בְּנֵי, because there is no evident reason for the express precedence of the adjective definition.

"The O. T. knows only one who shall be both priest and king in one person (Psa. cx. 4; Zech. vi. 13). Christ the Messias (John iv. 26), whom, with Hävernick, Hengstenberg, Hofmann, Anberlen, Delitzsch, and Kliefoth, we here understand by the מְשִׁיחַ בְּנֵי, because in Him the two essential requisites of the theocratic king, the anointing and the appointment to be the מְשִׁיחַ of the people of God (cf. 1 Sam. x. 1; xiii. 14; xvi. 13; xxv. 30; 2 Sam. ii. 4; v. 2 seq.), are found in the most perfect manner. These requisites are here attributed to Him as predicates, and in such a manner that the being anointed goes before the being a prince, in order to make prominent the spiritual, priestly character of His royalty, and to designate Him, on the ground of the prophecies, Isa. lxi. 1-3 and Iv. 4, as the person by whom 'the sure mercies of David' (Isa. lv. 3) shall be realized to the covenant people. The absence of the definite article is not to be explained by saying that מְשִׁיחַ בְּנֵי, somewhat as מְשִׁיחַ, Zech. iii. 8; v. 12, is used κατ' ἔξοχ. as a nomen propr. of the Messiah, the Anointed; for in that case בְּנֵי ought to have the article, since in Hebrew we cannot say בְּנֵי מְשִׁיחַ, but only מְשִׁיחַ בְּנֵי. Much rather the article is wanting, because it shall not be said: the Messiah, who is prince, but only, the one who comes to be anointed and at the same time prince, because He that is to come is not definitely designated as the expected Messiah, but must be made prominent by the predicates ascribed to Him as a personage altogether singular."

* [How ill the chronological elements of the prophecy accord with the reference of this anointed one and prince to Cyrus, is evident from the fact that the author is obliged to sever Daniel's conjoined statement (7+62) in order to effect anything like an agreement. Yet even thus the historical fulfilment has to be vaguely presumed, and cannot be definitely verified.]

shall be built again, etc.; rather, "and (during) three-score and two weeks (it) shall return (or 'be restored') and be built."* This period of sixty-two weeks, the "result of subtracting the significant seven at the beginning, and of one to be reserved for the end," covers the time during which the heathen world-kingsdoms succeed each other, down to the fourth and most godless power, which is to attempt to entirely suppress the Divine kingdom of the Old Covenant that had meanwhile been perfectly restored, although with much labor, but which by that very effort secured its own destruction through the Messianic judgment (cf. viii. 11 et seq.; 23 et seq., and the preceding parallels). The subject of מְשִׁיחַ בְּנֵי, which must be supplied, is doubtless Jerusalem, in analogy with the former half of the verse, where the same idea is presented in an active form. The specification of time, מְשִׁיחַ בְּנֵי, which precedes in the accusative, "marks the limits of the period, within which, at different times, the building was prosecuted" (Hitzig).—The limitation of this period, beginning a new clause as it does, is properly preceded by an Athnach, which serves to divide the verse. The method adopted by the ancient translators, by Luther, and by a majority of subsequent expositors (including Hengstenb., Hävern., Anberl., Zündel, etc.—but not Kranichfeld, Kliefoth, and Füller), divides the verse so as to connect the "sixty-two weeks with the preceding clause, despite the Athnach, and thus obtains sixty-nine weeks as the time that should elapse before the coming of the anointed prince; but it is evidently based on the desire to give a direct Messianic bearing to the passage. It is opposed (1) by the fact that the sixty-two weeks are repeated in v. 26, where they are preceded by the article, which clearly marks them as an independent period; (2) that the clause מְשִׁיחַ בְּנֵי thus occupies a very abrupt and bare position, being without any designation of time, while the preceding clause has two; (3) that the sense of the writer clearly is that the rebuilding and restoration had not begun before the sixty-two weeks, while he evidently regards the seven weeks as a period of desolation and ruinous neglect of the city which afterward was to be built (cf. Hitzig, p. 140; also Kliefoth, p. 323 et seq.).†—The

* [The only justification of this translation, which separates the two periods of seven weeks and sixty-two weeks, assigning the former as the terminus ad quem of the Anointed Prince, and the latter as the time of rebuilding, lies in the Masoretic interpunction, which places the Athnach between them. Some adduce also the fact that the v connective is likewise at the point, and not at מְשִׁיחַ. But these arguments, especially the latter, are not conclusive; and the rendering in question involves a harsh construction of the second member, being without a preposition. It is better, therefore, and simpler, to adhere to the Authorized Version, which follows all the older translations. Kell, indeed (although admitting that the Masoretic punctuation is neither authoritative nor decisive), departs from it, but endeavors to extricate himself from the chronological difficulties resulting by his interpretation of these "weeks" as not being heptades of years. Stuart, too, insists upon the Masoretic separation, but he is thereby led into a maze of interpretation from which he confesses he sees no satisfactory exit.]

† [These arguments, however, have little weight; for (1) the sixty-two weeks are still "an independent period," namely, that following the seven weeks of rebuilding, i.e., covering the whole period of the restored city down to the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times; rather, (with) street and ditch, but in troublous times. יְרוּחוֹ וְחִירוֹ. a combination that suggests חִירוֹמָה נָחַל, Isa. xxvi. 1, is evidently an adverbial apposition to the subject יְרוּחוֹ; and there properly signifies "street-and-ditch-wise," i.e., with streets and ditches. It was not to be a wretched, confused, and scattered, as well as a defenceless mass of houses, but was to be arranged in streets, and to be surrounded with a fortified (wall and) ditch. [יְרוּחוֹ means the street and the wide space before the gate" (Keil, who adds "before the temple," but this last is by no means certain.)] יְרוּחוֹ is regarded by most moderns, and certainly with justice, as synonymous with the Chald. חִירוֹ, "ditch." This rendering is indirectly supported by the ancient versions also, which have "wall" (Sept., Theodot.: οικοδομηθήσεται πλατεία καὶ περίτειχος; Vulgate: "rumsum edificabitur platea et muri"). Hitzig arbitrarily asserts that the verb נָחַח will not admit of such an interpretation of יְרוּחוֹ. On his view, the word is synonymous with נָחַח, Ezek. xli. 12, and gives the meaning "according to street and court." Hofmann adopts a similar rendering, "extension and bounded space," as do also Kliefoth and Füller, "opening and limitation." Grotius, on the other hand, conceives of an "aqueduct." Dathe, of the Divine "judgment," and several others take יְרוּחוֹ as a parenthetic supplement, signifying "and it is determined" (decided), or, "as it is determined" (Hitzig, in Stud. u. Krit., 1832, Hengstenb., Hävernick, Von Lengerke, Wieseler, Kranichfeld). * יְרוּחוֹ expresses the reason why so long a time is required to build and restore, and therefore stands in an adversative relation to the preceding (= "but, however"). The historical commentary on this "but in troublous times" is found in the narratives of Ezra and Nehemiah, respecting the frequent disturbing and interruption of the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem in the time of the Persian kings; cf. especially Neh. ix. 36, 37.

appearance of the Anointed One and Prince: (2) the pause before the statement of the rebuilding of the "street and wall" is justified and even required by the fact that this is evidently a resumption of the former declaration of the "building of Jerusalem;" (3) so far from this period of rebuilding being delayed till some subsequent event, it is set forth as the very initial terminus a quo of the entire prophecy. We may add, that the subdivision of the sixty-nine weeks into two portions of seven and sixty-two weeks respectively perfectly corresponds with the assignment, in the same connection and order, of two distinct events, namely, the completed reconstruction for the former portion, and the Messianic advent for the latter. If, on the contrary view, we appropriate the sixty-two weeks to the reconstruction-period, we fall into several exegetical contradictions: (1) we confound it with the Messianic-period, which is described in very different terms, ver. 26; (2) we leave no special transaction for the preceding seven years; (3) we make the Messianic-period vastly too long for its definite limitation in ver. 37. Other difficulties of a historical character will be adduced presently.]

* [We suggest, as best suited to the etymological import of these two terms, as well as their proverbial antithesis and adverbial adjection to the sentence, the sense of "court and alley," i.e., broad square, and close street; to denote the complete restoration of the city, with all its places of resort and thoroughfare.]

"The city was inhabited in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (Hag. i. 4), but had neither walls nor gates (cf. Zech. ii. 8, 9); up to that time the enemies of the Jews had prevented the building of the temple and of the walls either by cunning or by force (Ezra iv. 4, 5, 12, 23 et seq.). In the twentieth year of Artaxerxes Longimanus the walls and gates had again been destroyed (Neh. i. 3); and the renewed building succeeded only under manifold precautions: Neh. iii. 33; iv. 1, 2 et seq.; vi. 1 et seq." * (Hitzig). Any reference of the expression to disturbances encountered in the building up of the church, or the New-Test. kingdom of God, can only be admitted in a typical sense, since the primary reference of the passage is solely to Jerusalem in the period following the captivity. When Kranichfeld, p. 329, declares that יְרוּחוֹ is

"the modifying factor connected with oracles like Jer. xxxi. 38; Isa. liv. 11; lx. 10; Ezek. xlv. 6; xlviii. 8, 15 et seq.," he thereby substantially contradicts his ordinary interpretation of the passage, which is only typically Messianic, and he is guilty of an inconsequent vacillation in the direction of the strict Messianic theory.

Verse 26. And after (the †) threescore and two weeks shall the Messiah be cut off; rather, "an anointed one." Since the period covered by the sixty-two weeks (or 434 years) is preceded by the seven weeks (or forty-nine years) according to the above, the event here predicted must fall into the last of the seventy weeks in v. 24, as the next verse expressly states. Hence the מָשִׁיחַ who is to be cut off during that final year-week cannot possibly be identified with the מָשִׁיחַ whom the preceding verse introduced already on the expiration of the seventh of the seventy weeks of years. † Instead of an "anointed prince," we are here referred simply to an "anointed one," who is, moreover, placed in such an intimate relation to "the city and the sanctuary" in the second half of the verse—i.e., to Jerusalem and the temple located there—that he is brought into sharp and clearly defined contrast with the "prince" and people who destroy that city and its sanctuary. A high priest of Israel is evidently intended, whom the people of the foreign and hostile prince "cuts off" (יְרוּחוֹ), i.e., "destroys, kills" (cf. Gen. ix. 11; Deut. xx. 20; Jer. xi. 19; Psa. xxxvii. 9; Prov. ii. 22;

* [That the reconstruction of the city wall, however, was completed at this last date is certain from Neh. vi. 15. This was B. C. 446. The temple had been rebuilt a long time, Ezra vi. 15. B. C. 517. During Nehemiah's administration the whole process of restoration was evidently effected. It is impossible, therefore, to protract this period over the sixty-two year-weeks, as the author seeks to do. The historical interpretation here falls completely. From whatever point of time we reckon the first forty-nine years, they certainly included this work of reconstruction.]

† [The article here only shows that the period in question agrees in general with that similarly stated in the preceding verse. That they do not exactly coincide is clear from the fact that the terminus a quo of the two is differently stated: in the one it is "till the Messiah," in the other, down to his "cutting off." The difference in time is accurately defined by the following verse.]

x. 31, etc.).* And since the hostile prince is unequivocally characterized in both vs. 26 b and 27 as the ruler of the antitheistic and anti-Christian world-power, and as the originator of the blasphemous and sacrilegious horrors which already appeared in chap. vii. 25; viii. 11 et seq., it will evidently be appropriate to regard a high priest who fell at the hands of heathen persecutors in the period of religious oppression under the Seleucidæ as the "anointed one," in whose death the prophecy before us was primarily, although but typically, fulfilled. Such a person is found in the high priest Onias III. who was murdered by Andronicus, the governor under Epiphanes, according to 2 Macc. iii. 31 et seq.; iv. 1 et seq., and to him the prophecy may be referred with the highest probability that the interpretation is correct. According to 2 Macc. iv. 34 et seq., the slaying of this anointed one took place before the second campaign undertaken by Epiphanes against Egypt, and shortly before the king arrived at Tyre on his return from Cilicia (cf. ibid., vs. 22, 30, 44; chap. v. 1). Hence, it certainly transpired before the abuse of the city and its sanctuary by the same king, a feature with which the description in this verse harmonizes well upon the whole [but with some fatal exceptions]. A discrepancy exists in a chronological aspect only between that event and the statements in the prophecy; for, while the sixty-two weeks of years extend, when reckoned from the end of the first seven year-weeks or B.C. 539, to B.C. 105 or into the reign of the Asmonæan Aristobulus I. or his successor Alexander Jannæus (after 105), the murder of Onias by Andronicus took place as early as 141 or 142 of the era of the Seleucidæ, i.e., B.C. 171 or 172, and therefore in the fifty-third week of years after B.C. 539. Consequently, if it be conceded that all the remaining assumptions are correct, it must be acknowledged that the prophecy is not consistent with itself in a chronological aspect, or that the prophet saw events belonging to different periods in a single comprehensive view—in other words, that he conceived of a catastrophe 'n the historical future, which was decidedly important to the nations concerned, as belonging to a period, later by a number of years (perhaps ten weeks of years, or seventy years) than it actually transpired. Cf. infra, eth.-fund. principles, etc. Nos. 1 and 2.†—The following

* [Kell insists that מָשִׁיחַ does not necessarily denote a violent death. But the passages adduced by the author are sufficient to establish this as the general meaning. The "orthodox" interpretation of this clause as referring to the crucifixion of the Messiah is certainly well sustained.]

† [This admission of failure to meet the chronological terms of the prophecy sufficiently points out the fallacy of the author's interpretation. The Anointed one of this verse can be no other than that of the preceding verse. "The circumstance that in ver. 26 מָשִׁיחַ has neither the article nor the addition מֶלֶךְ following it appears to be in favor of this opinion. The absence of the one as well as of the other denotes that מָשִׁיחַ, after what is said of Him in consideration of the connection of the words, needs no more special description. If we observe that the destruction of the city and sanctuary is so connected with the Mashiach that we must consider this as the immediate or first consequence of the cutting off of the Mashiach, and that the destruction shall be brought about by a Nagid, then by Mashiach we can understand neither a secular prince or king, nor simply a high priest, but only an anointed one who diverging interpretations are to be rejected: (1) That adopted by Eichhorn, Corrodi, Wieseler, Hitzig, Kamphausen, etc., which comes especially near our own; they regard the anointed one as being Onias, but reckon the sixty-two year-weeks, which closed at the time of his death, from B.C. 604 instead of 539, so that the first seven weeks are not to be counted (?), or rather, are included in the sixty-two (?)—since 604-434 actually results in 170, the number of the year in which Onias died; (2) The similar view of Wieseler (Gött. Gd.-Anz. 1846) and of Delitzsch (upon the whole that of Hofmann also, Weiss. und Erf., p. 303 et seq.), which holds that Onias is the anointed one, at whose cutting off the sixty-two weeks of years from B.C. 604 were to have expired; but that the seven weeks are to be placed after the year-week which began with the year of his death—hence are to be reckoned from B.C. 164 (cf. on the impossibility of this assumption, supra, on v. 25); (3) The opinion of Bleek, Maurer, v. Lengerke, Roesch, Ewald, etc., that the anointed one who was cut off was not the high priest Onias, but the king Seleucus IV. Philopater, of Syria, who was killed by the usurper Heliodorus in B.C. 176; this opinion involves still greater chronological difficulties than the former, inasmuch as the sixty-two weeks of years, when reckoned back from B.C. 176, would extend to B.C. 610; and it is opposed, moreover, by the inadmissible character of an attempt to explain מָשִׁיחַ by "king;" (4) That of Bertholdt, who believes that the passage refers to the death of Alexander the Great (I), who left no heir; (5) The assumption of Kranichfeld, that the anointed one is the Messiah of Israel, as in Psa. ii. 2; Isa. lxi. 1, and therefore not identical with the "anointed prince" of v. 25, but not less distinct also from Onias, the murdered high-priest of Maccabæan times; (6) The orthodox churchly view which identifies the "anointed one" with the "anointed prince" of the preceding verse, and believes that both denote Christ, whose sufferings and death are said to be predicted in a similar manner by מָשִׁיחַ בְּנֵי אֱדֻם, as in Isa. liii. (held among moderns, e.g., by Häverni, Hengstenb., Auberl., Pusey [Keil], etc.); (7) The assertion by Kliefoth (on Zech. xiii. 7 and also on this passage) that the anointed one is Christ, but only in the final stage of his work and government among the kingdoms of the earth; and further, that the passage, "like Luke xvii. 25; 2 Thess. ii. 7, describes the relation to the world and mankind which Christ shall occupy by reason of the great apostasy before the end of the world, as prophecy leads us to expect."—But not for himself; rather, "and he has no one," i.e., "for his helper, his deliverer from death;" or "he has stands in such a relation to the city and sanctuary, that with his being 'cut off' the city and the sanctuary lose not only their protection and their protector, but the sanctuary also loses at the same time, its character as the sanctuary which the Mashiach had given to it. This is suitable to no Jewish high-priest, but only to the Messiah whom Jehovah anointed to be a Priest-King after the order of Melchisedek, and placed as Lord over Zion, his holy hill. We agree therefore with Häverni, Hengstenberg, Auberl., and Kliefoth, who regard the Mashiach of this verse as identical with the Mashiach Nagid of ver. 25 as Christ, who, in the fullest sense of the word, is the Anointed, and we hope to establish this view more fully in the following exposition of the historical reference of this word of the angel. —Keil].

nothing, there remains nothing to him" (אין לו), namely מְאַחֲזֵהוּ, of Fuller and Kranichfeld on this passage). This אין לו meets with an extraordinary variety of interpretations, based respectively on the different explanations of מְאַחֲזֵהוּ. Theodotion: καὶ κριμα οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν αὐτῷ; Jerome: "et non erit ejus populus qui eum negaturus est" (in like manner also Grotius, and a majority of Roman Catholic expositors); Bertholdt: "and he (Alex. the Gr.) shall have no successor;" v. Lengerke, Roesch, Bleek, Ewald, etc.: "and he (Seleucus Philopater) shall have no successor;" Wieseler: "and he (Onias) shall have no son;" Auberlen: "he, Christ, shall have no adherents;" Hofmann, Hengstenb., Kranichf., Kliefoth (and similarly also Calvin, Junius, Ebrard): "he, Christ, shall possess nothing, shall be without possessions, and be deprived of everything;" Hofmann (in Weiss. und Erf.): "and there shall not be to the people," i.e., an anointed one, the people shall have no Messiah;* Hävernick: "and not for himself, i.e., for his own sake,"—supply, "shall the Messiah die, but for the benefit of mankind, which is to be redeemed;" Michaelis, E. C. Schmidt (in Paulus' Memorabil. VII. 51), Wieseler (in Gött. Gel.-Ans., 1846), Hitzig: "and he is not, i.e., Onias" (—אין לו consequently = אֵין לוֹ, cf. Gen v. 24). Upon the whole cf. Kliefoth, p. 357 et seq. Since the forcible cutting off of an anointed one is concerned, we are obliged to regard that explanation as being most consistent with the context, which supplies מְאַחֲזֵהוּ, perhaps (cf. Ps. vii. 3; 1. 22; Isa. v. 29) after אין לו. It does not differ materially from that advocated by Hofmann, Hengstenberg, Kranichfeld, etc., which supplies מְאַחֲזֵהוּ; for whoever has no deliverer or helper is also without power, without possessions, without anything whatever. We differ from those expositors only in regarding the anointed one who is described as being without possessions and helpless, not directly as the Messiah, but more immediately as his type, the Jewish high priest who was killed in the course of the Antiochian persecution,—in short, in substituting the typical Messianic theory for the direct (in which we agree substantially with Fuller).—And the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary, and the end thereof shall be with a flood; rather, "and the people of a prince,† who shall come and end with overflowing,‡ shall destroy the city and the sanctuary." The words evidently refer to a catastrophe which follows immediately on the cutting off of the anointed one. The "coming prince" (בְּרִיךְ הַבָּיָא) who approaches to cause destruction to the city and the sanctuary, or more exactly, who comes as the ruler of the people that brings ruin and destruction, is doubtless, therefore, the Old-Test. antichrist, or the antitheistic horn of the earlier visions (chap. vii. 21, 25; viii. 11 et seq.; 24 et seq.), and consequently Antiochus Epiphanes, מְאַחֲזֵהוּ (= מְאַחֲזֵהוּ) describes this ruler as coming at the head of his army in a hostile character (cf. בָּרַח in i. 1; viii. 6; xi. 10, 13, 15, 16, 40, 41), and the definite article indicates that his coming was a familiar fact to the prophet, as having formed the subject of his earlier predictions.* The participle is therefore not employed without a purpose (Hofmann, Weiss. und Erf., I. 804), nor does it refer to עַם, "people" (Schöll, Ebrard). It does not signify Epiphanes' "succession" to his predecessor Seleucus (Roesch, Maurer), nor denote the future "appearing" or mysterious presence of the New-Test. antichrist, in the sense of 2 Thess. ii. 9 (Kliefoth).—The ending of this prince "with overflowing" is probably not materially different from the "pouring out of annihilation and judicial punishment upon the desolator," at the close of the following verse. עֹשֶׂה, "a flood, an overflowing," accordingly denotes the judgment inflicted by God in his anger on the impious בְּרִיךְ (Wieseler, Kliefoth), or, more probably, since in that case a genitive עֹשֶׂה (cf. Prov. xxvii. 4) would properly be required in order to define the sense more clearly, it is used sensu bellico to denote an overflowing with warlike hosts, which should lead to the end of his life, i.e., his annihilation (chap. xi. 45; cf. vii. 26). Cf. the exactly similar use of עֹשֶׂה in chap. xi. 10, 22, 26, 40, and in Isa. viii. 8, together with עֹשֶׂה Isa. x. 22.—Here again we are obliged to reject a number of diverging explanations, and further definition of the בְּרִיךְ, but an independent statement as to the result of that prince's coming. The suffix in עֹשֶׂה doubtless refers to the בְּרִיךְ, but in an objectes not a subjective sense: it is the end which he causes, not any which he is to suffer. It is thus precisely parallel with the עֹשֶׂה of the clause immediately following. This view is confirmed by the article in עֹשֶׂה, which commentators have overlooked or misapplied, but which is here, as often, equivalent (like the Greek article) to a personal pronoun, q.d. "in his overflowing," evidently the military campaign or מלחמה immediately subjoined. The whole phrase thus indicates that the invasion should issue in the destruction of Jerusalem. This was certainly not done by Antiochus Epiphanes.]

* [Kell's interpretation is substantially like this, namely: "it is not to Him, viz., that which he must have, to be the Messiah."]†

† [On the contrary, בְּרִיךְ is here rendered definite by the epithet or adjective following, and therefore may properly be translated "the prince." It simply "omits the article because it is different from that in ver. 25, and the article would give a wrong sense, or at least the insertion of it would make it dubious to the reader, inasmuch as it would naturally refer him to the בְּרִיךְ in ver. 25. The בְּרִיךְ here is merely a heathen prince acting in a civil (rather military) capacity, in distinction from a מְאַחֲזֵהוּ who belongs to the people of God."—Stuart.]

especially that of Hitzig, v. Lengerke, etc., who refer the words to a warlike expedition undertaken by Antiochus Epiphanes, instead of one that should break in upon him like a flood and annihilate him; that of Ewald, who obtains the sense "who comes with his host overflowing" (or "in overflow") by a violent emendation, inasmuch as he substitutes וְיָצִי, "and his host," or וְיָצִי, "and his line of battle" (after Prov. xxx. 27), for וְיָצִי; that of Gesenius, Rosenmüller, Roesch, etc., who take וְיָצִי in the sense of "suddenly, like a flood;" that of Auberlen, Hävernick, Delitzsch, etc., who refer the suffix in וְיָצִי to the city and sanctuary, rather than to the "prince;" "their destruction shall come by overflowing," etc.—And unto the end of the war desolations are determined; i.e., the devastating of the city and sanctuary are to continue to the end of the warlike alarms excited by their impious oppressor, as a matter that is determined by God. מִלְחָמָה designates that state of war which begins with cutting off the anointed one, and eventually results in the destruction of the city and the sanctuary (so, correctly, Rosenmüller, Hofmann, Ewald, Füller, etc.). Others read, "and to the end shall be war, the determined desolations," in which method וְיָצִי is either taken as an apposition (Hävernick, v. Leng., Maur., Wieseler, Hitz., Auberlen), or as an explanatory clause to the foregoing, with the conjunctions omitted in the connection (Kranichfeld, Kliefoth), and in connection with which still further differences of opinion exist with regard to the meaning of וְיָצִי, some expositors referring it to the end of the prince (Wieseler), some to the end of the sanctuary (Häv., Aub.) or of the period of the seventy weeks—hence, to the last year-week of the seventy (v. Lengerke, Hitzig), and some even to the end of all things, the "absolute end" (Kliefoth). The reference of וְיָצִי to the exterminated prince is evidently the only one in harmony with the context, which thus identifies it with the וְיָצִי of the preceding clause; but it is more appropriate to regard it in the sense of a stat. constr., "to the end of the war," because of the more regular and connected character of the arrangement of the sentence.† וְיָצִי is also the construct state of וְיָצִי, which recurs at the close of the following verse, and here probably denotes the same idea as in chap. xi. 36, and Isa. x. 23; xxviii. 22, viz.: "determination, destiny, what is ordained." A "determination of the desolations"

* [These latter interpretations are refuted in detail by Keil, whose objections, however, do not apply to the explanations which are suggested above.]

(וְיָצִי as in v. 18; cf. on that passage) is a decree that aims at desolations and has them for its object. Ewald: "the decision respecting the horrors," i.e., the decision of God at the judgment of the world, which relates to the horrible actions and devastations of Antiochus, or which serves to punish them (?). Hofmann and Kliefoth are still more arbitrary: "a determined measure of desolations, which is thus limited and confined."—[This language was not fulfilled in any appropriate sense by Antiochus, who aimed merely at the suppression of Jehovah's worship, but left the city and sanctuary uninjured. It seems to us that the old interpretation, which refers it to the last war with the Romans when Titus seemed compelled by providence to persist in his attack till the temple itself was demolished, is the only adequate one. This was the retribution that eventually followed the rejection and murder of their Messiah by the Jews.]

Verse 27. And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week; rather, "make a strong covenant,"* etc. This sentence (introduced by an explicative vav) is obviously an explanation and more particular illustration of the statements in the preceding verse. Its subject is neither the indefinite "it" (Füller), nor the "one week" (Theodot., Dereser, Hävernick, Von Leng., Hengstenb., Hitz., Auberl.), but, beyond all question, וְיָצִי, which governs the preceding sentence as a logical subject, is finally included in וְיָצִי, and is the prominent subject of consideration, from v. 26 וְיָצִי (thus, correctly, Berth., Maur., Wieseler, Ewald, Kranichfeld, Kliefoth, etc.).† It is observed, therefore, with regard to the anti-Christian prince of the final world-power, that "he shall confirm the covenant as to many," i.e., "that he shall enter into a strong, firm covenant with many;" for the Hiphil וְיָצִי, which occurs elsewhere only in Psa. xii. 5, and there signifies "to be strong, to exhibit strength," in this place doubtless expresses the transitive idea of strengthening, and in connection with the idea "covenant," involves more particularly the notion of "confirming or establishing." The many (וְיָצִי with the article) with whom the strong covenant is made by the prince are obviously the numerous apostate Jews, who were induced by the heathen tyrant to break their covenant with God and disobey His law, according to 1 Macc. i. 10 et seq., and thus to enter into an antitheocratic alliance that was hostile to God, for one week, i.e., during a week of years (שָׁבועַ שָׁנָה, accusative of time). Cf. the allusions to this fact in chap. xi. 22 (where בְּרִית is employed in the same antitheocratic sense as here), in xi. 32 (where the transgressors of [Jehovah's] covenant, the מְרַשְׁעֵי בְרִית, are the same as the רִבִּים in this place), and also in chap. viii. 10 et seq., where the stars that were trodden under foot by the little horn may likewise represent the breakers of the covenant who are here mentioned (cf. also viii. 24 et seq.).*—A great diversity of opinion respecting the meaning of the "covenant" exists among the representatives of the theory which makes אֲדָמָה the subject of הִנָּבִיר. In illustration of this, cf. Hitzig, "the one week of years shall make the covenant—i.e., the adherence to the faith in Jehovah, and to the theocratic law—hard for many;" Hofmann (Schriftbeweis, II. 2), "the one week of years shall confirm many in the covenant through tribulation and the trial of their faith" (similarly, Rosenmüller, before Hofmann); Von Lengerke, "A week shall confirm a covenant to many, through the seductive arts of Antiochus;" Hengstenberg, Hävernick, Auberlen, etc., "the one week, or rather the events belonging to it, especially the death of the Messiah referred to in v. 26, will lead to the conclusion of a new, strong, and firm covenant with many," etc.—And in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease; i.e., during one half of the week. הַשָּׁבֹעַ הַשֵּׁנִי might of itself signify the middle of the week; but the following 'וְגַם מִן הַשָּׁבֹעַ shows that something transpires during the הַשָּׁבֹעַ, which naturally belongs to the close of the whole period of oppression here described, viz.: the punishment and annihilation of the impious persecutor. For this reason הַשָּׁבֹעַ must rather denote half of the week, and more particularly the second half, and it therefore corresponds to the three and a half years of persecution of chap. vii. 25; and נִשְׁבֵּית—for which no other appropriate subject can be found than that of the preceding verb הִנָּבִיר—can therefore express no other sense than that of "causing to cease" during the period in question. The impious madman causes to cease during that period זֶכֶר וְנִחֻחַ, the bloody and unbloody offerings, which are mentioned representatively for all the sacrifices required by the theocratic ritual, as being the two principal classes of offerings under the Mosaic economy,

† [On the contrary it seems to us that the subject of this clause is not the וְיָצִי just spoken of, but the וְיָצִי preceding, or, more definitely, the וְיָצִי just before; for (1) this (as Hengstenberg rightly says) is the predominant or principal subject of the entire passage; and (2) each of the other portions of the seventy weeks is directly referred to that personage, so that this final week will not fill up the number appropriately if otherwise referred. The objections of Keil to this interpretation are unimportant. Moreover, the prophecy is not historically applicable to Antiochus, but does correspond to the term of the Messiah's ministry: as we shall endeavor to show.]

in a similar manner as that in which הַיּוֹמִי, "the daily," was employed in chap. viii. 11 to express this concrete individualizing and comprehensive sense.* The expression here employed cannot be taken to refer to the superseding of the Old-Test. institution of sacrifices by the New-Test. worship in spirit and in truth, as being based on the perfect expiatory sacrifice of Christ (against Hävernick, Hengstenb., Auberl., etc.); for the verb הִנָּבִיר would not have been suited to express that idea, and, moreover, the sin offering (cf. v. 24) would hardly have been passed by without mention in that case. Kliefoth emphasizes correctly, "that in this place the הַיּוֹמִי of v. 26 must be considered the subject, and that the observation here relates not to the abrogation, but merely to the suspension of the sacrifices;" but he afterward arbitrarily applies the passage to a temporary suspension and suppression of the eucharist as the sacrifice of the New Covenant, to be caused by the antichrist in the last age of the church.—And for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate; rather, "and abominations of desolation shall be on the wing." This יָעַל בְּנֶה שְׁקִיצִים מִשְׁמַח constitutes the actual climax of the many difficulties presented in this passage, the real crux interpretum, which has produced almost as many explanations as interpreters. Probably all those methods of explanation are to be at once rejected and avoided which contradict the most ancient quotation and translation of the words in the originally Hebrew Maccabean book (chap. i. 54; cf. Matt. xxiv. 15; Mark xiii. 14), and the corresponding testimony of the most ancient translators, the Sept., Theodotion, and the Vulgate. All these render שְׁקִיצִים מִשְׁמַח by "abominations of desolation" (1 Macc., i. c., τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως; Sept., Theodot., βδέλυγμα τῶν ἐρημώσεων; Vulg., abominatio desolationis), which probably resulted from the influence of primitive traditions that were certainly correct in the main. מִשְׁמַח was accordingly regarded as a genitive from the beginning, and probably by the author himself—not, however, as a genitive of possession, but as a genitive of description; or, what amounts to the same thing, it was considered an apposition to the preceding plural שְׁקִיצִים, in support of which the analogy of אֲרֵבֶּה in chap. viii. 8 may be adduced on the one hand (as also the similar connection of that plural with a singular in Jer. xlix. 11), and on the other, the appositional combination מִשְׁמַח הַשְּׁקִיצִים in chap. viii. 18 (cf. also הַבְּרִית מִשְׁמַח

רָאָה, 1 Chron. xxvii. 5). * The plural שְׁקִיפִים (for which, however, the writer of 1 Macc. i. c., substituted the sing. שְׁקִיפָה, βδελυγμα, possibly with design, because the abomination of idolatry with which Epiphanes desecrated the temple was chief in his mind) at all events denotes "abominations, horrible things," and more particularly abominable things from a religious point of view, abominable idolatries, what is loathsome in the domain of Divine worship, "res abominandas ad cultum Deorum spectantes," cf. xi. 31; xii. 11. In like manner as this meaning of שְׁקִיפִים is adequately secured by the βδελυγμα or abominatio of the ancient translators, so that of שְׁקִיפָה, by which it denotes "ravager or desolation," is evidently established by their ἐρημωσις. This rendering may be substantiated by a comparison with שְׁמִימָה in the preceding verse, and also with שְׁמִימָה in Ezek. xxxvi. 3 (of שְׁמָה, "to be desolate, uninhabited," Lam. i. 4; 2 Sam. xiii. 20), and accords as well with the context as does the idea of an "object to be stared at, or of terror"—hence "what is terrible, dreadful,"—by which Hitzig, Ewald, et al., prefer to render the term (by virtue of a one-sided application of the fund. meaning of שְׁמָה, "to stare, shudder"). If these considerations are accordingly sufficient to establish for שְׁקִיפָה the sense of "abomination of desolation" = "desolating abomination of idolatry, hideously devastating nature of the idolatrous service," there remains only the difficult וְיִצֵּל בְּנֶהָ to be interpreted. The ancient versions are agreed in rendering בְּנֶהָ by lepon, temphum, and also in not connecting it as a stat. constr. with the following term, but taking it separately as a stat. absol., and reading it וְיִצֵּל. It might be difficult to raise any material objection against this departure from the Masoret. punctuation, since it is only too easy to conceive of בְּנֶהָ as a stat. constr., and thus reach the ordinary reading, in view of the temptation to obtain the sense of "wings of abomination, hideous wings," which is suggested by passages like Zech. v. 1, 9. Moreover, the interpretation of בְּנֶהָ by "sanctuary" has an almost irresistible though indirect support in the περιβόλιον τοῦ λεποι of Matt. iv. 5. בְּנֶהָ, in itself equivalent to "screen, covering, roof" (from which fund. meaning all others, e.g., wing, tassel, edge, border, etc., are readily derived), might without difficulty become the customary term to designate the roof of the temple or the "pinnacle of the temple" (Matt. i. c.), and afterward be applied, with equal adaptation, to the entire edifice of the temple (in view of its elevated site and its prominent buildings), by virtue of a synecdoche analogous to that which prevails in the Latin with reference to tectum, and in the Greek (cf. Matt. viii. 8) in the use of στέγη. If this view should not seem objectionable, it will not be necessary to limit the sense of בְּנֶהָ so as to apply to the roof-pinnacle, summit, or highest point of the temple (Gesenius, Hengstenberg, etc.), nor yet to violently amend וְיִצֵּל בְּנֶהָ by supplying וְיִצֵּל בְּנֶהָ, with J. D. Michaelis. It will then be possible to render it simply by, "and on the wing, i.e., the temple," and to regard the "desolating idolatrous abominations found on it as any symbols or utensils of idolatrous worship whatever, whether idols, altars erected to their worship, or other similar fixtures. See especially Bleek, Jahrb. f. d. Theol., 1860, p. 93 et seq."—We adduce, by way of illustration merely, several of the more recent and noticeable of the many interpretations rejected in favor of the above (with reference to which Hitzig, p. 168, observes somewhat coarsely, but not without wit, and, were he to assign to his own a principal place among them, not incorrectly, that "the expositors themselves are here lying-in in the weeks, and being delivered of all manner of שְׁקִיפִים"). Hitzig interprets, "and annihilation, even to its full consummation, is poured out on the extreme point of the horrible abomination" (by which expression is designated the idolatrous altar, which, according to 1 Macc. i. 59, was erected on the altar of burnt-offerings by Antiochus); Ewald, "and above shall be the horrible wing of abominations," i.e., "the wing-shaped (!?) point of the heathen altar shall appear over" the ruined altar of Jehovah; Wieseler, "and a desolator shall arise against the wing of abominations;" Von Lenggerke, "the desolator comes upon the pinnacle of abomination" (also Hengstenberg, Maurer, Reinke); de Wette, "the abomination of the desolator shall stand on the pinnacle of the temple;" Hävernick, "on the head (or summit) of the abominations is a desolator;" Auberlen, "and because of the desolating wing of abominations . . . the curse (!) shall drop down upon the desolate;" Delitzsch, "and indeed, because of the desolating wing of abominations (which spreads over the temple and the altar), the sacrifice shall be abolished;" Hofmann, "and upon the covering of the desolating idolatrous institutions (i.e., on the new plate which Antiochus caused to be placed on the profaned altar with a view to the offering of heathen sacrifices) the sacrifice shall be interrupted for half a week;" Füller, "and over the covering of abominations stands a desolator;" Ebrard,

Kliefoth, "and a destroyer comes on the wings of idolatrous abominations" (so formerly Reichel, Stud. u. Kritiken, 1848, and also Kranichfeld [and substantially Keil]); Jahn, Hermeneutic. Append., p. 161, Gesenius (Thesaur.). "desolation comes upon the horrible wing of the rebel's host;" [Stuart, "and a waster shall be over a winged fowl of abominations," i.e., the winged statue of Jupiter Olympius placed by Antiochus in the temple], etc.—Even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate; rather, "but (only) until extirpation and judicial punishment shall be poured out upon the desolator," i.e., the abomination of desolation shall continue only until the Divinely determined judgment shall be poured out upon the desolator. The וְעַד may be rendered by "and indeed" (as ἐπεξεgeticum), or by "but yet;" in either case this closing sentence serves to limit the idea. It points out, in a comforting manner, how long the abomination of desolation should continue in the sanctuary, certifying that it could be maintained no longer than the providence of God should permit.* "The thought that the events of the entire period of severe tribulation in question are controlled by a Divine decree which predetermines their end and results was already expressed for the comfort of the pious in the וְעַד of v. 26, and was also implied by וְעַד , v. 24" (Kranichfeld). The combination וְעַד וְעַד is taken verbatim from Isa. x. 23; xxviii. 22, and signifies, as in those passages, "utter extinction (annihilation) and consummation,"—a hendiadys which denotes a "Divinely determined annihilation, extirpation imposed as a judicial punishment." This two-fold idea forms a unit in the intimate blending of its shades of meaning, and is the subject of the verb וְעַד ; for וְעַד is not in this instance a preposition governing the two substantives, but a conjunction, signifying "until that," as elsewhere וְעַד ; cf. Gen. xxxviii. 11; Hos. x. 12. The annihilation that was determined "drops down, is poured out" on the וְעַד , the impious desolator, as the curse and the oath were to descend upon the guilty Israelites, v. 11; cf. וְעַד , which does not materially differ from וְעַד , as has already been shown.— וְעַד , the Kal participle of וְעַד , is probably equivalent in substance to וְעַד , the Piel partic. of the same verb (cf. chap. viii. 13; xii. 11 with chap. xi. 31).† Like that, it signifies "desolating, the desolating (agent), desolation," and probably does not primarily designate the person of the antichrist, but rather both antichrist and his host (cf. v. 26, "the people of a prince")—hence, the aggregate of the power that opposed God led Israel into apostasy and desecrated its sanctuary, and upon which the Divine judgment was for that reason poured out. Hitzig arbitrarily remarks (as did Ewald and Hoimann before him) that וְעַד does not designate the tyrant who resisted God, but rather the idol-altar erected by him or the heathen religion generally, against which destruction and judgment are here denounced, as being horrible to any Israelite in its nature.

Relating to the history of the exposition of vs. 24-27.

1. Jewish exposition in pre-Christian times is united in referring this section to the Maccabæan era of tribulation under Antiochus Epiphanes. This is established beyond controversy by the $\text{βδελυγμα ἐρωμώσεως}$ of 1 Macc. i. 54, which corresponds to וְעַד , v. 27, and in that place denotes the smaller idol-altar (θυμιάριον , v. 59) erected by Antiochus Epiphanes on the altar of burnt-offerings. It is no less clearly indicated by the manner in which the Sept. renders this paragraph, and supplements it with various additions that obviously relate to the Maccabæan period. In this connection the mode of expressing the time indicated at the beginning of v. 26 is especially instructive. "And after threescore and two weeks," reads in that version, " $\text{μετὰ ἑξήκοντα καὶ ἑβδόμηκοντα καὶ ἑξήκοντα, δύο,}$ " i.e., after 139 (67 + 62) years. This was doubtless intended to designate the year 139 of the era of the Seleucidæ (B.C. 174) as the time at which began the apostasy of the Jews who had been seduced by Antiochus; cf. 1 Macc. i. 11 et seq.; 2 Macc. iv. 9 et seq. See also Wieseler, Die 70 Wochen, etc., p. 201; Hävernick, Komment., p. 387 et seq.—Several expressions in the New Test. appear to indicate that shortly before the advent of Christ the Jews again began to look for the fulfilment of the prophecy in question in the future; e.g., Luke ii. 38 (cf. v. 24), $\text{προσδεχόμενοι λίτρῳ σου Ἰερουσαλὴμ}$; Matt. xi. 3, ὁ ἐρχόμενος , a designation of the Messiah that probably originated in a misunderstanding of וְעַד in v. 26 (cf. Wieseler, p. 150); and also the allusions to the "abomination of desolation," v. 27, contained in the eschatological prophecies uttered by the Saviour (Matt. xxiv. 15; Mark xiii. 14) and by St. Paul (2 Thess. ii. 3 et seq.), which could only be understood by their contemporaries, in case a Messianic character were assigned to the paragraph before us, and consequently, in case its fulfilment were not exclusively looked for in the events of the Maccabæan period.*—Jose-

* [Rather, it shows that the abominable object should remain even until the complete desolation. Keil's objection to the use of וְעַד as a conjunction, that "though וְעַד is so used, וְעַד is not," has little force.]

† [Such a confusion of Kal and Piel is quite unauthorized. וְעַד must here, as everywhere else, be treated as passive, desolate. It is certainly parallel with וְעַד of the preceding verse, as the connection with וְעַד in both instances shows.]

thus also bears witness that this Messianic-eschatological interpretation was current among the Jews of his day, in the repeated instances where he states, or at least implies, that the terrible incidents connected with the Jewish war and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans were predicted by the prophet Daniel; e.g., Ant., X. 11, 7: "Daniel also wrote concerning the Roman government, and that our country should be made desolate by them (ὅτι ἐν αὐτῶν ἐρημαθῆσεται);" De Bell. Jud., IV. 5, 2, where he applies the term "anointed one," v. 26, and again the expression "anointed one and prince," v. 25, to the high priest Ananus whom the Idumæans murdered; and De Bell. Jud., VI. 5, 4, where the mysterious oracle "that then should their city be taken, when their temple should become four-square" seems to refer back to v. 27 (where they perhaps read יְהִי כְּרִבְעָה instead of שְׁבַע), etc. It is less certain whether any direct reference to this section is contained in the celebrated passage, De Bell. Jud., VI. 5, 4, ὡς κατὰ τὸν καιρὸν ἐκείνων ἀπὸ τῆς χάρας τῆς αὐτῶν ἀρξεί τῆς οἰκουμένης. In that case the parallel records in Tacitus, Hist., V. 13 and Suet., Vesp., 4, must, of course, be likewise rooted in the prophecy of Daniel that is before us. Concerning this question see Hävernick, p. 390, who, however, probably finds too much in the passage, since he refers the ἀρξεί τῆς οἰκουμένης directly to the יְהִי of v. 25 and 26.*

2. The interpretation of Josephus, which applies the prophecy to the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and to Titus as the יְהִי of v. 26, seems to have been accepted, with scarcely an exception, by the later Jews of the Talmudic æra and the time immediately subsequent. The principal witness to this fact is Jerome (on v. 24 et seq.; T. V., 2 ed. Vallara, p. 694). The "Hebraei" of his day calculated the 490 years or seventy weeks of years from the first year of Darius or B.C. 539 indeed, but none the less assigned their conclusion to the age of Jesus, even finding his death predicted therein (probably in the יְהִי of v. 26), since they held that "non erit illius imperium, quod putabat se redempturum" (as it should be read, instead of "quod putabant se retenturos," which is a later emendation). They also found a prediction of the approach of the Roman army under Vespasian and Titus, in the same place. Several added even the rising under Barcocheba or the three years' (three and a half years) war against Hadrian: "Nec ignoramus, quosdam illorum dicere, quod una hebdomada, de qua scriptum est: confirmabit pactum multis hebdomada una, decidatur Vespasiano et Hadriano, quod iuxta historiam Josephi Vespasianus et Titus tribus annis et sex mensibus pacem cum Judæis fecerint. Tres autem annis et sex mensibus sub Hadriano supplantantur, quando Hierusalem omnino subversa est, et Judæorum gens cæteratim cæsa, ita ut Judææ quoque finibus pellerentur."—The two Gemaras also refer this prophecy to the war against Vespasian; the Babylonian in Nusir, c. 5; Sanhedr., c. 11, and the Jerusalem in Kelim, c. 9; and several

Talmudic and Rabbinical traditions are likewise based on that interpretation, e.g., that the Targumist had neglected to translate the Hagio-grapha, because it was taught in them that "the Messiah should be cut off" (v. 26. See Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. ad Luc. xix. 11; Schöttgen, Hor. Hebr., p. 211); and that the Messiah actually came at the time when Jerusalem was destroyed and the temple desolated, but as a sufferer and in disguise (Gläserer, De gemin. Jud. Mess., p. 23 ss.; Corrodi, Krit. Gesch. des Chilismus, I. 284 et seq.).—It was reserved for the later period of the middle ages to introduce several new and more independent explanations beside this variously modified Messianic interpretation of the prophecy; e.g., by referring the יְהִי to Cyrus (Saad. Gaon., Rashi, Jachiad.), or to Nehemiah (Ibn-Ezra) or the high-priest Joshua (Levi b. Gera). Cf. Müller, Judaism, pp. 321, 342 et seq.; Carpzov, in his ed. of Raymond Martini's Pugio fidei, p. 233.—It was customary to follow the Seder Olam Rabba in reckoning the seventy weeks from the first destruction of the temple to the second; see Abendana, in the Spicileg. ad Michl. Jophi: "Hebdomades hæc sept. sunt septimana annorum quadringentorum nonaginta, idemque sine dubio a devastatione primi ad devastationem secundi templi, quia sept. anni fuere captivitatis Babylonice, et quadringenti viginti anni, quibus futura erit domus secunda in structura sua: atque sic majores nostri exposuere in Seder Olam." By this method of reckoning, the יְהִי of v. 25, is accordingly made to apply to the period of Jeremiah's prophecy respecting the seventy years' exile or to the year B.C. 588. Ibn-Ezra alone departs from this method, by referring that expression concerning the going forth of the oracle (v. 23) to Daniel, and consequently assigning the beginning of the 490 years to the year B.C. 539 and extending the first seven weeks of years belonging to that period, to Nehemiah, the restorer of the temple, or to the twentieth year of Artaxerxes. Concerning these Rabbinical methods of reckoning, and at the same time, concerning their fundamental incorrectness and untenable character in a chronological point of view, cf. Chr. B. Michaelis, Annot. uberior, III. 320 et seq. Individual Rabbins in modern times were convinced of the incorrectness of this usual anti-Messianic interpretation, as appears from the noteworthy expression of the Venetian chief-Rabbin Simon Luzzato, concerning this passage, as recorded by Wolf in the Biblioth. Hebr., III. 1228. According to him, "the consequence of a too extended and profound investigation on the part of Jewish scholars would be that they would all become Christians; for it cannot be denied that according to Daniel's limitation of the time, the Messiah must have already appeared. But that Jesus was the true Messiah he felt himself unable to accept as certain."

8. The Christian expositors of the older time regarded the directly Messianic bearing of the passage as being generally incontrovertible, and especially the application of יְהִי to Christ the crucified, as also the reference of the "restoring and building" of the city and temple in v. 25 to the establishing of the church of the New Covenant; cf. Barnabas, Ep., c. 16:

γράφεται γὰρ καὶ ἔσται, ἐβδομάδης συντελουμένης, οικοδομηθήσεται ναὸς θεοῦ ἐνδόξως ἐπὶ τῷ ὄνματι κυρίου, κτλ. The different exegeses varied exceedingly, however, in the mode of reckoning the years.* Jerome, on this passage, already mentions nine different methods of explaining them: (1) that of Jul. Africanus, who reckoned the 490 years from Nehemiah, or the 20th year of Artaxerxes, to the death of Christ, but in connection with this committed the error of reckoning by Jewish lunar years (resulting in only 465 solar years); (2) Three different theories of Eusebius, who (a) dates the first sixty-nine weeks from the return of the Jews in the reign of Cyrus to the death of Alexander Jannæus, the high priest and king, and Pompey's invasion (B.C. 536-B.C. 64; thus in De n. ev. VIII 2, 55 et seq.); or (b) from the second year of Darius Hystaspis (B.C. 520 to the birth of Christ (ibid. and Chronic., Ol. 184); or, (c) regards the last week as a period of seventy years, and attempts to calculate from the resurrection of Christ; (3) that of Hippolytus, who counted sixty-nine mystical weeks (comprising more than seven years each) from the first year of Cyrus to the incarnation of Christ, and declared that the last mystical week denotes the future period of the antichrist, which is connected with the end of the world; (4) that of Apollinaris of Laodicea, who reckoned the 490 years from the birth of Christ ("ab exitu Verbi," v. 25), and therefore expected the coming of the antichrist and the end of the world about a century after his day, in the "last week;" (5) that of Clemens Alex. who extended the seventy weeks of years, in the face of all chronology, from the first year of Cyrus to the second year of Vespasian (B.C. 560-A.D. 70); (6) that of Origen, who denies the possibility of any more exact chronological estimate, and therefore assumes 4900 years instead of 490, reaching from Adam to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus (not indeed in vol. X. of his Stromata, which Jerome cites, but in his Tract. XXIV. on Matthew c. 24); (7) that of Tertullian (adv. Judæos, c. 8), who reckons the 437½ years from the first year of Darius Nothus (whom he strangely identifies with Darius Medus) to the birth of Christ, and fifty-two and a half from that event to the destruction of Jerusalem, thus obtaining 490.—Jerome himself expresses no opinion respecting the mode of reckoning to be observed, but seems to favor that of Africanus, which he preferred to all the others, and probably not without reason. That method is likewise adopted by Chrysostom, Theodoret, Isidore of Pelusium, Euthymius Zigabenus, and generally by a majority of expositors in the Oriental church, but few of whom assume an independent position. Among the latter are, e.g., Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. xii. 19), who attempts to extend the seventy

* On this point, cf. Heusch, Die patristischen Berechnungen der 70 Jahren des Daniels, in Die bibl. Theol. Quartalschrift, 1:68, No. iv., p. 535 et seq.; also Reinkens, Die biblischen Weissagungen, iv. 1, 389 et seq. The statements of the latter are, however, sadly in need of correction and supplementing by those of Heusch.

weeks of years from the sixth year of Darius Medus to the birth of Christ, but violates historical accuracy by identifying Darius Medus with Darius Hystaspis; Ephraem Syrus who places the restoration of Jerusalem in the beginning of the seventieth week and the destruction by Titus at its close, without entering on a more careful calculation in other respects; Polychronius, a brother of Theodore of Mopsuestia, who reckons the first seven weeks from Darius Medus to the ninth year of Darius Hystaspis, when Zerubbabel's temple is said to have been completed, the sixty-two weeks from the twentieth year of Artaxerxes to the birth of Christ, and the final week from that date to Titus, while the death of Christ falls in its central point; Basil of Seleucia (Orat., 38 in t. 85 of Migne's Patrol.), who calculates the first sixty-nine weeks from the completion of the walls of Jerusalem in the twenty-eighth year of Xerxes (!) to the resurrection of Christ, and identifies the seventieth week with the first seven years after the resurrection, while he declares the abomination of desolation erected in the middle of that week to have been the familiar attempt of Caligula to erect his image in the temple.—Among the later expositors of the Latin church, Augustine, following the example of Jerome, avoids every independent and detailed calculation of the seventy weeks. He contents himself with finding a fulfilment of the leading features of the prophecy Dan. ix. 24 et seq., in the earthly work of Christ and in the judgment of Jerusalem, and expressly rejects (especially in Ep. 199 "de fine seculi") the opinion of those who looked for two periods of seventy weeks of years, the first of which should reach to Christ's advent in the flesh, and the second to the end of the world. This assumption of a double period of seventy weeks of years, or of an Old-Test. and typical realization of the prophecy, followed by a New-Test. antitypical fulfilment, was advocated as late as the sixth century by the unknown Arian author of the so-called Opus imperfectum in Matthæum. Sulpicius Severus (Chron., II. 21) extends the sixty-nine weeks from the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes I. to Vespasian, or from the restoration of the temple to its second destruction. His contemporary, Julius Hilarius, appears in his Chronologia s. libellus de mundi duratione (in Migne, t. 13, p. 1098) as the forerunner of the modern critical exposition, in consequence of his denial of the direct Messianic character of the prophecy, whose fulfilment he places in the age of Antiochus and the Maccabees; but he commits the gross chronological blunder of assigning 434 years (= 62 weeks) to the interval between the return of the Jews under Zerubbabel and the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, while the period between B.C. 536 and B.C. 175 really amounts to but 361 years! Prosper Aquitan in his Chronicon adopts the view advocated by Eusebius in the Demonstr. evangelica and the Chron. (see supra, No. 2 b), and accordingly reckons the sixty-nine weeks from the building of the temple under Darius to Herod the Gr. and the birth of Christ. Finally, the venerable Bede adopts substantially the view of Julius Africanus (Libell. de temporum ratione, c. 7), as does also Thomas Aquinas (Comm. in Dan., in Opp., t. XIII. ed. Antwerp).

4. The expositors of modern times, and more particularly of pre-rationalistic times, are agreed in recognizing the Messianic bearing of this prophecy, but differ exceedingly in their modes of reckoning the seventy weeks, or, what amounts to the same thing, in their interpretations of בְּשָׁבַע דָּבָר, v. 25.* As the terminus a quo of the seventy weeks they accept one of the following dates:

a. The time of the first prophecy by Jeremiah (Jer. xxv. 11 et seq.), or the fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign; thus Harduin (Chronol. Vet. Test., Amstel., 1709, p. 592 ss.); A. Calmet (Dissert. sur les 70 semaines de Daniel, Dissert., p. 1); A. Collins (The scheme of liberal prophecy, I. 109).

b. The time of Jeremiah's second prophecy (Jer. xxix. 10) or the fourth year of Zedekiah; so Seb. Münster, Vatablus (and also several expositors belonging to the last centuries in the Middle Ages, e.g., Lyranus, in the Postilla, Raym, Martini, Pugio fid., 2, 269, etc.).

c. The date of Daniel's prophecy itself (chap. ix. 1), and hence the first year of the reign of Darius Medus over Babylon, B. C. 539; so J. H. Jungmann (Cassel, 1681); J. Koch (Entsiegeller Daniel, II., § 206, and Kurze Anfangsgründe der Chronologie, II. 24), J. D. Michaelis (Versuch über die 70 Wochen Daniels, Gött. and Gotha, 1770; cf. his Epistola de Septuag. hebdom. ad Jo. Pringle, London, 1773); Matth. Hassenkamp (Versuch einer neuen Erklärung der 70 Wochen Daniels, Lemgo, 1772); Velthusen (Muthmassungen über die siebenmal siebenzig Jahre beim Daniel ix. 24-27, Hanover, 1774).

d. The first year of the reign of Cyrus, B. C. 580; Calvin, Écolampadius, l'Empereur, Cocceius, Matth. Bervaldus (Chronicon ss. auctoritate constitutum, III. 7), B. Blayney (A dissertation by way of Inquiry into Daniel's seventy Weeks, Oxford, 1775), H. Uri (Sept. hebdomadum, quas Gabriel ad Danielem detulerat, interpretatio, paraphrasis, computatio, Oxford, 1788), also Dathe, Hegel, etc., in their commentaries.

e. The second year of the reign of Darius Hystaspis (B. C. 520), or the year of the prophecies of blessing by Haggai (i. 1 et seq.; ii. 1 et seq.) and Zechariah (i. 1 et seq.; iii. 8 et seq.; viii. 7 et seq.); so J. Driedo (De scriptis et dogmaticis ecclesiasticis, c. 5), Corn. Jansen (Concord. evangel., c. 122), J. A. Bengel (Ordo temporum, etc., Stuttgart, 1741).

f. The second year of the reign of Darius Nottus (B. C. 423); so J. J. Scaliger (De emendat. temporum, I. 4), S. Calvisius (Opus chronologicum).

g. The second year of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus; so Luther (D. Prophet Daniel deutsch, etc., vol. 41, p. 247, ed. Erl.), Melancthon (Comm. p. 891), Sal. Glossius (Philol. sacra).

h. The seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, or the date of the first decree by this king to rebuild Jerusalem (Ezra vii. 1; viii. 11 et seq.); so Abr. Calov (De Septuag. septimanis mysterium, Viteb., 1663; Bibl. illustr., I., p. 119 ss.), M. Geier, in the Comm., Isaac Newton (Observations, etc.), J. R. Rus (Diss. de Sept. hebdom. Danielis, Jenæ, 1740), H. Benzel (Diss. de 70 hebdom. Danielis, in the Syntagma dis- sertat., II., 21 ss.), H. Prideaux (Connections, etc.), Alex. Sostmann (Comment. chronol. philol. et exeget. in orac. Dan. ix. 24-27, Lugd. B., 1710), S. Deyling (Progr. ad Dan. ix. 24 ss., Lips., 1724), J. G. Franck (Novum systema chronologie fundamentalis, Gött., 1778), J. C. Döderlein (Institutt. Theol. chr., II., p. 530 ss.).

i. The twentieth year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, or the date of the second edict by that king (Neh. ii. 1, 7 et seq.); so Luther (Dass Jesus Christus ein geborner Jude sei, vol. 29, p. 71 et seq., ed. Erl.),* H. J. Offerhaus (Dissertat. de 70 septimanis Danielis, Groning., 1756), J. G. Reinbeck (Betrachtungen über die Augsb. Konfession, III., 39), S. S. Weichmann (Carmen Danielis de 70 hebdom. Christo vindicat., Progr., Viteb., 1772), Starke (Synops., p. 2614).

k. The tenth or eleventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, or the earlier date by about ten years assigned to his second edict, on the ground of his co-regency with his father Xerxes; so Dion. Petavius (Doctrina temp., L. 12, c. 29; Rationarium temp., II., 3, c. 9), Camp. Vitringa (De Septuag. hebdom. Dan. advers. Marahum, Obseruat. sacr., II., p. 290 ss.), C. B. Michaelis (in Annot. uberior., etc.).

l. The second year of the reign of Xerxes; so J. E. Faber (Jesus ex natulium opportunitate Messias, Jenæ, 1772, p. 125 ss.).

A great difference of opinion prevailed also with reference to the particular terminus ad quem of the prophecy referred to Christ, inasmuch as (a) some, following Eusebius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Jacob of Edessa, and other ancient churchly expositors, extended the seventy weeks merely to the death of Christ, others (b) continued them to the time of his presentation in the temple (Jungmann, Sostmann, etc.), others (c) to his baptism in the Jordan or to his anointing (Melancthon, Calvin, Vitringa; also W. Whiston, Dissertation upon Daniel's weeks, London, 1725), still others (d) to the year of our Lord's death (Luther, Calov, Prideaux, Buddens, H. Ecol. Vet. Ti., p. 854 ss.), and others finally (e) included the more general spread of the Gospel in the years immediately following the Saviour's death in the series of the seventy weeks (Petavius, Bengel, J. Brunsmann, etc.).—Various methods were adopted in order to obviate, by means of exact calculation, the discrepancy between the termin. a quo and ad quem, which was either too large or too small. According to Bertholdt, p. 574 et seq., they may be designated as follows:

(1). The method of parallelism by which the seven and the sixty-two weeks were reckoned from the same point of time, or by which these periods were not regarded as successive in their order, but as contemporaneous with each other (Harduin, Jungmann, Collins, Marsham, etc.).

(2). The method of intercalation which consisted in interpolating intervals of greater or less extent between the several periods of hebdomads, and especially between the sixty-ninth and seventieth weeks (l'Empereur, Newton, Koch, Beer, Uri, etc.).

(3). The method of transposition by which the first two periods of hebdomads were enum-

* Luther, however, confound* Artaxerxes I., who figures in the book of Nehemiah, with Cambyse, cf. also the work, Von den Juden und ihren Lügen, vol. 32, pp. 196 et seq., 212 et seq.

* Cf. Bertholdt, Daniel, II. p., 567 et seq.

erated in inverted order, i.e., the sixty-two first, and the seven afterward (thus, in imitation of Tertullian, Theodoret, etc., some of the most recent expositors, especially Hofmann, Delitzsch, Wieseler, etc.).

(4). The analogical method which estimates the hebdomada in the several sections by an unequal standard, e.g., regarding the seventieth week as a "septimana magna" or Jubilee period of forty-nine years (Newton, Frank; similarly Calmet, A. Kluit [Vaticinium de Messiu duce primarium s. explic. Sept. hebdom. Dan., Mediol., 1774], and already many of the church fathers mentioned above, as Eusebius, Polychronius, etc.).

(5). The method of reckoning by lunar years of 354 days, without an intercalated month (Hassenkamp and J. D. Michaelis—after the precedent of Jul. Africanus and his patristic successors).

(6). The method of counting by jubilee periods of fifty years each, by which the seventy years appear to be exactly equal to 500 years (Sostmann and others).

(7). The method of reckoning by Chaldean years of 360 days, by which the seventy hebdomads are reduced to 483 years (Pet. Brinch, Diss. chronol.-critica de 70 hebdomad. Danielis, Hafn., 1702).

(8). The mystical method of enumeration, which seeks either to limit or extend the seventy weeks of years by the use of a year of any abnormal and mystical length. Hippolytus and others led the way in the ancient church in this method; and following them we have J. J. Hainlinus (Clavis sacrar. temporum, Tüb., 1692, and Sol temporum s. Chronol. mystica, Tüb., 1647); Bengel, Thube, Crusius (Hypomnemata in theologiam prophetica). Among them Hainlin assumed shorter years than the ordinary, giving them 343 days each, and thus obtained 480 Julian years for the seventy weeks. Bengel, Thube, etc., on the other hand, sought to amplify, and therefore fixed the length of a mystical year at $1\frac{1}{4}$ solar years, and thus obtained $555\frac{1}{2}$ years for the period of seventy weeks.

5. The critico-rationalistic or anti-Messianic expositors of recent times may be divided into two principal classes:

A. That of the emendators who adopt a violent course, and seek to remove the chronological difficulty by means of exegetical or critical assumptions of a more or less arbitrary character, e.g., (1) by the assertion that the seventy weeks are ordinary weeks and therefore 490 days, and extended from the day of the vision to the time of Cyrus and of laying the foundations of the temple (thus the Eng.-work, A free Inquiry into Daniel's vision or Prophecy of the Seventy Weeks, London, 1776; cf. Bertholdt, p. 554 et seq.); (2) by the assertion that Daniel, who wrote after the time of Cyrus, predicted to the people an impending second destruction of the recently restored temple in this prophecy, which was therefore not fulfilled (Eckermann, Theol. Beiträge, I. 1, p. 132 et seq.); (3) by the assumption that vs. 23-27 are the gloss of some rabbi (Franz Löwenheim, Inquisition critica exegetica in difficult. proph. Dan., c. ix., etc. Wiroeb., 1787); (4) by several less important changes in the reading of v. 24 or 25, such as were proposed by Schmidt (in Paulus' Memorabilia, VII., 41 et seq.), Velthusen, J. D. Michaelis, Jahn, et al. The first (with whom Baumgarten-Crusius agrees, Bibl. Theol., p. 370) reads v. 24, שְׁבַעִים שָׁבָעִים, "seventy, yea, seventy years" (which is intended to indicate the duration of the exile), and then translates v. 25, "from the present time to the Messiah are seventy, seven, sixty, and two weeks," which is interpreted to mean that "twice seventy years may elapse before his advent" (1). Velthusen (Muthmassungen über die siebenmal 70 Jahre des Daniel, Hannover, 1774) reads v. 25 שְׁבַעִים שָׁבָעִים שְׁבַעִים, J. D. Michaelis (Versuch über die 70 Jahrwochen Daniels, Gött., 1771) emends the same passage so as to read שְׁבַעִים שָׁבָעִים שְׁבַעִים, Jahn (Herm. sacra, Append., t. I.), on the other hand, reads v. 24, like Schmidt, שְׁבַעִים שָׁבָעִים (the seventy years of the captivity), and then renders v. 25 שְׁבַעִים שָׁבָעִים (70 x 7 or 490 years, which reach from Cyrus to B.C. 64), and adds in addition שְׁבַעִים שָׁבָעִים שְׁבַעִים (i.e., seventy years, to A.D. 7 or 8, and sixty-two years, to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus).

B. The more considerate and scientific expositors of the critical school conceive of the passage as belonging to the times of Antiochus Epiphanes, and as a Vaticinium ex eventu relating to that age. In this view they were preceded by numerous Jewish and a few Christian representatives of the Maocabean interpretation (e.g., by Julius Hilarianus, about A.D. 400; by Marsham, an Englishman [Canon chron., p. 610 ss.], the Jesuit Harduin [Opp. selecta, p. 592 ss.; cf. Köhler, De Harduin novu sed inepta interpretatione vatic. apud Dan. de 70 hebdom., Altorf, 1721], and the English free-thinker Ant. Collins [Scheme of Literal Prophecy, Lond., 1726]). So Corrodi (Krit. Gesch. des Chiliasmus, p. 247 et seq., and Freimüthige Versuche über verschiedene in Theologie und biblische Kritik einschlagende Materien, p. 42 et seq.), who, however, introduced much that is arbitrary in developing his scheme. He renewed, for instance, the questionable expedient of transposing the weeks [see No. 4 (3)], reckoning first sixty-two hebdomads from the beginning of the captivity to the first invasion of Judæa by Epiphanes, then seven hebdomads from the date of the composition of the book of pseudo-Daniel to the Maocabean Messiah, who, it is alleged, was expected to appear about the year B.C. 115, and finally inserting a single hebdomad between the two former periods, to which last week he assigns the actual persecutions, which involved, e.g., the murder of Onias III., the interruption of the sacrifices, etc.—Another representative of this tendency is Eichhorn (Allgem. Bibliothek der biblischen Literatur, III., 761 et seq.) who follows the method by parallelism [No. 4 (1)] rather than that of transposition, calculating the first seven hebdomads backwards from the edict of Cyrus in B.C. 536 to the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, but reckoning the sixty-two weeks forward from the fourth year of Jehoiakim (B.C. 605) to Ant. Epiphanes, and the final week from the death of Onias to the restoration of the temple services by Judas Mac-cabæus.—Eichhorn's hypothesis found an adherent in v. Ammon, who adopted it in his Biblische Theologie (II. 217 et seq.) with but few changes; but Bertholdt opposed it with keen criticism, and advanced instead the following explanation: "seventy weeks of years are determined upon the Jews until the expiation of their sin (i.e., to the dedication of the temple by Judas Maccabæus), and, more particularly, from the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar to the reign of Cyrus, forty-nine years or seven weeks of years; within a period of sixty-two further weeks of years Jerusalem is to be rebuilt (hence to the time of Epiphanes). At about the end of these sixty-two weeks (!) Alexander the Gr. dies, without leaving a natural successor. Afterward Jerusalem is desolated by Antiochus Epiphanes, who forms an alliance with numerous apostate Jews, that continues during nearly a week of years. At the middle of that week he interrupts the temple services and erects the statue of Jupiter Olympus on a wing of the temple—until death overtakes him." So far as the chronological order of the seven and sixty-two weeks is concerned, this expositor is therefore not a parallelist, but a representative of the theory that they denote successive periods. To obviate the exorbitant interval of sixty-two weeks of years between B.C. 536 and B.C. 175, he assumes that, as a whole, the statements by the oracle respecting time "are not to be taken mathematically, but prophetically and indefinitely" (p. 613)!—Bertholdt's theory is accepted by Griesinger (Neue Ansicht der Aufsitze im Buch Daniel, 1815, p. 92) and substantially also by Bleek. The latter (Theolog. Zeitschr. of Schleiermacher, de Wette, and Lücke, 1822, and Jahrb. f. d. Theologie, 1860) differs from Bertholdt in several particulars, e.g., in not dating the commencement of the first seven weeks of years from the destruction of Jerusalem, but from the prophetic oracle of Jeremiah, chapters xxv. and xxix., and in extending the sixty-two weeks exactly to the death of Seleucus Philopater (the מָלְכָא without a successor, v. 26). But they are entirely agreed in placing the seven, sixty-two, and one weeks in succession to each other, and in most positively rejecting every parallelism or transposition of these periods, as being contrary to the sense of the vision (Jahrb., etc., p. 83).—H. L. Reichel (Die vier Weltreiche des Propheten Daniel, in the Theol. Stud. u. Krit., 1848) and Kamphausen in Bunsen's Bibelwerk advocate views similar to those of Bleek, excepting that the latter holds that the "anointed one" of v. 26 denotes the high priest Onias, instead of Seleucus Philopater.—Several others, however, again made use of parallelisms, e.g., Rösch (Die 70 Jahrwochen des Buches Daniel, genau chronologisch nachgemessen, Stud. u. Krit., 1834), v. Lengerke, and Hitzig. The first takes the year B.C. 609 as the starting-point of the two parallel epochs as being the year which the alleged pseudo-Daniel assumed for the destruction of Jerusalem. The seven weeks of years, beginning at that date, were to continue until the commencement of the reign of Cyrus, B.C. 560, and the sixty-two weeks until the death of Seleucus Philopater, the "anointed one who should be cut off;" but this period is lengthened by the addition of eight farther weeks, which reach to B.C. 120 or to John Hyrcanus, the political Messiah of Judaism in the Maccabæan period. Von Lengerke likewise regards the seven and the sixty-two years as being parallel, but dates them from B.C. 588. The sixty-two were to expire with the murder of Seleucus Philopater, the "anointed one," v. 26 (although this is said to involve an error of 21–22 years in the reckoning of pseudo-Daniel, since the 434 years, if calculated from 588, would, in fact, reach to B.C. 154), and the seventieth week was to reach from 170 to the death of Antiochus in B.C. 164. There is consequently a gap of about six years between the close of the sixty-second week and the beginning of the last! Hitzig subjects this hypothesis of v. Lengerke to a searching criticism, but on his part, likewise adopts an arbitrary explanation based on parallelisms. He (a) inserts the seven weeks of years between B.C. 588 and 539; (b) the sixty-two weeks or 434 years, on the other hand, are reckoned backward, from B.C. 172 to B.C. 606, the year in which Jeremiah uttered his prophecy respecting the seventy years; (c) the seventieth week extends from April, B.C. 170, to the end of March, 164, and the murder of Onias, the "anointed one," v. 26, falls in the beginning of this last week. This hypothesis comes nearest to that of Eichhorn, from which it differs merely in reckoning the seven weeks forward from 588, and the sixty-two backward from 172, while Eichhorn counts the seven weeks in a retrograde order, and the sixty-two progressively.—A peculiar mode of reckoning was adopted by Ewald, which may be characterized as the abbreviating method. It first reckons the seven weeks of years from B.C. 588 to 539, and the sixty-two weeks from thence to B.C. 165, but then assumes a shortening of the latter period of 434 years by seventy (which reduction, it is alleged, was formerly indicated in the text itself by a note after v. 25 or v. 27 that has now been lost), and by this method returns to the year B.C. 175, in which the "anointed one was cut off," i.e., in which Seleucus Philopater died—and approximately at the same time, the year in which the momentous last week began, which extends from B.C. 174 to 167 (p. 424 et seq.).—Wieseler in substance (in his treatise, Die 70 Wochen, formerly followed the method of parallelism etc., Göttingen, 1839), but at a later period preferred a peculiar modification of the transposing method (in his review of the Times of Daniel, by the duke of Manchester, Gött. Gel. Anz., 1846). In the former instance he reckoned the sixty-two weeks from B.C. 606 to B.C. 172, and the last week from 172–165, and regarded the seven weeks as not admissible or to be counted beside the other sixty-three (pp. 102 et seq.; 123 et seq.); but in the latter, while he continues to reckon the sixty-three weeks from B.C. 606–165, he places the seven weeks after them, as representing the period which was to elapse between the week of severe tribulation and the advent of the Messiah (the מָלְכָא, v. 25, who is to be carefully distinguished from the מָלְכָא mentioned in v. 26, where Onias is intended). This period, which must not be calculated with mathematical exactness, but is to be interpreted spiritually, denotes a jubilee cycle, that has grown from a period of fifty years into one of more than 150 years, since Christ was born 160 years after the date of its beginning (p. 131 et seq.). Wieseler's modification of the transposing method may be denominated the lengthening hypothesis, in contradistinction from Ewald's abbreviating method. It obviously forms the point of transition to the Messianic conception of the text, and is intimately connected with the views of several representatives of the typical-Messianic interpretation in the latest times.

6. The most recent Messianic expositors are divided into two classes, who advocate respectively a direct-Messianic interpretation of the prophecy, or one that is merely typically Messianic.*

A. To the former class belong Less (Beweis der Wahrheit der christlichen Religion, p. 275 et seq.), Sack (Apologetik, p. 283 et seq.), Scholl (Commentatio de Sept. hebdomadibus Danielis, Francof., 1831), Dereser, Hävernicks, Hengstenberg, Allioli, Reinke, Stawars, Sepp, Weigl, Auberlen, Duke George of Manchester, Pusey, Kliefoth, etc. [including the great body of English and American expositors, with the almost sole exception of Moses Stuart]. In general, they are agreed in referring both the בְּקִרְיָהּ נִבְרָה, v. 25, and the בְּקִרְיָהּ, v. 26, to Jesus Christ, but they differ considerably as to the special terminus a quo of the prophecy, or its terminus ad quem. A majority regard the twentieth year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, or B.C. 455 (Neh. i. 1; ii. 1) as the starting-point of the seventy weeks or the date of the בִּלְמַע דָּבָר. They count sixty-nine weeks of years, or 483 years, from that date to the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius, twenty-eight ær. Dionysius, or 782 a. u. c. (Luke iii. 1), when the three and a half years of public activity on the part of our Lord began. They consequently place the Saviour's death and resurrection in the middle of the last week, and refer the בְּקִרְיָהּ נִבְרָה, v. 26, to his crucifixion. The remaining three and a half years are regarded as a more or less variable terminus, admitting of no precise chronological determination, but rather transpiring indefinitely in the course of the founding of Christianity (so Less, Sack, Scholl, Dereser, Hävernicks, Hengstenberg, Allioli, Reinke). Modifications of this theory are advocated (1) by Fr. Stawars (Die Weissagung Daniels in 24-27 in Bezug auf das Taufjahr Jesu, in the Tübinger Theol. Quartalschrift, 1868, No. III., p. 416 et seq.), who translates בִּלְמַע דָּבָר, v. 25, "from the fulfilment of God's promise to rebuild Jerusalem," and contends that that promise was fulfilled in connection with the rebuilding of Jerusalem as a city, under Nehemiah, in the year 458; from that time to twenty-six ær. Dionysius 483 years or sixty-nine weeks elapsed, and immediately afterward, in Jan. 27, Jesus was baptized in the Jordan by John; (2) by Auberlen and Pusey, who begin the seventy weeks in B.C. 458, or the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus (Ezra vii. 7), instead of the twentieth year of that reign, and thus obtain the twenty-sixth year of our æra as the close of the sixty-nine weeks, or the time of our Lord's baptism; (3) by Sepp (Leben Jesu, I., p. 248 et seq., second ed.), who regards Ezra as the spiritual rebuilders of Jerusalem, and therefore reckons from the year B.C. 460, locating the baptism of Jesus in the year 778 a. u. c., or A.D. 25; (4) by Weigl (Ueber das wahre Geburts- und Sterbejahr Jesu Christi, Part I., p. 108 et seq.), who renders the words at the commencement of v. 25 "from the execution of the command to rebuild Jerusalem," etc., and begins the seventy weeks with the year B.C. 453, thus obtaining the year 783 a. u. c., or A.D. 30, as the time of our Lord's baptism; (5) by Duke George of Manchester (in the work reviewed by Wieseler, The times of Daniel, chronological and prophetic, examined with relation to the point of contact between sacred and profane chronology, Lond. and Edinb., 1845), who takes the first year of Darius Medus as the terminus a quo of the seventy weeks—identifying that monarch with Darius Nothus, like Tertullian, Scaliger, Calvisius, etc.—and therefore calculates the 490 years from B.C. 424, which brings him to A.D. 66, the year in which the Christians fled from the besieged city of Jerusalem, and in which the Christian church was really founded. He assumes an entirely different terminus a quo for the sixty-nine weeks, namely B.C. 444, the alleged first year of Cyrus, whom he believes to have lived in the fifth instead of the sixth century before Christ (!). The sixty-nine weeks, or 483 years, intervened between that year and Christ's death on the cross in March, A.D. 39; (6) by Kliefoth, who goes back to the mystical theory of reckoning, and accordingly extends the seven weeks from the edict of Cyrus in B.C. 537 to the advent of Christ, regardless of the fact that that period does not consist of seven weeks of years, nor of seven centuries, nor of any cycle whatever, whose aggregate of years is divisible by seven—the sixty-two sevens from Christ to the time of the great apostasy, or of the antichrist at the end of earthly history (during which period of indefinite duration the church is to be "built" and "restored," or brought back to God), and finally, the last week from the great apostasy to the appearing of Christ, the last judgment, and the consummation of the world.

B. Hofmann, Delitzsch, Fuller, Ebrard, and Kranichfeld [also substantially Keil] adopt the typically Messianic interpretation. The former three also favor the transposing theory followed by Wieseler (1846), inasmuch as they assign to the seven weeks of years a place after the 62 + 1 weeks. They reckon the latter from B.C. 606 or the fourth year of Jehoiakim to the time of the Maccabees (and more particularly, the sixty-two weeks from 606-172, and the one week from 172-165), regarding the events of the æra of the Antiochian persecution and the Maccabæan revolt as types and prefigurations of the history of the founding of Christianity; and they describe the seven weeks of years as a period of unmeasured length, whose beginning is coincident with the "going forth of the word to build Jerusalem," i. e., with the first preaching of the Gospel in the time of Christ and the apostles, while their end is connected with the judgment of the world and the advent of Christ! There is therefore, on this theory, a "breaking of the thread," or a hiatus, between the sixty-three and the seven weeks amounting to about 160–190 years, and, in addition, an extension of the last seven weeks into periods of mysterious length; in other words, the aid of intercalation and of mystical enumeration is superadded to that of transposition [cf. supra, No. 4, (2), (3), and (8)]. These are employed at least by Hofmann and Delitzsch, who do not even shrink from the venturous experiment of amplifying the seventy weeks into quadratic Sabbatic periods,* while Füller, more sober and considerate, but assuredly not less arbitrary, interprets the six weeks as being wholly future, and as belonging to the distant end of the world. He endeavors to render this inordinate hiatus conceivable by the assumption that Daniel saw the post-Macedonian antichrist, Antiochus Epiphanes, and the post-Roman antichrist of the last times perspectiveally as one.—Ebrard avoids every method of transposition, but does not escape violently altering the text (in a review of Füller's Daniel, in the Gütterslohe Allgem. literar. Anzeiger, Oct., 1868, p. 267, and earlier, in his Offenbarung Johannis, p. 67 et seq.), in his endeavor to demonstrate the typically Messianic sense of the passage. Supported by the amplifying version of the Sept. (see supra, No. 1), he reads שְׁבַעִים in v. 25 a (scil. שְׁבַעִים), instead of שָׁבַעִים, or he asserts that שְׁבַעִים was omitted after שְׁבַעִים through the inadvertence of a copyist. He farther holds that v. 24 states, in general terms and round numbers, that seventy weeks of years were to elapse from the beginning of the captivity to Christ, and, by the method described above, obtains the more exact statement in v. 25, that $7 + 70 = 77$ weeks of years should intervene between the edict of Cyrus (538) and Christ, and sixty-two weeks between the building of the city "with street and wall" by Nehemiah (B.C. 440) and Christ (six years earlier than the Christian era). The time from Christ's birth to his death or the thirty-five years of his life on earth, in which he particularly includes the three and a half years of his official activity, are conceived by him as the former half of the last week, the whole of which is said to be a "larger mystical" week; and its latter half "reaches to the mystical three and a half years of the Apocalypse, which extend to the return of Christ."—Kranichfeld does less violence to the text than any of those referred to. Avoiding transposition, parallelisms, and emendations, he reckons the first seven weeks of years from the prophecy of Jeremiah, chap. xxix., and from the destruction of Jerusalem in B.C. 588 (cf. supra, on v. 25), the sixty-two weeks from the end of the former seven or the time of Daniel's vision in B.C. 589, and regards the שְׁבַעִים, v. 25, who stands at the beginning of the sixty-two weeks, as representing Cyrus, while the מָלְאֵךְ, v. 26, who appears at their close, is supposed to denote Christ. This theory consequently postulates a gap of more than a century between the Maccabæan period, which bounds the sixty-two weeks (and to whose sufferings the prophetic descriptions of v. 26 b and 27 refer), and the time of Christ, the "anointed one who was to be cut off," v. 26 a, which interval was unnoticed by the prophet, in harmony with the law of perspective vision.*

The assumption of this interval between the close of the sixty-two weeks and the opening of the New-Test. æra of salvation does not constitute the feature which forms our only objection to Kranichfeld's theory; for, without some such interval the prophecy would lose its genuinely prophetic character, and instead of being an ideal description, possessing the future, it would present a calculation of arithmetical ex-

* [Kell thus classifies the various interpretations: "1. Most of the church fathers and the older orthodox interpreters find prophesied here the appearance of Christ in the flesh, His death, and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. This view is in our time fully and at length defended by Hävernick (Comm.), Hengstenberg (Christol., III. 1, p. 19 sq., 3d ed.), and Auberlen (Der Proph. Daniel, etc., p. 103 sq., 3d ed.), and is adopted also by the Catholic theologian Laur. Reinken (Die Messian. Weissag. bei den gr. u. kl. Proph. des A. T., IV. 1, p. 206 sq.), and by Dr. Pusey, of England. 2. The majority of modern (continental) interpreters, on the other hand, refer the whole passage to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This view presents itself in the Alexandrian translation of the prophecy, more distinctly in Julius Hilarianus (about A.D. 400) (Chronologia s. Weltus de mundi duratione, in Migne's Biblioth. cler. univ., t. 12, p. 1096), and in several rabbinical interpreters, but was first brought into special notice by the rationalistic interpreters Eichhorn, Bertholdt, v. Lengerke, Maurer, Ewald, Hitzig, [Rossmüller], and the mediating theologians Bleek, Wieseler (Die 70 Wochen u. die 63 Jahroochen des Proph. Daniel, Göt., 1839, with which compare the retractation in the Göttinger. Gel. Anzeiger, 1846, p. 113 sq.), who are followed by Lücke, Hilgenfeld, Kranichfeld [Stuart], and others. This verse has been defended by Hofmann (Die 70 Jahre des Jer. u. die 70 Jahroochen des Daniel, Nürnberg, 1836, and Weissag. u. Erfüllung, as also in the Schriftbew.), Delitzsch (art. Daniel in Herzog's Realencykl. vol. III.), and Zündel (in the Kritischen Unters.), but with this essential modification, that Hofmann and Delitzsch have united an eschatological reference to the primary historical reference of vers. 25–27 to Antiochus Epiphanes, in consequence of which the prophecy will be perfectly accomplished only in the appearance of antichrist and the final completion of the kingdom of God at the end of the days. 3. Finally, some of the church fathers and several modern theologians have interpreted the prophecy eschatologically, as an announcement of the development of the kingdom of God at the end of the exile on to the perfecting of the kingdom by the second coming of Christ at the end of the days. Of this view we have the first germs in Hippolytus and Apollinaris of Laodicea, who, having regard to the prophecy of Antichrist, ch. vii. 25, refer the statement of ver. 27 of this chap. regarding the last week to the end of the world, and the first half of this week they regard as the time of the return of Elias, the second half as the time of antichrist. This view is for the first time definitely stated in the Berleburg Bible. But Kliefoth, in his Comm. on Daniel, was the first who sought to investigate and establish this opinion exegetically, and Leyser (in Herzog's Realenc., XVIII., p. 388) has thus briefly stated it: 'The seventy שְׁבַעִים, i.e., the

* Cf. Delitzsch, p. 284, "If the seventy weeks are not regarded as simple, but rather as quadrated Sabbatic periods, it follows that 70×49 or 3430 years are to intervene between the fourth year of Jehoiakim and Christ, whose parousia is considered as one such period. Consequently, if 3,595 years be added to that aggregate, as having passed from the creation to the fourth year of Jehoiakim, the suggestive amount will result in about 7000 years (diminished by only twenty-five years) as the duration of the world. For a criticism of this view cf. Kliefoth, p. 387 et seq.

καταβολή of Daniel (ch. ix. 24 sq.), measured by seven, within which the whole of God's plan of salvation in the world will be completed, are a symbolical period with reference to the seventy years of exile prophesied by Jeremiah, and with the accessory notion of omenicity. The seventy is again divided into three periods: into seven (till Christ), sixty-two (till the apostasy of antichrist), and one, שְׁבַעִים, the last world, הָעוֹלָם, divided into $2 \times 3\frac{1}{2}$ times, the rise and fall of antichrist." With the last view Kell's own interpretation essentially agrees. The great objection to it is that it mixes the literal with the mystical import of the prophecy, and fails to yield any exact fulfilment of the definite numbers of the text].

actness (cf. the following section, No. 1). Our difficulty consists in the circumstance that the "anointed one who should be cut off," v. 26 a, is held to be Jesus Christ, the Messiah, who was exalted through humiliation and sufferings to glory, while everything subsequently mentioned in the immediate context (the "prince" who should "destroy the city and the sanctuary," the "covenant with many" confirmed by him, the interruption of the sacrifice and oblation, the introduction of the abomination of desolation, and the judicial punishment of the destroyer) had its complete historical fulfilment in the events of the period of persecution and oppression under Antiochus, and serves merely as a typical illustration of the times of suffering and of the judgments under the New Covenant. The continuity of the prophetic description appears to be painfully broken by this application of v. 26 a to Christ, when the predictions of v. 26 b and v. 27 are simultaneously referred [by Kranichfeld, etc.] to the Maccabean epoch. In addition to this contradiction of the context, this method of interpretation involves the logical inconsequence of a vacillation between the typical and the direct Messianic theory of exposition, or of an obscure intermixture of the prefigurative and the antitypical.

Seventy heptades have been decreed [to transpire] upon thy nation, and upon thy holy city, for [entirely] closing the [punishment of] sin, and for sealing up [the retributive sentence against their] offences, and for expiating guilt, and for bringing in [the state of] perpetual righteousness, and for sealing up [the verification of] vision and prophet, and for anointing Holy of Holies. And thou shalt know and consider [that] from [the time of the] issuing of a command for restoring and building [i.e., for rebuilding] Jerusalem till [the coming of] Messiah prince [shall intervene] seven heptades, and sixty and two heptades; [its] street shall return and be built [i.e., shall be rebuilt], and [its] fosse, and [that] in distress of the times. And after the sixty and two heptades Messiah shall be cut off, and nothing [shall be left] to him; and people of the coming prince shall destroy the city and the holy [building], and his end [of fighting shall come] with [or, like] the flood, and until [the] end of warring [shall occur the] decreed [result] of desolations. And he shall establish a covenant for the many [during] one heptade, and [at the] middle of the heptade he shall cause to cease sacrifice and offering; and over a wing [i.e., eagle as an ensign] of abominations [i.e., idolatrous images], [shall preside the] desolator, and [this shall continue] till completion, and a decreed [one that] shall pour out upon [the] desolate.

I have been unable to satisfy myself of the entire consistency of any of the foregoing interpretations of this remarkable prophecy, and would therefore propose a partly new elucidation, in accordance with the preceding literal translation and the following diagram. In doing this I need not dwell upon the minor peculiarities of phraseology, which have been fully treated already.

	Last Reform begun [late in Summer] B. C. 410.		Christ Baptized, August, A. D. 26.
Edict published at Jerusalem, July, B. C. 459.	7 w. = 49 y.	62 weeks = 434 years.	1 w. = 7 y.	Jesus rejected, September, A. D. 32.
	70 heptades = 490 years.
	52½ years.	62 weeks = 434 years.	Half w.
	Reform Completed, [early in Spring] B. C. 405. Christ Sacrificed, March 18, A. D. 29.
Sequel.—Jerusalem razed by the Romans, A. D. 70.

In verse 24 we have a general view of the last great period of the Jewish Church (see the middle line in the diagram). It was to embrace four hundred and ninety years, from their permanent release from Babylonian bondage, till the time when God would finally cast them off for their incorrigible unbelief. Within this space Jehovah would fulfil what he had predicted, and accomplish all his designs respecting them under their special relation. The particulars noted in this cursory survey are, first, the conclusion of the then existing exile (expressed in three variations, of which the last phrase, "expiating guilt," explains the two former, "closing the sin" and "sealing up offences;") next, the fulfilment of ancient prophecy, by ushering in the religious prosperity of Gospel times; and, lastly, as the essential feature, the consecration of the Messiah to his redeeming office.

The only "command" answering to that of verse 23 is that of Artaxerxes Longimanus, issued in the seventh year of his reign, and recorded in the seventh chapter of Ezra, as Prideaux has abundantly shown, and as many cri tics agree. At this time, also, more Jews returned to their home than at any other, and the literal as well as spiritual "rebuilding of Jerusalem" was prosecuted with unsurpassed vigor. The period here referred to extends "till the Messiah" (see the upper line of the diagram); that is, as far as his public recognition as such by the Voice at his baptism, the "anointing" of the previous verse; and not to his death,—as is commonly supposed, but which is afterward referred to in very different language; nor to his birth—which would make the entire compass of the prophecy vary much from four hundred and ninety years. The period of this verse is divided into two portions of "seven heptades" and "sixty-two heptades," as if the "command" from which it dates were renewed at the end of the first portion; and this we find was the case. Ezra, under whom this reformation of the State and religion began, was succeeded in the work by Nehemiah, who, having occasion to return to Persia in the twenty-fifth year after the commencement of the work (Neh. xiii. 6), returned "after certain days," and found that it had so far retrograded that he was obliged to institute it anew. The length of his stay at court is not given, but it must have been considerable to allow so great a backsliding among the lately reformed Jews. Prideaux contends that his return to Judæa was after an absence of twenty-four years;* and I have supposed the new reform then set on foot by him to have occupied a little over three years, which is certainly none too much time for the task (see the lower line of the diagram). The "rebuilding of the streets and intrenchments in times of distress" seems, to refer, in its literal sense, to the former part especially of the forty-nine years (compare Nehemiah iv.), very little having been previously done towards rebuilding the city, although former decrees had been issued for repairing the temple; † and, in its spiritual import, it applies to the whole time, and peculiarly to the three years of the last reform.

The "sixty-two weeks" of verse 26, be it observed, are not said to commence at the end of the "seven weeks" of verse 25, but, in more general terms, after the "distressing times" during which the reform was going on; hence, they properly date from the end of that reform, when things became permanently settled. It is in consequence of a failure to notice this variation in the limits of the two periods of sixty-two weeks referred to by the prophet (compare the middle portions of the upper and of the lower line in the diagram) that critics have thrown the whole scheme of this prophecy into disorder in applying to the same event such irreconcilable language as is used in describing some of its different elements. By the ravaging invasion of foreigners here foretold, is manifestly intended the destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman troops, whose emperor's son, Titus, is here styled a "prince" in command of them. The same allusion is also clear from the latter part of the following verse. But this event must not be included within the seventy weeks; because, in the first place, the accomplishment would not sustain such a view,—from the decree, B. C. 459, to the destruction of Jerusalem, A. D. 70, being five hundred and twenty-eight years; secondly, the language of verse 24 does not require it,—as it is not embraced in the purposes for which the seventy weeks are there stated to be appointed to Jerusalem and its inhabitants; and, lastly, the Jews then no longer formed a link in the chain of ecclesiastical history in the Divine sense,—Christian believers having become the true descendants of Abraham. At the close of the verse we have the judgments with which God would afflict the Jews for cutting off the Messiah: these would be so severe, that the prophet (or, rather, the angel instructing him) cannot refrain from introducing them here, in connection with that event, although he afterwards adverts to them in their proper order. What these sufferings were, Josephus narrates with a minuteness that chills the blood, affording a wonderful coincidence with the prediction of Moses in Deut. xxviii. 15-68; they are here called a "flood," the well-known Scripture emblem of terrible political calamities (as in Isa. viii. 7, 8; Dan. xi. 10, 22; Nah. i. 8).

Verse 27 has given the greatest trouble to critics of any in the whole passage; and, indeed, the common theory, by which the seventy weeks are made to end with the crucifixion, is flatly contradicted by the cessation of the daily sacrificial offerings at the temple, "in the middle of the week." All attempts to crowd aside this point are in vain; for such an abolition could not be said to occur in any pertinent sense before the offering of the Great Sacrifice, especially as Jesus himself, during his ministry, always countenanced their celebration. Besides, the advocates of this scheme are obliged to make this last "week" encroach upon the preceding "sixty-two weeks," so as to include John the Baptist's ministry, in order to make out seven years for "confirming the covenant;" and when they have done this they run counter to the previous explicit direction, which makes the first sixty-nine weeks come down "to the Messiah," and not end at John. By means of the double line of dates exhibited in the above diagram, all this is harmoniously adjusted; and at the same time the only satisfactory interpretation is retained, that after the true Atonement, these typical oblations ceased to have any meaning or efficacy, although before it they could not consistently be dispensed with, even by Christ and his Apostles.

The seventy weeks, therefore, were allotted to the Jews as their only season of favor or mercies as a Church, and we know that they were not immediately cast off upon their murder of Christ (see Luke xxiv. 27; Acts iii. 12-26). The gospel was specially directed to be first preached to them; and not only during our Saviour's personal ministry, but for several years afterward, the invitations of grace were confined to them. The first instance of a "turning to the Gentiles" proper was the baptism of the Roman centurion Cornelius, during the fourth year after the resurrection of Christ. In this interval the Jewish people had shown their de-terminated opposition to the New "Covenant" by imprisoning the Apostles, stoning Stephen to death, and officially proscribing Christianity through their Sanhedrim: soon after this martyrdom occurred the conversion of Saul, who "was a chosen vessel to bear God's name to the Gentiles": and about two years after this event the door was thrown wide open for their admission into the covenant relation of the church, instead of the Jews, by the vision of Peter and the conversion of Cornelius. Here we find a marked epoch, fixed by the finger of God in all the miraculous circumstances of the event, as well as by the formal apostolical decree, ratifying it, and obviously forming the great turning-point between the two dispensations. We find no evidence that "many" of the Jews embraced Christianity after this period, although they had been converted in great numbers on several occasions under the Apostles' preaching, not only in Judæa, but also in Galilee, and even among the semi-Jewish inhabitants of Samaria; the Jews had now rejected Christ as a nation with a tested and incorrigible hatred, and, having thus disowned their God, they were forsaken by him, and devoted to destruction, as the prophet intimates would be their retribution for that "decision," in which the four hundred and ninety years of this their second and last probation in the Promised Land would result. It is thus strictly true that Christ, personally and by his Apostles, "established the covenant," which had formerly been made, and was now renewed, with many of the chosen people, for precisely seven years after his public appearance as a Teacher; in the very middle of which space He superseded forever the sacrificial offerings of the Mosaic ritual by the one perfect and sufficient Offering of His own body on the cross.

† [Namely, by Cyrus, the Medo-Persian conqueror of the Babylonians, who thus put an end to the "seventy years' captivity," B. C. 590, as in Ezra i. 1; and by Darius Hystaspis, who renewed Cyrus's decree (Ezra iv. 24), B. C. 518, rescinding its prohibition by his immediate predecessors Cambyses and Smerdis.]

In the latter part of this verse we have a graphic outline of the terrible catastrophe that should fall upon the Jews, in consequence of their rejection of the Messiah; a desolation that should not cease to cover them, but by the extinction of the oppressed nation; it forms an appendix to the main prophecy. Our Saviour's language leaves no doubt as to the application of this passage, in His memorable warning to His disciples, that when they should be about to "see the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place," they should then "flee into the mountains" (Matt. xxiv. 15, 16; comp. xxiii. 36, 38), in order to save themselves from that awful "consummation" of ruin, which he also pointed out as the "determined" fate of that impenitent city, after it should have endured the "desolating" ravages of a siege unparalleled in rigor and suffering, besides being "left desolate" by the abandonment of their God. The destined period of fulfilment arrived, and Josephus, who witnessed it, tells us that the standards of the Roman army, who held sacred the shrined silver eagles that surmounted their banners, were actually placed, during the capture, in the temple, opposite the eastern gate, and there sacrificed to (De Bell. Jud., VI. 6, 1). Equally exact, if the view proposed above is correct, are all the specifications of this wonderful prophecy.

In the preceding investigation several chronological points have been partially assumed, which entire satisfaction with the results obtained would require to be fully proved. A minute investigation of the grounds on which all the dates involved rest would occupy too much space for the present discussion; I shall, therefore, content myself with determining the two boundary dates of the entire period, trusting the intermediate ones to such incidental evidences of their correctness as may have been afforded in the foregoing elucidation, or may arise in connection with the settlement proposed.* If these widely distant points can be fixed by definite data independently of each other, the correspondence of the interval will afford strong presumption that it is the true one, which will be heightened as the subdivisions fall naturally into their prescribed limits; and thus the above coincidence in the character of the events will receive all the confirmation that the nature of the case admits.

1. The date of the Edict. I have supposed this to be from the time of its taking effect at Jerusalem, rather than from that of its nominal issue at Babylon; the difference, however,—being only four months,—will not seriously affect the argument. Ezra states (chap. vii. 8), that "he arrived at Jerusalem in the fifth month (Ab, our July–August) of the seventh year of the king" Artaxerxes. Ctesias, who had every opportunity to know, makes Artaxerxes to have reigned forty-two years, and Thucydides states that an Athenian embassy, sent to Ephesus in the winter that closed the seventh year of the Peloponnesian war, was there met with the news of Artaxerxes' death, πυθόμενοι . . . Ἀρταξέρξην . . . νεωστὶ τεθνηκότα (κατὰ γὰρ τοῦτον τὸν χρόνον ἐτελείτθην), Bell. Pelop., IV. 50. Now this war began in the spring of B.C. 481, as all allow (Thuc. ii. 2), and its seventh year expired with the spring of B.C. 424; consequently, Artaxerxes died in the winter introducing that year, and his reign began some time in B.C. 468. This latter historian also states that Themistocles, in his flight to Asia, having been driven by a storm into the Athenian fleet, at that time blockading Naxos, managed to get safely carried away to Ephesus, whence he dispatched a letter of solicitation to Artaxerxes, then lately invested with royalty, νεωστὶ βασιλεύοντα (Bell. Pelop., I. 137). The date of the conquest of that island is B.C. 466, which is, therefore, also that of the Persian king's accession. It is now necessary to fix the season of the year in which he became king. If Ctesias means that his reign lasted forty-two full years, or a little over rather than under that length, the accession must be dated prior to the beginning of B.C. 466; but it is more in accordance with the usual computation of reigns to give the number of current years, if nearly full, and this will bring the date of accession down to about the beginning of summer, B.C. 466. This result is also more in accordance with the simultaneous capture of Naxos, which can hardly have occurred earlier in that year. I may add, that it likewise explains the length assigned to this reign (forty-one years) by Ptolemy, in his Astronomical Canon, although he has misled modern compilers of ancient history by beginning it in B.C. 465, having apparently himself fallen into some confusion, from silently annexing the short intermediate periods of anarchy sometimes to the preceding and at others to the ensuing reign. The "seventh year" of Artaxerxes, therefore, began about the summer of B.C. 460, and the "first [Hebrew] month" (Nisan) occurring within that twelvemonth, gives the following March-April of B.C. 459 as the time when Ezra received his commission to proceed to Jerusalem for the purpose of executing the royal mandate.

2. The date of the conversion of Cornelius. The solution of this question will be the determination of the distance of this event from the time of our Saviour's Passion; the absolute date of this latter occurrence must, therefore, first be determined. This is ascertained to have taken place in A.D. 29, by a comparison of the duration of Christ's ministry with the historical data of Luke iii. 1-23; but the investigation is too long to be inserted here. (See Dr. Jarvis's Introduction to the History of the Church.) A ready mode of testing this conclusion is by observing that this is the only one of the adjacent series of years in which the calculated date of the equinoctial full moon coincides with that of the Friday of the crucifixion Passover, as any one may see—with sufficient accuracy for ordinary purposes—by computing the mean lunations and week-day back from the present time. This brings the date of Christ's baptism to A.D. 25; and the whole tenor of the Gospel narratives indicates that this took place in the latter part of summer. Other more definite criteria of the season cannot be specified here.

The chief chronological difficulties of the Acts occur in the arrangement of the events associated with Cornelius's conversion, and arise from the vague notes of time (or, rather, absence of any definite dates) by Luke, between the account of the Pentecostal effusion (chap. ii. 1) and the death of Herod Agrippa the elder (chap. xii. 23); indeed, but for the periods noted by Paul in Gal. i. and ii. it would be utterly impossible to adjust minutely the dates of this portion of the history. As it is, the subject is almost abandoned by most chronologers and commentators as hopelessly obscure and uncertain; but there is no occasion for such despair. The death of Herod is ascertained (by the help of Josephus, Antiq., XIX. 8, 2) to have occurred in the early part of the year A.D. 44, between which time and the Pentecost of A.D. 29 is an interval of fifteen years, covered by the incidents contained in chapters ii.-xi. of the Acts. The visit of Paul, spoken of by him as his second to Jerusalem (Gal. ii. 1), appears at first sight to be the same with that narrated in Acts ii. 30, since there is no mention of any intervening visit; it was made in company with Barnabas, and the "revelation" (Gal. ii. 2) might answer to the prediction of the famine by Agabus (Acts xi. 28), which caused the journey. Now in that case it is certain that the date of this visit ("fourteen years after") is not reckoned from that of his former visit (Gal. i. 18), for then it would have occurred at least seventeen years (14+3) after his conversion, which would be two years more than the whole interval between this second visit and the Pentecost referred to; it is, therefore, reckoned from his conversion, which makes his journey to Damascus, on which he was converted occur one year (15-14) after this Pentecost. This is corroborated by two ancient ecclesiastical traditions, one of which states that Paul was converted in the year after the Ascension, and the other refers the martyrdom of Stephen (which was so connected with Paul's persecuting journey to Damascus, as not to have preceded it many months) to the close of the same year in which Christ suffered. If, on the other hand, as the best authorities mostly agree, the second visit spoken of in Gal. corresponds with that described in Acts xv., as the similarity of the subject debated at the time (the obligation of Mosaicism) especially indicates, then we are at liberty to apply the natural interpretation to the intervals there given, and we shall thus have the visit in question occurring seventeen years after the conversion of Paul. Now, the date of the visit referred to in Acts xii. is known to be A.D. 44, and if we allow the reasonable space of three years for the first missionary journey, as recorded in the intervening chapters (Acts xiii., xiv.), and the considerable stay at Antioch upon its close (xiv. 28), we shall still have, as before, an interval of one year between the Crucifixion and Paul's conversion—a space, for all that we can see, sufficiently ample for the events related.

Paul's first visit (Gal. i. 8) must naturally be reckoned in like manner from his conversion, as it is mentioned to show the length of his stay in Damascus and its vicinity, and is put in contrast with his intentional avoidance of Jerusalem on his conversion (ver. 17); we have thus the date of this same visit in Acts ix. 26 fixed at A.D. 33, four years after the noted Pentecost. I need not here discuss the length nor precise time of the visit into Arabia (Gal. i. 17), nor the exact mode of adjusting this passage with Luke's account in the Acts; these points are capable of easy solution, and do not require the supposition of some intervening visit in either narrative. Neither need I stop to reconcile the mention of travels in Syria (Gal. i. 21) with the sea voyage direct from Cassarea to Tarsus (Acts ix. 30); the visit to Jerusalem occupied only fifteen days (Gal. i. 18), and there is nothing here to disturb the above dates.

Most chronological schemes, blindly following the order of Acts ix. and x., without taking into special consideration this interval of three years spent by Paul at Damascus, have placed the conversion of Cornelius after that apostle's return to Tarsus, the arrangers being apparently actuated by a desire to fill up the period of fifteen years by sprinkling the events along as widely apart as possible for the sake of uniform intervals. But several considerations present themselves to my mind which cause me to think this arrangement erroneous. In the outset, the question arises on this supposition, What were the other apostles doing these three years? Was nothing going on at Jerusalem or in Judæa worth recording? But this interval is not thus left a blank by the sacred historian. Luke says (Acts ix. 31), "Then had the churches rest," etc.; that is, as I understand it, during these three years, the persecution stirred up by Saul after the martyrdom of Stephen being arrested by the conversion of that enemy, the Christian societies generally enjoyed great quiet and prosperity. I cannot discover any pertinent cause for this remark, unless we suppose it to refer to the period succeeding this event. The same idea is carried by the mention of the travels of Peter "through all parts" (verse 32), evidently during this season of outward peace, when his presence was no longer needed to sustain the Church at Jerusalem. It was during this tour that Peter was called to preach the Gospel to Cornelius; the year succeeding the conversion of Saul was probably spent by Peter in building up the society at the metropolis, his tour apparently occupied the summer of the year following; and in the third year Paul, on his visit to Jerusalem, finds Peter returned thither. This affords convenient time for all these occurrences, and connects them in their natural order. Lastly, under this view we can readily explain the plan of Luke's narrative in these chapters: after tracing the history of the Church (specially under the conduct of Peter) down to the persecution by Saul, he takes up the subject of this opponent's conversion, and does not quit him until he has left him in quiet at home—hence his omission of all reference to these three years as being unsuitable to his design of continuity; he then returns to Peter, and narrates his doings in the interim. This parallel method of narration is proved by the resumption of Paul's history in chapter xi. 19, where Luke evidently goes back to the time of Stephen, in order to show what the dispersed evangelists had been accomplishing during the four years succeeding that martyrdom, and thus connect the preaching to the Gentiles with the latter part of that period (ver. 20); and this again prepares the way for the visit to Antioch of Paul, who had lately returned to Tarsus.

It is true, in this scheme there is made an interval of ten years between the establishment of the Church at Antioch and the visit of Paul to Jerusalem, about the time of Herod's death; but it is much better to place such an interval, during which no incident of striking moment occurred, after the Gospel had become in a measure rooted in the community, than to intersperse considerable periods of uninteresting silence in its early planting, when matters which, had they transpired afterward, would be passed by as trivial, were of the greatest importance in the history. Intimations are given of the general prosperity of the cause, and there was no occasion to present the details of this period, until some remarkable event broke the even course of occurrences. Such an event was the visit of Paul, and especially the contemporaneous conduct and fate of Herod; and the latter account is accordingly introduced in the twelfth chapter by the phrase, κατ' ἐκείνον δὲ τὸν καιρὸν, always indicative of some fresh occurrence after a period of comparative monotony and silence. Nor is this interval left entirely devoid of incident; it is in fact filled up by the account of the preparation for the famine. It was "during those days" that the prophet Agabus visited Antioch from Jerusalem; some time after his arrival, he predicted the famine, and it is plainly intimated that the fulfilment did not take place immediately, but several years afterward, "in the days of Claudius Cæsar." That emperor, therefore, was not reigning at the time of its utterance, and as the famine took place in the fourth year of his reign (Josephus, Ant., XX. 5, 2, compared with I. 2), there is here an interval of at least four years silently occurring between two closely related incidents of this period. The "whole year" during which Paul preached at Antioch (Acts xi. 26) is reckoned from his call thither by Barnabas, but does not extend to his visit to Jerusalem; it only covers his first labors confined to the city itself (after which he itinerated in the neighboring regions of Syria, Gal. i. 21), and extends merely to about the time of the arrival of Agabus. The above interval of ten years was occupied by Paul in such labors as are referred to in 2 Cor. xi. 23-27.

We thus arrive at the conclusion, based upon internal evidence, that the admission of the Gentiles by the conversion of Cornelius occurred near the close of Peter's summer tour, in A. D. 32; we cannot be far from certainty in fixing it as happening in the month of September of that year.]

ETHICO-FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES RELATED TO THE HISTORY OF SALVATION, APOLOGETICAL REMARKS, AND HOMILETICAL SUGGESTIONS.

1. A truly unbiassed apprehension of the sense of the prophecy respecting the seventy weeks of years will succeed in demonstrating a typical reference to the Messiah only rather than any direct allusion.* The general character of the language in the introductory passage, v. 24, opens a prospect, indeed, of events such as are elsewhere foretold only in prophecies that are directly Messianic in their nature; but these events are here assigned to a time immediately subsequent to the end of the seventy weeks of years, which are made to begin with Jeremiah's לשבעים concerning the seventy years, or at about the commencement of the captivity (B.C. 600 or 588). The prophet consequently saw the Messianic period of deliverance in a much closer proximity than its actual distance from his time would justify, and he connected it intimately with the era of persecution under the Seleucids, which he saw in spirit as the closing period of the series of seventy sevens of years, as prophetically revealed to him. The theocratic seer, who could not calculate by centuries, but only by Sabbatic periods or cycles of jubilees, expected the advent of the Messianic deliverance after seventy Sabbatic years should have expired, instead of removing it to the distance of five or six centuries.† The limit assigned by the prophet certainly testifies to his wonderful range of vision, and exalts him far above his contemporaries in the captivity, none of whom would have been likely to remove the beginning of the Messianic era to any considerable distance beyond the close of the Babylonian captivity; but it still falls below the historical measure of the distance between Jeremiah's prophecy and the New-Test. fulfilment by 100-110 years,—or, in other words, instead of extending into the time of Christ, it merely reaches to the age of John Hyrcanus and his immediate successors. The principal stations in the course of pre-Christian development were doubtless sufficiently apparent to the prophet, and upon the whole, were seen as separated from each other by precisely the interval which actually resulted in the progress of events. In his younger contemporary Cyrus, the "anointed prince," v. 25, he recognized the introducer and founder of a period of relative salvation for the people of God (a period which should bring a restoration of Jerusalem, although for the time an imperfect, troubled, and oppressed restoration), and therefore saw in that prince a first typical forerunner of the Messiah. He saw a farther pre-factory condition to the coming of the Messiah in the religious persecutions and antitheocratic abominations, with which the descendant of a royal Javanic house should afflict Israel in the distant future, slaying the anointed high priest (Onias III., B.C. 172), and even interrupting the theocratic worship for a time and desecrating its sanctuary; and he fixed the interval between the former positive and this later negative preparation for Messiah's coming, with approximate correctness, at sixty-two weeks (i.e., the difference between the first seven, which had already expired at his time, and the momentous last week of the seventy—a number of years which certainly exceeds the actual historical interval between 539 and 175 or between Cyrus and Epiphanes by seventy years.* But the additional interval of more than one and a half centuries or twenty-three to twenty-four weeks of years, which, according to the Divine purpose, was to intervene between the typical ωδὲς τοῦ χριστοῦ of the Maccabean age and the advent of Christ, escaped his vision while ranging in the distance. In the limitation of his earthly and human consciousness† he did not suspect that the Spirit of prophecy did not reveal to him any immediate, but only indirect preparations and types of the Messianic era. He does not see the abysmal gap of renewed waiting during nearly two hundred years, which separated the bright exaltation of the victorious Maccabean era from the still more glorious and heavenly period in which the New Covenant should be established; and the prophets and observers of prophetic predictions immediately subsequent to him, probably noticed no more of that interval than did he (cf. the Eth.-fund. principles on chap. vii. No. 2). The pious theocratic searchers of the Scriptures in the Maccabean period, and probably in the later stages of that period, who had themselves begun to experience a painful consciousness of the descent into the gap which Daniel had overlooked, were probably the first to arrive at an understanding of the merely typical nature of the contents of vs. 26 and 27, thus being taught to look for a more perfect and enduring realization of that oracle. Cf. Kranichfeld, p. 337: "This natural difference between the prophet's conception of events and their historical reality would ultimately lead to the inference that a farther realization of the prophecy was to be expected,* inasmuch as the Grecian empire, and more particularly that of Antiochus Epiphanes, did not appear as the last of the heathen monarchies, and the final supremacy of the Messianic kingdom of God was not yet introduced. Instead of charging the prophetic idea as such with being untrue in this respect, or of rejecting it without farther investigation as not having been fulfilled, the thoughtful circles among the people would probably treat that idea as Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, and Daniel himself treated the Messianic hopes of Jeremiah or Isaiah, that were connected with the return from the captivity, since the prophetic description had been so remarkably fulfilled in other respects. The internal evidence demonstrated that the idea was in itself incontrovertibly true, and it was regarded as such, while its realization in the light of historical facts was referred to a more distant future. In like manner Christ unites the description of the Messianic future with its conflict, and its triumphs with his own time, and connects with the latter the thought of the erection of Messiah's kingdom; while the New-Test. Apocalypse, from its historical point of view, connects it with a still later time. Christ simply regards the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of all things, joined to the triumph of God's kingdom, as a comprehensive whole, on the authority of Daniel's description; and he consequently designates the present yevea (Matt. xxiv. 31 and parallels) as the time in which the picture of the eschatological future should be realized.† The apostles imitate him in expecting the end of the world in the age in which they lived;‡ but the Revelator's field of vision lay beyond that yevea, and beyond the destruction of Jerusalem. That such a transfer and reference from one period to another (which, as compared with its predecessor, is to bring a more complete, and ultimately, a full realization) is possible, without degrading the prophetic idea and destroying its value, is implied in the very character of the genuine prophetic oracle, as being essentially comprehensive in its nature, even though the writer may primarily have intended it to refer only to some particular event in the progress of history.—The reference of the prophecy respecting the future tribulation was doubtless accepted in the beginning of

* [On the contrary, there is good reason to believe that this remarkable prophecy sustained the faith of the pious Jews in their anticipations of the near approach of the Redeemer's coming (cf. Mark i. 15; Luke ii. 26, 28), as it has since been a powerful argument to prove his actual advent at the time predicted (cf. Gal. iv. 4; 1 Pet. i. 11).]

* [It is difficult to see how a discovery of Daniel's own error on the point in question should lead his readers either to entertain greater faith in his predictions or to seek for a more correct interpretation of them than he was able to attain himself.]

† [There is this essential difference, however, as to the point at issue between these eschatological sayings of our Lord and this of Daniel, that Christ expressly disclaimed any revelation or even knowledge of the "times and seasons" of the events predicted; whereas the prophecy before us is a pure series of such chronological potand. Indeed our Lord in these very utterances explicitly refers to this identical passage of Daniel as affording the only clue that he gives to the date of their occurrence.]

the Maccabæan epoch, and among others, by the writer of the first book of Maccabees; but the Jewish Sibyl may serve to show that despite such reference, the circumstances of the times might make way for another interpretation in each instance, since, as early as about B.C. 140, and at the time of a newly founded hereditary Jewish-national dynasty, it makes the ten horns of Dan. vii. end beyond the Epiphanes with Demetrius I., finds the little horn in Alexander Balas, who seized the throne of the Seleucidæ, instead of referring it to Antiochus Epiphanes, and no longer regards the world-controlling power of the Jewish theocracy as bound to the ruin of the dead Hellenic influence, which is characterized in mild terms, but to the power of the hated Roman empire. The Romans, whom the Septuagint substitutes for the מַלְאָכִים in Dan. xi. 31, are here directly and practically installed in the place of the fourth world-kingdom of Daniel, in which position we afterward meet them in Josephus and the New Testament." Concerning the latter point cf. Hilgenfeld, Die jüdische Apokalypitik, pp. 69 et seq., 84 et seq., and also supra, § 6, note 3, of the Intro. to this work.

2. Despite the repeated specific references to facts and circumstances in the Maccabæan æra, the prophecy before us is no vaticinium ex eventu, that was invented in that age; for the want of agreement between its statements and the actual conditions of that time is far more general than their correspondence.* It is (1) a fundamental non-agreement between the prophecy and the fulfilment, that the sixty-two weeks of years, if reckoned from the end of the seven weeks, or from B.C. 538, in harmony with the context and the evident sense of the prophecy, extend down to B.C. 105, while the whole of the Antiochian-Maccabæan catastrophe, which forms the contents of the last week of years, was ended at least seventy years earlier; and (against Ewald) the text contains no indication whatever that the period of 434 years or sixty-two weeks is to be shortened by seventy years or ten weeks of years. Further (2), the murder of the high priest Onias, which we are compelled to regard as the Maccabæan or typical fulfilment of the קִרְיַת מִשְׁפָּחָה, v. 26, did not transpire exactly in the beginning of the sixty-ninth or last week, but somewhat earlier, in the year 141 æ. Sel., which was still included in the sixty-second week (cf. 2 Macc. iv. 7 et seq.; xxiii. 34). The prediction of v. 26, "and after the threescore and two weeks shall an anointed one be cut off," does not therefore harmonize exactly with the corresponding fact in the Maccabæan history (cf. supra, on that passage; also Kranichfeld, p. 309 et seq.); and if not Onias, but Seleucus Philopater is to be understood as denoted by the "anointed one who was cut off," as Bleek, Maurer, Roesch, v. Lengerke, Hitzig, etc., contend, the chronological discrepancy becomes still greater. To this must be added (3) that the temple and the altar did not remain in the profaned condition to which Antiochus Epiphanes had reduced them during "half a week or three and a half years, but only during three years and a few days (see Eth.-fund. principles, etc., on chap. vii. No. 3, b), and finally (4), that the detailed description of this desecrated state and of the "abomination of desolation," v. 27, which stood on the sanctuary while thus profaned, does not correspond more exactly to the statements in 1 Macc. i., than the allusions to the judicial punishment of the antitheistic madman, which are found in the close of the same and the preceding verse, accord precisely in any way with what history records concerning the end of Antiochus Epiphanes. In order to be understood by his contemporaries, a Maccabæan pseudo-Daniel would have clothed his allusions in a very different form, and would have made them everywhere less equivocal. The surroundings of the vision concerning the seventy weeks, and the preparations for it would likewise have received a different form at his hands; and the fervent penitential and intercessory prayer, by which the Spirit of prophecy was invoked and the Divine exposition of Jeremiah's oracle was secured, this especially would have been different in both contents and form, from what it is in vs. 4-19, had it been invented by a pseudo-Daniel. Instead of revealing a relationship to the similar prayers in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, which were written immediately after the captivity, it would have displayed a character more nearly like that of the far more verbose and prolix apocryphal writings which originated during the last pre-Christian centuries, such as Baruch, Eccclus., Judith, and the additions to Esther and Daniel; cf., in addition to Bar. i. 14-ii. 19 (regarding which see above, on v. 4 et seq.), especially Eccclus. li.; Jud. ix.; Tob. iii. and xiii.; Ezek. iii. 1 et seq.; and also the Prayer of Azariah, Dan. iii. 26 et seq. Nor would the alleged pseudo-Daniel of the Maccabæan age have been likely to omit from a prayer written to favor a tendency, every allusion to the raging of the enemies of God's people, which still continued at his time, since that prayer would unquestionably be designed to contribute to the quickening of the religious and national zeal and courage (cf. e.g., the prayer of Judith, chap. ix. which has already been referred to, and see again the remarks on v. 4 et seq.).

3. The practical fundamental thought, and the central idea of this section is to be looked for neither in Daniel's penitential prayer and fervent intercession for his nation only, nor yet merely in the equally serious and comforting disclosures of the vision of the weeks. It is rather contained in the relation of the two constituent elements to each other, i.e., in the causal connection of the prayer, as the expression of a disposition of the heart, that showed it truly prepared to receive Divine revelations concerning the salvation connected with the future of God's kingdom, with the revelation itself that was thus obtained. Inasmuch as that preparation of the heart reaches its highest point in the disposition which constitutes the prophet a אִישׁ אֱלֹהִים (v. 23), a God-loving favorite of God, a needy, contrite, humble, and therefore worthy object of the yearning love of the Father of mercies, it may be said that this expression in v. 23, which states in a brief and striking manner the reason why the following prophetic disclosures are vouchsafed to the prophet, contains the central and fundamental thought of the whole chapter. Moreover, since by that very expression the prophet is characterized as an anxious searcher after the goal of the history of the Old-Test. empires, and as one of those humble and self-abasing servants of God, to whom He granted the most extended view of the future of His kingdom,* in reward of their humility and their faithful investigations in the documents containing His revelation of salvation, the nature of genuine prophecy under the Old Dispensation, as being a longing and anxious preparation for the future manifestation of deliverance in Christ may be found to have been characterized in this section, and to have been exemplified in one of the most prominent instances in the collective development of Old Testament. The theme for the homiletical treatment of the chapter as a whole might therefore read: "Daniel, the favorite of God; the leader and founder of that series of pious 'watchers' (προσδεχόμενοι, Luke ii. 25, 38) which reached to the time of Christ; the example and teacher of the only Divinely attested method of 'searching the Scriptures' (John v. 89); the model possessor of the Spirit in which the Scriptures are to be read and pondered; the ideal prophet in the sense indicated by Peter" (1 Pet. i. 10, 11: περὶ ἧς σωτηρίας ἐξεθέτησαν καὶ ἐξηρτίησαν προφῆται οἱ περὶ τῆς εἰς ὑμᾶς χάριτος προφητεύσαντες, ἐρευνῶντες εἰς τίνα ἢ ποῖον καιρὸν ἐδόχῃ τὸ ἐν αὐτοῖς πνεῦμα χριστοῦ προμαρτυρούμενον τὰ εἰς χριστὸν παθήματα καὶ τὰς μετὰ ταῦτα δόξας). If a proper use were made of the key afforded by 1 Pet. i. 10, to arrive at a correct understanding of the chapter and a correct estimate of the Messianic position of the prophet, thus securing the weapons with which to energetically refute the current rationalistic prejudice that Daniel no longer represented a normal and healthful stage of prophetic development, but rather one in which it had already begun to degenerate and to be "apocalyptically diseased," a sermon framed on some such plan would be able to achieve truly powerful results, both in a practical and an apologetic point of view. In view of the extraordinary wealth of matter, it might be well to divide it into two themes for sermons, in order to treat it thoroughly; for instance, let one sermon treat of the spirit in which the Scriptures should be read and the mysteries contained in them be approached (vs. 1-23), and another bear upon the principal feature disclosed by the Scriptures when thus perused, viz.: the fundamental law of all the history of salvation—"through sufferings to glory" (vs. 24-27).

* Cf. Füller, Der Prophet Daniel, p. 264. "We hear Daniel repeatedly characterized as a Jewel of great value in the sight of God. Hence, for the reason that Daniel is precious with God, the latter meets his petitions and wishes kindly, and makes disclosures to him which would not otherwise have been imparted. If his nation may find comfort and encouragement in these disclosures at a later day, it is to know to whom it is indebted for them, and to learn that a man upon whom rests the favor of God may be a blessing to his people during subsequent centuries. For Daniel is not merely the instrument through which, but also the man for whose sake God imparts this revelation, which possesses incalculable value for Daniel's nation for centuries to come."

4. Homiletical suggestions on particular passages. On v. 2 et seq., Jerome: "In cinere et sacco postulat impleri, quod promiserat Deus; non quo esset incredulus futurorum, sed ne securitas negligentiam et negligentiam pareret offensam."—Melancthon: "Etiam si Deus promisit beneficia corporalia vel spiritualia, tamen precibus vult exerceri fidem, et vult orare penitentiam, sicut inquit Zacharias: Convertimini ad me, et ego convertar ad vos, etc. Et orat Daniel de restituenda Ecclesia; ita nos quoque officiamur vero dolore propter Ecclesie calamitates et oramus, ut Deus eam augeat, gubernet et servet." Spener: —(Penitential sermons on Daniel's penitential prayer): "All the Divine prophecies are obscure before their fulfilment, and can only be apprehended through special industry in the light of Divine truth; therefore, 'whoso readeth, let him understand' (Matt. xxiv. 14).—Starke: "If Daniel read prophetic writings, although himself a prophet of the Most High, how silly is it to imagine that we can know everything of ourselves! Thence it results that dreams and false imaginings are taken for God's word (Ezek. xiii. 8 et seq.). . . . It is certainly the duty of a Christian to exercise his faith continually in prayer; but when a special promise by God is before him, he should arouse himself to that exercise more fully (Acts iv. 24); for there are many promises which include the condition of true repentance and obedience to God, either expressed or implied," etc.—J. Lange: "Promise, prayer, and fulfilment always belong together (Psa. xxvii. 8)."

V. 4 et seq., Melancthon: "Daniel fatetur peccata populi et tribuit Deo laudem justitiae, quod juste puniverit populum. Deinde petit remissionem peccatorum et reductionem populi. Est ergo vera contritio, agnoscere iram Dei aduersus nostra peccata, expectare propter iram Dei, dolere quod Deum offenderimus, tribuere in laudem, quod iuste nos punit, et obedire in penite.—Nec tamen satis est peccata noscere, intruere penas, sed accedat quoque consolatio. Ergo Daniel non solum doctrinam contritionis proponit, sed addit partem alteram. Docet suo exemplo petere et expectare veniam propter misericordiam et promissiones."—Starke: "A conception of God's punitive justice is necessary, in order that man may more fully recognize the guilt of his sin, and may not lull himself into a mistaken security with the comforting thought of His mercy. . . . But despite this there is no other nor better comfort in the agony of sin, than God's goodness and mercy, through which alone we can obtain forgiveness by faith."—Hävernick: "At the same time, the prayer of the prophet was not merely one that proceeded from him as an individual, but one offered by him as a mediator of the whole nation, in whose name he now cried to the Merciful One. We may therefore ascribe a liturgical character to it with entire justice, and thus explain the frequent borrowing of former expressions in which it abounds."

Verses 11-14, Calvin: "Daniel hic significat, non debere videri absurdum, quod Deus multo sit asperior in electum populum, quam in gentes profanas; quia scilicet major erat impietas illius populi quam gentium omnium, propter ingratitudinem, propter contumaciam, propter indomabilem illam perniciem. Quum ergo superarint Israelitae gentes omnes et malitia et ingratitudine et omni genere scelerum, Daniel hic prædicat, merito tam duriter ipso affligi.—Geier: "The greater the favor shown by God toward a nation or country, the greater will afterward be the punishment which follows on its ingratitude (Deut. xxxii. 18, 23 et seq.)."—Spenser: "Divine threatenings are recorded in order that man be deterred from sinning, and also that an evidence of God's righteousness and truthfulness may be drawn from their realization.—Without repentance, all other means to avert the wrath of God are useless. He that should endeavor to quench the fire with one hand, while pouring oil on it with the other, would increase the fire more than his attempt to quench it would diminish it (Jer. ii. 23)."

Verse 15 et seq., Starke: "Where genuine repentance exists it fills the heart, so that it cannot avoid breaking out in humble confession, and that repeatedly (Jer. vi. 11).—When man humbles himself under a sense of God's wrath, recognizes that the punishment was deserved, and flies to Divine mercy for refuge, God transforms His wrath and displeasure into grace (Psa. lxxxi. 14, 15).—If the church, and even every single member belonging to it, bears the name of Christ, it follows that this is the most powerful motive to hear our prayer for the church which we can present to God (cf. Acts iv. 27 et seq.)."—Hävernick: "As the strongest motive for a father to be careful for his child, is that it is called by his name—and that not in conformity with a custom having no significance, but as a sign that it belongs to him and must be considered as his property,—so the prophet here expresses his confidence in the grace of God most beautifully by the feature that he refers to the city which is called by the name of God, the city of Jehovah, the great King, which is founded in eternity (Psa. xli. 5; xlviii. 2, 9; lxxxvii. 8)."

Verses 20–23, Jerome: "Non populi tantum peccata, sed et sua replicat, quia unus e populo est; sive humiliter, quum peccatum ipse non fecerit, se jungit populo peccatori, ut ex humilitate veniam consequatur."—Id. (on chap. x. 11): "Congruenter 'vir desideriorum' vocatur, qui instantia precum et afflictione, corporisque jejuniis duritie cupit scire ventura et Dei secreta cognoscere."—Starke: "The prayer that is poured out before God for our personal wants and the common need is never unheard (Psa. xci. 15).—What will God not do for the sake of man! The princes of heaven are obliged to render Him service and reveal His will to the faithful, that they may be strengthened in faith and hope (Heb. i. 14).—True Christians imitate the angels, who seek to instruct each other more and more in the ways of God, till they all arrive at the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God (Eph. iv. 13; 1 Pet. i. 12)."—Füller (see the note connected with No. 8).

Verses 24–27, Melancthon: "Primum refutat hic locus errorem Judaeorum de lege retinenda et de regno politico Christi. Si erit perpetua justitia, item: si Christus occideretur, sequitur legem Moysaïcam non retinendam esse, nec fore mundanum regnum.—Secundo tradit testimonium de passione Christi.—Tertio cum politia jam desierit, ita ut nullos habeat duces, nullos prophetas, nulla tribuum discrimina (cf. Hos. iii. 4 s.), constat impletum esse dictum Jacob: Non auferetur sceptrum de Juda, donec venerit Salvator (Gen. xlix. 10). Necesso est igitur, venisse Salvatorem."

—Starke: "If everlasting righteousness shall be brought back, it follows that man has once possessed it, but has lost it.—While Christ is the true High-priest who atones for all men, and the great Prophet who has revealed the will of God concerning our salvation, He is also the true King, who has the power to place his atoning blood to our credit, and to protect His believing followers."—Hävernick: "The complete expiation of the great and numerous sins of Israel shall take place in the time of Messiah, the true High-priest; but His coming shall be delayed until after the expiration of the period that was indicated. But precisely because the sins of the people were as the sand of the sea, so that Daniel himself confessed their enormity (vs. 4–19), it was necessary to provide a perfect and wholly complete expiation, in contrast with that which had hitherto been made in the temple at Jerusalem, which was the mere foreshadowing of the future reality. The eyes of Daniel and of Israel were not to linger on the temple only, whose restoration the prophet so anxiously desired; they were to lift their eyes up farther, to Him who was to come, who is both the true temple, and the priest who ministers in it."—Füller: "Meanwhile the principal concern was that Israel should happily escape from the tribulation caused by the Old-Test. antichrist. When that was realized, it might be inquired why the seven weeks of years did not begin (?—rather, why Messiah did not come!)—At a later period, John, the New-Test. Daniel, appeared with his Revelation, which continued to build on the foundations laid by Daniel, and described the troubled times of the New-Test. antichrist, together with the deliverance from them, being designed to render the same service to the New-Test. people of God, which Daniel's prophecy formerly rendered to God's people under the Old Covenant."

4. The prophet's last vision, containing the most thorough description of the future sufferings of Israel, and of its ultimate Messianic exaltation.

CHAPS. X. 1—XI. 1.

1 In the third year of [to] Cyrus king of Persia, a thing [word] was revealed unto Daniel, whose name was called Belteshazzar; and the thing [word] was true [truth], but [and] the time appointed [warfare] was long [great]: and he understood the thing [word], and had understanding of [in] the vision [appearance.]

- 2 In those days I Daniel was' mourning three full weeks.' I ate no pleasant 3 bread, neither came flesh nor wine in [to] my mouth, neither did I anoint myself at all till three whole weeks were fulfilled.
- 4 And in the four and twentieth day of [to] the first month, as [and] I was by 5 [upon] the side of the great river, which [it] is Hiddekel, then [and] I lifted up mine eyes, and looked [saw], and, behold, a certain [one] man clothed in 6 linen [linens], whose [and his] loins were girded with fine gold of Uphaz; his body also [and his body] was like the beryl, and his face as the appearance of lightning, and his eyes as lamps of fire, and his arms and his feet like in colour to [the aspect of] polished brass, and the voice of his words like the voice of a 7 multitude. And I Daniel alone saw the vision [appearance]; for [and] the men that were with me saw not the vision [appearance]; but a great quaking fell upon them, so that [and] they fled to hide [in hiding] themselves.
- 8 Therefore [And] I was left alone, and saw this great vision [appearance], and there remained no strength in me; for my comeliness was turned in [upon] me
9 into corruption, and I retained no strength. Yet [And] heard I the voice of his words: and when [as] I heard the voice of his words, then [and] was I in a deep
10 sleep [stupified] on my face, and my face toward the ground [earth]. And, behold, a hand touched me, which [and] set me upon my knees and upon the palms
11 of my hands. And he said unto me, O Daniel, a man greatly beloved, understand [have understanding in] the words that I speak unto thee, and stand upright; for unto thee am I now sent. And when he had spoken [at his speaking] this word unto [with] me, I stood trembling.
- 12 Then [And] said he unto me, Fear not, Daniel; for from the first day that thou didst set [give] thy heart to understand, and to chasten thyself before thy 13 God, thy words were heard, and I am [have] come for [at] thy words. But [And] the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood [was standing in front of] me one and twenty days: but [and], lo, Michael, one of the chief [first] princes, came 14 to help me; and I remained there with [beside] the kings of Persia. Now [And] I am [have] come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter [sequel of the] days: for yet the vision is for many days.
- 15 And when he had spoken [in his speaking] such like [like these] words unto [with] me, I set [gave] my face toward the ground [earth], and I became dumb.
- 16 And, behold, one like the similitude of the sons of men [man] touched [touching upon] my lips: then [and] I opened my mouth and spake, and said unto him that stood before me, O my lord, by the vision [appearance] my sorrows 17 are turned upon me, and I have retained no strength. For [And] how can the servant of this my lord talk [speak] with this my lord? for [and] as for me [I], straightway there remained [would stand] no strength in me, neither is there breath left in me.
- 18 Then [And] there came again and touched me one like the appearance of a 19 man, and he strengthened me, and said, O man greatly beloved, fear not; peace be unto thee; be strong, yea [and], be strong. And when he had spoken unto [in his speaking with] me, I was strengthened, and said, Let my lord speak; for thou hast strengthened me.
- 20 Then [And] said he, Knowest thou wherefore I [have] come unto thee? and now will I return to fight with the prince of Persia: and when I am gone forth, 21 [then] lo, the prince of Græcia shall [has] come. But I will show [tell] thee that which is noted [recorded] in the scripture of truth: and there is none that
1 holdeth with me in [upon] these things, but Michael your prince. Also [And] I, in the first year of [to] Darius the Mede, even I, stood to confirm and to strengthen him.

GRAMMATICAL NOTES.

PREFATORY REMARKS

Concerning the final vision of Daniel (chap. x.-xii.) as a whole.

The last section of the prophetically visional part of this book falls into three clearly defined subdivisions of unequal length, and was therefore not inappropriately treated by the person who divided the Holy Scriptures into chapters. It is not only the most comprehensive, but, because of its form and contents, also the most remarkable and difficult among the prophetic portions of the book. Having been composed later than the three preceding visions, namely subsequent to the captivity and when the return of the exiles had already begun (see on v. 1), it supplements their contents, and develops them still farther—especially those of the second vision (chap. viii.) and of the third (chap. ix.). The development of the fourth and last world-power to the stage of anti-Christianity, which was described with special interest in those two chapters, is now illustrated more fully than in any former instance, and at the same time, the ultimate triumph of the kingdom of God over that and all other opposing powers is brought into a clearer light and portrayed in more glowing colors than heretofore. The relation of the section to chap. vii. as serving to complement and still farther develop its subject, becomes especially prominent in this bright closing scene; while the prophecy is in so far complementary to chapters viii. and ix. as it describes the development of the anti-Christian world-power in predictions distinguished by a greater fullness of detail—to say nothing of the similarity between its preparatory scenery and that of chap. viii. and also of ix. 20–23. The section serves to complete the visions of chap. viii. by describing more exactly the hostile relations in which the various constituent sections of the fourth world-power stood to each other, as already symbolically indicated in chap. viii. 22 et seq.; and particularly by showing how the holy land, which lay between the contending sections of the divided empire, in some cases was drawn indirectly into suffering, and in others was made the object of direct attack. In like manner this vision becomes complementary to that in chap. ix. since it fills the outline of the sixty-two weeks and also of the one final week of tribulation [?], which were but briefly referred to in that chapter, with a wealth of contents, that displays a growing animation and interest as the description draws near to the close of the sixty-second and the beginning of the last week. In tracing the particular manner of the development of the anti-Christian power out of the fourth and last world-monarchy, there seems to have been the occasional intervention of a later hand, which drew the prophecy with sharper lines and adapted it more fully to the subsequent facts connected with its historical fulfilment, than had been done in the general outline which was revealed to the prophet.* The statements in v. 5 et seq., concerning the geographical position of the two most powerful sections of the great divided Javanic world-empire, and also concerning the direction taken by the various expeditions for conquest which their rulers organized, the repeated attempts to unite the contending dynasties by means of matrimonial alliances, the insurrections and treasonable plots against individual sovereigns, etc., can hardly be regarded otherwise than as interpolations on the part of a pious Jewish apocalyptist of the Maccabæan age, although it may be impossible at this day to venture a definite estimate respecting the proportion of the whole section chap. xi. 5–45 that originated with Daniel, or as to how much is to be credited to the subsequent reviser (see the exeget. remarks on the several passages, particularly on vs. 5, 6, 8, 14, 17, 18, 25, 27, etc., and pre-eminently on v. 40 et seq.; and cf. supra, Introd. § 1, note 2, and § 4). While, for reasons that have been given (cf. Introd. § 4, note 1), we decidedly reject the hypothesis that the entire section chap. x. 1–xii. 13, excepting only the first four verses of chap. xii., is spurious, we regard the theory that chap. xi. has been interpolated as above suggested, as necessary, chiefly because details characterized by such unusual precision as is found in that chapter, seem to conflict with the nature of genuine and healthful prophecy, and with the analogy of all the remaining prophecies in the history of Old-Test. revelation.* We are entirely agreed with Kranichfeld (p. 340 et seq.) in holding that the nature or the “self-evident canon” of prophecy requires “that the prediction should not usurp the place of historical development itself, i.e., that it should not adduce such future dates, as cannot be connected with the time of the prophetic originator, as the unfolding of a religious or moral idea animated by the operations of God—although in other respects a particularizing description may offer any amount of detailed representations in illustration, limited only by the confines established by that canon.” We cannot, however, agree with him in believing that the entire vision before us, and especially that part contained in chap. xi., must be regarded “by that canon” simply as a developing of the ideas contained elsewhere in the book. The many surprising details of that chapter do not appear to an unbiassed mind as the mere development of former thoughts, but, rather as concrete statements respecting the political and family history of the Seleucids and the Ptolemies, such as no other Old-Test. prophet would have attempted to furnish, even approximately, and such as conflict with the spirit of Old-Test. prophecy in general. We are certainly not compelled by any merely subjective reason to assume an interpolation of the text of Daniel in this place, after having rejected that theory in every other instance. The only reason which prevents us from defending the genuineness of this closing section is based on the analogy of all the balance of O.-T. prophecy, which in no case affords a similar example of specific and detailed description of the future (cf. Tholuck, Die Propheten und ihre Weissagungen, p. 105 et seq.; Die Grenzen einer Prädiktion—an investigation, however, which seems to require a more strict apprehension).

* [We have repeatedly objected to this hypothesis of a later interpolation as purely subjective and gratuitous.]

* [That the prophecies in question are unique in this particular may readily be conceded without any impeachment of their genuineness. The whole book is remarkable for its vividness and personality of delineation. The details were so striking that Cyrus the Great and Alexander the Great are traditionally reported to have recognized their own portraits immediately. But the same is measurably true of other specifications in O.-T. prophecies, although not on so extended a scale. Even the name of Cyrus is mentioned by Isaiah nearly two centuries before his time; yet few, among evangelical interpreters at least, would on that account pronounce those passages a forgery. The author's reasoning for the rejection of the authenticity of these predictions of Daniel is entirely uncritical. Hengstenberg, in his work on the Genuineness of the Book of Daniel (Edinb. translation, sec. xii.), adduces other examples of equal definiteness in O.-T. prophecy, and meets this whole objection fully. The vague manner in which our author adduces the argument gives very little opportunity to do more than make this general demurral to his views on this point.]

The whole section divides itself, as has already been observed, into three parts, the first of which describes the general circumstances that conditioned the new vision, and also the introductory features of the vision itself (consisting in the appearance of a mighty angel, which at first excited the prophet's alarm and terror, but subsequently exercised a comforting and exalting influence over him), chap. x. 1-xi. 1. The special description of the future having been thus introduced is taken up by the second part and carried forward from the unfolding of the Persian world-empire, then upon the stage, to the highest point of conceded power developed by the atheistic tyrant who ultimately sprang from the Javanic world-monarchy, and who became the antichrist of the Old Testament (chap. xi. 2-45).^{*} Finally, the third part describes the triumph, the deliverance, and the exaltation of God's people in the Messianic period, and, if it does not certify the nearness of that era of ultimate prosperity, it yet conveys the assurance

^{*} [Kell takes a different view of this whole prophecy, with a view to obviate any sudden transition, either from the Persian monarchy to the Antiochian tyranny, or from that to the final consummation of the kingdom of God. "The angel of the Lord will reveal to Daniel, not what shall happen from the third year of Cyrus to the time of Antiochus, and further to the resurrection of the dead, but, according to the express declaration of chap. x. 14, what shall happen to his people מְלָכֵי בָבֶלֶת וְיָמֵי מְלָכֵיהֶם, i.e., in the Messianic future, because the prophecy relates to this time. In the מְלָכֵי בָבֶלֶת וְיָמֵי מְלָכֵיהֶם takes place the destruction of the world-power, and the setting up of the Messianic kingdom at the end of the present world-æon. All that the angel says regarding the Persian and the Javanic world-kingsdoms, and the wars of the kings of the north and the south, has its aim to the end-time, and serves only to incite briefly the chief elements of the development of the world-kingsdoms till the time when the war that brings in the end shall burst forth, and to show how, after the overthrow of the Javanic world-kingsdom, neither the kings of the north nor those of the south shall gain the possession of the dominion of the world." But this last would certainly seem to be a very inadequate reason for so great a detail of political delineation. Hence, after pursuing the exposition of the middle portion of this prophecy especially, Kell concludes thus: "From this comparison this much follows, that the prophecy does not furnish a prediction of the historical wars of the Seleucids and the Ptolemies, but an ideal description of the war of the kings of the north and the south in its general outlines, whereby, it is true, diverse special elements of the prophetic announcement have been historically fulfilled, but the historical reality does not correspond with the contents of the prophecy in anything like an exhaustive manner." Accordingly he everywhere exaggerates the minor discrepancies that occur between the prophecy and the history of Antiochus in particular, with a view to enhance this idealistic theory. The indefiniteness and inconsistency of thus carrying on at once a double line of interpretation renders his scheme on the whole very unsatisfactory. Yet it is in pursuance of his general theory concerning the absence of a design on the prophet's part to particularize the history or the Jews as such. To a certain point this theory is doubtless true; but he carries it so far as to render the predictions rather symbolical than real. The discrepancies upon which he chiefly relies for the support of his view we will examine in detail as they occur.]

that its approach is determined by immutable measurements and conditions fixed by God (chap. xii. 1-13).—The exorbitant length of the intermediate part, exceeding, as it does, the aggregate of the others nearly two-fold, might be adduced as an additional and highly probable evidence of its interpolation, as suggested above.^{*}

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Verse 1. The time and significance of the vision. In the third year of Cyrus king of Persia—therefore B.C. 536 or 535 [probably, 534], later than any other date in the book (cf. on chap. i. 21). It is significant and instructive, as bearing on the subject and design of the vision, which dwells with special interest on the aspect of affairs subsequent to the Persian dominion, that when it was imparted to Daniel, he had already lived under Medo-Persian rule during several years. Cf. Kranichfeld, p. 340: "After a series of prophetic announcements by Daniel had received a genuine prophetic fulfilment during the time of the exile itself, and, on the one hand the newly confirmed return of the exiles had been but lately realized, while on the other, the מְלָכֵי בָבֶלֶת וְיָמֵי מְלָכֵיהֶם, which had been predicted instead of the Messianic glory, was feelingly demonstrated, e.g., by the disputes with the Samaritans, by the interruption of the building of the temple (cf. Ezra iii. 8 with iv. 8), and, above all, by the continued aversion of the supreme Persian powers (cf. Dan. x. 13, 20), it now became the interest of the seer to devote special attention to the last heathen empire of the earth, the only one remaining to be demonstrated, and to present theoretically this last characteristic picture of hostility, in colors that would constantly impress its nature, and in such detail as the confidence springing from the unvarying success of the past would justify. Thoroughly convinced as he was, on the ground of his own observation and of the teaching of earlier prophecy that the Javanic west would eventually displace the east in the dominion of the world, and that at the same time the ultimate form of heathen government would appear in connection with the former, he would naturally not regard the transient Persian empire, which had indeed been adequately characterized at its very beginning, as the מְלָכֵי בָבֶלֶת וְיָמֵי מְלָכֵיהֶם (cf. x. 14; ii. 28; viii. 19) upon which prophecy elsewhere dwells by preference, but would rather consider the final form of heathen power over the theocracy in that light."—Hitzig inquires "Why Daniel was still at Babylon in the third year of Cyrus? Why so pious a theocrat, and so devoted a lover of Jerusalem and the holy land, had not returned thither? Why he should seem to place himself among the despisers of the holy mountain and among the apostates (Isa. lrv. 11; lxvi. 5), by disregarding the exhortations of Isa. ii. to return (Isa. xlviii. 20; lii. 11 et seq.)?—to all of which the simple answer is, that while ranking as a highly esteemed and influential officer of the state, even under Persian rule (cf. chap. vi. 29), he must have been persuaded that he would be able to render his nation more important service with regard to the rebuilding of their city and temple, were he to remain behind to represent them at the court, than he possibly could were he to accompany them on their return to Judæa. As a secondary consideration his somewhat advanced age may have influenced his decision (despite Ezra iii. 12), cf. Hävernick on the passage.—Unto Daniel, whose name was called Belshazzar. Cf. i. 7; ii. 26; iv. 5; v. 12. Both names are given in this place, for the reason, probably, that the two-fold relation which the prophet occupied (being connected with the Old-Test. people of God, and also filling an official station at the court of the world-kingdom) and which is thus indicated, constituted the feature by which he was enabled "to view the history of the conflict of Israel with the world-power, and to record for the benefit of his people what might be expected from the latter" (Fuller).—And the thing was true; or, "and the word is truth," i.e., the word of God which was revealed to the prophet, and which, unlike the words of so many false prophets of that time (Jer. xxix. 8 et seq., 15), is not a lying and deceptive word, but truth, that is worthy of credit and shall surely come to pass; cf. 2 Sam. vii. 28; 1 Kings viii. 26; also below, v. 21; xi. 2; xii. 7.—But the time appointed was long; rather, "and great tribulation," supply, "formed its subject" הַדָּבָר is an additional predicate of הַדָּבָר (cf. Gen. xi. 1; Isa. vii. 24; Jer. xxvi. 2). Maurer renders it correctly: "oraculum vocatur ab argumento," and also de Wette: "and refers to great wretchedness." אֲנִי here denotes "warfare, oppression, trouble," exactly as in Isa. xl. 2; not "bravery, might" (Vulg., Syr.), nor "exertion," as if the great effort put forth by the prophet while receiving the revelation were alluded to (Hävern.), and least of all, "ministering," as Ewald strangely conceived, referring to the numerous angels whom he regarded as being engaged in this new revelation with industrious energy and care (!).—And he understood the thing, and had understanding of the vision; rather, "observed the word, and gave attention to the vision." בִּינְיָן is not an imperative (v. Lengerke, Ewald), but an infinitive with a perfect signification.* The construction with an accusative of the object is similar to that in chap. ix. 2; cf. xii. 8. The following וַיִּבְרָךְ, although mīlāh, is not an imperative (as v. Lengerke supposes, but a noun, which has the accent here on the first syllable, because of the accented כִּי that immediately follows; cf. Ezek. xix. 14. The probable design of the statement that Daniel gave careful heed to what was revealed was to emphasize the highly significant and profoundly important subject of the vision from the outset, and also to give assurance of the credibility of the prophet's narrative.

Verses 2, 3. The frame of mind of Daniel and his outward deportment while receiving the revelation. Verse 2. In those days I Daniel was mourning three full weeks. The tidings respecting the discouraging state of affairs among the Jews, who had returned to the holy land, which may have reached Daniel about this time, may be regarded as the probable cause of his sadness. An especial cause of grief to him probably lay in the fact, that as the intervention of the Samaritans had interrupted the building of the temple since the second year after the return of the exiles (Ezra iv. 4 et seq.; cf. iii. 8), the latter were prevented from observing the Passover in a lawful manner. His attention would be especially directed to that fact, since according to v. 4, the period of three weeks spent by him in mourning and fasting was included in the very month of the feast of the Passover, so as to precede the date fixed for the beginning of that feast (which continued from the 14th to the 21st Nisan, the "first month" of the Jewish year) by twelve days, and to extend three days beyond its close—to the 24th Nisan.—שָׁבַע יָמִים. The addition of יָמִים, which is designed to indicate the full or enumerated measure of the weeks (cf. our "three full weeks"), is hardly intended to contrast with the weeks of years which are implied in chap. ix.; for the contrary of Gen. xxix. 14; xli. 1; Num. xi. 20 et seq.; Jer. xxvi. 8, 11, etc.—I ate no pleasant bread. לֶחֶם חֲמֻדֹת, "bread of pleasures, of desires," is doubtless a contrast to the "bread of affliction," Deut. xvi. 3, i.e., to the unleavened bread which was eaten during the Passover. Hence, the first expression of his grief mentioned by Daniel is that he abstained from the use of leavened bread, or from eating the לֶחֶם חֲמֻדֹת. Luther's rendering, "I ate no dainty food," is therefore mistaken and inexact; and also Bertholdt's, "I abstained even from the use of bread."—Neither came flesh nor wine in my mouth. A genuine fast, in which all dainty, attractive, or luxurious viands were avoided; cf. Gen. xxvii. 25; 2 Sam. xii. 20; Isa. xxii. 13, etc.—Neither did I anoint myself; another characteristic indication of a sorrowful disposition, cf. Eccl. ix. 8; Psa. xxiii. 5; Isa. lxi. 3, etc.—Hitzig's view is substantially correct: "The design of his mourning was not to support prayer and inter-

* [In these phrases יָמִים is doubtless, as Gesenius explains, to be regarded as an accusative of limitation, the preceding noun being in the absolute, and not the construct state. Yet even this appositional relation seems to limit the שָׁבַע יָמִים, whether the latter be regarded as a noun = weeks or even simple = seven, to the usual hebdomadal sense. It thus stands really, though perhaps not intentionally, in contrast with the undefined שָׁבַע יָמִים of chap. ix. 24-27, and leaves the word in that passage to be interpreted by the exigencies of the context.]

† ["But this contrast is not well founded, for the לֶחֶם חֲמֻדֹת (unleavened cakes) of the Passover was not (notwithstanding Deut. xvi. 3) bread of sorrow, but pure, holy bread, which Daniel did not eat, in opposition to the law, for three weeks. לֶחֶם is not to be limited to bread in its narrower sense, but denotes food generally."—Kell.]

cession as in chap. ix. (for which reason it does not assume its appropriate garb, cf. Psa. xxxv. 18, 14), but rather to prepare to receive a revelation. However, the writer by no means entertains the opinion that asceticism could secure or compel a revelation; for in that case the means employed would have been increased, particularly as the vision was delayed. Daniel rather confines himself to abstinence from worldly enjoyment, in order to maintain the serious frame of mind in which the desired revelation should be received, and which is the only one that may hope to be blessed with a revelation."

Verses 4-7. Designation of the special time and place. Description of the appearance of the angel who conveys the revelation. And in the four and twentieth day of the first month. Since, according to Esth. iii. 7, the "first month" was Nisan (cf. also 1 Macc. vii. 49; ix. 3), and since by vs. 12 and 13, the mourning and fasting of Daniel began precisely twenty-one days before the present date—therefore on the third Nisan,—tho' special reason why he commenced such exercises on that particular day may probably be found in the fact that the 1st and 2d Nisan were still observed, at the period of the captivity, as they were already in the time of Saul and David, as the festival of the New-year or of the first new moon in the year; and it was of course unsuitable for him to fast while that joyous festival continued (cf. 1 Sam. xx. 18, et seq.; xxvii. 34, with ii. 19, vi. 29).—I was by the side of the great river, which is Hiddekel. It cannot be easily determined whether he was there in vision merely, as in the similar case, chap. viii. 2 (see on that passage), or likewise in body. The latter opinion (Hävern., v. Leng., Maurer, Hitzig, Kliefoth, Füller) appears to be preferable, in view of the subsequent mention of Daniel's companions on the bank of the river.—Concerning קָדְשֵׁךָ, i.e., probably, the "swift, tearing" (from קָדַח), as the Scriptural designation of the Tigris, cf. Gesen.-Dietrich, a. v., and also the expositors of Gen. ii. 14. The latter passage, moreover, clearly asserts the distinction between the Hiddekel and the Euphrates, which is observed throughout the Old-Test. generally, and thereby demonstrates the mistake of Syrus, who regards the קָדַח in this place as denoting the Euphrates.—

Verse 5. Then I lifted up mine eyes and looked, etc., exactly as in the vision on the banks of the Eulæus, chap. viii. 3.—And behold a man clothed in linen. The description begins with his clothing, hence proceeds from without inward (contrary to the method of, e.g., Matt. xvii. 2; xxviii. 3). White linen (בְּגָדִים, from בָּרַךְ, cf. Ezek. ix. 2) was the garb of priests, especially of the high-priests (cf. Lev. xvi. 4, 23; vi. 8 with Isa. xliii. 28), and therefore symbolizes holiness; the addition of golden ornaments denotes princely rank. The person here described was therefore at all events a קָדֵשׁ (cf. Isa. xliii. 28) or holy angelic prince, and more particularly, was identical with the "man's voice between the Ulai," chap. viii. 16, which directed Gabriel to interpret the vision for Daniel in that place, since according to chap. xii. 6, he hovered over the river. It was shown on the former passage, that the angel who uttered that command need not necessarily have been superior to Gabriel, but that he may have belonged, as well as the latter, to the class of archangels or מַלְאָכִים; and he may be regarded as the compeer of Michael as well, despite v. 13, where he refers to the aid he received from the latter against the prince of Persia. Hence, he was a third angel-prince besides Gabriel and Michael, whose name, however, is not given; and it is therefore vain to search for the specific name he bore. Hofmann, Auberlen and Füller conceive of this angelic prince as being the power of nature which operates for the kingdom of God in the entire heathen world, or as the good principle in the world-power, which is identical with the κατ'εχων, 2 Thess. ii. 6; but they fail to establish exegetically, and in an adequate manner this identity, as well as the character ascribed to the angel. Concerning the modicum of truth which may nevertheless underlie this opinion, see Eth.-fund. principles, etc., No. 1.—The identity of this angel with Michael, which Kranichfeld assumes, is opposed by the manner in which Michael is represented as not being present, in vs. 13 and 21. It is more probable that he was identical with Gabriel (Ewald et al.); but the appearance of the latter on his entrance in chap. viii. is described in different terms, and, moreover, the name of Gabriel is not expressly mentioned; cf. infra, on v. 13.—Whose loins were girded with fine gold of Uphaz; i.e., with the finest and most valuable gold; cf. Psa. xlv. 8, "gold of Ophir." The identity of אֶפְזָיִם and אֶפְרַיִם, which is assumed by, e.g., the Vulg., Chald., and Syr. (but not by Theodot.), is opposed by the different form of the name, and by the impossibility of transforming י into פ.^{*} The country here referred to (and in Jer. xii. 8) was probably a region in the south or east, and perhaps adjoining to Ophir, which abounded in gold, and like the latter, constituted a principal source from whence the people of hither Asia derived their precious metals in ancient times. The theory which seems best recommended is that of Hitzig, who combines the Sanscr. name vīpācā = Hyphasis, with the supposition based on that etymology, that the country derived its name from a colony which came to Arabia Felix from the river Hyphasis in India. Cf. Nägelsbach on Jer. i. c., concerning this question.—Verse 6. His body also was like the beryl, or "crysolite," hence having the golden lustre of topaz or amber, which shone through his garb of white linen. With regard to בְּרִיָּא—whose primary signification was doubtless "the sea" (= Sanscr. varīṣa), and which afterward became the name of the celebrated colony of Phœnician merchants located in Spain near the Mediterranean sea, and still later was employed to designate the precious stone brought from thence, which the Sept and Josephus term the χρυσόλιθος with probable correctness—see Hitzig on Ezek. i. 16; Gesen.-Dietrich in the Handwörterbuch; and also my observation on Cant. v. 14.—And his face as the appearance of lightning; cf. Ezek. i. 13; Matt. xxviii. 3. On the comparison of his eyes with lamps of fire cf. Rev. i. 14, which passage is wholly imitated from the one before us.—And his arms and feet like in colour to polished brass; rather, “arms and feet like the gleam of glowing brass.” מִרְקָרִית, which primarily denotes the “place of the feet,” is here synonymous with רַגְלָיִם, “feet,” as appears from the mention of יָרְעוֹת, “arms,” in the same connection; for why, if the arms glowed like brass, should the place only of the feet present the same appearance and not rather the feet themselves? (against Kranichfeld, etc.). * —קָלֵל, the attribute of הַקּוֹשֵׁשׁ, together with צִיָּר (cf. Num. xi. 7), is taken from Ezek. i. 7. It denotes brass in a glowing and liquid or molten state (קָלֵל, a fuller form of the more usual קָל, light, swiftly moving, volutilis), not merely “shining or gleaming” brass (Ewald, etc.), nor yet “brass of the smelting furnace,” as Hitzig assumes, putting entirely too artificial a sense on the idea. Cf., however, the parallel Rev. i. 15, οἱ πόδες αὐτοῦ ὅμοιοι χαλκοῦ βράνω ὡς ἐν καμίνῳ πεντρομένῳ.—And the voice of his words like the voice of a multitude, or “of a roaring.” קוֹל הַמָּוֶן primarily signifies the “voice (sound) of a roaring,” and may denote the roaring of the sea, of the stormy waves of the ocean, or of a great multitude of people (Theod., Vulg., Syr., and also moderns, e.g., Kranichfeld, Füller, etc.). The parallels, Ezek. i. 24 (קוֹל מַיִם), Jer. liii. 2; Isa. xvii. 12; Rev. i. 15, determine in favor of the former interpretation. The terrified prophet does not at first recognize what the speaker says in so dreadful a voice, either here or in v. 9. Cf. the analogous circumstance in chap. viii. 13 a.—Verse 7. The men that were with me saw not the vision; a feature similar to that connected with the conversion of St. Paul, Acts ix. 7; xxii. 11. It is impossible to determine who the prophet's companions were; they may as well have been the servants of the highly esteemed “prince” Daniel (chap. vi. 21), as associates of a different rank.—But a great quaking fell upon them; evidently because they heard the dreadful sound of the roaring, although they saw nothing; cf. Gen. iii. 8; Am. iii. 6; Acts ix. 7.†—They fled to hide themselves; rather, “they fled hiding themselves.” בְּהִתְחַבֵּא, properly, “while hiding themselves,” a periphrase of the gerund; cf. Gesenius, The-saur., p. 175 a. The infinitive with ל would have expressed the somewhat different idea, “they fled to hide themselves;” cf. 1 Kings xxii. 25; 2 Kings xix. 11.

Verses 8–11. The impression made on Daniel by the appearance of the angel. His temporary stupor, and subsequent and gradual restoration. I . . . saw this great vision. The same language is used with reference to the appearance of the Lord in the burning bush to Moses, Ex. iii. 8.—My comeliness was turned in me into corruption; rather, “the color of my face was changed into disfigurement for me.” Literally, “and my brightness,” etc. (thus Ewald et al.). הִוָּךְ, “brightness, freshness of color,” here corresponds to the Chald. יָרִי, chap. v. 6, 9; vii. 28. עָלַי, “on me,” seems to be a Chaldaism employed as a periphrase for the dative, and therefore to be equivalent to אֵלַי (unlike v. 16). It is hardly to be separated from the verb and to be immediately connected with הִוָּךְ, thus periphrasing the genitive (against Hitzig).—לְמַשְׁחִיתָהּ, properly, “to destruction;” cf. 2 Chron. xx. 28. The following context indicates the nature of this destruction or disfigurement, by stating that the loss of color was joined to faintness and a total loss of strength.—Verse 9. Then was I in a deep sleep on my face, i.e., in a stupefied state, during which a total loss of his senses and of consciousness was depicted on his countenance.—And my face (sank) toward the ground; i.e., the loss of consciousness was not momentary, but was protracted during some time, and brought him to the ground on his face. With a strange arbitrariness Hitzig finds “an attention to trivial details that border closely on the comical” in the statement that the face was toward the ground; as if the frequent expression אֶפְסָרִים וְיִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה אֶרְצָה (Gen. xix. 1; xlii. 6) or וְיִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה אֶרְצָה (Gen. xxxiii. 8, etc.) did not likewise indicate the apparently general use of אֶרְצָה in this sense! On the subject of chap. viii. 17.—Verse 10. And behold, a hand touched me. The stunned prophet is not able to say whose hand it was; but the tenor of the entire representation shows, beyond the reach of doubt, that it was the hand of the same person who had hitherto been in his presence (cf. viii. 18; Ezek. ii. 9). Kranichfeld (see above, on v. 5) is therefore in error when, after having assumed that the angel described above was Michael, he regards the one who now appears and henceforth addresses Daniel as being Gabriel (as do Hävernick, Hengstenberg, etc.). Such a multiplication of persons is unnecessary, and is opposed by the total silence of the author with regard to the names of the appearance here introduced. Maurer, Hitzig, v. Hofmann, Füller, Kliefoth, etc., correctly hold to the identity of the angel who touches Daniel with the one introduced in v. 5.—Set me (rather “shook me”) upon my knees and upon the palms of my hands; a constr. pragnans, for “shook me and helped me,” etc. The couching position which he accordingly assumed at first is the natural posture of one who is stunned and overwhelmed with awe in the presence of a superior being.—Verse 11. O Daniel, a man greatly beloved. See on chap. ix. 23.—For unto thee am I now sent; namely, sent at this precise moment, as the servant of God and the bearer of a message of blessing and comfort. The angel designs by this encouraging address not merely to induce Daniel to arise to an erect position, but also to fix his attention on the words about to be spoken.—I stood trembling—in fearful expectation of the things to which he should listen; cf. Ezra x. 9.

* [Keil, however contends that מִרְקָרִית, place of feet, does not stand for feet, but denotes that part of the human frame where the feet are; and the word indicates that not the feet alone, but the under parts of the body shone like burnished brass.]

Verses 12–14. The angel's statement respecting the design of his coming and the reason of his delay to that time. Cf. chap. ix. 23.—For from the first day (therefore from the third Nisan, according to v. 4) that thou didst set thine heart; properly “gavest thy heart;” cf. Eccles. i. 13, 17.—To understand, and to chasten (or “humble”) thyself before God. V. 14 a states what Daniel desired to understand, viz.: the future experiences of his people. He sought to obtain the knowledge of this by humbling himself before God in fasting, etc. Consequently לְהַכְרִיחַ וּלְהַתְעַצֵּב וְגו' may be considered a hendiadys, to the extent to which the implied verbal idea is co-ordinated.—And I am come for thy words, i.e., in consequence of the words of thy prayer to which reference has just been made. On כְּדִבְרֶיךָ, “according to thy words,” cf. for instance, Esth. i. 12; iii. 15; viii. 14; 1 Kings xiii. 1, etc. The perfect בָּאֵתִי, “I have come,” denotes the coming of the angel, which had already been determined on at the beginning of the prophet's prayer, had only then become an accomplished fact. The delay in his coming, which was caused by the interference of a hostile angelic power, is accounted for in the following verse.—Verse 18. But the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood me one and twenty days. שֹׁרֵר מַלְכוּת פָּרְסָא.

Jerome observes correctly, although upon a possibly inadequate exegetical foundation: “Videtur mihi hic esse angelus, cui Persis credita est, iuxta illud quod in Deuteronomio (xxxii. 8, lxx.) legitur: ‘Quando dividebat Altissimus gentes et disseminabat filios Adam, statuit terminos gentium iuxta numerum angelorum Dei.’ Isti sunt principes, de quibus Paulus apostolus loquitur: ‘Sapientiam loquimur inter perfectos, quam nullus principum sæculi hujus cognovit; et enim cognovissent, nunquam Dominum gloriæ crucifixissent.’ Restituit autem princeps, i.e., angelus Persarum, faciens pro credita sibi provincia, ne captivorum omnis populus dimitteretur.” This interpretation is supported, and that of Calvin, Hävernicks, Kranichfeld, et al., which takes שֹׁרֵר in the sense of “king, earthly and human sovereign,” is opposed by the following considerations: (1) in chap. xi. 5, where שֹׁרֵר is unquestionably employed in the latter sense, the connection is entirely different from the character of the present passage, where the הַשֹּׁרֵרִים which immediately follows obviously denotes angelic princes; (2) the Persian kings, on the other hand, are termed מְלָכֵי פָּרְסָא at the end of the verse; (3) the idea of an angel's conflict with a human king seems very inappropriate; (4) the angel Michael was Israel's “prince,” i.e., guardian angel, according to v. 21; chap. xii. 1; and corresponding to this, the prince of Persia who is here noticed, and the prince of Græcia mentioned in v. 20, were, without doubt, the angels of Persia and Javan respectively; (5) the idea of guardian angels over entire realms, whether friendly or hostile in their disposition toward the theocracy, is attested by various Old-Test. parallels, particularly by Isa. xxiv. 21 (see Knobel on that passage); Isa. xli. 2; Jer. xli. 25; xlix. 3 (where the gods of heathen nations take the place of the guardian angels); Deut. xxxii. 8; and Psa. xcvi. 4, lxx.; also Bar. iv. 7 and Eccles. xvii. 17 (where ἡγεμόνες seems to designate an angel prince, exactly like “שֹׁרֵר” in this passage),—to say nothing of New-Test. passages, such as 1 Cor. viii. 5; x. 20 et seq.—The withstanding or resisting during twenty-one days is obviously to be understood sensu hostili (לְהִיגֵר), as in Prov. xxi. 30; cf. 2 Sam. xviii. 13), without, however, involving the idea that the Persian court, or any earthly locality whatever, was the scene of such opposition or warfare (as, e.g., Füller assumes). That adversari may more probably have taken place in super-mundane regions; and that this was the case seems to have been attested by parallels like 1 Kings xxii. 19 et seq.; Job i. 6; ii. 1 et seq.; Luke x. 18; xxii. 31. Hofmann (Schriftbew. i. 286 et seq.) and Füller hold that “the prince of the kingdom of Persia” does not denote an actual guardian angel of that realm, but any evil spirit whatever, who may have sought to exert an influence on the decisions of the Persian king, while on the contrary the angel who appeared to Daniel sought to counteract that influence by his own, as being more beneficial to Israel;* but this opinion is altogether too artificial, because it supposes two spiritual powers—the one good and the other evil—in every case (a “court-angel” and a “royal court-devil,” in the language of Starke), as exerting influence over the ruler of a kingdom. Moreover, the idea of the spirit ruling at a court, as being either good or bad, either peaceful or warlike, has too modern an aspect, and is foreign to the modes of conception that were current among the ancient Orientals. The strongest argument against this opinion, however, consists in the consideration that the title שֹׁרֵר מַלְכוּת פָּרְסָא, and farther on, the appellations שֹׁרֵר יִרָן and שֹׁרֵרֶס (Michael, the prince of Israel; v. 21, cf. v. 20), imply a more intimate connection, a much closer and more constant relation between the angel and the corresponding nation than is involved in a merely temporary influence over the governmental policy of any particular ruler. A spirit who may have exercised a temporary control over the decisions of one or more Persian kings could not on that account simply be designated the שֹׁרֵר.

פָּרְסָא. The angel who is thus entitled must be considered the constant patron of the Persian

* Cf. especially Füller on this passage, p. 274: “The question is, which of the two spirits shall succeed in exercising the greater influence over the Persian court and king. It becomes an object to gain the consent of the Persian king and the holders of power under him, that he may decide thus or otherwise. . . . It is conceivable that in such a case the good spirit, who operated on the world-ruler, would occupy a more difficult position, and be engaged in a harder task than the evil spirit, to whom the heart of the natural man, to say nothing of the heart of a heathen, is more accessible than it is to the former. It was then that Michael came to his support by causing, as Hofmann remarks (as above, p. 288), the relations which Cyrus had assumed toward the Jewish people to operate on that king, and to gain increased influence over his inclinations and views,” etc.

nation and state, as much so as Michael was the constant patron of Israel, having been known as such in the age of Joshua (Josh. v. 13) as well as in that of Daniel, and still later, in that of the New-Test. apocalypticist (Rev. vii. 7; Jude v. 9). For additional thoughts on the subject see on vs. 20, 21, and the Eth. fund. principles.—And lo, Michael, one of the chief princes; properly, “one of the first” (חַדָּשִׁים, i.e., of the most eminent; cf. 1 Chron. xviii. 17, and also חַדָּשִׁים הַקְּדוֹלִים, chap. xii. 1. The name Michael, “quis sicut Deus” (cf., e.g., Ex. xv. 11; Ps. lxxxix. 7), and also the name of Isaiah’s prophetic contemporary מִיכָיָה (= מִיכָיָהוּ) is, according to Haneberg’s correct observation (in Reusch’s Theol. Literaturbk., 1867, No. 3, p. 72), “a name that sounds like a decided monotheistic protest against every undue exaltation of the angelic dignity.” It expresses still more strongly than the similar name of Gabriel (cf. on viii. 16), the idea of God’s incomparable and assisting power, as whose instrument the angelic being who bears this name must be regarded (Kranichfeld). His “coming to help” is probably to be conceived of as an armed intervention, and supported by celestial hosts, as is suggested by the preceding warlike phrase לִנְגֹדֵי, and as the term מִלְחָמָה in v. 20 indicates still more clearly. Michael must be conceived of in this place as battling at the head of an angelic host, as in Josh. v. 14 and Rev. xii. 7; cf. also Gen. xxxii. 2; 2 Kings vi. 17, and other references to hosts of celestial angels. How little this belligerent attitude of Michael comports with the view of Hofmann and Füller, that the speaker was a special “good spirit of the heathen world-power,” whose battle with the prince of Persia was fought in the circles of the Persian court, will be apparent at once. Concerning the theory of the older exegetes and also of Hävernicks, which directly identifies Michael with Christ, see Eth. fund. principles, No. 1, and also on chap. xii. 1.—And I remained there with the kings of Persia; rather, “and I became superfluous there,” etc., namely, because another who was still more powerful than I had relieved me, and now represented me in the resistance to be made to the prince of Persia. The angel says that his presence became superfluous “with the kings of Persia” because he refers to all the powers who operate at the head of the Persian empire, including both the earthly and the super-earthly, the guardian spirit and the king beside his chief officers (cf. Isa. xxiv. 21 et seq.; lvii. 9; Ps. lxxxiii. 6; also the more extended signification of “kings” [= great ones, mighty ones], which occurs, e.g., in Ps. ii. 2; Job xxix. 25; Ezek. xxvi. 7; 1 Kings xi. 24). The difficult נִשְׁמַר מִלְכֵי פֶרַס must probably be explained in this way (with Ewald and partly also with Hitzig). The explanation offered by others, “and thus it happened that I remained or tarried during an extended period with the kings of Persia” (Vulg.: “et ego remansi ibi,” etc.; Syr., Dereser, Rosenm., Kranichf., etc.), is opposed by the fact that נִשְׁמַר does not properly signify “to remain behind,” but “to remain over, to be superfluous” (at the most, it might be possible to adduce Gen. xxxii. 25 in support of the former meaning); and also that the construction of the sentence does not justify its being regarded as a supplement or complementary explanation of the remainder of the verse. The translation of Luther, Geier, Winer, Gesenius, Hävernicks, etc.: “and I gained the ascendancy, or the victory, with the kings of Persia,” is likewise at variance with the general usage of נִשְׁמַר. The explanation of Füller (and Hofmann [also Keil]), “and I then maintained my place beside the kings of Persia,” certainly accords better with the usage; but it is opposed by the consideration adduced above, concerning the assumption of two angelic powers who contend for the greatest influence over the Persian king. Nor can it be understood on that theory why the plural מִלְכֵי פֶרַס was used instead of the singular; for, although the opinion that the writer intended Cyrus together with his successors, hence the entire Persian dynasty, by his “kings of Persia,” has recently become an especial favorite (being accepted likewise by Füller and Hofmann), it seems to us so improbable in itself, that even the adoption of the theory which asserts the Maccabean origin of the book, could scarcely serve to establish it (cf. especially Hitzig, who contends for the more extended signification of מִלְכֵי upon substantial grounds). The Sept. (and Theodot.) renders the passage correctly with regard to its meaning: καὶ αὐτὸν (sc. τὸν Μιχαήλ) κατέλιπον ἐκεῖ μετὰ τοῦ ἀρχοντος βασιλείας Περσῶν.—Verse 14. I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days. Cf. the introductory words of Jacob’s blessing, Gen. xlix. 1; also Num. xxiv. 14. Concerning הַיָּמִים הָאֵלֶּים as a designation of the Messianic future (the “issue of the ages,” Füller), cf. on chap. ii. 28. The “end of the indignation,” mentioned in chap. viii. 19, is not materially different from this end of (pre-Messianic) days.—For yet the vision is for many days; rather, “for yet a vision for those days,” supply “I now bring, am about to reveal.” הַיָּמִים, the days, those days, viz.: the latter days just mentioned. כִּי is probably to be taken (with Füller and O. B. Michaelis) as referring indirectly back to the two preceding visions which treated of the latter days, hence to chapters viii. and ix. (cf. especially chap. viii. 19 b and chap. ix. 23 et seq.). Consequently the angel now brings yet an eschatological prophecy, yet a vision of the last times which forms the final and most specific revelation. None of the other interpretations yield a clear sense that agrees with the context, e.g., that by Hitzig: “but it is yet continually a prophecy for ages;” by Hävernicks, “for the prophecy to be imparted to thee shall extend to this time” (similarly Kranichfeld: “כִּי, exceeding the present and the immediate future in its range”); the highly artificial one by Cocceius: “expectatio promissionis adhuc protelabitur, nempe per ista tempora, quæ partim c. 8, partim c. 9 descripta sunt,” etc.

Verses 15–17. The prophet’s renewed consternation, in consequence of the reverential awe felt by him in the presence of his super-human visitor, who therefore now assumes an increasingly human bearing (see v. 16 a; cf. v. 18 a). . . . I set my face toward the ground and became dumb; the same attitude of reverential awe as in Luke xviii. 13; xxiv. 5.—The prophet's dumbness was twice removed by the comforting interference of the angel (v. 16 et seq. and v. 19); but he afterward remained speechless, excepting that he asked the brief question in chap. xii. 8.—And behold one like the similitude of the sons of men touched my lips, or, "like the sons of men he touched my lips;" the subject is not indicated here (and in v. 18), which does not, however, permit a doubt to arise that the one "after the similitude . . . of men" is identical with the angel who was hitherto present. מְדַבֵּר אֲנִי serves to recall the מְדַבֵּר בְּנֵי אָדָם, chap. vii. 13, as מְדַבֵּר אֲדָם in v. 18 recalls the similar expression in chap. vii. 15. An identity with Gabriel, however, cannot be established on this repeated assurance of the angel's manlike appearance (against Kranichf.).—The touching of the lips (for the purpose of unsealing and opening them) is similar to the incident in Isa. vi. 7; Jer. i. 9.—O my lord, by the vision my sorrows are turned upon me. There is nothing strange in the form of the prophet's address to the angel, which terms him "my lord," particularly since the angel belonged to the class of "chief princes;" cf. Josh. v. 14; Judg. vi. 13. With regard to צָרָתִי, "sorrows," properly, "pains," cf. Isa. xlii. 8; xxi. 8; 1 Sam. iv. 19. צָרָתִי, "my sorrows" (cf. Psa. xviii. 24), characterizes the acuteness of the terrified sensation alluded to more impressively than could have been done by צָרָתִי merely; and since the term is obviously employed in a tropical sense only, it does not sound strange from the lips of a man (against Hitzig), and does not require to be obviated by means of putting an unusual sense on צָרָתִי, e.g., by "my joints trembled in me" (Vulg., Luther, Berth., Hävernick, Fuller), or by "my features were changed" (Ewald, following Psa. xlix. 15).—Verse 17. And how can the servant of my lord talk, etc. אֲדַבֵּר, as in 1 Chron. xiii. 2, a Chaldaism for אֲדַבֵּר.—As for me (properly "and I") straightway there remained no strength in me, neither is there breath left in me; i.e., the power to stand and breathe regularly (1 Kings x. 5; Josh. ii. 11) departed from me afresh. The renewed consternation described in these words was not as great as the former, in v. 9; the "ceasing of the breath" was not in a literal sense as in 1 Kings xvii. 17, but only figurative, as in the similar form of speech, Cant. v. 6.—A majority of recent expositors correctly regard this second member of the verse as no longer belonging to Daniel's address to the angel; for if it were still included, the words "there is no strength in me" would have been employed twice in close proximity (v. 16 b and here) and in nearly the same form. Moreover, the incident of the two following verses requires a suitable preparation.—Fuller, however, is entirely too artificial when he includes the words "and I—" in Daniel's explanation to the angel, but excludes everything else, to the close of his remarks.

Verses 18, 19. The prophet is touched and strengthened for the third time, and more effectually than before (cf. vs. 5 and 16). The being touched and strengthened three times by the angel (in which old-churchly exegetes, e.g., Ephraem, etc., sought to find an allusion to the Trinity) was certainly not accidental; cf. the conflict of Christ in Gethsemane, Matt. xvi. 38 et seq.; his being tempted thrice in the desert, Matt. iv. 1 et seq.; also such passages as John xxi. 15 et seq.; Acts x. 16; 2 Cor. xii. 8 et seq., etc. Hitzig, however, being utterly unaware of the profound mystical meaning of the description, thinks that "the broad representation that he was gradually invigorated, at first to speak himself, and afterward to listen to speech (v. 16 b, 19 b), has a manufactured appearance, and does not impress."—Like the appearance of a man; cf. on v. 16.—Verse 19. Peace be unto thee; be strong, yea, be strong. שָׁלוֹם וְכֹחַ; cf. יְשׁוּעָה וְכֹחַ, Josh. i. 6, 7, 9; and with regard to the repetition of the verb, as strengthening the idea, cf. Jer. x. 25; li. 34, etc.—For thou hast strengthened me, viz.: sufficiently to enable me to listen with courageous composure to all that is to be revealed, not excepting even what is calamitous and terrible.

Verse 20.—chap. xi. 1. Solemn and circumstantial introduction of the subsequent detailed description of the future, connected with an encouraging reference to the constant readiness of God to assist Israel, despite the serious character of the situation of the time (and particularly, despite the dangers which threatened from the direction of Persia and Javan).—Knowest thou wherefore I come unto thee? i.e., art thou aware of the serious and highly important character of the message which I am to deliver unto thee? Dost thou sufficiently estimate the tremendous earnestness of the situation, in consequence of which my mission became necessary?—And now will I return to fight with the prince of Persia. That is, the peaceful service of disclosing the future unto thee, in which I am now engaged, forms but a brief interruption to the great war which I must continue steadily to wage against the guardian spirit of the Persian power. With regard to הַיָּסֵד, considered as denoting an actual warfare rather than a mere altercation or dispute in the council of the angels of God (as Bertholdt and others think, see on v. 13.—And when (as soon as) I am gone forth, lo, the prince of Græcia shall come. The "going forth" in this passage, as often in descriptions of warlike incidents (e.g., Josh. xiv. 11; 1 Kings ii. 7; 1 Sam. viii. 20; Isa. xlii. 12; Zech. xiv. 10), certainly denotes a going forth to battle rather than the mere departing from a locality (Hofmann, Fuller, etc.). The observation does not, however, refer to his going forth to meet the prince of Persia, but a going forth to other conflicts after the war with the latter shall have been brought to a close; or, in other words, it denotes a going forth out of the war against the prince of Persia (so Jacchiad., Bertholdt, Hitzig, Kranichfeld, etc.—correctly). The sense is therefore: "Scarcely shall the Persian war be ended, when the Greek arises against me; the conflict with the Græcian world-power shall be immediately consequent on the war with that of Persia."* Cf. the similar contrasting of מִיָּד and מִיָּד in 2 Kings xi. 5, 7. Hofmann's exposition of the passage is altogether too labored: "The prince of the Græcians enters into the quarrel against the prince of the Persians, from which the angel retires; but, after the Persian empire has fallen, the angel renews the conflict with the new adversary, and, as in the former instance, is supported by Michael, the prince of Israel" (Schriftbew., I. 290; cf. Weissag. und Erfüllung, I. 312 et seq.). Hofmann, however, properly rejects V. Lengerke's view, on which the coming of the prince of Græcia must be regarded as victorious, and leading to the defeat of the angel. Hitzig, on the other hand, comes especially near to the latter theory, in his venturesome assertion that the angelic prince who converses with Daniel, and who is to battle against Persia and afterward against Greece, represents the guardian spirit of Egypt, as of a power that had been friendly to the Jews in former ages and that especially made common cause with them against Syria (= Javan) in the period of the Seleucids!—a bold hypothesis, that has no support in the context, and that is absolutely incompatible with the expressions of sacred awe and reverence which Daniel made use of toward this celestial מַלְאָךְ, according to v. 5 et seq. Daniel would have been an idolater of the coarsest kind had he rendered such homage as is described in this chapter, and particularly in vs. 16–19, to the angelic patron and representative of Egypt (whom he assuredly regarded as a damonic power inimical to God, no less than those of Persia and Javan). And a possible Maccabæan pseudo-Daniel would have been still less likely than the Daniel of the era of the captivity, to involve himself in the guilt of so gross a violation of the monotheistic principle and of disobedience to the first commandment in the decalogue.—Verse 21. But I will show thee that which is noted in the Scripture (or book) of truth. אֲבָל, "but still," a strong adversative particle, serves here to introduce the antidote to the fears for the theocracy excited by v. 20—in the shape of a comforting allusion to the ultimate welfare and blessing which are awaiting God's people according to the book of Divine providence, despite all the conflicts and sufferings that must precede them. Properly, "in a book of truth," i.e., in a Divine document upon which "the yet unrevealed (Deut. xxxii. 34) fortunes of nations (Rev. v. 1) as well as of individuals (Psa. cxxxix. 16) in the future are entered" (Hitzig). Cf. the books of judgment in chap. vii. 10, and also the term סִפְרֵי אֱלֹהִים in chap. xi. 2, which briefly comprehends the contents of the book of truth.—And there is none that holds with me in these things; rather, "and yet there is none that exerts himself with me against these," i.e., against the guardian angels of Persia and Javan, the demonic patrons of the heathen world-powers. On כָּמִי מִיָּד מִיָּד, exerting oneself with another, batting beside one, supporting one, cf. 1 Sam. iv. 9; 2 Sam. x. 12. The participle characterizes the action, although future, as nevertheless being constant.—But (only) Michael your prince,—namely, in the sense of Josh. v. 13 et seq.; cf. supra, on v. 13. The sentence "and there is none . . . your prince," taken as a whole, is not intended to justify the greatness of the sufferings through which Israel must pass (Hofmann), or the long duration of the prospective conflict with the world-powers (Füller); it simply aims to place in a clearer light the help afforded by the grace of God, which requires no foreign support in order to protect, and eventually to fully deliver Israel" (Kranichf.). The sentence would still express the idea of the self-sufficiency of the good spiritual powers in the kingdom of God, which require no aid from the world, and also of their ability to effect all things, even if it were made (as Füller proposes) dependent on מִיָּד מִיָּד, and consequently if (in disregard of the accentuation) it were translated, "But I will show thee that which is noted," etc., ". . . and the absence of one to help me," etc. In that case, however, it would present two very dissimilar objects of the angel's remarks as co-ordinate with each other, the former of which is very general in its character, and the latter equally specific; and this rendering would not obviate the incongruous relation between the contents of the former half of the verse and those of the latter, which exists in any case.—Chap. xi. 1. Also I in the first year of Darius the Mede, even I, stood to confirm and to strengthen him, or, "As I also . . . stood by him as a supporter and helper;" properly, "and I also." אֲנִי begins a new sentence (cf. Psa. xxx. 7; Job xix. 25) which does not stand in an adversative relation to the preceding verse (Hitzig), nor serve to explain it (Luther, etc.), but which is comparative. It describes the relation by which the angel who now speaks and Michael, the prince of Israel, assisted each other, as being reciprocal. מִיָּד מִיָּד serves to repeat the מִיָּד, without regard to sequence, "and I . . . my standing was as his support," etc. Cf. Job ix. 27; Zeph. iii. 20; and respecting the use of מִיָּד sensu bellico a. militari cf. supra, v. 13 and chap. viii. 25.—לְךָ "to him." Hävernick and Hitzig propose to refer this participle to מִיָּד מִיָּד rather than to Michael, because the strong terms מִיָּד מִיָּד and מִיָּד מִיָּד are supposed to warrant the conclusion that the one to whose support he came was a being inferior to the assisting angel, which would not apply to the relation of the latter to Michael. But in view of all the teaching of this section, a martial angelic prince may well be in occasional need of the aid and support of another, without being inferior to the latter on that account; and in support of the view that Michael, the guardian angel of Israel, was obliged to put forth special efforts in behalf of his wards, and therefore required the assistance of other good angelic powers to an unusual degree, precisely "in the first year of Darius the Mede," or at the period when the world-power passed from the Chaldeans to the Medo-Persians, it will be sufficient to refer to chap. vi. and to chap. ix. 1 et seq. (cf. Zech. i. 12). Cf. Hofmann, Schriftbew., I. 289, and also Füller, p. 279: "The first verse of chap. xi. is thus intimately connected with the last verse of chap. x.; and it was unwise to separate them, and thereby to confuse the train of thought (by referring γ to Darius the Mede). If it be asked, what interests were at stake in the first year of Darius, the answer will be, the position which the new dynasty should occupy toward the people of Israel. And it may be seen from the narrative in chap. vi. that efforts were made in that particular year to place it in a hostile attitude toward that people. It was in that juncture that the good angel of the world-power stood by Michael, the prince of Israel, until he prevailed; in the coming conflict Michael shall support him."

* [Yet "we must not, with Kranichfeld, supply the clause, 'to another more extensive conflict,' because this supplement is arbitrary; but rather, with Kilefoth, interpret the word generally, as it stands, of the going out of the angel to fight for the people of God, without excluding the war with the prince of Persia, or limiting it to this war" (Kell).]

ETHICO-FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES RELATED TO THE HISTORY OF SALVATION, APOLOGETICAL REMARKS, AND HOMILETICAL SUGGESTIONS.

1. The characteristic and leading feature of the contents of this section is angelological in its nature. An angelic being is introduced and described in an unusually minute and life-like manner, whom we (see on vs. 5 and 18) cannot regard as being identical with the Gabriel of chapters viii. and ix., nor yet with Michael, to whom he repeatedly refers in the communications addressed by him to Daniel; but the important disclosures made by this being respecting the nature and functions of several leading representatives of the angelic world, and the exalted rank and powerful influence within that world claimed by him, no less than his tremendous influence on the fortunes of earthly empires, justify the careful description of which he is the object (vs. 5-7), as well as the expressions of profound reverence addressed to him by Daniel (according to vs. 8-11; 15-19). These expressions, together with the counteracting efforts of the angel called forth by them, by which he designed to strengthen and encourage the terrified and overwhelmed prophet, are analogous to the incidents connected with the appearance of Gabriel to Daniel in chap. viii. 15 et seq.; but while the prophet's fainting and his restoration by Gabriel occurred but once in that instance (see on v. 18), the same features appear thrice in this connection, leading to the conclusion that this nameless angelic prince is of extraordinary importance, and at least equals, if he does not outrank Michael, the "captain of the Lord's host" (Josh. v. 13). As the latter comes to his assistance (vs. 13, 21), so he affords aid to that prince in return (chap. xi. 1) in the conflict with the "princes" of Persia and Javan, the angels who fight against God at the head of the heathen world-power. The latter likewise appear to be possessed of exalted power, and therefore as terrible spiritual beings who are dangerous to the kingdom of God and its representatives. They are powerful demons who bear the name שְׂרִיפִים "princes, archangels," by virtue of their influential rank in the kingdom of darkness, with as much propriety as do Gabriel, Michael, etc., by virtue of their position in the kingdom of light.

The power of the evil angels, however, is only transient and perishable, like that of the empires over which they rule, while the angelic princes of light, Michael and the nameless one, who stand in the service of God, triumph over them all in succession, although the victory may only be achieved by effort and determined conflict.

But who is this nameless one, this mysterious being, to whom not even the predicate מַלְאָכִי is applied, although doubtless belonging to him, to say nothing of a definite nomen proprium being assigned to him?—Are we, in connection with many older expositors (e.g., Vitrina, C. B. Michaelis, Rambach, Starke, etc.), to identify him with Christ, the "uncreated angel of the Lord," whom Daniel repeatedly addressed as מַלְאָכִי , and whose description is said to be strikingly similar to that of the "Son of man" in chap. vii. 13 et seq. (with which compare especially vs. 16, 18), and also to that of Christ in the Apocalypse (Rev. i. 13-18; x. 1-6)? This opinion is at all events more probable than that of the interpreters who identify Michael instead with Christ (Melancthon, Geier, Jo. Lange, Neubauer, Disput. de Michaele archangelo, Hävernick, etc.); but it is opposed, and the created nature of the angel is implied, by the following considerations: (1) he describes himself in v. 11 as a messenger sent from God to bear a Divine message to Daniel (similar to Gabriel in chap. viii. 16 et seq.; ix. 20 et seq.); (2) his difficulty in combating the protecting angels of the world-powers, even necessitating his being supported by other angelic princes, contrasts strongly with the manner in which the former visions describe the triumph of Christ over the world-empires opposed to him; see especially chap. ii. 44 et seq. and chap. vii. 18, 22, 26; (3) the circumstance already noticed in v. 10, that the address "my lord," together with the other features of the description which aim at the exaltation and glorifying of this angel, are elsewhere applied to angels who were certainly created; e.g., in Josh. v. 14, to the captain of the Lord's host; Judg. vi. 13, to the angel who appeared to Gideon; Judg. xiii. 8, to the angel whom Manoah saw; cf. also Rev. xix. 10; xxii. 8 et seq. We shall consequently be compelled to assume that the messenger sent from God to Daniel, as here introduced, was an angel proper, and distinct from the Son of God (see Jerome, Theodoret, and a majority of church fathers, on this passage). But what position of rank and power is to be attributed to him, or—in case he is at once co-ordinated with Michael and Gabriel in these respects (as we have done on v. 5), and is therefore regarded as an archangel—what particular office and functions are to be assigned to him, is after all a difficult question, and can hardly be answered with full exegetical certainty. The range of the angel's activity would become too limited if he were identified with the third of the archangels mentioned by name in the Old Test., beside Gabriel and Michael, viz.: with the Raphael of the apocryphal book Tobit, or if he were degraded to the rank of a mere guardian angel over Egypt (Hitzig; see on v. 20). On the other hand, his authority would become too extensive, and his position too exalted, if he were conceived of as the mighty governor of all earthly nature, the Divinely appointed ruler and spiritual guide of the whole terrestrial world, thus assigning to him a sphere similar to that occupied by the demiurge of the Gnostics, or the "earth-spirit" of Goethe in his prologue to Faust, or to that given by the ingenious natural philosopher, Max Perty (in his work über die mystischen Erscheinungen der menschlichen Natur, 1862), to the goodamon, the regent of our planet, who is regarded as the spiritual principle that presides over the earth, the human race, and the development of both. To assume such an earth-spirit, which is neither Scriptural nor natural, and which has no support even in the magical and mystical phenomena of human life (cf. the thorough criticism of this hypothesis in L. Giesebrecht's lecture on Das Wunder in der deutschen Geschichtsbeschreibung neuerer Zeit, Stettin, 1898, p. 10 et seq.), would be to disregard the tenor of this section, as certainly as it characterizes the angel as being decidedly supernatural, and at the same time (in v. 5 et seq.) endows him with external attributes of his rank such as would be but poorly adapted to the position and functions of a telluric planetary spirit. —Accordingly, if any particular explanation whatever of the nature and office of this angel is to be attempted, the opinion of Hofmann which was noticed above, on v. 5, is to be decidedly preferred to all others (Weissagung und Erfüllung, I. 312 et seq.; Schriftbeweis, I. 287 et seq.). That opinion has also been adopted by Auberlen (Daniel, etc., p. 67), Füller, Baumgarten, Luthardt, Riggenbach (on 2 Thess. ii. 6), and others. It assumes that the angel in question represents "the good spirit of the heathen world-power," while the "princes" of Persia and Javan opposed by him and Michael, represent the evil principle which is hostile to God, and which manifests itself in the development of the heathen world-power. The former is that "power in nature which operates in favor of God's kingdom throughout the heathen world," the "good spirit, which is to promote in the heathen world the realization of God's purpose of salvation;" the latter are powers opposed to God, who seek to cross and neutralize the plans of God and of the good angel, which aim at the salvation of the world. The former is the restraining principle (τὸ κατέχον, 2 Thess., i. c.) which restrains and prevents the ascendancy and prevalence of the height of Satanic wickedness in human history; the latter, on the contrary, endeavor to hinder and retard the progress of the kingdom of God. We regard this view as harmonizing well with the contents of the chapter before us, and can permit a partial departure from it only in so far as (1) we must consider it doubtful whether St. Paul intended to definitely and consciously allude precisely to the angel here described by the word κατέχον or κατέχων; (2) so far as we regard the conflict of the angel with those foes as an actual warfare in the invisible regions of the spirit-world, and not as a mere supplanting in the favor of the king and his court, because of the termini belli employed in vs. 13 and 20 et seq.; (3) so far as we are compelled to regard the foes against whom the angel contended, as being the actual spiritual protectors of the world-kingdoms in question, and as dæmonic powers or Satanic angels, who have entered on a permanent connection with the kingdoms over which they rule, in consequence of which they stand or fall with them (cf. on v. 13). The idea of guardian angels, or, more exactly, the idea of certain dæmonic spiritual beings (ἄγγελοι Σατάν, 2 Cor. xii. 7) as being at the head of the antitheistic world-monarchies and as fundamentally opposed to Michael, the prince of the theocracy, is not only countenanced by the leading authorities of the older exegetical tradition (Luther, Melancthon, Calov, Geier, C. B. Michaelis, Starke, and in substance also Jerome, Theodoret, and the older Roman Catholic expositors, excepting that they mistake the Satanic evil character of the "princes" of Persia, etc., to a greater or less extent), but it is likewise based on all the passages in both the Old and New-Test. Scriptures, which represent the gods of the heathen world as demons, and consequently, the heathen lands or states over which they rule and exercise spiritual authority as being provinces of the kingdom of darkness (cf. the expositors of 1 Cor. viii. 6; x. 20 et seq., especially Kling, vol. 7 of the New-Test. part of the Bible-work).*

2. This estimate of the contents of the chapter does not affect its credibility, nor does it oblige us to conclude that the section originated at the hands of a pseudo-Daniel in the Maccabæan age. Füller's remarks on these points, p. 272 et seq., are especially pertinent. We transfer to this place an epitome of this author's apology for the doctrine of angels, as contained in this section, although it is connected with views that diverge somewhat from ours, and that especially contain no correct estimate of the idea of guardian angels: "This is the meaning of our text. Shall we consider it a rabbinical idea and a Jewish fable? I cannot even find that it is entirely foreign to our modern conceptions. Do we not frequently speak of the spirit that reigns in the influential circles of a court? Is it not well understood that propositions which conflict with that spirit have no prospect of being approved, unless the prevailing spirit should be superseded by a different one? That is exactly what the text affirms—although certainly with a difference; for our age speaks of spirit without understanding a personal spiritual being by that term. 'Spirit' is a current word in its mouth, but it becomes embarrassed when asked how it conceives of spirit. As God, in the consciousness of modern times, has taken

refuge in the guise of a universal spirit, of which it may be affirmed that it is, and that it is not, with equal propriety, so the spirits are involved in a similar predicament; they have dissolved into vapor. The Scriptures, however, teach a different doctrine. They have and know a personal God and personal spirits, and teach that the latter include some who do the will of God, while others resist it. If we assume accordingly that such spirits exist, it will not surprise any mind that they should be active and influential (cf. Gen. xxxii. 1 et seq.; 2 Kings vi. 17, etc.). . . . According to the Scriptures as a whole, the angels are the agents through whom God governs the world, and they are concerned in many things where we do not suspect their presence. The only new feature in the passage is that they are employed in influencing the decisions of the rulers of the world; but this is not surprising, since they are concerned to realize or prevent the Divine purposes. The world-power interferes in the fortunes of Israel; should God quietly look on while His will is counteracted? In such a case he opposes the evil spirit by His spirit, so that spirit combats against spirit," etc. —Auberlen expresses ideas exactly similar, p. 67: "The Holy Scriptures only ask of us that we should take in a real sense the language we are accustomed to employ in a figurative sense, respecting a conflict of the good and the evil spirit in man. Similar ideas prevail in 1 Sam. xvi. 13, 15; 1 Kings xxii. 22; the Satanic influences with which we become better acquainted through the words of Jesus and the apostles are nothing different in their nature. This does not argue that the freedom of human action is thereby destroyed; for the influence of spirits over the inner nature of man is not irresistible, and their principal attention may perhaps be given to the shaping of external circumstances. The question concerning the relation of the Divine government to the freedom of man does not become more difficult by the additional feature of the service of angels, but, on the contrary, becomes more intelligible."—Cf. also Blumhardt, Ueber die Lehre von den Engeln, in Vilmar's Pastoral-Theol. Blättern, 1865, I. p. 32: "If Christ is presented to us as he who shall reign until all his foes are made the footstool for his feet, his reigning is always realized through the means of angels who are sent forth, and over whom is placed a special angel, Michael being prominent among them; and the fact that so little is said respecting the persons of the warring angels, who must be regarded as constantly reappearing, produces in us the more positive and elevating impression, as it is always the same battle from the beginning and down to the consummation of God's kingdom, when he shall have put down all opposing rule, and all authority and power (1 Cor. xv. 24). In this light we learn to lose sight of the strangeness of a name also, e.g., that of Michael ('who is like God?'), and see that the names found in the Scriptures have not the slightest connection with the follies of the Jewish doctrine concerning angels, which includes extended registers of angels' names. But we also learn how easy it is, when the Word is carefully and thoroughly studied, to set aside the sneering objections of opponents, who judge everything superficially by its appearance, and are ready to throw it into the lumber-room of superstitions, if we only guard against being moved from our simplicity by the power of a worldly wisdom that overlooks the kernel of everything."

3. Nor does the chapter contain anything aside from the doctrine of angels that is not well adapted to the time of Daniel, and to the captive prophet Daniel as its author. This has already been shown with reference to several particulars. It only remains to call attention to the alleged "historical improbability" contained in v. 1, that Daniel did not return to the holy land with Zerubbabel and Joshua, as being a circumstance that on the contrary lends very little support to the Maccabean-tendency hypothesis. For while it is a sufficient explanation of that fact that the aged and esteemed prophet remained at Babylon for the special purpose of promoting the welfare of his compatriots and of the theocracy (see on that passage), it is certainly improbable that a writer of the Maccabean period, who should have invented this narrative in the interest of a tendency, would have left his hero in a strange land, among the many indifferent and apostate ones (cf. 1 Macc. i. 13 et seq.; xlv. 55), when a suitable opportunity was presented for his return, and while his own heart was animated with a glowing love for the "pleasant land" (עֲרֵב וְשֵׂכֶל, chap. viii. 9; xi. 16).—The zealous fasting of Daniel (v. 2 et seq.) serves as little as the circumstance above referred to, to render probable the composition of the chapter in the Maccabean age; for the prophet's fasting does not bear an ascetic and work-righteous character, such as was adapted to the spirit of the later Judaism, and especially to the Alexandrian Judaism, inasmuch as the cause of the gracious acceptance of the supplicant while yearning for deliverance, is shown by v. 12 to have been, not his fasting, but the fervent and persistent prayer which accompanied it. In this character of a mere accompaniment and outward sign of sorrow because of national and religious misfortune, fasting (together with related usages connected with mourning, e.g., abstaining from anointing, the wearing of sackcloth, sitting in ashes, etc.) was practised, long prior to the captivity, by the earliest representatives of the prophetic order, such as Elijah, Joel, Isaiah, etc. (cf. 1 Kings xvii. 6; xix. 4 et seq.; Joel i. 14; ii. 12; Isa. xx. 2 et seq.); so that the similar conduct of Daniel, which becomes additionally appropriate in view of its being connected with the occurrence of the feast of the Passover, does not seem remarkable or untimely in the least.—In opposition to Hitzig's assertion that the remarks of the angel in chap. x. 21; xi. 1, contain an allusion to the political relations of Egypt with Syria and Palestine in the Maccabean period, see supra, on these passages.

4. The homiletical treatment of the chapter will have regard primarily and principally to its angelological features. In this respect attention will naturally be directed less to the nature and employment of the angels brought to our notice than to their relation to the designs and modes of operation of the Divine providence which employs them as instruments in its service. The influence of God on the fortunes of the world-empires and the decisions of their rulers, as being exerted through the agency of angels, and as employing the power of the mighty princes of the spirit-world for the welfare of man—such will probably be the theme of a meditation on the contents of the section as a whole. In connection with this it will be proper to refer to passages like Psa. xxxiv. 3; ciii. 20 et seq.; Heb. i. 14, etc., and to illustrate and enforce them in their profound truth and comforting power, by the subject of this chapter.

Homiletical suggestions on particular passages:
On v. 1, Melancthon: "Nova visio exhibetur jam Daniel, non solum ut ipse et ceteri pii in hoc presenti periculo confortentur, sed etiam et posteritas præmonetur de præcipuis mutationibus imperiorum et de his calamitatibus, quæ Judæa impendebant. . . . Habes Ecclesæ imaginem, quam Deus vult et excoerci afflictionibus et fide expectare liberationem. Et cum liberat, tamen eventus non respondent nostris conjecturis. Cum Cyri beneficium impeditum esset, postea magis conspici potuit, a Deo gubernari hanc liberationem, cum tot impedimenta incidissent, quæ humanis consiliis tolli non poterant."

On v. 2, Jerome: "Secundum anagogen vero hoc dicendum est, quod qui in luctu est et sponsi fuget absentiam, non comedit panem desiderabilem, qui de caelo descendit, neque solidum capitis cibum, qui intelligitur in carne, nec bibit vinum, quod letificat cor hominis, nec exultat faciem in deo (Pa. civ. 15). Hoc autem jejuniis sponsa impetrabiles facit lacrimas, quando sponsus fuerit ablatus ab ea." etc.—Cramer: "To fast and prepare the body is indeed a proper external discipline, not to deserve something thereby, as the Papists do, but in order to a still better preparation: Matt. vi. 17 et seq."

On v. 4, Geier: "Iuxta hunc fluxum se fuisse dicit propheta, jejuniis hactenus maceratus precibusque vacans devotus, sine dubio, ut animum nonnihil recrearet hac loci jucundioris contemplatione, si quidem ad hujusmodi fluxuum ripas amant nonnunquam dantur colles, valles aut luci arboribus consiti, ubi undarum suaviter audiuntur susurri adeoque non exigua simul suppeditatur ansa recolendi beneficia tam creationis, quam conservationis redemptionis." etc. Cf. Psa. xxxvii. 1 et seq.; Ezek. i. 1 eto.

On v. 8 et seq., Calvin: "Deus non ideo terret suos, quoniam ipsum oblectet nostra perturbatio, sed quoniam id nobis utile est, quia scilicet numquam erimus idonei ad discendum, nisi carne nostra prorsus subacta. Hoc autem necesse fieri violento modo propter perviciam nobis ingentiam."—Starke: "Behold in this the goodness and friendliness of God, who not only knows how to terrify, but also causes the terrified ones to be comforted and strengthened!"

On v. 11, Theodoret: Καλεῖ αὐτὸν οὐ Βαλτασάρ, ἀλλὰ Δανιήλ· τὸ μὲν γὰρ ἦν Χαλδαῖον, τὸ δὲ Ἑβραίων ὄνομα· καὶ τὸ μὲν ὑπὸ εὐσεβῶν ἐτίθη, τὸ δὲ ὑπὸ δυσσεβῶν προσετίθη.—Starke: "It is difficult for a timid and sorrowful heart to appropriate to itself the Divine comfort; wherefore God sometimes calls them by name; cf. Acts x. 31."

On v. 13, Jerome (see supra, on that passage).—Melancthon: "Angelus pius narrat Danieli, se dimicasse cum principe Persarum, i. e., cum diabolo moliente dissipationes regni Persici. Etsi enim ignoramus, quomodo inter se pugnent boni et mali spiritus, tamen certamina esse non dubium est, sive disputatione flant, sive aliis modis. At ergo bonus Angelus repressum a se esse malum spiritum, qui Cambysen juvenem et aulicos impios incitabat, vel ad delendam gentem Judæicam, vel ad interficiendum Danielem, vel ad alias malas actiones tentandus, quæ novos motus in regno alaturus erant."—Auberlen, Blumhardt, Füller (see supra, No. 2).

On v. 15 et seq., Starke: "If needless terror and alarm can deprive a pious soul of his speech, is it a wonder that wicked persons shall be dumb when Christ addresses them with the words, Friend, how camest thou in hither, etc.? (Matt. xxii. 12).—If God does not first open our lips, either directly or indirectly, we shall be unable to speak what pleases Him (Rom. viii. 26; x. 15)."

On v. 20 et seq., Melancthon: "Hæc exempla ostendunt satis inquietam fuisse provinciam. Fuerunt igitur et angelorum certamina, qui malos spiritus, seditionum et discordiarum inflammatores depellebant."—Starke: "When one kingdom of the world has been destroyed, Satan will reign through another; and thus the church is compelled to contend constantly against the prince of this world, until all kingdoms shall belong to God and Christ.—The fact that the power of angels is limited appears from their requiring the assistance of others."

b. Detailed prophetic description of the Persian and Græcian world-kingdoms, and also of the kingdoms which should arise from the latter, together with their conflicts.

CHAP. XI. 2-45.

- 2 And now will I shew thee the truth. Behold, there shall stand up yet three kings in [to] Persia; and the fourth shall be far richer than they all: and by [according to] his strength through [by] his riches he shall stir up all [the whole] against [with] the realm of Græcia [kingdom of Javan].
- 3 And a mighty king [a king, a hero] shall stand up, that shall rule with great
- 4 dominion [rule], and do according to his will. And when he shall stand up, his kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided [partitioned] toward the four winds of heaven [the heavens]; and not to his posterity, nor according to his dominion [rule] which he ruled: for his kingdom shall be plucked up, even for [and given to] others besides those [these].

- 5 And the king of the south shall be strong, and [become] one of his princes; and he shall be strong above him, and have dominion [rule]; his dominion
- 6 [rule] shall be a great dominion [rule]. And in [to] the end of years they shall join [associate] themselves together; for [and] the king's daughter [daughter of the king] of the south shall come to the king of the north to make an agreement; but [and] she shall not retain the power of the arm; neither shall he stand, nor [and] his arm; but [and] she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that begat her, and he that strengthened her in these [the] times.
- 7 But [And] out of a branch [shoot] of her roots shall one stand up in his estate [basis, i.e., stead], which [and he] shall come with an army [to the force], and shall enter into [come in] the fortress of the king of the north, and shall deal
- 8 against [do with] them, and shall prevail [strengthen himself]; and shall also carry captives [cause to go in the captivity] into Egypt their gods, with their princes [anointed ones], and with their precious [prized] vessels of silver and of
- 9 gold; and he* shall continue [stand] more years than the king of the north. So the king of the south shall come into his kingdom [And he shall come into the kingdom of the king of the south], and shall return into his own land [ground].
- 10 But his sons shall be stirred up [strengthen themselves], and shall assemble a multitude of great forces: and one shall certainly come, and overflow, and pass through; then [and] shall he return, and be stirred up [or, they shall strengthen themselves], even to his [or, their] fortress. And the king of the south shall be moved with choler [become very bitter], and shall come forth and fight with him, even with the king of the north: and he shall set forth [cause to stand] a great multitude; but the multitude shall be given into his hand.
- 12 And when he hath taken away the multitude [or, the multitude shall be taken away], his heart shall be lifted up [or, raised up]; and he shall cast down [cause to fall] many ten thousands: but [and] he shall not be strengthened by it.
- 13 For [And] the king of the north shall return and shall set forth [cause to stand] a multitude greater than the former, and shall certainly come after certain [at the end of the times the] years with a great army [force] and with much
- 14 riches. And in those times there shall many stand up against the king of the south: also [and] the robbers [sons of tyrants] of thy people shall exalt themselves [be lifted up] to establish [cause to stand] the vision; but [and] they shall fall [be stumbled].
- 15 So [And] the king of the north shall come, and cast up [pour out] a mount [mound], and take [catch] the most fenced cities [city of defences]; and the arms of the south shall not withstand, neither [and, i.e., or] his chosen people
- 16 [the people of his choice], neither shall there be any strength to withstand. But [And] he that cometh against [to] him shall do according to his own will, and none shall stand before him; and he shall stand in the glorious land [land of comeliness], which [and] by his hand [he] shall be consumed. He shall also [And he shall] set his face to enter [come] with the strength of his whole kingdom, and upright *ones with him; thus [and] shall he do: and he shall give him the daughter of [the] women, corrupting [to corrupt, or, destroy] her; but
- 18 [and] she shall not stand on his side, neither [nor] be for him. After this [And] shall he turn his face unto the isles, and shall take [catch] many; but a prince [general] for his own behalf [his reproach] shall cause the reproach offered by him [for him] to cease; without his own reproach he shall cause it to turn upon
- 19 [to] him. Then [And] he shall turn his face toward the fort [fortresses] of his own land; but [and] he shall stumble [be stumbled] and fall, and not be found.
- 20 Then [And] shall stand up in his estate [on his basis, i.e., stead] a raiser of taxes in [one causing the exactor to pass through] the glory of the kingdom: but within few days [and in single days] he shall be destroyed [broken], neither [and not] in anger nor in battle.
- 21 And in his estate [on his basis, i.e., stead] shall stand up a vile [despised] person, to whom [and on him] they shall not give the honour of the kingdom: but [and] he shall come in peaceably [with tranquillity], and obtain [or, strengthen] the kingdom by flatteries. And with the arms of a [the] flood shall

- they be overflown from before him, and shall be broken; yea [and], also the prince of the covenant. And after the league made with [from the covenanting to] him he shall work deceitfully: for [and] he shall come up, and shall become strong with a small people. He shall enter [come] peaceably [with tranquillity] even upon [and with] the fattest places of the province; and he shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor [and] his fathers' fathers; he shall scatter among [to] them the prey, and spoil, and riches; yea, and he shall forecast [devise] his devices against the strong holds, even [and that] for [till] a time.
- 25 And he shall stir up his power and his courage [heart] against the king of the south with a great army [force]; and the king of the south shall be stirred up to [the] battle with a very great and mighty army [force]; but [and] he shall not stand: for they shall forecast [devise] devices against him. Yea [And], they that feed [eat] of the portion of his meat [dainty food] shall destroy [break] him, and his army [force] shall overflow; and many shall fall down slain. And both these kings' hearts [the kings, their heart] shall be to do mischief [wrong], and they shall speak lies [falsehood] at [over] one table; but it shall not prosper: for yet the end shall be at [to] the time appointed.
- 28 Then [And] shall he return into his land with great riches; and his heart shall be against the holy covenant; and he shall do exploits and return to his own land. At [To] the time appointed he shall return, and come toward [in] the south: but [and] it shall not be as the former, or [and] as the latter. For [And] the ships of Chittim shall come against [in] him; therefore [and] he shall be grieved [dejected], and return, and have indignation against the holy covenant; so [and] shall he do; he shall even [and he shall] return, and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant.
- 31 And arms shall stand on his part [from him], and they shall pollute the sanctuary of trength [the stronghold], and shall take [cause to turn] away the daily [continual] sacrifice, and they shall place [give] the abomination that maketh desolate. And such as do wickedly against [the wicked doers of] the covenant shall he corrupt [pollute] by flatteries: but [and] the people that do know their [its] God shall be strong, and do exploits. And they that understand among [the prudent of] the people shall instruct [understand for the] many; yet [and] they shall fall [be stumbled] by the sword, and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil, many days. Now [And] when they shall fall [be stumbled], they shall be holpen [helped] with a little help: but [and] many shall cleave [be joined] to them with flatteries. And some of them of understanding [the prudent] shall fall [be stumbled], to try [lit., smelt in] them, and to purge [purify], and to make them white, even to [till] the time of the end: because it is yet for a [to the] time appointed. And the king shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvellous [distinguished] things against the God of gods, and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished [fail]: for that that is determined shall be done.
- 37 Neither shall he regard [And he will not have understanding upon] the God of his fathers, nor [and upon] the desire of women, nor regard [and he will not have understanding upon] any god: for he shall magnify himself above all. But in His estate [And on his base, i.e., stead] shall he honour [give glory to] the god of forces [strongholds]; and [to] a god whom his fathers knew not shall he honour [give glory] with gold, and [with] silver, and with precious stones [stone], and pleasant things. Thus [And] shall he do in the most [fortresses of] strongholds with a strange god, whom he shall acknowledge and increase [increase to acknowledge] with glory: and he shall cause them to rule over [the] many, and shall divide the land for gain [distribute ground with a price].
- 40 And at [in] the time of the end shall the king of the south push at [wage war with] him: and the king of the north shall come against him like a whirlwind [will storm upon him], with chariots [chariot], and with horsemen [horses], and with many ships [boats]; and he shall enter [come] into the countries [lands], and shall overflow and pass over. He shall enter also [And he will come] into the glorious land [land of comeliness], and many countries shall be overthrown [stumbled]: but [and] these shall escape out of his hand, even Edom, and Moab, and the chief [first] of the children of Ammon. He shall stretch forth his hand also [And he shall send his hand] upon [in] the countries [lands]; and the land of Egypt shall not escape [be for an escaped one, i.e., exempt]. But [And] he shall have power [rule] over the treasures of gold and of silver, and over all the precious [pleasant] things of Egypt: and the Libyans and the Ethiopians shall be at [in] his steps. But [And] tidings out of the east and out of the north shall trouble him: therefore [and] he shall go forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly to make away [devote to extermination] many. And he shall plant the tabernacles [tents] of his palace [pavilion] between the seas in [at] the glorious holy mountain [holy mountain of comeliness]; yet [and] he shall come to his end, and none shall help him.

LEXICAL AND GRAMMATICAL NOTES.

[מִיִּשְׁרָרִים, literally equities, hence a compact as to what is agreed upon as right between the parties. It here seems to refer especially to the terms or provisos of the alliance, the marriage being one of the main conditions or considerations.² The pronoun is emphatic.—יִשְׁרָרִים, probably, like מִיִּשְׁרָרִים above, contains an allusion to the rights of a contract, and may therefore signify allies.]

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Verse 2. Touching upon the last kings of Persia in a hasty and summary review. And now will I show thee the truth. אֲנִי, see chap. x. 21.—Behold, there shall stand up yet three kings in Persia; i.e., doubtless, after the present king, hence after Cyrus (see chap. x. 1), there shall be three more kings of Persia,—the Persian state shall have three more kings. The author therefore assigns altogether four kings to Persia, from which, however, it by no means follows that he “knew” only that number; nor can it be shown from Ezra iv. 5, 7 that the writer of that book knew of four Persian kings (Hitzig, Ewald).^{*} The number four is rather to be regarded as a symbolic number, exactly like that of the wings and heads of the leopard in chap. vii. 6 (see on that passage), which indicates that the development of the kingdom in question is completed, and is, to that extent, parallel with the number of the world-monarchies and with other significant quadruples; cf. Eth.-fund principles, etc., on chap. ii. No. 3.†—And the fourth shall be far richer than they all; rather, “shall acquire greater riches,” etc. This fourth one does not denote the last of all the Persian kings, Darius Codomannus, but the fourth from the beginning (or, in other words, the third of the three just mentioned),^{*} and therefore Xerxes, as pseudo-Smerdis, is probably not included, and Cyrus, Cambyzes, and Darius Hystaspis are considered the first three. The characteristic noticed in this place applies well to Xerxes, as he became especially famous because of his immense riches (Herodotus, III. 96; IV. 27–29), and as his expedition into Greece obscured those of his father by the excessive greatness of his armament. The significance of this fourth member of the old Persian dynasty (whose identity with Xerxes was naturally not yet apprehended by the prophet [?], especially as the angel did not see fit to state his name) is that he represents, on the one hand, the acme of the development in power of the kingdom in question, and, on the other, the beginning of its dissolution.—And by his strength through his riches, or, “when he has become strong through his riches. יִכְדּוּקֵתוֹ, an infinitive (cf. 2 Chron. xii. 1; also infra, v. 4, and chap. viii. 8, 23), is not co-ordinated with the following בְּעֶזְרֵתוֹ, but is placed above it.—He shall stir up all against the realm of Græcia, i.e., “stake all.” מְכַל, properly, “the all,” i.e., all that has been mentioned, all the immense treasures and forces referred to. יָעִיר, properly, “shall excite, stir up,” does not allude so much to inanimate treasures as to the subjects of this king as being the objects of his exciting activity; cf. v. 25; Job xii. 2; Jer. i. 9.—אֶת מְלָכְהָא יָוָן is not properly “against the realm of Javan,” but “to the realm,” etc.; אֶת serves to introduce the accusative denoting the direction of the movement.—It accords fully with the position of the seer prior to Xerxes, that Greece (with regard to Javan, cf. on chap. viii. 21) should be represented as a kingdom. A Maccabæan writer, who might aim to sketch the history of that king, and of his expedition against the Greeks, would

^{*} [“Moreover, this assertion (that the O. T. only knows of four Persian kings) is not at all correct; for in Neh. xii. 22, besides those four, there is mention made also of a Darius, and to the Jews, in the age of the Maccabees there was well known, according to 1 Macc. i. 1, also the name of the last Persian king, Darius, who was put to death (defeated) by Alexander.”—Kell.]

† [This interpretation is altogether vague and unnecessary. The meaning obviously is not that there should thereafter be only four more Persian kings in all, but merely that the next three should bring down the history as far as the prophetic vision extended in this regard, i.e., down to the breaking out of the conflict between Persia and Greece. Thus “the three kings who shall yet (עֲדָה) arise are the three successors of Cyrus, viz., Cambyzes, the pseudo-Smerdis, and Darius Hystaspis: the fourth is then Xerxes, with whom all that is said regarding the fourth perfectly agrees. Thus Hävernick, Ebrard, Delitzsch, Auberlen, and Kliefoth interpret.”—Kell.] assuredly have known, and indicated, that at that time Javan was not yet a מְלִכָּה.

Verses 3, 4. *Alexander the Great and his immediate successors. And a mighty king shall stand up. מְלִכָּה גִּבּוֹר, a heroic, warlike king; cf. מְלִכָּה גִּבּוֹר, Isa. ix. 5, and also the symbolic description of Alexander's martial greatness in chap. viii. 5 et seq., 31. מַעֲמִיד, "he stands up," i.e., comes up and presents a warlike and threatening appearance; cf. vs. 4, 14, and also v. 1. — And do according to his will. Cf. chap. viii. 4 and infra, v. 16. The sovereign arbitrariness with which Alexander ruled all the persons of his time is likewise attested by Curtius, X. 5, 35: "Fortunam solus omnium mortalium in potestate habuit."—Verse 4. And when he shall stand up (rather, "when he has stood up"), his kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided toward the four winds of heaven. מְלִכָּהוֹ is probably to be closely connected with the idea presented by מַעֲמִיד in the preceding verse: "and when," or, "and as soon as he shall have stood up" (Von Lengerke, Füller, etc.); so that the brief duration of Alexander's reign is here indicated. Others, e.g., Hävernick, Kranichfeld, Ewald, etc., render it, "and when he shall stand in his power, when his power has reached its highest point" (Luther); but this view is questionable, because of the entirely too pregnant meaning which is thus attributed to מַעֲמִיד. Hitzig's assertion that מַעֲמִיד in this place is synonymous with the Syr. מַעֲמִיד, "to depart in death, to die," and that the following מְלִכָּה (with which cf. chap. viii. 8) is not passive in its signification, and therefore does not denote "to be broken," but "to break apart," must certainly be rejected.—On the phrase, "be divided toward the four winds of heaven," cf. the analogous symbolic description in chap. viii. 8.—And not to his posterity, namely, "shall it be divided;" they shall not be benefited by the division, but shall be entirely deprived of their patrimony, thus realizing a feature that was common in the early experience of the theocracy, 1 Sam. xv. 28; 2 Sam. iii. 10; 1 Kings xi. 11; xiv. 7-10; xv. 20; xvi. 8 et seq.; xxi. 21. It is well known that this actually was the case with Alexander's sons, Hercules (whose mother was Barsina, and who was murdered by Polysperchon) and Alexander (a filius posthumus, born of Roxana, and likewise murdered). Cf. Diodorus, XIX. 105; XX. 28; Pausan., IX. 7; Justin., XV. 2; Appian, Syr., O. 51.—Nor according to his dominion which he ruled, "shall the divided kingdom be;" on the contrary, it shall present a painful picture of impotence; cf. מְלִכָּה בְּכֹחַ in the parallel, chap. viii. 22.—For his kingdom shall be plucked up, even for others besides those. מְלִכָּהוֹ, to the exclusion of those, i.e., of the natural heirs and rightful successors of this ruler. Concerning the phrase, "to be torn out, uprooted," cf. on chap. iv. 12, 12; also Job xiv. 7 et seq.; Isa. vi. 10, etc.

Verses 5, 6. The first Seleucids and Lagids. While the prophetic description, upon the whole, has hitherto confined itself to general outlines, and has not materially deviated from the ordinary methods of prophecy, it begins at this point to assume a suspiciously specific character, which arouses the thought that later hands may have improved on the prophecy by interpolating various features of detail. The fact that only the two states, emanating from the great Græcian world-empire, which bordered immediately on the "pleasant land," are more carefully followed in their further development, is not, indeed, enough to arouse this suspicion, for the other kingdoms of the Diadochi might have been passed over as too unimportant in their relations with the theocracy. It was, moreover, to be expected that Israel should be alternately oppressed by a southern and a northern neighbor, in view of the similar parts taken in earlier prophecies by the Assyrio-Babylonian north on the one hand, and by Egypt in the south, on the other (cf., e.g., Isa. xxx. 6; xliii. 6; Jer. iii. 12, 18; vi. 22; xli. 20, 24; Zeph. ii. 13; Zech. x. 10, 11). But the manner in which the transactions between the two kingdoms, whether peaceful or hostile in their character, are described with regard to their changeful course, is too exact, and covers too extended a succession of reigns and events, to find even a remote parallel in any other part of the prophetic literature of the Old-Test. canon.* The unique character of the section in this respect was recognized at an early period, and has been made use of by the opponents of the authenticity and genuine prophetic dignity of the book (e.g., early by Porphyry), in order to attack its character, and has also been employed for apologetic purposes, in order to demonstrate the inspired character of the prophecy, and the astonishing exactness with which its predictions corresponded with the actual development of the dominion of the Seleucids and the Lagids. With this view it is employed by Luther in his preface to Daniel and in his exposition of chap. xii. (which begins, according to his opinion, with chap. xi. 36;—see vol. 41, pp. 252 et seq., 294 et seq.); by Venema, Commentarius ad Daniels cap. XI. 5-XII. 3 (Leovard., 1752); by Hengstenberg, Beitr., p. 173 et seq.; and, generally, by a majority of orthodox expositors in ancient and modern times. Cf. especially Ebrard, Die Offenb. Joh., p. 81 et seq., where a thorough

* ["From the conflict of Persia with Greece, the angel (ver. 8) passes immediately over to the founder of the Græcian (Macedonian) world-kingdom; for the prophecy proceeds not to the prediction of historical details, but mentions only the elements or factors which constitute the historical development. The expedition of Xerxes against Greece brings to the foreground the world-historical conflict between Persia and Greece, which led to the destruction of the Persian kingdom by Alexander the Great."—Kell.]

* [As we have already remarked, this peculiarity of detail does not argue a want of genuineness here. It is impossible to sever this portion from the preceding and following predictions, which present no such "suspicious" features, without making an irreparable hiatus in the prophecy as a whole. Indeed this very part constitutes the gist of the entire disclosure, for it is this alone that immediately and intimately concerns the theocracy. The unprecedented and unparalleled character of the Antiochian persecution, as a chapter in Jewish history, justifies the minuteness and earnestness of the portraiture. The rest of this prophecy is but introduction and sequel to this central delineation. The careful reader will note that Daniel does not give a syllabus of secular history, but only sketches the course of those collisions which should affect the religious status and relations of Israel. The character and conduct of the Antiochian antichrist could not be fully appreciated without a setting forth of these connections.]

illustration of the harmony between the contents of this section and the facts of history precedes the remark: "For that very reason—this is the internal design of the specializing prophecy, chap. xi.—the coming of the Macedonian tyrant is connected with the age of Daniel by an unbroken chain of the most particular events, that it might be thoroughly apparent that no interval for the coming of the Messiah and his rejection should intervene between the time of Daniel and that tyrant." But Ebrard himself does not seem to have remained permanently satisfied with this mode of justifying the remarkably specific character of the prophecy on the supposition of a higher plane of revelation; for, in his review of Fuller's commentary, he confesses that he "has not yet found any exposition of chap. xi. that was entirely satisfactory" (p. 267).—We shall attend specially to Kranichfeld's view in the following exposition of the several passages. He likewise contends for the genuine character of the section throughout, but on the frequently forced assumption that the modern exegesis applies what was indefinite and merely ideal in the mind of the prophet to the facts of history in the corresponding period in far too pointed a manner.—And the king of the south shall be (or "become") strong, i.e., the ruler to whom the south, or Egypt, has fallen; cf. v. 8, where the south is expressly designated as מִצְרַיִם; also the Sept. on this passage, and Zech. vi. 8.—And one of his princes; and he shall be strong above him; rather, "but one of his princes—he shall be strong above him." With regard to the partitive בֶּן שְׁרָר in בֶּן שְׁרָר, cf. Gen. xxviii. 11; Ex. vi. 26; Neh. xiii. 28. The subject, "one of his princes," occupies a detached position at the beginning (cf. Ezek. xxxiv. 19); the copula, however, restores the connection: "(so far as he is concerned) he shall still be stronger."—Others (Luther, etc., Bertholdt, Rosenm., Kranichfeld, Fuller, etc.) regard the בֶּן שְׁרָר as the definite "and indeed, namely," and refer the suffix to the subject of the preceding verse: "and the king of the south, namely one of his (Alexander's) princes, shall become strong." This, however, is opposed by the lack of a definite subject of בֶּן שְׁרָר in that case, and by the unanimous authority of the ancient versions, which regard this second בֶּן שְׁרָר as the predicate of בֶּן שְׁרָר, despite the Altnach. Consequently, the event to which the passage alludes is the founding of the dynasty of the Seleucidae in the year B.C. 312, by Seleucus Nicator, the general of Ptolemy Lagus (Diodorus, XIX. 55, 58; Appian, Syr., C. 52),* who extended his dominion from Phrygia to the Indus, and thus greatly exceeded his former lord in power, approaching to the position of power and greatness occupied by Alexander himself more nearly than any other of the Diadochi (Appian, Syr., 55; Arrian, Anab., VII. 22. 9).—And (shall) have dominion; his dominion shall be a great dominion. בֶּן שְׁרָר is the predicate, followed by the subject in regular order. The whole clause, however, is logically subordinated to וַיִּמְשָׁל; cf. Gen. xii. 8.—Verse 6. And in the end of years they shall join themselves together. וַיִּבְרְכּוּ, "and after the lapse of several years," cf. 2 Chron. xviii. 2; also infra, vs. 8 and 13. The subjects of the sentence are the kings of the northern and of the southern kingdoms, and the alliance referred to is the marriage of Antiochus II. Theos (the son and successor of Antiochus I. Soter, who had followed Seleucus Nicator upon the throne of the Seleucidae as its second possessor, B.C. 281–261, but who is wholly unnoticed in this prophecy) with Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus (280–247), the second of the line of Ptolemies. Antiochus was obliged, on that occasion, to banish Lodeia, his former wife and half-sister, and to disinherit the children she had borne to him (Appian, Syr., C. 55; cf. Jerome on this passage). It is impossible to doubt that this event is referred to in this place, in view of what follows, and Kranichfeld therefore wastes his labor when he observes, with reference to וַיִּבְרְכּוּ, and with an apologetic aim, that "it is an interpolation to assume that Daniel here intended precisely a king of Syria."—To make an agreement; properly, "to make a straightening, to establish a just and peaceful condition." Cf. וַיִּשְׁרַר, v. 17, and the corresponding δικαια, 1 Macc. vii. 12.—But she shall not retain the power of the arm; neither shall he stand, nor his arm; i.e., probably, neither her arm nor his, which had strengthened themselves by that union, shall be able to retain the power thus acquired; * their union shall again be dissolved, and the political alliance, with its strengthening influence upon both kingdoms, shall thus be set aside. It seems unnecessary, upon this view, to adopt Hitzig's emendation, וַיִּבְרְכּוּ ("his [i.e., the arm of Berenice] arms shall not stand," which is held to be equivalent to "her father as well as her consort, who were hitherto her protectors, shall forsake her), and also Kranichfeld's rendering of וַיִּבְרְכּוּ in the sense of host, in support of which vs. 15, 23, and 31 may indeed be adduced, but this is decidedly opposed by the context, which treats solely of an intermarriage and its immediate consequences, and not at all of warlike events. It is likewise arbitrary to take וַיִּבְרְכּוּ in the sense of "support, protector," with Hävernick, Von Lengerke, etc., and accordingly to find the assistance to be derived by Berenice from Egypt referred to in the former half of the sentence, and in the latter half the aid rendered to her husband by Berenice herself. "Arm" is intended in each case to simply denote the physical or political power of the respective royal personages, and consequently, in the first instance, that of the Egyptian princess, and in the next that of her consort.—But she shall be given up and they that brought her, and he that begat her, and he that strengthened her in these times; or, "he that begat her and he that led her away in the times." בְּיָמֶיהָ, "they that brought her," denotes either the "begetter" who is mentioned immediately afterward, and the one that "led her home," hence her father and her husband (Hävernick, Füller, etc.), or the company of her followers, her train when she left Egypt (Ewald), [or "who brought her into the marriage" (Keil)]. The word is hardly to be taken, with Hitzig, as a categorical plural, and thus to be limited to the husband. מְחַלְסֵהָ properly signifies "he that holds her, that obtains possession of her," i.e., her consort (thus correctly Von Lengerke and Hävernick, while Hitzig, Kranichfeld, [Keil], etc., contend for the rendering of מְחַלְסֵהָ by "maintaining or supporting," which is too artificial).—בְּיָמֶיהָ, "in the times," is an idiom signifying "at that time," i.e., when his critical situation obliged him to marry her. וְהָיָה, "she shall be given up, be given over to ruin, overthrown (in perniciem traditur)," is a very general expression that does not necessarily imply death by violence; cf. Isa. v. 12; also infra, v. 11.—The historical commentary on the latter half of this verse is as follows: As soon as Ptolemy Philadelphus had died in B.C. 247, Antiochus Theos expelled Berenice, and recalled the formerly rejected Laodice. The latter, however, aimed at farther revenge, and to achieve it she poisoned the king, had her son by him, Seleucus II. Callinicus, declared his successor, and sent assassins against Berenice, who had fled to the sanctuary of Daphne. The latter queen was slain, together with her little son, and the hope of the Ptolemies to behold one of their lineage on the throne of the Seleucids was thus wholly destroyed. Cf. Polyæn., VIII. 50; Justin., XXVII. 1; Appian, l. c.—Kranichfeld vainly attempts to shake the evident correspondence of this series of facts with the language of the passage by regarding מְחַלְסֵהָ as denoting a violent death, and consequently as not harmonizing with the natural death of Ptolemy Philadelphus.* He farther translates וְהָיָה in the sense of "host," and attributes to מְחַלְסֵהָ the questionable meaning, "the promoters of her marriage" (the "furtherers of the whole Delilah-like match"), by all of which he obviously becomes liable to the charge of arbitrary "interpolation," to a far greater degree than the opponents whom he accuses of that crime because they frankly recognize the reference to those events.

* [Keil somewhat extends this objection: "The prophecy differs from the historical facts, not merely in regard to the consequences of the events, but also in regard to the matter itself; for it speaks not only of the daughter but also of her father, being given up to death, while the natural death of her father is in no way connected with that marriage, and not till after his death did the consequences fatal to his daughter and her child develop themselves." Such niceties of verification in a prophecy so concise and incidental we may safely leave to the candor of the reader.]

Verses 7-9. Ptolemy Evergetes and Seleucus Callinicus. But out of a branch of her roots shall one stand up in his place (marg.). The participle וְהָיָה, as in v. 5. וְהָיָה, "the sprouting of her roots" (cf. Isa. xi. 1) signifies the lineage, the immediate ancestry of Berenice; the person referred to was consequently the son of her parents and her own brother, viz.: Ptolemy III. Evergetes, the successor of Ptolemy Philadelphus, B.C. 247-221. וְהָיָה, an accusative of the direction (cf. v. 2. at the end); in vs. 20, 21, it is replaced by a definite וְהָיָה.—Which (or "and he") shall come with an (rather, "against the") army, and shall enter into the fortress of the king of the north וְהָיָה signifies neither, "he shall come to his host" (Hitzig), nor "he shall come to power" (Hävernick); the former rendering is as forced as the latter is contrary to the language (owing to the missing article). וְהָיָה is rather equivalent to against, and the "host" is that of the northern king. The "coming into his fortress" which follows, designates the result of the expedition as a whole, the taking of the northern king's fortress by the king of the south. It must, however, remain undecided whether this "fortress" denotes specially the strongly fortified maritime city of Seleucia (as Hitzig thinks). It is more probable that וְהָיָה is used collectively (cf. v. 19), and that therefore וְהָיָה does not denote the entering into the fortresses, but only the arrival before them.—And shall deal (or "execute it") against them and prevail. "Against them" refers to the subjects of the northern kingdom, not to the fortresses. With regard to וְהָיָה, "to do to, or against one," namely, according to pleasure, cf. Jer. xviii. 28; also the more definite וְהָיָה, vs. 3, 36; chap. viii. 4. Concerning the magnificent success achieved by Ptolemy Evergetes during his expedition against Syria (the conquest of almost the entire Syrian realm from Cilicia to beyond the Tigris, the taking of numerous fortresses, and the slaying of Laodice, the rival and murderess of his sister Berenice) cf. Appian, Syr., C. 65; Justin., XXVII. 1; Jerome on the passage.—Verse 8. And shall also carry captive into Egypt their gods, with their princes (rather "molten images"), etc. The suffix in וְהָיָה and also in וְהָיָה refers to the inhabitants of Syria, the same to whom וְהָיָה in the preceding verse referred. וְהָיָה does not signify "princes" in this passage (as it does, e.g., in Josh. xiii. 21; Ezek. xxxii. 30), but "molten images, cast images, brazen statues;" and consequently וְהָיָה is employed in the sense which is more generally denoted by וְהָיָה (Isa. xli. 29; xlviii. 5) or וְהָיָה (Ex. xxxii. 4, 8; xxxiv. 17, etc.). The express mention of the molten images besides the gods arises from the fact that the existence of the latter is made wholly dependent on the former. The transportation of the idols in itself is the significant evidence of the total subjugation of an opposing kingdom (cf. Isa. xli. 1, 2; Jer. xlviii. 7; xlix. 3; Hos. x. 5 et seq.); and likewise the removal of the "precious vessels of silver and gold" which is afterward noticed (חֶסֶד, כֶּסֶף, genit. materia, depending on the immediately preceding gen. qualitatis, חֶסֶד, cf. Nah. ii. 10; Jer. xxvii. 18 et seq.; Ezek. vii. 19 et seq.; Zeph. i. 18; Dan. i. 2.—The historical event which corresponds to this was the return of Ptolemy Evergetes to Egypt, occasioned by a revolt, when he carried away from Syria a booty of 4,000 talents of gold, numerous jewels, and 2,500 idol-statues, the latter including among their number those which Cambyzes had formerly transported to Persia. It was the restoration of these that secured to this third Ptolemy the name of Euergetes. Cf. Jerome on the passage, and the Marmor Adulitanum, the monument erected by the victor in commemoration of his deeds, which boasts that he had united Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Persia, Susiana, Media, and all the countries as far as Bactria, under his sceptre. In view of this exact correspondence of our passage to the facts of history, which, it is alleged, occurred subsequently to the composition of the prophecy, the suspicion that the oracle was conformed to the history appears to be only too well founded, especially as Egypt (מִצְרַיִם) is expressly mentioned as the goal of the magnificent triumphal march.* The predictions by other prophets relating to expeditions that secured great booty and that captured immense numbers of idol-images, e.g., those of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Nahum, Ezekiel, etc., in the passages cited above, are always associated with very different surroundings, and present fewer circumstances of detail to be particularly fulfilled.† For this reason it cannot be admitted that the neglect to mention the death of Laodice forms a proof of the undimmed originality of the prophecy (against Kranichfeld).—And he shall continue more years than the king of the north; rather, "and shall abstain from the king of the north (several) years," i.e., shall refrain from waging war against him, shall leave him in peace. Thus Hävernicks, Von Lengerke, Maurer, Hitzig, etc., correctly render the sense. On the other hand, Syr., Vulg., Luther, Kranichfeld, Füller, etc., render: "and for years he shall maintain himself before the king of the north," i.e., preserve his superiority over him, prævalebit adversus regem Aquilonis (Vulg.). This interpretation is opposed by the usage of כָּן in the sense of "to cease, abstain from something," which occurs elsewhere also; cf. Gen. xxix. 35; xxx. 9; 2 Kings iv. 6; xiii. 18.‡—

* [Surely the exact agreement of prophecy with history ought not to be an objection with any except those who deny the possibility of prediction at all. At other times the lack of this agreement is made by the author the ground of the same objection.]

† [This argument resolves itself simply into the conceded fact that the prophecy in question is unusually specific. But what of that? Was not the Spirit of revelation competent to impart particulars, if need be? The author's reasoning is purely of a piece with the presumptions of rationalism.]

‡ [Kell likewise, though he admits that כָּן might well bear the sense of abstaining from, yet adduces

Verse 9. So the king of the south shall come into his kingdom; rather, "and he shall (now) come into the kingdom of the king of the south." The subject obviously is the northern king, who was mentioned at the close of the preceding verse, for מִלְכָּה הַצָּפוֹן is clearly a genitive depending on מִלְכָּה הַצָּפוֹן (against Kranichfeld).—And shall return unto his own land, i.e., to the northern kingdom, to Syria. The reference to the expedition against Egypt by sea (with a fleet that was soon destroyed in a storm) and also by land, which Seleucus Callinicus undertook about B.C. 240, or two years after the departure of Ptolemy Evergetes from Syria, but which resulted in his total defeat and hasty flight, is sufficiently obvious; cf. Euseb., Chron., I. 346; Justin., XXVII. 2.

Verses 10–12. Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus the Great against Ptolemy IV. Philopater. But his sons shall be stirred up (or "prepare for war") and shall assemble a multitude of great forces. If the Keri מִלְכָּה is to be followed, it is unquestionable that the suffix of this plural refers back to the last named Syrian king Seleucus II. Callinicus, and that his two sons, Seleucus III. Ceraunus (B.C. 227–224) and Antiochus III. the Great (224–187), are intended. It is reported concerning the latter, although only by the somewhat credulous and hasty Jerome (on the passage), that, in connection with his younger brother, Antiochus, he made war on Egypt; but it is hardly possible that he should have attempted a war against Ptolemy Evergetes, who lived and reigned until B.C. 221, three years beyond the reign of Ceraunus. But the writer does not probably intend to assert by מִלְכָּה that the warlike expedition undertaken by the brothers was primarily and directly aimed against Egypt. The verb is rather used in a comprehensive sense, so as to cover the campaign of Seleucus Ceraunus (in which he met his death, B.C. 224) against Attalus of Pergamus, and also that commenced several years afterward by Antiochus Magnus, which was directed against the indolent Ptolemy IV. Philopater of Egypt; cf. Polyb., IV. 48; Appian, Syr., C. 66 (Hävernicks, Von Lengerke, Maurer, Hitzig, Füller, etc., are substantially correct). This counteracts the attempt of Venema, Bertholdt, and Kranichfeld to read מִלְכָּה with the Kethib, and to understand Ptolemy Philopater, the son of Evergetes, by this "son," by proving it to be superfluous, and, moreover, to be conflicting with the plural מִלְכָּה *—And (one) shall certainly come, overflow, and pass plausible reasons from the context in favor of the sense to stand before. It is difficult, however, to see how this signification can be legitimately extracted from the words.]

* [The author's remarks sufficiently meet the objection of Kell that "the announcement of the war of his (Callinicus) sons with many hosts overflowing the land is not confirmed by history;" but to make all clear we add the following from Stuart: "The sons of Seleucus Callinicus were Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus Magnus. The former of these two began the war against Egypt, in Asia Minor, where Egypt had tributary or allied provinces. He perished in the contest there. Antiochus Magnus then led on his army toward Egypt; and hence מִלְכָּה in the singular. The infin. being after the definite verb denotes the continued advance of the army under Antiochus."] through (or "inundate"). וְיָבֹא בָּוָא, a strong description of the protracted but irresistible advance, followed by a portrayal of the overflowing masses of warriors that recalls the similar description in Isa. viii. 8. Beginning with this point, the subject is singular, denoting Antiochus the Great alone, who became king of Syria after the death of his brother Seleucus III., and after that of Ptolemy Evergetes became the terrible and victorious foe of Egypt, whose luxurious and cowardly king, Ptolemy Philopater, quietly permitted him to take the fortress of Seleucia on the Orontes, to capture Tyre and Ptolemais through the treachery of Theodotus, and finally to besiege the fortress of Dora during a protracted period, while entering into a four months' truce with him in connection with that siege (Polyb., V. 45-86).—Then shall he return, and be stirred up (or, "and they wage war"), even to his fortress. וְיָבֹא can in no case designate the return of Antiochus to Seleucia on the Orontes, after concluding the truce above referred to, in order to go into winter quarters at that place (Polyb., V. 66), but rather, as appears from the verb. bellium וְיָבֹא (as it must be read with the Kethib, instead of וְיָבֹא, as the Keri prefers) which immediately follows, it denotes a renewal of his operations against the Egyptians in the spring of 218, in the course of which he surrounded the Egyptians in the strong city of Sidon, to which they had advanced, conquered all Phœnicia and Palestine, and finally established himself in Gaza (Polyb., V. 68-80). וְיָבֹא (as it should be read, or even וְיָבֹא, with the Keri, but not וְיָבֹא, as Kranichfeld desires), "his fortress," doubtless refers to the great and exceedingly strong city of Gaza, so that its suffix points back to the king of the north, the subject of וְיָבֹא. It is arbitrary, however, to assume a designed assimilation in sound between וְיָבֹא and וְיָבֹא, as do Venema and Hitzig. —Verse 11. And the king of the south shall be moved with choler, etc. On וְיָבֹא cf. chap. viii. 7. The king of the south who is "moved with choler" is Ptolemy Philopater, and his "coming forth," as here described, denotes his moving to attack Antiochus the Great in the year 217, with 70,000 foot, 5,000 horse, and 73 elephants (Polyb., V. 79).—And he shall set forth a great multitude; but (rather, "and") the multitude shall be given into his hand. The southern king is the subject here likewise, whose success, as based on the support of a great army, is described in this and the following verse (not the king of the north, as Kranichfeld supposes). וְיָבֹא designates the great host before described, at whose head the aroused Egyptian king goes forth, and וְיָבֹא the host, of nearly equal strength (62,000 foot, 6,000 horse, and 103 elephants) with which the Syrian opposed him. Hitzig arbitrarily assumes that instead of וְיָבֹא we should read וְיָבֹא; so that the sense would be, "and he (Ptolemy Philopater) gave the great multitude into his own hand."—Verse 12.

And when he hath taken away the multitude, his heart shall be lifted up; rather, "and the multitude shall rise up (or "lift itself up"), and his courage (or "heart") increase." The "multitude" denotes the powerful host of the Egyptians (= וְיָבֹא, v. 11) which is now advancing; * "his courage" (וְיָבֹא) is the courage of the hitherto cowardly, dissipated, and lustful Ptolemy Philopater (cf. 2 Kings xiv. 10). The Kethib וְיָבֹא is probably to be retained, instead of replacing it by the Keri וְיָבֹא, which is simply an easier reading. וְיָבֹא is spoken of a warlike "rising up" to battle, as in Isa. xxxiii. 10.—And he shall cast down ten thousands ("myriads"). This occurred near Raphia (southwest of Gaza), where Ptolemy Philopater inflicted a heavy defeat on Antiochus the Great, in which the Syrians lost in killed 10,000 foot, 300 horse, and five elephants, and more than 4,000 prisoners (Polyb., V. 86).—But he shall not be strengthened by it; or, "but yet he shall not become strong," i.e., inasmuch as he followed up his victory very negligently (see Justin., XXX. 1: "Spoliasset regem Antiochum, et fortunam virtute juvasset;" cf. Polyb., V. 87), and immediately returned to Egypt after garrisoning the cities that had formerly been lost, in order to resume his former dissipated life. The Vulgate, "sed non pravelebit," is incorrect.

Verses 13, 14. Farther description of the warlike deeds of Antiochus Magnus. For the king of the north shall return, and set forth (rather "shall again set forth") a multitude, greater than the former. This new adventure falls fully thirteen years after the defeat of Antiochus near Raphia. Not until he had carried on fortunate wars during an extended period against the Parthians, the Bactrians, and even to the borders of India, and until he had likewise conquered Asia Minor and the Thracian Chersonnesus, did he turn his arms against Egypt in B.C. 203, where Ptolemy Philopater had recently died and left the throne to his son Epiphanes, a child of five years, who was placed under the guardianship of the voluptuous and cruel Agathocles. In league with Philip of Macedon, who concluded a formal treaty for the division of the Egyptian empire with him, he advanced toward Egypt at the head of the immense army which he had formed while engaged in his protracted eastern wars, and which he had especially strengthened by the addition of a great number of Indian elephants, and succeeded in depriving it again of Phœnicia and southern Syria; see Justin., XXX. 2; XXXI. 1; Polyb., XV. 20; Jerome, on this passage.—And shall certainly come after certain years; rather, "and toward the end of times he shall come (repeatedly) during a period of years." The "times" at whose end his annually repeated coming shall begin (וְיָבֹא, during several years, as in v. 8 b) are the thirteen years between the battle near Raphia and the death of Ptolemy Philopater (B.C. 217-204). — With a great army and with much riches (rather, "equipment"). In connection with this equipment we are probably to conceive of the rich treasures secured in past wars, in addition to the Indian elephants. — And in those times there shall many stand up against the king of the south. Insurrections occurred in upper Egypt as early as the first year of the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes, occasioned by the bad administration and the cruelty of his guardian Agathocles; and these were followed in subsequent years by renewed insurrections, the revolt of subjugated countries, etc. Before his eighth year had expired, the king was obliged to conquer Lycopolis, a stronghold of the rebels (see Corp. inscr., III. 339: Inscr. of Rosetta, 20, 26, 28; Jerome, on the passage). — Also the robbers of thy people shall exalt themselves; rather, "and criminal sons of thy people shall revolt." The literal reading is, "and sons of the ravenous ones, of the oppressors of thy people." יִרְיָצִים denotes persons who overturn the law and justice (cf. Psa. xvii. 4; Ezek. vii. 22; xviii. 10; Isa. xxxv. 9), hence violent persons, robbers. With regard to the occurrence of two stat. constr. in immediate succession (יִרְיָצִים יִרְיָצִים), which must not be strained so as to denote robbers' sons, robbers by birth (Füller), cf. the examples collected by Ewald (Lehrb., § 289 c.). The oracle refers to the league against Egypt, into which a large number of Jews entered with Antiochus the Great, and to their participation in his warlike operations against that country, a.g., in his attacks on the garrison which the Egyptian general Scopas had left in the citadel of Jerusalem (Josephus, Ant., XII. 8, 3). The theocratic writer sternly condemns this partial revolt to the Syrians as a criminal course or as common robbery, because of the many benefits conferred on the Jewish nation by the earlier Ptolemies. — To establish the vision (rather, "visions"), namely, the visions respecting the afflictions of the Jews under Ant. Epiphanes already recorded in chap. viii. and ix., which could appropriately be regarded as a consequence or punishment of the revolt from the Egyptians as here described. וְיִרְיָצִים is used collectively in this passage, in the sense of "what there is of prophecy, such visions as exist." — But they shall fall. יִפְּלוּ does not probably denote stumbling or falling in a moral point of view (Hävernicks, etc.), but to be unfortunate in war, to be oppressed politically and religiously, etc. The special event referred to, whether a punishment imposed by Scopas, in the shape of taking away various nobles as hostages (cf. Polyb., XVI. 39; Josephus, Ant., XII. 8, 4), or otherwise, must remain undetermined. It is not to be denied that at any rate this particular passage presents a somewhat considerable discrepancy between the prophetic text of the section and the corresponding historical events; cf. Kranichfeld on the passage, p. 368.*

* [Kell, however, somewhat arbitrarily declares that "וְיָבֹא, with the article, can only be the host of the king of the north." He contends that "the meaning is this: 'As the multitude rises up, so his heart is lifted up.'"]

* [It certainly may with justice "be denied that there is here such a discrepancy." There is, indeed, some indistinctness, owing chiefly to our inability to determine the exact application of the term "fall" here. It is clear, however,

Verses 15-19. Last wars and death of Antiochus Magnus. So (rather, "and") the king of the north shall come, and cast up a mount, and take the most fenced cities; rather, "a strongly fortified city." The reference is probably to the siege and ultimate capture of Sidon, into which "city of fortifications" (יְרֵיר קִבְּצִירֹה), cf. Ewald, § 177 c) the Egyptian leader Scopas had thrown himself after suffering a severe defeat at the hands of Antiochus at Paneas, near the sources of the Jordan, which reduced his army to 10,000 men (B.C. 198). While Antiochus was carrying on a war in Asia Minor against Attalus in the preceding year, Scopas had again brought Coele-Syria under the dominion of Egypt; but in consequence of that terrible defeat he was deprived not only of that province, but also of the whole of Palestine as far as Gaza by the Syrian king. After enduring a protracted siege in Sidon, in the course of which an Egyptian army under Eropus, Menocles, and Damoxenus had vainly attempted to extricate him, he was compelled by hunger to surrender himself into the victor's hands (Polyb., XXVIII. 1; Livy, XXXIII. 19; Josephus and Jerome, l. c.). The text, consequently, does not expressly notice the repeated advance of the Egyptians and the great battle near Paneas, but contents itself with referring to the final results of this new war, viz.: the capitulation of the remaining Egyptian troops in Sidon. The idea that יְרֵיר קִבְּצִירֹה is used collectively (Theodot., Syr., Vulg., Kranichfeld) must be rejected, because this event is so obviously referred to as appears especially from the second half of the verse. — And the arms of the south shall not withstand, etc.; an allusion to the unsuccessful nature of the attempt made by the three Egyptian leaders to come to the assistance of the besieged Scopas. זְרֵאוֹת is evidently used in the sense of military forces (arms = army), hence not as in v. 6; on the other hand, cf. v. 22 and 31. — Verse 16: But he that cometh against him shall do according to his own will; i.e., Antiochus, the victor of Paneas and conqueror of Sidon, who now subjugated the whole of Palestine (the "pleasant land" or "land of beauty," — cf. on chap. viii. 9). — Which by his hand shall be consumed; rather, "and destruction is in his hand." יִהְיֶה בְּיָדוֹ, as in Isa. x. 32; cf. xliv. 20; Job xi. 14. If there were no other reason, these parallels would be sufficient to show that יִהְיֶה בְּיָדוֹ cannot here denote "to consummate" (Luther), nor yet "completeness or totality," which would result in the meaning, "and it is wholly in his hand," i.e., the glorious land (Hävern., Von Leng., van Ees, Füller, etc.; also Bertholdt and Dereser, who that it indicates a failure of their expectations; and of this, in the case of the apostate Jews referred to, history affords sufficient confirmation. "The apostasy of one party among the Jews from the law of their fathers, and their adoption of heathen customs contributed to bring about that oppression with which the theocracy was visited by Antiochus Epiphanes" (Kell). On the author's view, that these specifications were interpolated into the prophecy by a later hand, it is impossible to account for any such vagueness, much less "discrepancy;" for the forger would certainly have taken pains to conform his language to the well-known facts.]

prefer, however, to read מִלְּפָנָיו.*—Verse 17. He shall also set his face to enter with the strength of his whole kingdom. "To set his face" is equivalent to "fixing his aim" upon something; cf. 2 Kings xii. 18, and for the rest of the sentence, cf. Psa. lxxi. 16; Isa. xl. 10. Livy, XXXIII. 19, plainly asserts that Antiochus was temporarily inclined to follow up his victories in Coele-Syria and Phoenicia by a powerful attack on Egypt: "Omnibus regni viribus connixus, cum ingentes copias terrestres maritimasque comparasset," etc. The same author records also an attack on the cities on the coast of Cilicia and Caria belonging to Ptolemy, as being an introductory step toward the execution of that plan. The reference of the text to this fact is so unequivocal, that all explanations which do not accord with it must be rejected, e.g., that of Hävernick, Von Lengerke, etc.: "to come against the strength of his (the Egyptian monarch's) whole kingdom;" and of Füller, "to come in the power of his (Antiochus') whole kingdom," which is interpreted to mean, that he should secure the complete possession of the royal power throughout Syria, and re-establish its former limits.—And upright ones with him; rather, "and an agreement shall he make with him." This rendering of וְיָשְׁרִים עִמּוֹ was adopted by the Sept. (καὶ συνήκας μετ' αὐτοῦ ποιήσεται), Vulg., Luther, Berth., Dereser, Von Leng., and Hitzig, although the two last-named writers attempt emendations of the text (Von Leng., וְיִמְרִשְׁרִים instead of וְיָשְׁרִים; Hitzig, וְיִשְׁרֵה instead of וְיָשְׁרֵה) which are entirely uncalled for. It is certainly obvious that the words refer to the treaty concluded in the year 198 between Antiochus and the defeated Ptolemy Epiphanes, by which Coele-Syria was left in the hands of the victor, and in connection with which the marriage of Cleopatra, the daughter of Antiochus, with Ptol. Epiphanes was agreed upon, although not consummated until five years afterward (Polyb., XXVIII. 17; Josephus, Ant., XII. 4, 1); see what follows. Such explana-

tions as the following must therefore be rejected, "and upright ones shall be with him,"—i.e., the Jews (!)—"and he shall succeed in it" (Gesenius, Winer, etc.); "and strong ones come with him, and he conducts it successfully" (Füller); or, "and uprightness with him, and he shall accomplish it" (Hävernick, Kranichf.), etc.—And he shall give him the daughter of women, i.e., his daughter Cleopatra, who is here designated as "a daughter of the women" (i.e., of her mother, grandmother, etc., who were still employed with her education), probably on account of her youth; cf. Zech. ix. 9, where מִן־הַנְּעוּרוֹת in like manner denotes a young ass-colt.* As Ptolemy himself was but seven years old when this treaty was made, the agreement primarily involves a betrothal only, the marriage being postponed during five years to B.C. 193.—Corrupting her; rather, "to destroy it," i.e., his league with Egypt; his purpose was to ruin his former opponent and present ally. הַהִשְׁתָּרִיחַ is probably to be taken in this sense, without substituting הַשְׁתָּרִיחַ for it with Hitzig, or, with others, referring the suffix to the daughter. If the latter interpretation ("to destroy her") were adopted, the הִ would certainly lose its telic signification, and become consecutive: "so that he destroys her, so that he ruins her in this way" (Kranichf.), but the following clause does not accord with this view.—But she shall not stand on his side, neither be for him; rather, "but it shall not succeed, nor result to his advantage," i.e., Antiochus shall not realize the expected benefits from the agreement. Others, less appropriately, conceive of Cleopatra as the subject, "she shall not stand on his side (?), neither be for him (?), but rather take sides with her husband, the king of Egypt" (cf. Jerome on the passage). The rendering preferred by us is supported by the exactly similar expressions in Isa. vii. 7; xiv. 24.†—Verse 18. And he shall turn his face unto the isles (or coast-lands), and shall take many (of them). The Kethib וְיָשֻׁב is to be retained in opposition to the Keri וְיָשִׁיב, which is transferred to this place from v. 17 for the sake of analogy. אֲרָיִם, i.e., "the isles and coast-lands" probably denotes the coasts of Asia Minor, which Antiochus

† [Still the construction proposed is harsh, for the subject of the verb is naturally הַבֵּית הַהוּא. Her destruction, "it is true, was not the object of the marriage, but only its consequence; but the consequence is set forth as had in view, so as forcibly to express the thought that the marriage could lead, according to a higher direction, only to the destruction of the daughter. The last clauses of the verse express the failure of the measure adopted. The verbs are fem., not neut.; thus the meaning is: . . . 'she (the daughter) shall not stand,' not be able to carry out the plan contemplated by her father. The words הַהִשְׁתָּרִיחַ do not stand for הִשְׁתָּרִיחַ לָהּ, 'she shall not be to him,' or 'for him.' In that case, לָהּ must be connected with the verb. According to the text, לֹא-יָשֻׁב forms one idea, as לֹא-יָשִׁיב impotent (cf. Ewald, § 270): 'she shall be a not for him,' i.e., he shall have nothing at all from her.'—Kell.]

subjected to his power through the aid of his fleet and army in the summer of 197, and also Macedon and Hellas, which were attacked and conquered by him in the following year, after having spent the intervening winter at Ephesus and crossed the Hellespont in the spring (Livy, XXXIII. 19, 38, 40; Polyb., XVIII. 34).^{*}—But a prince . . . shall cause the reproach offered by him to cease; or, "but a general (military leader) shall stifle his scorn," i.e., his scornful and contemptuous declaration to the Roman ambassadors at a meeting in Lysimachia, that "Asia did not concern them, the Romans, and he was not subject to their orders" (Polyb. and Livy, l. c.). The leader (מִצְדֵּק, as in Josh. x. 24; Judg. xi. 6, 11) who stifled the scornfulness of the Syrian king (הַשָּׂרִי, literally, "to cause to cease" [to teach it to cease, Luther]), was Lucius Scipio Asiaticus, whose brilliant victory near Magnesia on the Sipylus in Lydia, B.C. 190, enabled him to force Antiochus to conclude an immediate peace on very severe and humiliating terms (Polyb., XXI. 14; Livy, XXXVIII. 38; Appian, Syr., 38, 39, etc.).—Without his own reproach he shall cause it to turn upon him; rather, "he shall assuredly give him back his reproach;" he shall retaliate by inflicting a more bitter reproach on his part. מִצְדֵּק in this place is synonymous with אֶחָד or אֶחָדָם, and does not signify "except that" (Hävernick).†—Kranichfeld attempts in vain to obviate and obscure the manifest reference of this representation to the defeat of Antiochus near Magnesia, as being an artful "fabrication of history" on the part of the "positivists in prophetic interpretation."—Verse 19. And he shall turn his face toward the fort ("forts") of his own land. These words are probably ironical; instead of advancing against the fortresses of foreign lands, he is thenceforward to be employed only with those of his own realm, perhaps in the direction of placing them in good condition for defence. Fuller's remark, that here and in vs. 24, 31, and 39, מְצֻרִים denotes temples, which Antiochus was eventually obliged to plunder, because of the distracting state of his finances, is entirely too artificial and without adequate support from the customary usage of the term. History is acquainted with but a single instance in which Antiochus pillaged the temples, viz.: that of the temple of the Elymaio Zeus, or Bel, in connection with which he was slain, together with his warriors, in a rising of the people; and it is arbitrary to argue a number of similar acts from this single fact.‡—But he shall stumble and fall, and not (or, "no more") be found. Cf. what has just been remarked, and see Strabo, XVI. 1, 18; Justin., XXXII. 2; Diodorus, Fragm., 26, 39, 40.*

Verse 20. Seleucus Philopater, the son and successor of Antiochus Magnus, B.C. 187–176. Then shall stand up in his estate a raiser of taxes (in) the glory of the kingdom; rather, "one that causeth an exacter of taxes to pass over" (marg.), or "one that sendeth out a driver," to the ornament of the kingdom. The driver was obviously a collector of money, or of tribute, and the person intended was the treasurer Heliodorus, who was sent out by Seleucus Philopater (according to 2 Macc. iii. 7 et seq.) to Jerusalem to confiscate the treasure in the Jewish temple. הָדָר מְלָכוֹת, "the splendor or ornament of the kingdom," doubtless designates Jerusalem (as does also the הָדָר of Judaea, chap. viii. 9); cf. the similar laudatory terms applied to that city in Psal. xlviii. 3; 1. 2; Lam. ii. 15.† The accusative הָדָר נִלְוֶה accordingly indicates the direction rather than the measure ("who causes to pass through the extent (?) of the land," Fuller et al.), and cannot in any case be regarded as a nominative in apposition with the subject מְצַדֵּק, as Kranichfeld proposes, who consequently translates: "(one) who shall lead drivers thither, the ornament of dominion."—But in few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger, nor in battle. Soon after Heliodorus was despatched to plunder the temple of Jehovah, B.C. 176 or 175, Seleucus Philopater was suddenly and mysteriously removed, possibly by poison which had been administered to him by the same Heliodorus (Appian, Syr., C. 45). The words "after some (or 'a few') days" doubtless refer to the brief interval between the departure of that officer and the king's death, rather than to the brief duration of his reign of only twelve years, as they are generally applied.‡ On the statement exactness, and the temple referred to may very well be taken as a representative of the native fortifications, especially as it was so vigorously defended as to cause the death of the assailant.]

* [Keil still insists that "what is said regarding his return to the fortresses of his own land and his own throne, does not so correspond with the historical issue of the reign of this king, that one would be able to recognize therein a prediction of it." Yet such a prediction has actually been recognised by interpreters of all ages.]

† [Keil, however, objects to "this interpretation of the words as too limited. נִלְוֶה denotes, no doubt (2 Kings xxiii. 35), to collect gold and silver; but it does not thence follow that נִלְוֶה, when silver and gold are not spoken of, means to collect tribute. The word in general designates the taskmaster who urges on the people to severe labor, afflicts and oppresses them as cattle. הָדָר מְלָכוֹת is not synonymous with הָדָר הַמְּלָכִי, ver. 16, but stands much nearer to הָדָר מְלָכוֹת, ver. 21, and designates the glory of the kingdom. The glory of the kingdom was brought down by נִלְוֶה, and נִלְוֶה refers to the whole kingdom of the king spoken of, not merely to the Holy Land, which formed but a part of his kingdom. By these oppressions of his kingdom he prepared himself in a short time for destruction."]]

‡ [Keil's objection: "The reference of these words, 'in days few,' to the time after the pillage of the temple of Jerusalem by Heliodorus is not only an arbitrary process

† [Keil objects to the signification moreover, assigned to מִצְדֵּק, that "in all places where it is so rendered a negative sentence goes before it, cf. Gen. xliii. 8; xlvii. 18; Judg. vi. 14, or a sentence asking a question with a negative sense, as Amos iii. 8, 4. Hence מִצְדֵּק here has the idea of exception, and can only be rendered after an affirmative statement by however, for the passage introduced by it limits the statement going before."]] that he was to be destroyed "neither in anger, nor in battle," the remarks of Appian respecting the mode of Philopater's death (ἐξ ἐπιβουλῆς) should be compared.*

Verses 21-24. The rise of Antiochus Epiphanes; his first Egyptian campaign. And in his estate shall stand up a vile person. הַיָּהוּ does not probably denote "a despised one, whose birth deprived him of every right to the throne" (Kranichfeld), but rather one who is deservedly despised, who is despicable, morally contemptible, thus corresponding to נִמְאָס, Jer. vi. 30, and contrasting with מְרֻסָּב, 1 Sam. xv. 9 (cf. Hitzig on the passage). The symbolic description of the person here introduced, as a "little horn," chap. vii. 8; viii. 9, is in any case appropriate. A contrast with the cognomen Ἐπιφανής was probably not intended, since the term appears to be one of the original constituents of the section, rather than an interpolation; for a Maccabæan interpolator would hardly have avoided the temptation to avail himself of the suggestion afforded by the familiar perversion of Ἐπιφανής into Ἐπιμηνής to make use of a term like מְשִׁיחַ, for instance (cf. 1 Sam. xxi. 16; Jer. xix. 26; Hos. ix. 7).—To whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom; rather, "to whom was not given," etc.—who has seized the royal dignity instead, in opposition to the will of his nation. Cf. the Eth.-fund. principles, etc., on chap. vii., No. 8; and with reference to the expression מְלָכִיּוֹת, cf. 1 Chron. xxix. 25; Psa. xxi. 6.—He shall come in peaceably (or "unexpectedly")—וְשָׁלְוָה, as in v. 24 and chap. viii. 25) and obtain the kingdom by flatteries; rather, by "dissimulations." הַנְּקִלְקוֹת does not denote smooth speeches or flattering words merely, but dissimulating words and actions, a hypocritical and deceitful bearing in both word and deed. It occurs in the same sense in v. 34. The historical tradition, indeed, speaks only of the application of military force by Antiochus, when seeking to obtain the Syrian throne for himself, and of the assistance which Eumenes and Attalus rendered him to that end, by expelling the usurper Heliodorus. But this assuredly did not exclude the employment of all manner of cunning arts and secret manoeuvrings, which probably were the only means by which he could secure the countenance of those kings of Pergamos. The difference between the language of the passage and the historical fact is at any rate inconsiderable; and it is not necessary to assume that to obviate that difficulty the Sept. substituted the more appropriate בְּהִלְקוֹת or

הַנְּקִלְקוֹת for בְּהִלְקוֹת, and translated it by καταχίσει βασιλεὺς ἐν κληροδοσίᾳ αὐτοῦ, on the ground that they "could find no historical equivalent for the former term" (against Kranichfeld).—Verse 22. And with the arms of a flood shall they be overflowed from before him; rather, "and the overflowing power of the host shall be swept away and broken before him," literally, "and the arms of the overflowing—before his face they shall be swept away," etc. On וְיִצְוֹ, cf. vs. 15, 31; on וְשָׁפָה, cf. chap. ix. 26. The tropical expression וְיִצְוֹ

וְשָׁפָה, when taken as a whole, involves a metaphor that is not entirely unmixed, similar to שֹׁרֵשׁ שְׂוֹפָה, "the overflowing scourge," in Isa. xxviii. 15. The "overflowing hosts" probably represent in part the troops of Heliodorus, whom Antiochus routed with the assistance of his Pergamenian allies, and in part the Egyptian forces which sought to deprive him of Coele-Syria soon after his accession to the throne. "For after the death of Cleopatra (v. 17), Eulans and Lenæus, the guardians of her son, Ptolemy Philometor, demanded the cession of Coele-Syria, the dowry which had hitherto been refused (Polyb., XXVIII. 1; Diodor., Leg. 18, p. 624 Wess.; Livy, XLII. 49). Antiochus, on the other hand, would not acknowledge that his father had promised such a dowry (Polyb., XXVIII. 17), and therefore refused to grant it. Finding that the Egyptians were preparing for war, he took the initiative, and succeeded in defeating the generals of Ptolemy between the Casian mountains and Pelusium. On every calculation, that event transpired in B.C. 171" (Hitzig).—Yes, also the (rather, "a") prince of the covenant; supply וְיִשְׁכַּר, "shall be broken." The person referred to was probably the high priest Onias III., who was put to death by command of Antiochus Epiphanes in the year 172, and hence about the time of the war between that king and Ptol. Philometor. He was denominated a נְסִיךְ in chap. ix. 26 (see on that passage),* and here bears the title of נְסִיךְ בְּרִית, "prince of the covenant," because he was the actual head of the theocracy at that time; cf. the repeated designation of the theocracy by the term בְּרִית in the following verses, e.g., vs. 28 and 32 (thus correctly Theodoret, Rosenm., Hitzig, Hofm., Füller). A majority of recent writers refer this expression to Ptol. Philometor; but this is opposed (1) by the fact that at the time which is here indicated, that prince was by no means in league with Antiochus; (2) that if it were really intended to represent him as having entered into such an alliance, it would have been necessary to employ the words וְנְסִיכֵי בְרִיתוֹ, or rather בְּעַל

ing, but is also contrary to the import of the words, since בְּרִית in בְּרִיתִים does not mean post,[†] has little force, even if we accept his interpretation of נְסִיכֵי preceding; for that term evidently constitutes a fresh date or starting-point.]

* [Kell once more urges that "of Seleucus Philopater, to whom ver. 20 must refer, if the foregoing verses treat of Antiochus the Great, nothing further is communicated than that he, 'quum paternis cladibus fractas admodum Syria opes accepisset, post otiorum nullaque admodum rebus gestis nobilitatum annorum duodecim regnum,' was put to death through the treachery of Heliodorus, unus ex purpuratis (Livy, XLII. 19: cf. App., Syr., C. 45), and the mission of Heliodorus to Jerusalem to seize the treasures of the temple, which is fabulously described in 2 Mac. iii. 4 ff. The וְיִשְׁכַּר (shall be destroyed) of this king בְּרִיתִים וְנְסִיכֵי (within a few days) does not harmonise with the fact of his twelve years' reign.]"

נִרְיָה (cf. Gen. xiv. 13); (3) that the Egyptian is always designated as מִלֵּךְ הַנִּגָּב in this chapter, while, on the other hand, בִּרְיָה always refers to the theocracy.*—Verse 23. And after the league made with him he shall work deceitfully, i.e., as soon as he shall have established friendly relations, and allied himself with his defeated opponent, which his victory near Pelusium enabled him to accomplish. Even while the battle was raging, Antiochus displayed great kindness toward the Egyptians, everywhere interfering to check the slaughter by his soldiers, and thus won the hearts of his foes (see Diodorus, Exc. in Weas., p. 579). This conduct seems to have subsequently been of material value to him in the capture of Pelusium, Memphis, and generally of all lower and central Egypt (cf. Diodor., l. c.; Polyb., XXVIII. 16 et seq.; Jerome, on this passage).—And shall come up, and shall become strong (or "prevail") with a small people, unexpectedly. Cf. Jerome: "Ascendit Memphin et ibi ex more Egypti regnum accipiens puerique (i.e., Ptolemai Philometoris) rebus se providere dicens, cum modico populo omnem Egyptum subjugavit sibi, et abundantes atque uberrimas ingressus est cicilites." Several expositors propose to refer נִרְיָה to the king's invasion of Coele-Syria and Palestine only, instead of understanding his victorious march up the Nile as far as Memphis (e.g., Kranichfeld, Hofmann, Ewald, and especially Füller, who had already interpreted the preceding נִרְיָה as referring to the league of Antiochus with the Pergamenian kings Eumenes and Attalus); but this interrupts the regular progress of the narrative by transposing an event from the beginning of the war to the history of its close. בִּשְׁנָה, "unexpectedly," is probably to be included in this verse, as Von Lengerke, Hitzig, etc., propose. It states that the victor had penetrated into the heart of their country before the Egyptians were fully aware of the fact, or had made arrangements to resist his progress. Hitzig's explanation, "with confidence (= בְּבִטְחָן) as if he were not in an enemy's country," is unnecessary; and also that offered by others, "with a peaceful object" ("in the midst of peace," Füller).—Verse 24. Concerning נִשְׁלָה, see what immediately precedes.—And he shall enter even upon the fattest places of the province. The extraordinary fertility of lower Egypt is well known; cf. Plin., H. N., XXI. 15: "Aegyptus frugum fertilissima," etc. With regard to the genitive combination מִדְּרֵיכָה, cf., e.g., מִדְּרֵיכֵי אֲדָם, Isa. xix. 19. Concerning מִדְּרֵיכָה, a "territorial jurisdiction or province," see on chap. ii. 48; iii. 2.—He shall scatter among them the prey (rather "prey"—without the article), and spoil, and riches. This defines "that which his fathers had not done, nor his fathers' fathers." It consisted of an immoderate squandering, by which he not only divided among his soldiers the money provided for carrying on the war, but also the spoil of Pelusium and all other booty that had been acquired. Even the Egyptians (to whom נִרְיָה is perhaps to be specially referred) were not excluded from his liberality. Thus he bestowed on each Greek a piece of gold at that time, while at Naucratis, according to Polyb., XXVIII. 17. His unusual liberality during this campaign in Egypt is also attested by 1 Macc. iii. 50.—He shall forecast his devices against the strong holds, even for a time. מִבְּצָרִים unquestionably denotes fortresses in the proper sense, or strong cities, rather than temples, as Füller supposes (cf. on v. 19).—It refers, e.g., to the taking of Pelusium, and to the siege of the fortified cities of Naucratis and Alexandria, etc. (Polyb., XXVIII. 17-19). וְעַד-זֶמֶן, "and that until a time," i.e., until a time that has been determined by a higher power—for a time. Cf. מְעַד in v. 8, and the similar terms in vs. 6 and 18.

Verses 25-27. The second Egyptian campaign of Antiochus Epiphanes. And he shall stir up his power and his courage. Concerning נִרְיָה, cf. מִלֵּךְ הַנִּגָּב in v. 2; also Psa. lxxviii. 38; 1 Macc. ii. 24.—Against the king of the south. This was not probably Ptolemy Philometor, but his younger brother Ptolemy Physcon, who had thrown himself, together with his sister Cleopatra, into the strong city of Alexandria, at the time when Antiochus was conquering Egypt, and had there been declared king in the stead of his brother, who had fallen into the hands of the Syrians. After the departure of Antiochus

* [Kell objects that the interpretation of this outting off of the "prince of the covenant," as referring to the murder of Onias III., "is not warranted by the facts of history. That murder does not at all relate to the matter before us, not only because the Jewish high-priest at Antioch did not sustain the relation of a 'prince of the covenant,' but also because the murder was perpetrated without the previous knowledge of Antiochus, and when the matter was reported to him, the murderer was put to death by his command (2 Macc. iv. 36-38). Still the fact remains that Onias was slain by his agents, however much he disavowed or even regretted the occurrence. To deny the propriety of the epithet "prince of the covenant" as a title of the high-priest is arbitrary, as also the interpretation: "We must, therefore, with Kranichfeld, understand בִּרְיָה, in undefined generality, of covenant princes in general." There is little force in Stuart's comment that the latter phrase is "not the high-priest Onias, the prince of the Jewish covenant, as Rosenmüller maintains, for then בִּרְיָה would of course be employed. בִּרְיָה is designed for a mere adjective of quality or condition here, and the article is omitted, as it is more generally in such cases. . . . If Rosenmüller be in the right, the order of time would be inverted, and a υπερβολον must consequently be admitted in the course of the narrative, which is improbable." "The absence of the article in בִּרְיָה is no proof against the reference of the word to the holy covenant. The article is wanting where otherwise the determination is found from the connection, e.g., ch. viii. 13" (Kell).]

* ["But to distribute money and spoil is nothing unheard of, and in no way does it agree with the 'fat provinces.' The context decidedly refers to conduct which injured the fat provinces. This can only consist in squandering and dissipating the wealth of this province which he had plundered to its injury (לָהֶם [to them], dativ. i. commodi). A historical confirmation is found in 1 Macc. iii. 29-31. To bring the provinces wholly under his power he devised plans against the fortresses that he might subdue them."—Kell.]

(occasioned by a revolt of the Tarsians and the Mallotes in Cilicia), this usurper had probably brought the entire kingdom into his power, as seems to be implied in Livy, XLIV. 19: "Antiochus, Syria rex—per honestam speciem majoris Ptolemæi reducendi in regnum, bellum cum minore fratre ejus, qui tum Alexandream tenebat, gerens." etc.—But he shall not stand; for they shall forecast devices against him; i.e., despite the magnitude of his army, this Ptolemy shall offer no resistance to the Syrian king (לֹא יִרְעוּ, cf. viii. 4, 7; 2 Kings x. 4), because treason in his own camp (cf. what immediately follows), of which his opponent is able to make skilful use, shall cause his defeat.—Verse 26. Yea, they that feed of the portion of his meat shall destroy him. With regard to פָּרְקָי, cf. on i. 8. The אֲבִיכֵי פָּרְקָי were of course members of the royal household and servants of the king, therefore serpents whom he had cherished in his own bosom, like the traitorous אֲבִי לִחְמִי in Psa. xli. 10 (John xiii. 18); cf. v. 27 and 2 Sam. ix. 11 et seq.; xix. 29; 1 Kings ii. 7; xviii. 19, etc.—And his army shall overflow (or "flow away, dissolve"); and many shall fall down slain. Concerning the "flowing away," which is here equivalent to "dissolving, turning away to flee," cf. v. 22; also 1 Sam. xiv. 16, where יָמוּן expresses about the same idea. On the second member of the sentence, cf. Judg. ix. 40; 1 Chron. v. 22; 1 Macc. i. 18.—The decisive victory of this second Egyptian war (the δευτέρα ἐποχή, 2 Macc. v. 1), which Antiochus achieved over Physcon and Cleopatra, was not gained on land, so far as we know, but in a great and fortunate naval action near Pelusium; and יהִרְסוּ יָמֵיכֶם seems to be applicable only to a battle of the former kind, not to the scattering or destruction of a fleet. Nor is there any definite record of treason committed against Ptol. Physcon by the Egyptians.* But, after making due allowance for this discrepancy [?], the whole description seems more appropriate when applied to the second Egyptian campaign of Epiphanes than when it is altogether referred to the events of the former war, as Ewald, Fuller, etc., attempt to do.—Verse 27. And both those kings' hearts shall be to do mischief. This does not allude, probably, to their evil designs against their enemy Physcon, but to those entertained against each other; cf. Prov. xxvii. 19; and on the term לִמְרֵס (i.e., literally, "belonging to do evil"), cf. Isa. i. 5; Judges v. 9. The two kings themselves are certainly not Physcon and his victorious opponent Epiphanes, nor yet the two brothers Philometor and Physcon, but Antiochus and Philometor, who were leagued against Physcon, and concerning whom Livy (XLV. 11) and Polyb. (XXIX. 8) expressly state, that at that time they had taken the field in company against the latter king.—And they shall speak lies at one table. Probably an allusion to a particular incident which is no longer known.* Their "speaking of lies" was naturally a hypocritical profession of disinterestedness on the part of Antiochus, as if his only concern were to reconquer the kingdom for his nephew Philometor (out regnum queri suis viribus simulabat, Livy, l. c.), while the latter pretended reverence and gratitude toward his uncle, but in his heart was anxious to have him removed from his path.—But it shall not prosper, i.e., their joint endeavor to overthrow Physcon; the latter, on the contrary, retained possession of Alexandria and of his usurped crown.—For yet the end shall be at the time appointed; rather, "for yet the end is (reserved) to the appointed time." "The end," namely of the Syro-Egyptian wars, and consequently of the sufferings of Judæa, which was intermediate between the contending kingdoms. The time indicated by לְמוֹדָר in v. 29 is not identical with this פֶּד, or "end of the appointed time," but rather that denoted by פֶּד יִבְיָהּ in v. 40, and by פֶּד נָח in v. 35.

Verses 28-30. The third Egyptian campaign of Antiochus. Then shall he return into his land with great riches, i.e., with much booty, which he partly secured in Egypt, and partly on his homeward march through Judæa, which was now in a state of insurrection. Cf. 1 Macc. i. 19, 20; 2 Macc. v. 11 with Livy, l. c.—His heart (shall be) against the holy covenant. Cf. the detailed descriptions of the rapine and other atrocities committed by Antiochus while marching through Judæa; 1 Macc. i. 20-29; 2 Macc. v. 11-17. יָרִיתָ קֶדֶשׁ denotes the theocracy with reference to its territory and its adherents.—And he shall do exploits; rather, "accomplish it," i.e., his malicious intention, the design of his לִבָּב.—Verse 29. At the time appointed he shall return, and come toward the south. לְמוֹדָר, "at the appointed time," i.e., the time appointed by God. The reference is to the spring of the year B.C. 168, in which Antiochus began his third campaign against Egypt, this time against the two Ptolemies, Philometor and Physcon. The brothers had become reconciled to each other in the preceding year, through the influence of their sister Cleopatra, and had made common cause against the Syrian, whose conduct in leaving behind him a strong garrison in Pelusium had indicated his purpose to secure a permanent influence over Egypt. Incensed by the course of the Ptolemies, Antiochus led a large army through Coele-Syria and Palestine to Egypt in the spring of 168 (primo vere, Livy, XLV. 11), and would have inflicted heavy penalties on the brothers had not the

* [The phrase is sufficiently justified by the hypocritical alliance. "At one table designates the dissembled amity and intimacy of the parties, who said and did all they could to mislead each other" (Stuart). Keil, after interpreting: "The evil doing consists in this, that the one seeks to overthrow and destroy the other under the cloak of feigned friendship: for they eat as friends at one table, and 'speak lies'—the one tells lies to the other, professing friendship. But their design shall not succeed;" yet cautiously adds "All interpretations of these words which are determined by historical facts are arbitrary. The history of Antiochus Epiphanes furnishes no illustrations for this." The above league affords abundant presumption of these facts, even if strictly understood.]

Romans interfered (cf. Livy, 1. c.; Polyb. XXIX. 8; Justin., XXXIV. 2).—But it shall not be as the former, or as the latter, i.e., a success similar to the triumphs of the first and second expeditions shall not be realized; cf. for instance, v. 12.—"וְיִדְּקוּ", "as—so also;" cf. Ezek. xviii. 4; Josh. xiv. 11 (Ewald, Lehrb., p. 851). The two substantives are in the cas. adverbialis.

—Verse 30. For ships of Chittim (פְּרִיִּים) shall come against him. The expression is derived from Num. xxiv. 24, where Balaam predicted the humiliation of Assyria through the agency of ships of Chittim. In that place Grecian ships were probably intended, but the reference here is certainly to ships belonging to the Romans, namely, the fleet of C. Popilius Lænas, which sailed to Egypt after the victory over Perseus near Pydna (June 22d, B.C. 168), in order to prevent the Syrian king from subjugating that country, as he designed to do (Livy, XLV. 10; Polyb., XXIX. 1). It is not necessary to assume, with Beitholdt and Dereser, that the "ships of Chittim" denote the Macedonian fleet which fell into the hands of the Romans at the victory of Pydna, and was afterward employed by Lænas for his voyage to Egypt. Aside from the fact that Polybius and Livy do not mention this fact, to designate ships that had been taken by the Romans as Macedonian vessels would obviously be inappropriate; and, moreover, the customary usage throughout this book would lead us to expect פְּרִיִּים instead. The term פְּרִיִּים is very broad and indefinite in its application, as appears already from Gen. x. 4. It denotes all the islands and coast-lands along the northern shores of the Mediterranean sea, beginning with Cyprus (which is referred to under that name in Isa. xxiii. 1, 12; Ezek. xxvii. 6), and extending as far as Spain, and therefore might appropriately be employed to designate Rome or Italy in particular (cf. Knobel, Völkertafel, p. 95 et seq.). The Sept. is correct (Papaini), and also Jerome; but the latter overlooked the adjective nature of פְּרִיִּים (plur. of פְּרִי), and therefore inserted a copula between the two nouns: "venient super eum trieres et Romani."—Therefore shall he be grieved (rather, "discouraged") and return. It is known that Popilius Lænas, on meeting with Antiochus four miles from Alexandria, did not grasp the hand extended by the latter in greeting, but at once presented the message entrusted by the senate to his care, and that when the king requested time to consider its contents, the Roman drew a circle about him, and did not permit him to pass beyond it before he had given the desired answer (Livy, XLV. 12; Polyb., XXIX. 11; Appian, Syr., 66; Justin., XXXIV. 3).—And have indignation against the holy covenant: so shall he do; or, "and shall accomplish it." Fuller says well, "The rage which he was unable to vent on Egypt is now turned against the holy covenant; in his displeasure he turns against Israel, without being hindered" (יִפְשֹׁדוּ as in v. 28). Several writers, among whom are Rosenm. and Kranichfeld (the latter being guided by his desire to render the prophecy as dissimilar to the history as possible), take the preceding וְיִדְּקוּ adverbially, and regard it as qualifying וְיִפְשֹׁדוּ: "and again he shall have indignation," etc. וְיִדְּקוּ, however, is not used as a mere auxiliary in any other part of this section; and the return of the northern king from Egypt could not be passed over without notice in this place, since not to have mentioned it would have made Egypt the scene of the subsequent warlike operations in v. 31 a, which would thus conflict with v. 31 b (cf. Hitzig on the passage).—He shall even return and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant; rather, "and he shall return, and fix his attention on them," etc. The second "and he returns" denotes his journey to Antioch from Palestine, where he had halted by the way. His "fixing attention" (וְהִבִּיט, as in v. 37; Job. xxxi. 1; Jer. xxxix. 12) on the apostates from the covenant (עֹזְבֵי בְרִית = פְּרִיִּים, v. 14) is to be understood in the sense of affiliating with them, who became his favorites and protégés, and for whom he endeavored to erect a new and idolatrous system of worship; cf. 1 Macc. ii. 18; 2 Macc. vi. 1. Also infra, on v. 39.

Verses 31–36. Attacks on the sacred institutions of the theocracy, and the persecution of its faithful adherents by Antiochus. And arms shall stand on his part; rather, "and armed hosts of his shall remain," namely, in the holy land. Consequently וְיִרְעִים יַעֲקֹב is used substantially as in v. 15, to denote the standing still of an armed host (cf. the leaving of a Syrian garrison in the citadel of Zion, which is mentioned in 1 Macc. i. 84). The usual rendering is, "and armed bands shall arise from him"—which, however, seems more appropriate and conformable to the context than Kranichfeld's strange interpretation, "and accomplices (i.e., traitorous Israelites) shall stand up through his influence" (!). וְיִרְעִים probably does not signify "at his bidding" (cf. 2 Sam. iii. 37), but is a partitive, or rather expresses dependence on the possessor.—And pollute the sanctuary of strength; rather, "the sanctuary, the stronghold." The sanctuary is probably termed the stronghold (מִצְדָּה, an apposition) in a spiritual sense, as being the refuge and support of Israel; cf. Psa. xviii. 8; xxxi. 3–5; Isa. xxv. 4, etc., where Jehovah himself is termed Israel's strong tower (Von Leng., Kranichfeld, Fuller). The reference of the expression to the fortifications with which the second temple was certainly provided (1 Macc. vi. 7; v. 60) is less probable. However, cf. 1 Macc. i. 37; 2 Macc. vi. 4.—And shall take away the daily sacrifice. Cf. the parallels, chap. viii. 11–13; ix. 27; xii. 11; and with regard to the historical fulfilment, cf. 1 Macc. i. 45, 54.—Verse 32. And such as do wickedly against (or "by") the covenant shall he corrupt by flatteries; Hitzig: "the condemnners of the covenant, its accusers." The מְרִשְׁעֵי בְרִית, however, are evidently the same as the עֹזְבֵי בְרִית in v. 30; וְיִרְעִים is simply an accusative of specification; cf. Ewald, Lehrb., § 238, 2 et seq.—וְהִבִּיטוּ, properly, "to desecrate," here signifies "to cause to revolt," utterly to sever their union with the theocracy, against which they had already sinned. Consequently, the expression does not involve a tautology, as if a successful effort to lead such as had already cast off their allegiance to apostatize were asserted. Kranichfeld interprets very harshly and arbitrarily, "and so far as the sinner against the covenant is concerned, he shall pollute it (the covenant) by his insinuating deportment." בְּחִלְקוֹתָם, "with smoothnesses," i.e., with smooth words and dissimulating arts (doubtless including deceitful promises, cf. 1 Macc. ii. 17 et seq.) probably differs merely in form from בְּחִלְקֵיהֶם in v. 21; cf. v. 34.—But people that do know their God shall be (or "prove themselves") strong (i.e., to resist his seductive efforts), and do exploits; rather, "do it." Cf. vs. 17, 28, 30, and for the historical fulfilment, see 1 Macc. i. 62 et seq.; ii. 3 et seq.—Verse 33. And they that understand among the people shall instruct (the) many. עַם מְשֻׁבְּרֵי עֵט does not denote "teachers of the people" (Deresser, Hitzig), and the analogy of לְהַשְׁבִּירָם in chap. ix. 22 is not sufficient to establish that rendering. מְשֻׁבְּרֵי is rather to be taken as equivalent to intelligens (cf. Sept., Theodot.: ol anveroi laou; Vulg., docti), in harmony with the usual intransitive sense מְשֻׁבְּרֵי (see chap. i. 4, 17; ix. 13, 25). This rendering finds a special support in the contrasting of the מְשֻׁבְּרֵי and the רְשָׁעִים in chap. xii. 10. These understanding ones, i.e., these genuine theocrats, e.g., a Mattathias (1 Macc. ii. 1 et seq.), an Eleazar (2 Macc. vi. 18), etc., shall "impart understanding (יְבִרָה), cf. Job vi. 24) to the many, i.e., the not inconsiderable number of the "people that do know their God," v. 32, who were faithful to the covenant and capable of being saved, and of whom 1 Macc. i. 65 et seq. testifies that they were somewhat numerous.—Yet they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, etc. "They," viz.: the many who hearken to the voice of the understanding ones, not the latter in person; see v. 35. For the narrative of the fulfilment, see 1 Macc. i. 57; ii. 38; iii. 41; v. 13; 2 Macc. vi. 11.—Verse 34. Now when they fall they shall be holpen with a little help, or, "they shall obtain but little help" (עֲזָרָה מְעוֹט), referring to the efforts of Judas Maccabæus (1 Macc. iii. 11 et seq.; iv. 14 et seq.), which were not sufficient to put an end to all the suffering and persecution at a single stroke; cf., e.g., 1 Macc. v. 60 et seq.—But many shall cleave to them with flatteries, or "hypocrisies," i.e., in addition to the limited aid received by them, the party of faithful adherents shall absorb many impure elements, which associate themselves hypocritically (בְּחִלְקוֹתָם, cf. on v. 32) with the "many." It appears from passages like 1 Macc. vi. 21 et seq.; ix. 23, that this was actually the case in the Maccabæan age, principally as a consequence of the bloody severity with which Judas Maccabæus treated all apostates (1 Macc. ii. 44; iii. 5, 8).—Verse 35. And some of them of understanding (see v. 33)

shall fall, e.g., certain priests, 1 Macc. v. 67; Eleazar, 2 Macc. vi. 18, etc., and Judas Maccabæus himself, etc. נָכַסְלָם can have no other meaning in this place than that in which it occurs in vs. 33 and 34.—To try ("smelt") them, and to purge and to make them white (or, "cleanse them"), even to the time of the end; literally, "among them." This is a statement of the Divine purpose in imposing the specified sufferings. "Among them" (בֵּינֵהֶם), i.e., not merely among the "understanding ones," but also among their followers, among the theocratic party as a whole, which, according to v. 34, stood in some need of being sifted and purified. לְבָרָר alludes to the separation or removal of the dross that was expelled by the צָרֻר, and לְלָבֵן to the polishing and brightening of the metal that was thus freed from its impure elements. "The three-fold description is also probably designed to indicate that the purifying should be effected by various processes. Not only are the pretended adherents to Jehovah's party to separate themselves from His sincere followers, but the latter themselves, incited thereto by the example of steadfastness and self-denial furnished by their martyrs, shall cast out from themselves everything that is impure; and they shall succeed in gaining over all those who share their convictions in their hearts, but have been hindered by fear and timidity from avowing an open connection with them. In like manner a Nicodemus and a Joseph of Arimathea were induced by the very death of Christ on the cross to confess their allegiance to him.—Thus Antiochus attempts to annihilate the party among the Jews that is devoted to its God, but succeeds only in contributing to its purifying" (Füller).—The "time of the end" (עֵת־הַסֵּפֶר) down to which the painful process of purifying is to be continued, denotes, in the sense of the prophecy, the end of the pre-Messianic period as a whole, as appears from chap. viii. 17; ix. 27; but it coincides essentially with the end of Antiochus himself.—Because it is yet for a time appointed; i.e., the period of tribulation shall be protracted until then; cf. v. 27.—Verse 36. And the king shall do according to his will. The מֶלֶךְ can be no other than the one hitherto represented, the antitheistic persecutor of Israel, the king of the north, Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore not Constantine the Great (Ibn-Ezra, Jacchiad., Abarbanel, etc.), or the Roman state as a whole (Rashi, Calvin, etc.), or the New-Test. antichrist (Jerome, Theodor., Luther, Ecclamp., Geier, Calov, Kliefoth)—all of which interpretations contradict the context, and arbitrarily interpose a hiatus of centuries between v. 35 and the closing verses of the chapter.—And magnify himself above every god, i.e., subjectively, in his proud imagination; cf. 2 Macc. ix. 12; 2 Thess. ii. 4; also chap. viii. 25. Jerome, Luther, Fuller, etc., render the words, "against every god;" but this interpretation of לְכָל־אֱלֹהִים is antagonized by its use in v. 37 b, where it is likewise connected with לְכָל־אֱלֹהִים , but notedly in the sense of "above."—And shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods. Cf. chap. vii. 8, 25; and concerning אֱלֹהֵי אֱלֹהִים , see chap. ii. 47.—And shall prosper, i.e., in his undertakings generally; cf. viii. 12, 24 et seq.—Till the indignation be accomplished; namely, God's anger against His people, in whose execution He employed Antiochus as a scourge or "saw" (Isa. x. 15). Cf. viii. 19; ix. 27; and on the whole expression, see Isa. x. 23, 25.

Verses 37–39. Description of the general godlessness of Antiochus Epiphanes, without confining it to its relations to the theocracy. Neither (or, "and not") shall he regard the god ("gods") of his fathers, hence, shall manifest his impiety even with reference to the requirements of the religious sense of the heathen. This will include his robbery of temples (Polyb., XXXI. 4), and his efforts to destroy national bounds by tearing down their several religious systems (Diodor., XXXI. 1; 1 Macc. i. 43). *—Nor the desire of women, nor regard any god; rather, "nor the desire of women nor any god shall he regard." In view of the connection $\text{וְלֹא־יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה לְאִשָּׁה}$ cannot possibly signify anything else than a god, contained in the latter, ver. 37 (Calovius, Geier, Kliefoth), amount to verbally impossible interpretations." But surely this phrase might be understood to refer to different points of time, if the chance in the connection required it. Even this, however, is not necessary. It is sufficient to apply it to the general issue of these troubles of the theocracy, and thus room is still left to introduce the sequel of Antiochus's career, which in fact did not take place till the controversy about the Jewish worship was pretty well decided at Jerusalem by the first successes of the Maccabees.]

and does not, therefore, denote chaste conjugal love (Luther, J. Gerhard, etc., who support their view by a reference to καὶ βίβιν γαμῖν, 1 Tim. iv. 8), or a love for women, susceptibility to amorous emotions generally (Grotius), nor yet "the supplications of women" (Dathé, Stäudlin), or "the favorites of women," i.e., children (cf. Hos. ix. 16; Mic. i. 16, etc.—thus Bertholdt). We are to conceive, rather, of the goddesses of nature among the Asiatics, the Baaltis, Astarte, or Mylitta of the Babylonians, the Persian Artemis, and the Nansä of the Syrians. This is the more certain, as it is expressly reported of Antiochus that he had inflicted a gross indignity on the worship of this goddess (who is identical with the "queen of heaven," Jer. vi. 18; xlv. 17 et seq.), by attempting to plunder a temple of Artemis or Aphrodite in Elymais (Polyb., XXXI. 11; Appian, Syr., c. 66; 1 Macc. vi. 1–4; 2 Macc. ix. 2). For this reason modern expositors since J. D. Michaelis, Gesenius, Dereser, and Hävernicks are, with few exceptions, agreed in applying the words to this divinity. Concerning the designation as "the desire of women," cf. Isa. xlv. 9, where the heathen gods in general are characterized as יְהוָה מְבַרְכִים

"favorites." *—He shall magnify himself above all; above everything, whether Divine or human (the addition of $\text{וְעַל־כָּל־בָּשָׂר}$ merely to $\text{וְעַל־כָּל־אֱלֹהִים}$ would be one-sided). Cf. 2 Thess. ii. 4: ἐνὶ πάντα λεγόμενον θεὸν ἢ σίβασμα.—Verse 38. But in his estate shall he honour the god of forces; rather, "but he shall honor the god of fortresses in his place." $\text{וְהָיָה אֱלֹהֵי מְצֻדֹת}$ is not properly a nom. propr.: the god "Mauzsim" or "Mausim" (Luther, following the Sept., Theodot., and the Vulg., which have Μαυσιμ, Mauzim), but rather, as appears from the repeated mention in this chapter of מְצֻדֹת (vs. 7, 10, 19, 31) or מְצֻדָּתוֹ (v. 15) or מְצֻדָּרִים , it denotes a martial god to whom the Syrian king paid special reverence—a "god of fortresses or castles," who must be regarded as being Jupiter Capitolinus, because he is subsequently described as formerly unknown to the Asiatics. There is no question respecting the character of this divinity, as being pre-eminently warlike, nor yet respecting the special reverence which Epiphanes entertained for him. "To him, the Capitoline Jupiter, were devoted the spolia optima; he was called Jupiter Stator, because he brought the Romans to a stand in answer to the prayer of Romulus, when they fled before the Sabines. But the surname Capitolinus accords fully with

* [Kell's defence of the abstract interpretation is signally weak: "A verbal proof that $\text{וְהָיָה אֱלֹהֵי מְצֻדֹת}$ denotes Analitis or Adonis as the favorite deity of women has not been adduced. For these words, δαιδερτον μωτηριον, denote not that which women desire, but that which women possess which is desirable; cf. under 1 Sam. ix. 20. But it is impossible that this can be Analitis or Adonis, but it is a possession or precious treasure of women. This desirable possession of women is without doubt love; so that, as C. B. Michaelis has remarked, the expression is not materially different from $\text{וְהָיָה אֱלֹהֵי מְצֻדֹת}$, the love of women, 2 Sam. i.

26." On the contrary, all the associated terms compel us to understand a concrete object of regard. As Kell himself admits, "The connection requires us to think of a deity, because these words are placed between two expressions which refer to the gods.")] the god of fortresses; for the capitol was, so to speak, the seat of the Roman empire, the arx omnium nationum (Cicero, Verr., VII. 72), as being the citadel of Rome, beside which stood its temple. There the generals sacrificed and paid their vows; and when they returned from their victories, they were taken thither in triumph.—It is readily conceivable that Antiochus should honor this foreign god; he had learned to know him and his worship while at Rome." Antiochus did not, probably, regard the principal god of the Romans as distinct from the Olympic Zeus of the Greeks, whom he adored with a special zeal, according to Livy, XLI. 20; Polyb. XXVI. 10; 2 Macc. vi. 2, and for whom he caused a splendid temple to be erected at Athens; as a genuine Oriental syncretist he rather identified the two. Probably the magnificent temple which, according to Livy, XLI. 20, he began to build at his capital, Antiochia, but which did not arrive at its completion, was dedicated indifferently to both the Capitoline and the Olympic Zeus, the principal god of the Romans and the Greeks. The interpretations which deviate from this are accordingly to be rejected, e.g., that of several rabbins, Grotius, Bertholdt, Ständlin, etc., who think of Mars (who was evidently not a god of fortresses, but rather a god of battles), and that of Hitzig, who proposes to read אלהי קצו, not to render "god of the sea fortress," and that it should be referred to Melcarth or the Tyrian Heracles, making only the latter sentence of the verse to apply to Jupiter Capitolinus. The correct view is advocated by Gesenius, Dereser, Von Lengerke, Hävernick, Maurer, Ewald, and, generally, by a majority of recent writers, among them Vaihinger, Art. Meusim in Herzog's Real-Encyclop.—לְבַנּוֹ, "upon his basis," probably indicates that Antiochus should honor the specified divinity "on its pedestal," hence in the form of a statue or an idol-image (Bertholdt, Hävernick, Von Lengerke, Maurer, Hitzig, etc.). A less probable opinion is that the words refer to the temple of Jupiter at Rome, as being the headquarters or seat of that god, to which Antiochus forwarded gifts (Kamphausen); and finally, the rendering "in his stead," which was formerly current (Luther, Gesenius, de Wette, and more recently Kranichfeld and Füller), conflicts with the general usage and with the context, because the preceding verse did not confine its statements to a single Oriental deity, in the stead of which this new god was to arise, while the sing. suffix in בְּנֵי can hardly be held to possess a "distributive and illustrative" force (cf. vs. 20, 21).—And (the) god whom his fathers knew not shall he honor with gold and silver, etc. This god with whom the ancestors of Antiochus were not acquainted was the god of fortresses just mentioned, not a different god (Hitzig), and still less quaiscunque Deus alius (Venema). Livy, XLII. 6, expressly mentions an embassy which Antiochus sent to Rome with a votive offering of golden vessels valued at 500 pounds (a portion of which would naturally be placed in the temple of the principal god).—וְהַיָּדוֹת, "jewels, precious articles of small size," is here equivalent to בְּנֵי הַמְדוֹת, 2 Chron. xx. 25.—Verse 39. Thus shall he do in the most strong holds with a strange god; rather, "and he shall pursue the same course with the fortifications of the fortresses as with the strange god;" i.e. he shall recognize and honor them only, shall fix his attention on nothing else, the fortresses are his idols. The words are significant merely as an introduction to what is to follow; עַל in this place is merely a stronger form of בְּ, cf. Job xl. 15; ix. 26; Psa. cxx. 4; cxliii. 7; Eccl. ii. 16. By approving of this explanation, which originated with Ewald, and which we are compelled to consider the only one that accords with the context, and that is adequately supported by the general usage of the language, we reject the numerous renderings which deviate from it, that have been imposed on the passage from of old, e.g., Vulg., "Et faciet, ut muniat Mausim cum Deo alieno, quem cognovit;" Luther, "And shall greatly honor those who aid him to strengthen Mausim, with the strange god whom he has selected;" Bertholdt and Dereser, "And shall store them (the jewels) in the temples of the god of war; all who hold with the strange god," etc.; Rosenmüller, Von Lengerke, Hävernick, "And in the manner which has been described he

because the remark that he honored the god on his pedestal would be quite inappropriate, unless it had also been said that he had erected a statue to him. עַל בְּנֵי has here the same meaning as in vers. 20, 21, and 7, 'in his place or stead.' But the suffix is not, with Kliefoth, to be referred to עַל בְּנֵי, 'in the place of all that which he did not regard,' but it refers to בְּנֵי אֱלֹהִים, 'in the peace of every god;' which is not overthrown by the objection that in that case the suffix should have been in the plur., because the suffix is connected with the sing. אֱלֹהִים. The 'god of fortresses' is the personification of war, and the thought is this: He will regard no other god, but only war; the taking of fortresses he will make his god; and he will worship this god above all as the means of his gaining the world-power. Of this war god as the object of dedication, it might be said that his fathers knew nothing, because no other king had made war his religion, his god, to whom he offered up in sacrifice all, gold, silver, precious stones, jewels." We must take exception, however, to the incongruous idea of this last sentence respecting the dedication of an abstract passion; nor can we see that in any reasonable or conceivable sense this could be said to characterize the king in question—be he who he may—above all his forefathers.]

* [Kell still objects; (1) "But according to the following passage, this god (worshipped by the person in question) was not known to his fathers. That could not be said either of Mars, Jupiter, or Melkart." Kell has overlooked the description of this deity, which is not his ancestral god (although even then it would doubtless mean, as in ver. 37, the deity commonly worshipped in the country, i.e., Asiatic or Syrian), but "a strange god" (אֱלֹהִים זָרִים, ver. 38). (2) "Add to this, that if the statement here refers to the honoring of Hercules, or Mars, or Zeus, or Jupiter, then therewith all would be denied that was previously said of the king's being destitute of all religion" (Kliefoth). We cannot see that this last discrepancy would be at all improved by the identification with any other deity whatever. It simply shows that the latter passage must not be so strictly interpreted. (3) "The words thus in no respect (?) agree with Antiochus, and do not permit us to think of any definite heathen deity." Strange then that the descriptive epithet זָרִים should have been added by the sacred writer if he had so indefinite a worship in view, and stranger still that he should go on to characterize that reverence by the particulars given in this and the following verse.]

shall proceed with regard to the true feasts together with the strange gods," etc.; Maurer, "Et sic ille versabitur in obtrudendo urbibus munitis Jove Capitolino, qui agnoverit illum," etc.; Kranichfeld (and similarly de Wette), "And he shall do it to the defensive fortresses with the aid of the strange god;" Füller, "And he is active for the fortifying of the strong holds with the strange god; whoso shall acknowledge," etc.; Kliefoth, "And he shall act with the defensive fortress according to the mind of the strange god; whoso shall acknowledge," etc.; Hitzig and Kamphausen, "And he shall provide for the defensive fortresses the people of a strange god, i.e., heathen colonists" (the two latter consequently transform עֲרֵי into עֲרֵי); [Keil, "With the help of this god, who was unknown to his fathers, he will so proceed against the strong fortresses that he will reward with honor, might, and wealth those who acknowledge him."—Whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory; rather, "To him who shall acknowledge (them), he shall make the honor great;" i.e., he shall confer great honor on those who, like himself, adore the god of fortresses, and consequently make an idol of fortifications and war in general. The persons in view are probably not the heathen subjects and military officers of the king, who naturally were already devoted to this martial god and the worship of fortresses, but primarily the Jews who apostatized to that religion, such as, e.g., a Jason, Menelaus, and others (2 Macc. iv. 10, 25; v. 15).—And shall cause them to rule (or "be lords") among (the) many; i.e., among the great mass of their nation. Füller, who identifies the עֲרֵי with those noticed in v. 33, i.e., with the theocratic Jews, probably goes too far in this; but he is doubtless correct in distinguishing the phrase "set them to be lords among many" from "to make them lords over many."—And shall divide the land for gain, or "in reward," i.e., in recompense for their apostasy. Nothing definite is stated with reference to a division of lands among the apostates by Antiochus in the passages that report his bribes and promises, 1 Macc. ii. 18; iii. 30 et seq.; but it can scarcely be doubted that he employed this means also, and that especially such property as had been confiscated from obstinate Jews was conferred on the apostates.

Verses 40–45. Recapitulation of the warlike career of Antiochus Epiphanes, not distinguishing between his several campaigns against Egypt, as was the case in v. 22 et seq., but merely noticing the general character of his attacks on that country, and their unfortunate results upon Judæa. The rather general character of this paragraph, which is analogous in this respect to the descriptions of the future drawn by earlier prophets, raises the expectation that these verses will prove to be especially original and free from interpolating additions—an expectation that will be verified by the exegesis of the several verses. Influenced by the words עַד זְמַן, "and at the time of the end," which appeared to relate to the final stages of the reign of Epiphanes, although the prophet probably employed it in the same general sense as in chap. viii. 17 (with reference to the closing period of the pre-Messianic history in general); and led astray to a no less extent by the example of Porphyry, who, according to Jerome on this place, discovered the description of a fourth and last Egyptian campaign in this paragraph, which he supposed to belong to the year before that in which the reign of Antiochus closed (B.C. 165),* a majority of modern expositors have also regarded these verses as a continuation of the historical narrative, whose special object was to describe the last warlike operations of Epiphanes against Egypt, Phœnicia, and Armenia. The Maccabean books make no mention of these final wars of Antiochus, but report that he marched toward the east only, namely, to Babylonia, Elymais, and Persia, and that he died in the latter country (see 1 Macc. iii. 87; vi. 1 et seq.); but this circumstance is explained, either by assuming that the writer of those books designedly ignored the wars in question, especially the fourth Egyptian and the Armenian campaigns (Hofmann, De bellis ab Antiocho gestis), or by declaring that his representations as a whole are not worthy of credit, and for that reason giving the preference to Porphyry's statements as reported by Jerome (so especially Füller on this passage, p. 328 et seq.). The report of Porphyry, however, appears rather to have originated in a misapprehension of the paragraph under consideration; for the remaining historians of the time, and particularly Livy, Polybius, and Appian, are entirely ignorant of a fourth Egyptian campaign of Epiphanes, and the credibility of the Maccabean books, especially of the first, cannot be assailed upon the ground of their statements respecting the final actions and the death of Epiphanes, nor in any other respect; see Wernsdorf, De fide Maccab., p. 58 ss., and Wieseler, Art. Antiochus Epiphanes in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. I., 886 et seq. We therefore agree with Dereser, Von Lengerke, Maurer, Hitzig, Ewald, and Kamphausen, in regarding vs. 40–45 as being in fact a kind of abbreviating and generalizing résumé of the contents of vs. 22–39; but we explain this peculiar feature by regarding that detailed narrative of the military career of Epiphanes, as the product of the interpolating activity of a pious Jew in the Maccabean period, while we consider vs. 40–45 as being a portion of Daniel's original prophecies uttered during the era of the Captivity, which was left untouched upon the whole by the interpolator.†—And at the time of the end

* Jerome, T. V., p. 2, p. 720: "Et hæc Porphyrius ad Antiochum refert, quod undecimo anno regni sui rursus contra sororis filium, Ptolemæum Philometrem dimicaverit. Qui audiens ventis Antiochum congregaverit multa populorum milia: ad Antiochum quasi tempestas valida in curribus et in equitibus et in classe magna ingressus sit terras plurimas et transivendo universas vestaverit: veneritque ad terram inclytam, i.e., Judæam . . . et arcem munitis de ruinis murorum civitatis et sic perrexit in Egyptum."—Cf. farther the statements respecting the result of this expedition to Egypt, and respecting the connected expeditions toward the north and east, p. 721: ". . . † [The author's views here have evidently been biased by his favorite theory of an interpolation of part of this prothe king of the south shall push at him. On וְיִדְכֶם , see immediately above. וְיִדְכֶם , "shall push at," accords fully with the genuine prophetic description of chap. viii. 4. The Egyptian king clearly appears as the beginner of this conflict, for he is mentioned before the northern king. Consequently, on the assumption that a fourth Egyptian war is here spoken of, it will be necessary to hold that Ptol. Physcon and Philometor, encouraged by their alliance with the Romans, had ventured to attack the Syrian. It is hardly to be credited that the Roman histori-phcy. But the whole prediction is consecutive and naturally connected, without any repetition or redundancy. Keil, admitting a primary reference of this passage to Antiochus, argues against this supposition of a recapitulation or summary here. "If thus, according to ver. 35, the tribulation with which the people of God shall be visited by the hostile king for their purification shall last till the time of the end, then the time of the end to which the prophecies of vers. 40-45 fall cannot designate the whole duration of the conduct of this enemy, but only the end of his reign and of his persecutions, in which he perished (ver. 40). On the contrary, the reference to chap. viii. 17 avails nothing, because there also וְיִדְכֶם has the same meaning as here, i.e., it denotes the termination of the epoch referred to, and is there only made a more general expression by means of וְיִדְכֶם than here, where by וְיִדְכֶם and the connection with ver. 35 the end is more sharply defined. To this is to be added that the contents of vers. 40-45 are irreconcilable with the supposition that in them is repeated in a comprehensive form what has already been said of Antiochus, for here something new is announced, something of which nothing has been said before. This even Maurer and Hitzig have not been able to deny, but have sought to conceal as much as possible.—Maurer by the remark: 'Res a scriptore iterum ac servitus pertractatus esse, extremam vero manum operi defuisse,' and Hitzig by various turnings—'as it seems,' 'but is not precisely acknowledged,' 'the fact is nowhere else communicated'—which are obviously mere make-shifts." Stuart thus defends the belief in another and final campaign of Antiochus: "Lengertke asserts the entire improbability of another and fourth invasion of Egypt and Palestine, on the ground that Antiochus was too weak and too poor to collect forces enough to carry on such a war with success. But 1 Macc. i. 27 seq. shows us that after Antiochus had heard of the notable defeat by Judas of his general Beron, 'he was enraged, and gathered together all the forces of his kingdom, καταβάντες ἱερουσαλὴμ σφόδρα, ἄν ἐξοικονομῶν μεγάλην ἐκκλήσιν.' These he paid profusely, while in an attitude of preparation for active service, and thus exhausted his treasury, 1 Macc. i. 28, 29. To Lysias, his general, he left one-half of his troops (1 Macc. i. 34), which amounted to 47,000 (v. 39), with orders to subdue and partition on Palestine (vs. 35, 36). Went, then, Antiochus was not at that time. It is indeed true that neither Apollon, nor Polybius, nor Justin, nor Livy, nor Josephus have given us any particulars about this latest war of Antiochus; but who that has read their Syrian histories does not know that mere summaries, scraps, and fragments are all that remain of these writers in respect to Antiochus? Josephus depends on 1 Macc.; and this is mainly confined to the exploits of Judas and his brethren. Rosenmüller very appositely remarks: 'Cumque omnino integra aliqua et continua de rebus Antiochi narratione, quæ a sua ætate scriptore aliquo fide digno literis sit mandata.' The argumentum a silentio, specially in respect to ancient history, is far from being cogent and satisfactory. On the other hand, the accuracy of the statements in the book of Daniel, respecting the domain of Alexander's successors, is on all hands admitted in other cases. Here it has narrated the events of an expedition, in vs. 40-43, with its usual minuteness, and apparently in good order. Why should this testimony be rejected? Nor does it stand alone. Jerome refers to Porphyry, who wrote against the book of Daniel, as saying with respect to vs. 40-43, that they relate to the last war of Antiochus, near the close of his life. . . . Let it be remembered that Jerome does not say a word to contradict this statement, although it made for his favorite object to do so if he could, inasmuch as he might then refer the passage to his favorite Antichrist. I do not see why the testimony of the book before us, the full confirmation of it by Porphyry, and the apparent consenting attitude of Jerome, do not place the matter before us fairly out of the reach of destructive criticism."] ans, and especially Livy, should have been uninformed with regard to such a war, waged by one ally against another.*—And he shall enter into the countries, i.e., into the countries adjoining to Egypt through which his march against the latter kingdom would lead him, hence, into Coele-Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine.—And shall overflow (or "flow along") and pass (or "surge") over. The phrase employed in v. 10, with reference to the war of Antiochus Epiphanes against Ptolemy Philopater, is entirely similar.—Verse 41. He shall enter also—rather, "and he shall enter"—into the glorious land, and many countries shall be overthrown; rather, "and many shall be caused to fall." The description is scarcely as concrete as the parallel in chap. viii. 9-11, and may therefore be an original prophecy with equal probability. The case differs in vs. 28, 31 et seq. The "many" who shall be caused to fall by the northern king are probably countries or nations, as appears clearly from וְיִדְכֶם , and as the fem. וְיִדְכֶם likewise indicates (namely, וְיִדְכֶם). That plural is consequently not to be pointed וְיִדְכֶם , "ten thousands" (Psa. xci. 7), nor to be translated, with Ewald, by "rabbins, teachers of high grade," and that interpretation to be taken as an evidence of the later composition of the book.—But these shall escape out of his hand, (even) Edom and Moab and the chief (or "kernel") of the children of Ammon. וְיִדְכֶם

וְיִדְכֶם , properly, the principal power, the "firstlings of the power" of the children of Ammon (cf. Num. xxiv. 20; Jer. xlii. 35; Am. vi. 1), which probably relates to Rabbah, their chief city, and the principal seat of their power. The entire prophecy before us relative to the neighbors of Israel does not bear the look of a valde ex eventu; for although the Maccabean book (1 Macc. iv. 61; v. 3-8) notices the assistance rendered to Epiphanes by the Edomites and Ammonites against the Jews, the mention of the Moabites in this place is so much the more remarkable, as that nation is never mentioned after the captivity as maintaining an independent existence (Ezra ix. 1 and Neh. xiii. 1 afford no proof to contradict this statement, since the Moabites are not referred to in those passages from a historical point of view, but dogmatically, with reference to the passage in the law, Deut. xxiii. 3), and since the name of the Moabites had already been lost in the more comprehensive one of Arabians in the Maccabean age. It is not strange, on the other hand, that a prophet of the time immediately subsequent to the Captivity should adduce the nations of Edom, Moab, and Ammon as leading representatives of tribal hostility to the theocracy,—not remarkable in the least; cf. the older prophetic parallels, Psa. x. 10; Isa. xi. 14; xxv. 10, 15, 16; Zeph. ii. 8; Jer. xliii.; xlix. 1-6; Ezek. xxv. 1-14; xxi. 20, 28, etc. Kranichfeld remarks correctly: "The Edomites, like the Moabites and Ammonites, showed themselves the most persistent allies of the oppressors of Israel among all its neighboring relatives; and when the Chaldean catastrophe broke in upon Judah, they proved themselves her most bitter enemies. From that period, the complaint against this treacherous nation, so regardless of fraternal ties, is poured out more persistently, and the cry for revenge upon it is repeated more urgently, than against Babylon itself; cf. Obadiah; Jer. xlix. 7-22; Lam. iv. 21, 22; Ezek. xxv. 12-14; xxxv. 5; Psa. cxxxvii. 7 et seq.; Mal. i. 1-3. Although Edom, Moab, and Ammon, of all others, were connected with Israel by ties of relationship, and therefore were bound to maintain cordial relations with it in the very nature of their connection, it is precisely these nations, the unnatural oppressors of Israel, that enter into the conception of every theocrat, and especially of the prophets, as the historical representatives of all hostility against the theocracy; and as their subjugation revives the Messianic hopes (Psa. xl. 10; Isa. xi. 14; xxv. 10), so the picture of the bloody humiliation of Edom is occasionally introduced to represent the Messianic universal triumph in Isa. lxi. 1-6, etc.—Verse 42. He shall stretch forth his hand also upon the countries, i.e., upon the aggregate of the southern countries generally; cf. v. 41 a, to which the words before us are related as a generalizing repetition. [?].—And the land of Egypt shall not escape.* לֹא תִהְיֶה לְפָלִיטָהּ, properly, "shall not be among the escaped ones;" cf. Joel ii. 3; Jer. l. 20; 2 Chron. xx. 24; Ezra ix. 14.—Verse 43. And he shall have power over the treasures of gold and of silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt. Cf. supra, v. 28, where the great booty was mentioned which Antiochus carried away on his return from the second Egyptian campaign, while the statement here is very general in its character, and notices the confiscation of treasures in Egypt once for all.—And the Libyans and the Ethiopians shall be at his steps as enforced auxiliaries, who were compelled to follow the victorious king of the north, as was Egypt in former times (cf. Ezek. xxx. 5; Jer. xlv. 9). The fact that this feature is recorded in no other authorities is an additional evidence for the genuine character of this prophecy (against Hitzig).† Concerning בְּצִדְדֵי, "in his following or train," cf. the analogous בְּרִגְלָיו, in Judg. iv. 10; v. 15; also Ex. xi. 8.—Verse 44. But tidings ("rumors") out of the east and out of the north shall trouble (or "alarm") him; therefore he shall go forth with great fury, to destroy and utterly to make away many. The masculine plural יְהַלְלֵהוּ is employed here, "in view of the omission from the general idea of the statement, of the subject which originates the rumors." Cf. the analogous case in chap. ii. 33. The "alarming rumors out of the east and north" may, in fact, be referred to the expedition which Antiochus undertook shortly before he died (B.C. 166, or 147 æ. r. Sel.—see 1 Macc. iii. 37), against the Parthians under Arsaces and against the Armenians under Artaxias, and which resulted in at least the subjugation and capture of the Armenian king (see Tacitus, Hist., v. 8; Appian, Syr. 45, 46). This thought is at any rate less forced than that which refers the words to the brutal treatment accorded to Jerusalem, which was mentioned in v. 30 et seq., and also to the alleged rebellion of the Aradians in Phoenicia, which is mentioned only by Porphyry in the passage cited by Jerome (see note above; against Hitzig). It is, however, by no means necessary to regard this passage as a patet. ex eventu; on the contrary, it is exceedingly possible that the remarkable correspondence between its statements and the historical fact that Antiochus Epiphanes was recalled from his warlike operations in the south by those insurrections in the north and east, became the very occasion which led the Maccabean interpolator to introduce into the preceding verses (22-39) allusions, still more specific in character, to the history of the wars of the antitheistic tyrant, with a view to represent his entire career as having been foretold by Daniel in all its successive stages.—Verse 45. And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palace † between the seas in the glorious holy mountain; rather, "between seas and the mountain of the holy ornament." הָרֵךְ קֹדֶשׁ, the "mount of the holy ornament," certainly denotes Mount Zion, the mount on which the temple at Jerusalem was erected (cf. אֶרֶץ הַקֹּדֶשׁ, chap. viii. 9, and אֶרֶץ הַקֹּדֶשׁ vs. 16, 41, as designations of the holy land); and the plural מִדְבָּרִים must be regarded, with Hitzig, Kranichfeld, etc., and with equal certainty, either as a poetical designation of the Mediterranean Sea (cf. Job vi. 3; Eccles. i. 2), or, with Venema, Füller, and others, as denoting the two seas between which mount Zion is situated—the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean. The latter view, on which the plural is employed for the dual, is the best recommended, on account of the absence of the article from הָרֵךְ קֹדֶשׁ. There is certainly no reference to any locality outside of the holy land, as Porphyry, l. c., held, referring the two "seas" to the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, and misunderstanding the choice poetical expression מִדְבָּרִים, "tents of his palace" (cf. the corresponding Syr. word for מִדְבָּרִים, "palace," and also Jer. xliii. 10, Targ.), to the extent of assuming a place between those rivers, and bearing the name of Apedno, as the resting-place of Antiochus while contending against the Armenians and Parthians; or, as Dreeser and Hävernick have interpreted it in modern times, ren-

the usual נָסַח, to spread out, to set up, probably with reference to the great palace-like tent of the Oriental ruler, whose poles must be struck very deep into the earth. Cf. the description of the tent of Alexander the Great, which was erected after the Oriental type, in Polyæn, Strateg., IV. 3, 24, and of the tent of Nadir-Shah, in Rosenmüller, J. u. N. Morgenl., IV., p. 364 f. These tents were surrounded by a multitude of smaller tents for the guards and servants, a circumstance which explains the use of the plural.—Exell.

dering ^{נִסְתָּר} correctly, but making the "mount of the holy ornament" to designate the "mount of the sanctuary of Nanea," which lies between the Persian Gulf and the Caspian Sea, and near which they believe Antiochus to have died,—a view which Hitzig justly characterizes as "a monstrosity," and which is equally unfortunate in interpreting either ^{וְהָיָה כִּי יִבְרָךְ} or ^{וְיָבִיט}.—But he shall come to his end, and none shall help him. The death of Antiochus did not take place in Judaea itself, nor did it occur immediately after his final sojourn in that country, when his camp was in the vicinity of Jerusalem (having returned from the third Egyptian war in B.C. 168.—On the location of his camp, cf. 2 Macc. v. 24 with 1 Macc. i. 20 et seq.), but rather from two to three years later, in connection with the campaign against the Parthians and Armenians, and in the Persian town of Tabæ (Τάβαυ), which Polyb., XXXI. 11, and Porphyry, in Jerome on this passage, agree in representing as the place of his decease; cf. in addition 1 Macc. vi. 4, 8.* So sudden a transition from the scene of the over-confident oppressor's sojourn in the holy land to that of his irretrievable destruction, which did not take place until after a considerable interval, is a decided proof of the genuine prophetic character of this passage.† A testimony of no less weight is found in the analogy of the peculiar expression ^{וְהָיָה כִּי יִבְרָךְ} to the former descriptions in chap. viii. 25; ix. 26, and in the poetic coloring of the entire representation. As a characteristic feature in the latter regard, we notice the words ^{וְהָיָה כִּי יִבְרָךְ} (cf. the shorter ^{וְהָיָה כִּי יִבְרָךְ}, chap. ix. 26), which serve as a transition to chap. xii. 1-3, and form an expression that refers in very general terms to the irretrievable and irrevocable character of his destruction. It would be useless to look for an indication of insanity (Polyb., l. c.) or of painful disease (2 Macc. ix. 5, 9, 28), as having preceded the death of Epiphanes, in these words.

ETHICO-FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES RELATED TO THE HISTORY OF SALVATION, APOLOGETICAL REMARKS, AND HOMILETICAL SUGGESTIONS.

1. Our exegetical examination has resulted in leading us to regard the opening and closing verses of the section as having originated with Daniel, or more particularly, those portions of

* [Stuart thus explains this seeming discrepancy: "But why is the mention of Antiochus's encampment between the Mediterranean and Jerusalem here brought again to view, after the speaker had already followed him to the East? For the purpose of impression, I should say, rather than from any necessity of the case. 'Look at the contrast' (the speaker would seem to say): 'now Antiochus encamps in his lofty tent like a palace, meditating the overthrow of the holy city and temple: next we see him in disgrace, and even in the agonies of death, stricken by an invincible and irresistible hand.' The interest with which a Hebrew would survey this picture may be imagined, but cannot well be described."] the prophecy which relate to the development of the Persian empire and to the first beginnings of the Javanic world-power (vs. 2-4), together with those that refer to the Old-Test. antichrist as the last representative of the Græco-Asian world-kingdom (vs. 40-45); while we saw cause to regard the portion intervening between the two just indicated (vs. 5-39) as being composed of both genuine and interpolated elements. It is impossible to assert that the intermediate section is spurious throughout, because it affords many traces of original prophecy, which may be recognized by the comparative discrepancy of their statements with the corresponding facts in the history of the Seleucids and the Lagids (see, e.g., vs. 14, 19, 26, 34, 39). By far the larger portion, however, seems to have been inserted by a later hand, since the parallels found in former descriptions of the future, viz.: chap. vii. 24, and viii. 9,—passages which likewise refer to the period intervening between Alexander the Great and Antiochus Epiphanes,—are exceeded by it to an almost incredible degree in regard to the specific character of its predicted details.* It follows the succession of the Seleucid monarchs and their conflicts with the Ptolemies with such conscientious accuracy, that it may almost be considered an attempt to demonstrate the ideal tenfold number of the horns of the fourth beast in chap. vii. 24, in the particulars of history. This, however, becomes improbable from the circumstance that the number of the Syrian kings who are mentioned is by no means exactly ten, but that, on the contrary, their succession is followed in a decidedly imperfect manner, as appears from the overlooking of Antiochus Soter (see on v. 6), and from the confused interchange of the earliest kings in general (see on vs. 5-9). We observed in a former paragraph (Eth.-fund. principles on chap. vii. No. 3, a) that it could not be proven that the writer of this book assigns exactly ten kings to the period from Alexander the Great to Antiochus Epiphanes, or that he was acquainted with precisely four kings of Persia, and no more (see on chap. xi. 2). The arrangement of the series of Seleucid kings according to a numerically symbolic plan, can in nowise be asserted, whether the chapter before us be regarded as the genuine production of Daniel throughout, or as enriched (?) by later additions of the Maccabean age. On the other hand, there can be no question that it was the design of the originator of this exact description of the history of the Seleucids and the Lagids, whether Daniel himself or an inspired (?) reader of his book in the Maccabean period were that writer, to demonstrate that the Maccabean period, and it alone, formed the point in which the entire series of prophecies in the book are centred, and consequently that it constituted the immediate preparation for the Messianic period of salvation. It became necessary, "on the beginning of the predicted unexampled trial, to enable the Jewish nation to trace, step by step, that it was by the counsel of God that it should begin under precisely those circumstances, and in precisely that juncture of the progress of history" (Delitzsch). It was necessary "to connect the advent of the post-Macedonian tyrant with the time of Daniel by so continuous a chain of the most particular events, that it would be evident that no hiatus could intervene between the time of Daniel and that tyrant, in which the Messiah might appear" (Ebrard; see supra on v. 5). Cf. also Füller, pp. 362, et. seq., 368.

2. The fundamental ethical and Messianic principle of the section coincides substantially with its aim, as it was pointed out in the preceding paragraph, and as we are compelled to formulate it in common with nearly all the orthodox expositors of recent times, despite our doubts concerning its unimpaired genuineness. God will not desert his people in the changing fortunes of the world, or amid the tempestuous thronging of the nations and the tumults of the wars incited by the monarchs of the earth. Even though they be pressed during centuries between mighty contending empires as between two millstones, and be unable in their own power to prevent the raging of such foes, God will not permit them to be either ground or crushed. He does not permit the chosen people of His heritage to be overwhelmed, even though the oppressor's power should reach its highest stage, and though to his violent attempts to suppress that people by force should be added the most flattering arts of dissimulation and the most dangerous spiritual trials (cf. v. 31 et seq.). Indeed, it is precisely when the need is highest, that He comes nighest with His aid and deliverance; precisely when to human wisdom every prospect of rescue has been lost, does the judgment of God break in on the oppressor and snatch him away to irretrievable ruin—"and there is none to help him" (v. 45). The particularizing description of the tedious conflicts between the kingdoms of the north and south is evidently designed to illustrate these truths, which are closely connected with the fundamental thought of chap. viii. These truths would still constitute the ethical kernel of this section, even if the portion that is probably interpolated, vs. 5-39 (where the prophecy becomes transformed into actual history), were conceived of as being wholly expunged; but they form its leading thought in a more obvious sense, when it is remembered that that portion is at least largely composed of genuine prophecies relating to the time between Alexander and Antiochus Epiphanes. It must accordingly be admitted, even on the assumption of the partially interpolated character of the section which we have adopted, that the prophecy enters upon the course of history from the Persian era to the Asmonæan period with an unusual fullness of detail, and does this because it accorded with the Divine purpose to afford the suffering confessors of the latter epoch a strong certainty that their afflictions constituted the woes, the immediate precursors of the Messianic era of deliverance. To the extraordinary trials of the Maccabæan age, the wise providence of God designed to oppose a means of comfort and strength possessing extraordinary power, in this unusually specific portion of Daniel's prophecies. "If that affliction was unique in its kind, is it wonderful that the people was armed against it, and strengthened to endure it, by means that are likewise unique in their kind? . . . The war which Antiochus waged against Israel was not like other wars. He aimed to destroy its religion; and therefore this war is represented as a contest against God and His service. In such a war Israel stood alone and without allies, in the resistance it opposed to the powerful king and his armies. In proportion as it was deprived of ordinary means of power and resistance, and was confined to the exercise of confidence in the aid of its God, in that proportion it was necessary to strengthen its trust; and this was accomplished by means of this unique detailed prophetic description of the tribulation and the history which should precede it" (Füller, p. 363; cf. Hofmann, Weissag. u. Erf., I. 313).—We have assumed that a pious [!] theocratic investigator of the Scriptures in that period of trial, affected and surprised by the marvellously exact correspondence between the prophecy and the history of his time, sought to give a still more direct form to that correspondence, and to remove the last remains of apparent discrepancy between the prediction and the recent historical past, by inserting into the prophetic text a series of canticina ex eventu; but this can no more destroy the incomparable value and the inspired character of the prophecy before us, than, for instance, the interpolations perpetrated on the somewhat analogous predictions of the abbot Joachim of Floris († 1202) by later mystical observers of the history of the Middle Ages, for the purpose of adapting them as accurately as possible to the facts in which they were realized, can throw doubt upon the high prophetic endowment of that personage [?], or can bring into question the occurrence of really genuine prophecies in his writings (cf. Neander, Kirchen-gesch., vol. II., p. 451 et seq.; Gieseler, II. 2, p. 354, No. 8; 356, No. 9). The interpolating activity of his later admirers did not destroy the fame as a genuine prophet of that celebrated apocalypticist of the twelfth century, who, as is well known, foretold the rise of two new orders, a preaching order and a contemplative order, during the period immediately subsequent to his own, and by that very means gave occasion to the more strict (or spiritual) party among the Franciscans in the thirteenth century to construct as perfect a concordance as was possible between his predictions and the history of the origin of their own order and that of the Dominicans; nor was his contemporary, S. Hildegard († 1197), who predicted the Reformation and the order of the Jesuits (Epist., p. 160; cf. Neander, ibid., p. 448 et seq.) deprived of her fame as a richly endowed prophetess [?], by the interpolated additions which were doubtless made to her prophecies at a later period.* With equal, and still greater truthfulness, it may be asserted that the prophetic and inspired character of this book is not materially injured, in any way whatever, by the opinion that the present section has received certain adaptations and particularizing additions from a later hand, and that by this opinion, e.g., its accurate references to the expedition of Ptol. Evergetes for conquest (vs. 7, 8), to the warlike operations of Antiochus Magnus (vs. 11-19), and to the three Egyptian campaigns of Epiphanes (vs. 22-30) are most readily explained.*

3. This chapter apparently presents but few points, or none at all, for practical or homiletical treatment, as it is composed almost exclusively of prophetic descriptions of special historical events. Even the thought just presented, that the wonderful adaptation of the prediction to particular events, was conditioned upon the extraordinary severity of the Maccabæan sufferings and oppressions, seems to afford but little opportunity for practical and edifying application. Instead of emphasizing that idea in a one-sided manner, it will be better to seize on the ethical centre of the entire prophetic historical picture, or, in other words, on the truth that God will not desert His people and His holy covenant in any of the storms and changing events of the history of the nations, but that He will send deliverance in the precise moment when their need has reached its highest point—and to make this the starting-point and principal object of study. The practical fundamental thought of the section is consequently the same in substance as that contained in Psa. xli. 2-8: "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will we not fear though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. Still the city of God shall be glad with its fountain [so Luther], where are the holy tabernacles of the Most High. God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved; God shall help her, and that right early."—The fundamental thought, reduced to a briefer form, may also be expressed as follows: The Lord causes the mighty millstones (the northern and southern kingdoms) between which the people of his heritage is placed like an insignificant and impotent grain of corn, to crush each other rather than that object of their bitter oppression; or. Where the need is highest, there is God's aid nighest; or, "For a small moment have I forsaken thee; but with great mercies will I guther thee" (Isa. liv. 7; cf. Lam. v. 20; Psa. xxxvii. 25; Heb. xiii. 5, etc.).

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Verses 1-8. The Messianic deliverance and the judgment for eternal retribution. And at that time; i.e. at the time just indicated (xi. 45), when judgment shall overtake the impious oppressor, Antiochus Epiphanes, and when he shall come to his end "without a helper."* In

* [Kell (as we have seen) makes the transition from the Antiochian to the Messianic era occur at an earlier point in the prophecy, and he urges the connective force of the introductory clause of the verse, especially the ו of consecution, as a proof that no break or interval can be admitted here. This is an unnecessary straining of the phraseology. In fact, phrases of date, like וְהָיָה כִּי here, usually opposition to Hävernick's attempt to interpret וְכָל יְמֵי הָיָה in the indefinite sense of "once, at a certain time," nearly all recent expositors have justly contended: (1) that the copula ו connects this new designation of time most intimately with the preceding; (2) that it is impossible to regard the words וְכָל יְמֵי הָיָה which Hävernick adduces in comparison, otherwise than as a reference to the time indicated in the context immediately preceding; (3) that the time referred to is immediately afterward characterized as a time of trouble, which shows with sufficient clearness, that, like the mention of the וְכָל יְמֵי הָיָה in v. 3 (cf. xi. 35), the allusion is to the period of persecution under Antiochus as heretofore described.*—Shall Michael stand up, the great prince, which standeth for the children of thy people. This introduction of Michael as the heavenly ally and protector of Israel (not as the Son of God or the Messiah himself,—as Hävernick, in accord with the older exegesis, still supposes), refers back to chap. xi. 1, and also to the preliminaries to the vision as a whole in chap. x., and especially to x., 13, 21, in the same way as וְכָל יְמֵי הָיָה refers to the close of the preceding chapter. In both places עָמַד is employed sensu bellico, and denotes an armed and martial appearance (cf. xi. 14, 16, etc.). עָלָה, following וְכָל יְמֵי הָיָה, serves to express the idea of protecting oversight over, etc., as in Esth. viii. 11; ix. 16. He "stands up" or "stands there" for the children of thy people, i.e., he represents their interests in the way of actively supporting them and of protecting them; cf. chap. x. 13.—And there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time; i.e., the trouble of the faithful shall then reach its highest intensity, shall have reached its climax when deliverance finally arrives; cf. chap. xi. 45; ix. 26, 27. On the relative clause וְכָל יְמֵי הָיָה, אשר לא היה, which describes this as a time of unheard of, unprecedented trouble, cf. Ex. ix. 18, 24; Joel ii. 2, and particularly Jer. xxx. 7, which latter passage seems to have served generally as a prototype of the text.—And at that time thy people shall be delivered. Kranichfeld remarks properly, that "the deliverance of Israel (וְיִשְׂרָאֵל) which is here conceived of as accomplished under the direction of מִיכָאֵל, is coincident in fact with the descriptions of chap. vii. 18, 26 et seq., 14; ix. 24; and the entrance to the Ancient of days (vii. 18) of him who was like the son of man, and who was the spiritually endowed leader of Israel, i.e., the Mashiach, sprung from Israel itself, receives notice as being the final result and attestation of the victorious conflict maintained, under the invisible direction of the angel מִיכָאֵל, against the adversary of the theocracy, who appears in the history of the nations. The absolute identity of the Mashiach with מִיכָאֵל, whose spiritual endowments and official relations were similar to his, does not, however, become manifest from this observation—as Hävernick and others assert—despite the appropriate and well-founded application of the description to the glorified Son of man in person, in the New-Test. Apocalypse,—any more than the direct identity of Satan, the adversary of God in the angelic world, with the New-Test. antichrist, who stands under his agis, can be demonstrated."—Every one that shall be found written in the book; or, "whosoever shall find himself recorded in the book." The A. V. is literal. On כָּל in the sense of "whosoever, quicumque," cf. Isa. xliii. 7; 2 Sam. ii. 23. The book is the same as that mentioned in the similar passage, Isa. iv. 3, and hence, the book of life; cf. on chap. vii. 10. It is, of course, not to be regarded as a "list of living Israelites" (cf. Ps. lxxix. 29; Ex. xxxii. 32); nor, probably, as a "record of those who shall be delivered in the decisive hour and be permitted to live." It is rather a record of those who shall inherit eternal life, a "list of the subjects of Messiah's kingdom" (cf. Hitzig on the passage), of those who shall stand approved in the judgment, whether they live until it transpires, or are raised from the dead to meet it, according to v. 2. Hofmann (Schriftbew., I. 209) is in substantial accord with this view—the "Divine register of Israel, upon which are entered all who truly belong to Israel,"—while Füller arbitrarily applies the expression in this place to the "book of truth," chap. x. 21.—Verse 2. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth; rather, "and many of them that sleep under the earth;" literally, "many of the sleepers of the dust-land." אֲדָמָה עֶפֶר, "land, earth of dust" (i.e., the dust of the grave, cf. Ps. xxii. 16, 30; Isa. xxvi. 19, etc), is substantially equivalent to "earth-dust, soil;" the אֲדָמָה עֶפֶר are those who sleep the sleep of death in that dust of the earth; cf. Ps. xliii. 4; Job iii. 13; Jer. li. 39, 57; and also the New-Test. κοιμώμενοι, κοιμώμενοι.—Shall awake, some to everlasting life, etc. While all the ancient Christian expositors regard this as referring to the general resurrection of the dead, and, among moderns, Hävernick, Hofmann, Auberlen, Zündel, Kliefoth, etc., still agree with that view, which makes indicate a transition rather than a close sequence. Cf. Stuart, who instances especially Isa. xix. 23; xxvi. 1; and even Dan. ii. 44.]

* [Kell, on the other hand, thinks that וְכָל יְמֵי הָיָה points back to וְכָל יְמֵי הָיָה (ch. xi. 40), which he interprets as "the time of the end, when the hostile persecutor rises up to subdue the whole world," i.e., the final Antichrist. The transition appears to us precisely analogous to that found in our Lord's eschatological discourse, Matt. xxiv. 29; Mark xiii. 24; and it seems to stand here, as there, for a connecting link between the near and the remote application of the prediction. The distress of the Antiochian persecution, like that of the final siege of Jerusalem, is made the symbol of the ecclesiastico-political throes of the final catastrophe, the downfall of Judaism being there the precursor of that of the world itself. The phrase, "In that time," thus becomes parallel with the formula, "In that day," or, "In those days," "In the last day," etc., as a stereotyped designation of the Messianic era. It is the constant practice of the prophets to view these series of future events on the same plane and in the same perspective, the interval, as well that between the close of the Old Dispensation and the introduction of the New, as that between the establishment of the latter and its ultimate triumph, being left out of view. There is thus always a measure of indefiniteness in the prophetic utterances on these points, especially in the phraseology relating to these "times and seasons."]]

"many" to be equivalent to "all" (or translates, with Hofmann, Schriftbew., II. 2, 549, "and in multitudes shall they arise from the world of the dead"), a majority of writers since Bertholdt (also Kranichfeld, Füller, Küstlin, in Stud. und Krit., 1869, No. 2, p. 252) hold that the many who awake from their sleep belong solely to the nation of Israel; as Füller expresses it, p. 339: the resurrection of the dead foretold in this place is "not the last and general resurrection, but a partial one which precedes that, and is confined to Daniel's nation." It is manifest, however, that the final and general resurrection is here intended, (1) because the expression, the "sleepers of the dust of the earth" is far too general in its character, to admit of its being limited to the deceased Israelites; (2) because the mention of the eternal punishment of the wicked in the closing words of the verse would be incomprehensible, and serve no purpose, if they refer only to Israelites who are to be punished eternally (see the context immediately below); (3) further, רַב־מְנוּחָה , which primarily implies the immeasurable extent of the multitude of the resurrected dead (cf. Hofmann's rendering: "in multitudes"), may as well designate the entire world of dead arising from their graves as a large fraction of it—in the same way as πολλοί or οἱ πολλοί is frequently employed in the New Test. as synonymous with πάντες ; cf., e.g., Matt. xx. 28; xxvi. 28, with 1 John ii. 2; 1 Cor. xv. 22; Rom. v. 15, 16, with v. 12; * (4) if the earlier prophetic parallels, Isa. xxvi. 19; lxvi. 24; Ezek. xxxvii. 1-15, actually do foretell a partial resurrection which is confined to Israel (which can by no means be positively established, since they rest, without exception, on the pre-supposition of an ultimate resurrection of all men, cf. Hofmann, Schriftbew., II. 2, 401 et seq.), this will not involve that the passage before us has a similar bearing; (5) on the contrary, the expectation of a general resurrection of the dead, whose existence is abundantly evidenced in the Jewish apocalyptic literature (2 Macc. vii. 14) and in the New Test. (see especially John v. 28 et seq.; Acts xxiv. 15), would require that there should not be wanting basal testimonies to that fact in the canonical Old Test. as well, which would obviously be the case if this passage referred exclusively to a particular resurrection of the Israelites; (6) nor does the intimate connection of the passage with the preceding context, or, in other words, the concatenation of the eschatological prophecies in vs. 1-3 with the era of the Antiochian-Maccabean troubles, as described in the preceding chapter, militate against the universal character of the resurrection in question. It is evident that in the mind of the prophet that period of trial was the immediate precursor of the end of the world.* As he viewed it, the end of the persecution by Antiochus and the advent of the Messiah to introduce a new and eternal period of blessing were substantially coincident. He saw nothing at all of the long series of years that were to intervene between those Old-Test. "voices of the Messiah" and his actual birth and incarnation, nor did he observe the many centuries between His first and second advent, between the beginning of the end and the ultimate end of all things, because it was inconsistent with the nature of prophetic vision (cf. supra, Eth.-fund. principles, etc., on chap. ix. No. 1). The antitypical general judgment of all flesh was identical with the typical judgment that came upon the Old-Test. oppressor of God's people, to his understanding; and it is therefore equally one-sided to deprive the judgment here referred to of its universal character, and to reduce it to a special judgment over the good and the wicked Israelites, as Bertholdt, Hitzig, and the remaining rationalistic expositors contend,—or to arbitrarily refer v. 1 to the deliverance of Israel from the oppression of Antiochus, and therefore interpret it typically and distinctively, but vs. 2 and 3 to the general resurrection and judgment, making them antitypical and eschatological, so that an immense chasm between the time of vs. 1 and 2 is postulated, of whose existence there is no indication in the text. Against this arbitrary disruption of a description that obviously forms a unit, see Hilgenfeld, Die Propheten Esera und Daniel, p. 84, and also Kranichfeld, p. 402. A hiatus of centuries certainly exists; but it belongs between chap. xi. 45 and chap. xii. 1, and is of such a character that the prophet could have been in no way conscious of its presence.†—And some to shame, and everlasting contempt. As the awaking "to everlasting life" recalls Isa. xxvi. 19, so the arising "to shame, to everlasting contempt" (וְיָקִימוּן , stat. constr. of וְיָקִימוּן , similar to וְיָקִימוּן , constr. of וְיָקִימוּן) suggests Isa. lxvi. 24. Cf. the New-Test. expressions ἀνίστασθαι κρίσις , John v. 29, and ἀνάστασις δεινός , Rev. xx. 14.—Füller supposes, very arbitrarily, that "the resurrection to shame" is "merely a passing observation," which might be omitted from the passage without damaging its meaning. On the contrary, the mention of the eternal shame and torment which await the wicked at the judgment is a leading thought, which was not only suggested, but positively demanded, by the recent mention of the helpless and irretrievable ruin of the antichristian madman (xi. 45), and which deserves consideration as a leading proof that the judgment here foretold is not to be distinctively Jewish, but universal in its character, precisely because of this undeniable reference to chap. xi. 45 b; see supra, No. 2.—Verse 3. And they

* Cf. Calvin on that passage: "MULTOS hic ponti pro OMNIBUS, ut certum est. Neque hæc locutio debet nobis nideri absurda. Non enim RABBITO opponit angelus omnibus vel paucis, sed opponit UNI; cfr. Rom. v. 15, 19." [Keil observes that "the angel has it not in view to give a general statement regarding the resurrection of the dead, but only discloses on this point that the final salvation of the people shall not be limited to those still living at the end of the great tribulation, but shall include also those who have lost their lives during the period of the tribulation." This, however, seems an unnecessary limitation of the "many," which Keil himself admits "can only be rightly interpreted from the context." Stuart clearly argues that the connection gives it here the universal sense.]

* [This view is unnecessary, and places the prophet in a false light. Daniel does not explicitly say that these events are simultaneous, if we have rightly apprehended and expounded his language. He did not indeed clearly apprehend the length of the interval, but we are not warranted in saying that he was not aware there was any. Much less does he assert it.]

that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament. There is no more reason here than in chap. xi. 33, 35, to translate מְשִׁיבֵי לַיָּם otherwise than "the wise, prudent, or understanding" ones. It does not characterize the pious generally (who were designated as the "many," רַבִּים, in chap. xi. 33, and who are again mentioned by the same term in δ of this verse), but "those who were prominent among the people by their piety, fidelity, and steadfastness, who accomplished more than others by word and deed; and suffered more than others for the holy covenant" (Füller). It is self-evident that the activity of such theocratically wise or prudent persons would include the work of teaching, but this does not involve the necessity of rendering מְשִׁיבֵי לַיָּם directly by "teachers." This over-precise adaptation of the idea is not established by the parallel מְשִׁיבֵי הַיָּם nor by the designation of Jehovah's servant by מְשִׁיבֵי, in Isa. lii. 13 (against Hitzig). On the other hand, the too general and diluted rendering, "pious, well-disposed ones" (de Wette), has no sufficient support, e.g., in Matt. xiii. 44; for Christ's statement respecting the "righteous" in general, that "they shall shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father," is a free application, but not a translation or an explanation of this passage.—On the comparison of the shining of the "wise" מְשִׁיבֵי, properly, "to radiate brightness, to shine brightly" with that of the bright arch of heaven (רָקִיעַ, "the firmament," cf. the expositors on Gen. i. 6), see especially Ex. xxiv. 10; also Ezek. i. 22, 26, etc.—And they that turn (the) many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever. The words מְשִׁיבֵי הַיָּם seem to have been borrowed from Isa. liii. 11, but do not on that account justify the assertion of Kranichfeld, that only originators of the righteousness mediated by the priestly function,—hence priests, "who take away the sins of the people through the sacramental ceremonial"—are to be understood thereby;—a view concerning מְשִׁיבֵי that is entirely too contracted, and, at the same time, interpolating in character, which finds no support either in the former mention of theocratic sacrifices (vii. 25; viii. 11, 13; ix. 26), or in the passage, chap. ix. 24.—The stars are mentioned as symbols of the heavenly condition of the righteous who have been glorified after the image of God in 1 Cor. xv. 40 et seq.; Rev. ii. 28; cf. also supra, on chap. viii. 10.

Verse 4. Concluding exhortation of the prophesying angel. But thou, O Daniel shut up (or "conceal") the words, and seal the book. The "words" and the "book" can hardly designate the entire book of Daniel's prophecies, but refer merely to the final vision, chap. xi. 2-xii. 8 (Häverni., Von Leng., Kranichf., Füller, etc., are correct). On סָתַר as denoting a limited section of connected writing, which occupies a single roll, cf. Neh. i. 1; Jer. li. 63; also supra, on chap. ix. 2.* On סָתַר, "to conceal,"

—i.e., to preserve in secret, or not publish it—and סָתַר, "to seal," which is added to strengthen the idea, see on chap. viii. 6. Neither of the words was to be taken literally, of course (against Hitzig). What the angel required of the prophet, and to which the latter doubtless consented, was merely that he should avoid any intentional or inconsiderate publishing of the prophecy, hence, that he should transmit it into chaste, approved, and trustworthy hands, that would be prepared to treat it in accordance with its mysterious and awe-compelling subject.—To the time of the end; i.e., until the juncture indicated in v. 1, to which the entire prophecy, beginning with chap. xi. 2, is directed.—Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased; rather, "many shall search it through, and the understanding shall become great." וְרַבִּים, properly, "they shall run about," namely, for the purpose of searching or investigating; cf. Jer. v. 1; Am. viii. 12; Zech. iv. 10; 2 Chron. xvi. 9. The interpretation by "wandering about, roving about without a guide" (as contrasted with the assured guidance afforded by God's word), which was advocated by J. D. Michaelis and Von Lengerke, cannot be established; nor can the sense of "careful reading," which was adopted by Maurer, Hitzig, Ewald, etc., be demonstrated, despite the citation of the rabbinical מְשִׁיבֵי, "a line (of reading), a straight line," which is alleged as underlying the words in the text.—The whole observation was evidently intended to assign a reason for the exhortation to conceal the imparted prophecy, and treat it sacredly, and to prevent its falling into profane hands; for that prophecy was not unimportant and ordinary in its character, but a means to secure to many, who should zealously examine it in the future, a deeper insight into the ways of God, the controller of all earthly fortunes. For that reason it would be sinful to profane it. ["If Daniel, therefore, must only place the prophecy securely, that it may continue to the time of the end, the sealing then does not exclude the use of it in transcriptions, and there exists no reason for thinking that the searching into it will take place only for the first time in the end" (Keil).]

Verses 5-7. Solemn avowal, by oath, of the assured realizing of the prophecy until a determined point in the future—namely, until the expiration of the mystical three and a half years, to whose close the prophet had already been referred, chap. vii. 25 (cf. viii. 14; ix. 27). The recurrence of this comforting designation of time indicates that the contents of these verses to the end of the chapter are designed to form an epilogue, not merely to the last prophetic vision (chap. x-xii. 8), but to the entire prophetic whole book. For, as Kliefoth remarks, the angel will close, ver. 4, the last revelation, and along with it the whole prophetic work of Daniel, and dismiss him from his prophetic office, as he afterwards, ver. 13, does, after he has given him, vers. 5-12, disclosures regarding the periods of these wonderful things that were announced. He must seal the book, i.e., guard it securely from disfigurement, 'till the time of the end,' because its contents stretch out to the end. Cf. ch. viii. 26, where the reason for the sealing is stated in the words, 'for yet it shall be for many days.' Instead of such a statement as that, the time of the end is here briefly named as the terminus, down to which the revelation reaches, in harmony with the contents of ch. xi. 40-xii. 8, which comprehends the events of the time of the end."]

part of the book, and even to the whole book itself. The new scene, however, which begins with this verse, and serves to introduce the epilogue, obviously occupies a more intimate relation to the scene, chap. x. 4 et seq., which introduces the last great vision, than to the others, and may even be regarded as a resumption of that scene, with but little modification. Compare, on the one hand, the words indicating a new beginning, "Then I, Daniel, looked," etc., which recall chap. x. 5, and, on the other hand, the circumstance that the principal person in the former scene, the mighty angelic prince, "clothed in linen," still continues to be the principal person in word and action (v. 6 et seq.), although two other angels, who had not been present hitherto, now appeared (as witnesses of the oath to be taken by him; see immediately below), so that the number present was now double its former size, when only Daniel and the angelic prince in linen clothing were on the scene.—And behold, there stood other two; i.e., other than the one who had hitherto spoken and who again resumes in v. 7,—other than the priestly angelic prince in linen garments. אֲחֵרִים is certainly not used with reference to the speaker introduced in v. 6 (Hengstenb.), but refers, as it always does, to what has been previously mentioned, so that it distinguishes two other persons besides the angel who was thus far the speaker; and these enter into the prophet's range of vision at this point. There can be no doubt that these persons were likewise angels; and the following verses leave no room to question that their number was precisely two, that they might be recognized as witnesses to the oath in v. 7; cf. Deut. xix. 15; xxxi. 28; 2 Cor. xiii. 1, etc. (thus correctly, Hitzig, Kranichfeld, and in substance Kliefoth also). It would be useless, however, to venture any supposition as to who the two angels were, for the simple reason that the writer did not see fit to furnish their names. It is scarcely probable that they were Gabriel and Michael, for Daniel would certainly have noticed their presence, since he had already mentioned these two chief princes among the angels in several instances. Probably angels of inferior rank are to be conceived of, since they were capable of being witnesses in the present case. Whether they were identical with the two saints whom the prophet heard conversing together in chap. viii. 13, or not, must remain undecided. In any case, the following theories, which conflict with the context, must be rejected: (1) that one of the two אֲחֵרִים was Gabriel, whose disappearance was nowhere mentioned (Von Lengerke); (2) that one of them was Gabriel, but the other was a different angel, who was already introduced in the former scene, chap. x. 5 et seq., but had not yet been designated by name (thus Hävernicks, who consequently finds the three angels of this scene present in chap. x., without exception, but without being clearly distinguished from each other); (3) that the אֲחֵרִים were the guardian angels or princes of Persia and Græcia, mentioned in chap. x. 20 (Jerome, Luther, Grotius, Sanctius, etc.); (4) that they were Judas and Simon Maccabeus (—so J. D. Michaelis); (5) that they were the representatives of all who in the future should wait for the kingdom of God and inquire after the time of its coming (Cocceius); (6) that they were a mystical personification either of the law and prophecy (thus a gloss in the margin of the cod. Chisian.) or of reason and imagination (rabbins, e.g., Jos. Jacchiades). M. Geier already remarks respecting these and other theories of a similar character: "Hæc figmenta sunt hominum, lectus auctoritate destituta."—The one on this side of the bank of the river, and the other on that side of the bank of the river; rather, "the one here on the bank of the river, the other yonder on the bank," etc. אֲחֵרִים, usually the Heb. name for the Nile (which in the Egypt. itself is called ior [Sahid. jero, Memphit. jaro]; cf. Gesen.-Dietz., s. v., אֲחֵרִים), is here used to designate the "great river" Tigris, chap. x. 4. The reason is probably to be found in the fact that at an early period אֲחֵרִים had acquired a purely appellative signification = הַנָּהָר הַקָּדוֹן, as may appear from the poetic use of אֲחֵרִים in the sense of "channels" (cf. Job xxviii. 10; Isa. xxxiii. 21). It is useless for Hitzig and Kranichfeld to deny the purely appellative use of אֲחֵרִים in this place, and to contend instead that the Tigris is here termed the Nile by way of metonymy—from which position they deduce consequences of a more or less arbitrary character (the former, that this designation reveals that the angel who had hitherto spoken, and who now, v. 6 et seq., hovered over the water, was the guardian spirit of Egypt [cf. on chap. x. 5] and also that the author of the entire book was of Egyptian descent [!]; the latter, that "the metonymical co-ordination in fact of the Nile, representing Egypt, and the Hiddekel, the representative of the coming time of trouble [?], was designed to indicate a second Egyptian deliverance"*).—Verse 6. And one said to the man clothed in linen, etc. The subject of אֲחֵרִים is certainly not "each of the two, the one on this side and one on the other" (Theod., Syr., Kranichf., Kliefoth), but rather only one of them (אֶחָד מֵהֵם, Ibn-Ezra), as the analogy of chap. viii. 13 clearly suggests, and probably the one nearest to the prophet, on the same side of the stream as the latter, and the only one whom he could hear. This angel represents the prophet himself in his inquiry, similar to chap. viii. 13 (cf. v. 14); Jerome is therefore not in the wrong to that extent, when he substitutes "et dixi" for "et dixit (alter eorum)," without further question.—Which upon (or "above") the waters of the river; supply "stood," or "hovered." This hovering over the waters of the Tigris denotes a new position, which was not mentioned in connection with the former introduction and description of the "man clothed in linen," chap. x., and with which chap. viii. 16 is probably not to be compared (see on that passage). The fact that the revealing angel hovered over the stream was hardly for the mere purpose of placing him between the two inquiring angels on its banks, nor was it merely designed to recall the brooding of God's Spirit over the waters, Gen. i. 2 (Hitzig), but rather serves to designate the mighty and swiftly flowing stream of the Tigris—as formerly the sea (chap. vii. 2)—as a symbol of the surging world of nations over which “the good spirit of the world-power” exercises sway as a beneficent and guiding principle of order (so Fuller, probably with correctness; but he combines with it the extremely forced hypothesis that the angels on the banks of the river were intended to denote the two-fold end of the world-period, hence the two manifestations of Christ, the first in lowliness and the second in glory!)—How long to the end of the wonders? i.e., “when (עַד-כִּי, here equivalent to כִּי) shall the end, the consummation, come of the wondrous things foretold by thee?” The עַד is evidently that referred to in v. 1 (cf. chap. xi. 45), and therefore different from the אַחֲרֵי, “the last end,” concerning which Daniel makes inquiry in v. 8. The “wondrous things” (פְּלִאוֹת) themselves are the extraordinary sufferings and judicial punishments, whose instrument Antiochus, the Old-Test. Antichrist, was to become, and which are described at the end, beginning with chap. xi. 30; cf. the similar use of פְּלִאוֹת in chap. viii. 24; xi. 36; and particularly Isa. xxix. 14.—Verse 7. And he held up his right hand and his left hand. The raising of both hands was designed to impart a solemn emphasis to the act of taking the oath; cf. Deut. xxxii. 40; Ezek. xx. 5.—And swear by him that liveth for ever. בְּיָהוִי-עוֹלָם, cf. iv. 31; Deut. i. c., and Rev. x. 6. יָהִי is an adjective, not a substantive, in this place. Cf. the similar predicates connected with the names of heathen gods also, e.g., δαιμόνων θεός in the inscrip. at Shakka (Burkhardt, Reisen, etc., pp. 147, 503); Προλεμαῖος αἰωνόβιος on the Rosetta stone, lines 4, 9, 54. In connection with the true God Jehovah, the predicate vivens in æternum has the profounder significance, that He not only lives for ever, but also fixes the limit of evil for ever (Ewald, on this passage).—That for a time, times, and a half; i.e., after a time, and two times, and a half time, or, briefly, after three and a half (mystical [rather, literal]) years; cf. on chap. vii. 25. To this limitation of time, which has become familiar from its former occurrence (cf. also chap. viii. 14; ix. 27), is now added a further one, which, however, substantially coincides with it:—and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people; rather, “and when the scattering of a part of the holy people shall have ceased.” No material objection can be brought to bear against this exposition of the words וְכִשְׁכַּלּוּם נִפְץ, since נִפְץ almost invariably has the meaning “to scatter, disperse,” in the prophetic usage (cf. Isa. xi. 12; Jer. xiii. 14; ii. 20, 23), while that of “break, shatter,” seems to be confined more particularly to poetry

(cf. Psa. ii. 9; cxxxvii. 9), and further, since the rendering of כִּי by “part, division,” seems to be adequately supported by parallels like Gen. xlvii. 24; 2 Kings xi. 7; Neh. xi. 1. It is not necessary, in order to obtain this meaning, to change the pointing so as to read כִּי־כִּלְכִּלּוֹת, as Hitzig proposes. The correct view is represented by Bertholdt, Dereser, Gesenius, Hävernicks, Von Lengerke, Zündel, and substantially by Theodot., Vulg., Luther, etc., excepting only that the latter neglect to render כִּי by “part,” and either interpret it by “might, warlike power,” or leave it altogether untranslated. On the other hand, Hengstenberg, Hofmann, Maurer, Auberlen, Kranichfeld, Füller, Kliefoth, Ewald, etc., render: “When the shattering of the hand of the holy people shall have ceased” (i.e., when its power shall have been entirely broken). In support of this view it is usually contended (with Hofmann, Weiss. und Erf., i. 314 et seq.) that the idea of reuniting the scattered Israel, which occurs nowhere else in Daniel, would be presented in this place without any preparation whatever. This is as if the chapter under consideration did not present a number of other ideas, which are wholly new and have never occurred previously, e.g., the prophecy of the resurrection in v. 2; the shining of the wise like the brightness of the firmament, in v. 3; and also the contents of v. 10; or as if the mention in this book of the expectation that the dispersed people of God should be reunited, which was so familiar to the earlier prophets, could be in any way remarkable, when taken in connection with the correspondence, usually so thorough, of the range of this prophet's ideas with that of his predecessors (cf. Joel iii. 5 et seq.; Am. ix. 11 et seq.; Isa. xi. 12; Jer. li. 20 et seq., etc., etc.).* It is entirely unnecessary to adopt the historical reference to 1 Macc. v. 23, 45, 53 et seq.; 2 Macc. xii. 32, which Hitzig discovers in this passage, and regards as a proof that in this instance there is another vatic. ex eventu. There is not the slightest difficulty, however, connected with the opinion that the facts recorded in those passages of the Maccabæan books (relating to the bringing back to Judæa of the scattered Jews who lived in Galilee and Gilead among the heathen, by Judas and Simon Maccabæus), constituted a first typical fulfilment and historical exemplification of the present prophecy.†—All this shall be finished. כִּלְכִּלּוֹת, not the foregoing words, but the things spoken of, the sum of the prophecy beginning with chap. xi. 2 (inclusive of the contents of chap. xii. 1-3). ‡

than “scatter,” and of כִּלְכִּלּוֹת by completion, rather than “ceasing;” but the sense is not materially different in either case, if the prophecy refer to the persecution by Antiochus, for the hour of striking for independence was coincident with that of the deepest oppression. The metaphorical signification of power for כִּי, however, seems preferable as being more usual and natural than that of part; and the latter savors too much of a diplomatic rendering.]
† [It may reasonably be objected to this reference that it is too petty, and requires too special a rendering of the words to be of any great value.]
‡ [The “fulfilment of all these things” obviously is

Verses 8, 9. The prophet's question concerning the FINAL end, and the angel's encouraging reply. And I heard, but I understood not, namely, the information just imparted by the angel, involving a two-fold designation of the time, and also including the statement, which was especially incomprehensible to the prophet, that at the expiration of the three and a half times the dispersion of a part of Israel should have reached its end.—What shall be the end of these things? i.e., "which event is to be the last of these 'wondrous things?'" (v. 6); by the occurrence of what event shall it be possible to know that the last end of the entire series of the predicted troubles and judgments has been reached?—Hence the אֲחִירָהּ, concerning which Daniel now inquires, does not directly coincide with the עַד to which the question of the angel in v. 6 referred, but stands related to it as the final point in a course of development is related to a final period of extended duration.*—Verse 9. And he said, Go thy way, Daniel, etc. לֵךְ, as in v. 13, an encouraging remark addressed to the prophet, who had approached with anxious questioning; cf. Ecc. ix. 7. This parallel demonstrates, if there were no other reason, that it is impossible to take הִלֵּךְ in the sense of "to die, to die peacefully, to lie down to sleep," in this place, as Bertholdt, Hävernick, etc., propose.—For the words are closed up (or "concealed") and sealed till the time of the end. Cf. v. 4, where הַדְּבָרִים, "the words," is evidently employed in the same sense as here, namely, as designating the words of the prophecy, chap. xi. 2–xii. 3. The statement that these words are "concealed and sealed" till the time of the end, has, of course, a different meaning from the exhortation in that passage, "to conceal and seal" them. While that exhortation was intended to warn him earnestly against an inconsiderate desire to publish and prostitute to common uses the statements of the prophecy, the present reference to their hidden condition (i.e., to the mysterious nature of the revealed facts), is designed to encourage and to lead to humble submission to the Divine guidance, whose purposes cannot at first be understood. עַד, however, has no other signification in this place than in v. 4, or than עַד in v. 6.†

explained by the more definite statement in vers. 11 and 12, for the prophet's inquiry was expressly in order to elicit such an explanation. This is precisely analogous to our Lord's eschatological data, Matt. xxv. 34, etc.; where the nearer event alone is chronologically determined, and the final one left vague (Matt. xxv. 38).]

* [Keil likewise distinguishes between עַד and אֲחִירָהּ, but neither his nor the author's distinction seems to be very clear or well founded. In the present instance אֲחִירָהּ seems to denote the nearer sequel of the pressing emergencies in immediate view, and עַד the more distant consummation of the entire prophecy. If so, the angel does not fully answer the inquiry of ver. 6, but does Daniel's, by designating only the terminus of the Antiochian history. "Hitzig is altogether correct in thus stating the (latter) question: 'What, i.e., which event is the uttermost, the last of the פְּלִאטוֹת, that stands before the end?'" (Keil).]

Verses 10–12. Approximate determination of the final point* (the אֲחִירָהּ) of the predicted development, for the purpose of affording additional comfort and encouragement to the prophet, in his anxiety to receive information. Many shall be purified and made white, and tried, rather, "shall purify and cleanse themselves, and shall be thoroughly tried." The terms recur from chap. xi. 35, excepting that they are differently arranged, and that the two leading verbs, בָּרַר "to purify," and לָבַן "to cleanse," are to be taken in a reflexive sense, corresponding to the Hithpael, while the third צָרַךְ (Niph.) expresses the passive sense of being thoroughly tried, or of being thoroughly purified (cf. Ps. xli. 7; Prov. xxx. 5). With each of the verbs the idea of suffering and persecution on account of the faith is of course again involved, as forming the media of purifying.—But the wicked shall do wickedly. The ו in וְהַרְשִׁיעוּ is adversative, and serves to contrast the conduct of the wicked in the last time with the contemporaneous course pursued by the faithful. Cf. the free rendering of the passage in Rev. xxii. 11.—And none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand, namely, what is the meaning and ultimate aim of the predictions relating to the last time; consequently they shall then understand the prophecy, and by its light shall be able to correctly interpret the signs of the time (cf. Matt. xxiv. 32 et seq.; Luke xxi. 28 et seq.), and accordingly, to act and regulate their conduct with reference to the salvation of their souls.†—Hitzig himself realizes that it would be exceedingly inappropriate to render מְבַרְרֵיהֶם by "teachers" in this passage; but why should he arbitrarily refuse to assign to it the meaning of "understanding ones," which is the only one

עַד in both cases) can be no other here than in ver. 4. "But since, according to ver. 4, Daniel himself must shut up and seal the book, the participles in this clause, assigning the reason for לָבַן, cannot have the meaning of the perfect, but only state what is or shall be done; shut up—they shall be (remain) till the time of the end; thus they only denote the shutting up and sealing, which must be accomplished by Daniel. . . . The shutting up and sealing . . . can only consist in this, that the book should be preserved in security against any desecration of its contents, so that it might be capable of being read at all times down to the time of the end, and might be used by God's people for the strengthening of their faith; cf. ch. viii. 28.—[Keil.]

* [It is strange that a commentator will persist in calling this an "approximate estimate," when its sole object was to clear up uncertainty as to the duration of the events in prospect, and when, accordingly, precise periods of time are assigned in explicit and varied terms. Surely the whole subject is designedly left in doubt if this language does not definitely determine it.]

† [It is thus true that history in a measure interprets prophecy, or rather enables the interpreter to give vividness and detail to predictions in themselves general and obscure. So also seeing is better than reading a description, however clear. But it is not necessary to wait for the accomplishment of prophecy in order to gain an intelligent comprehension of its essential import. To maintain this would be equivalent to denying any intelligible use of language. Nor is it true, as many expositors assert, that Daniel himself did not understand these prophecies. Ver. 6 only means that he did not clearly see the application of the announcement in ver. 7 to the previous prophetic declarations, especially the mode of computing the note of time there given. This point is cleared up by the particular specifications of the present communication, and Daniel is therefore dismissed with a peaceful sense of full intelligence.]

that can be admitted here, in the former passages (xi. 35; xii. 1), where it is no less appropriate?—Verse 11. And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and an abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. On the construction of the words יִבְעֶזֶה הַיִּסְדֵּר וְגו', which denote the beginning of the 1290 days, cf., e.g., chap. ii. 16; v. 15; Ecc. ix. 1; Jer. xvii. 10, etc. יִבְעֶזֶה, as appears from the following לְיָמֵי, which does not depend on יִבְעֶזֶה after the manner of the genitive, is not an infinitive, but a "relative asyndetic connection of the præc. propheticum with עַתָּה." The לְיָמֵי in לְיָמֵי may be regarded as "expressing the fateful purpose of God," and therefore as taking the place of the jussive imperfect, which ordinarily serves that purpose (cf. xi. 18).—The expression שָׁמָּה יִבְעֶזֶה is distinguished from the synonymous יִבְעֶזֶה שָׁמָּה, chap. xi. 31, and also from יִבְעֶזֶה שָׁמָּה, solely by its greater brevity, which may be indicated by the combination "desolating abomination" (cf. also the substantially identical שָׁמָּה יִבְעֶזֶה, chap. viii. 13).^{*} It seems to be inadmissible because of the substantial identity of the expression with those former parallels, to translate this passage, with Wieseler (Die siebenzig Wochen etc., p. 109): "From the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, till the desolating of the abomination, i.e., till the destruction of the idol-altar and the rededication of the temple by Judas Maccabæus."—It has already been shown, on chap. viii. 14, that the 1290 days are substantially identical with the half year-week (ix. 27), or with the three and a half times (vii. 25; xii. 7), and that they involve an extension of that period by about half a month only (twelve to thirteen days); and it was also shown on that passage, that on the other hand the 2300 evening-mornings or 1,150 days shorten the same period by about four months. According to all the passages relating to the period of three and a half years as thus determined (in the one case exceeding those years by a few days, in the other falling below them by a few months), and especially according to the present passage, the terminus a quo for that period was the juncture when the daily sacrifice was taken away, and when the abomination of desolation was placed in the sanctuary. Our passage is silent with regard to the special terminus ad quem, which had in former passages been described as coincident, on the one hand with the judgment of the wicked author of such profanation (chap.

vii. 26; ix. 27), and on the other with the rededication of the profaned sanctuary (chap. viii. 14); in other words, the revealing angel does not precisely determine the final point of the last time of trouble (the יָמֵי, concerning which Daniel inquired, v. 8).^{*} He affords an indication, indeed, that a period of blessing should ensue on the expiration of the mystical three and a half years, by employing the beatitude of the following verse: "Blessed is he that waiteth," etc.; but he refrains from determining the exact point of time in which it should begin. Upon this point his language is even undecided and equivocal, inasmuch as he fixes the limits of the intervening time, at first at 1290, but afterwards at 1335 days—thus in the one case exceeding the measure of exactly 1277 days by thirteen, and in the other by fifty-eight days. The troubled events of the Maccabæan period, which might deserve notice as the points of the beginning and the end of the historical equivalent of the three and a half years, do not present a satisfactory reason for such vacillating predictions; for the exact period required cannot be found in that epoch, however its limits may be fixed. E.g., if, with Bertholdt, Hävernich, Von Lengerke, et al., its conclusion is assigned to the day of rededicating the temple by Judas Maccabæus, or the 25th Chisleu (Dec. 15th) of the year B.C. 164 (1 Macc. iv. 52), and the 1290 days are reckoned backward from that date, their beginning will fall on June 10th, B.C. 167, or more than five and a half months earlier than the event which is generally regarded as marking the commencement of the three and a half years (i.e., earlier than the abrogation of the daily sacrifice on the 15th Chisleu, 167; cf. 1 Macc. i. 54); nor will that reckoning consist with the arrival in Jerusalem of Apollonius, the commissioner of taxes, which might possibly be regarded as the introductory event of the period in question; for according to 1 Macc. i. 29, his arrival took place only about three months prior to the 15th Chisleu, 167, instead of 5th (cf. supra, on chap. vii.). Further, the attempt to regard the Maccabæan dedication of the temple as the characteristic fact that marked the conclusion of the 1290 days, is antagonized by the circumstance that the troubles of the Jews had by no means reached their end at that time, since the dreadful tyrant Antiochus yet lived, the citadel of Zion was still garrisoned by enemies, their leader, Lysias, who had gone to Antioch, was employed in making preparation for farther extensive operations, in order to wipe out the shame of his former defeat by Judas, and, in addition, the Ammonites, Edomites, and other heathen neighbors threatened the little band of Jews led by the Maccabees with dangerous attacks (cf. 1 Macc. iv. 35, 41; v. 1 et seq.).[†] If we assume, with Hitzig, Bleek, Hofmann, Delitzsch,

^{*} [After the precise designation of the terminus ad quem in the passage which our author last refers to, there seemed to the prophet, or rather to his angelic instructor, no need of its repetition here. Every reader would spontaneously understand the period in question, dating from an idolatrous installation, to continue till the removal of the offensive and impious object. It is evidently the term of the sacrifice.]

Füller, etc., that the death of Epiphanes, which took place somewhat later than the dedication of the temple, ended the 1290 days, we are met by the difficulty of ascertaining the date of his death, which has not been preserved by any historical authorities that have descended to our times, and for that reason cannot be definitely settled. That Epiphanes died precisely 140 days after the dedication of the temple, is a mere assumption of Hitzig, Bleek, etc., based on a comparison of the 1150 days of chap. viii. 14,—which, it is asserted, extend exactly to the dedication—with the 1290 days of the present passage. This assumption appears the more uncertain, in proportion as, on the one hand, it becomes impossible to exactly accommodate those 1150 days between the desecration of the temple and the ascertained date of its rededication (cf. on chap. viii. 14), and as, on the other hand, it becomes difficult to reconcile the date of the death of Antiochus, as thus assumed, with historical statements respecting his end which have been preserved to us.* We are accordingly compelled to abandon every attempt to demonstrate an exact correspondence between the time indicated in the text and the periods of the Maccabæan era of persecution, and to remain content with the hypothesis that the 1290 days have a merely mystical and symbolical significance.† The merely approximate character of the correspondence between the prophetic measurement of time and the chronological relations of the history of its typical realization, with which we were obliged to content ourselves in a former instance, in connection with the 1150 days, returns here in a somewhat different manner. In that instance we found a considerable minus in comparison with the number 1277, and here a smaller plus.‡ It will scarcely become possible to ever assign a more definite reason for this two-fold discrepancy than that the seer's attention was to be emphatically called to the approximation of the designation of time. Cf. Kranichfeld also, p. 413, who justly observes in opposition to the artificial attempts to ascertain the exact historical grounds for the difference between the 1150 and 1290 days, which he adduces, that "it is, moreover, an assertion which can never be exegetically established, that the deliverance of the nation, the destruction of the foe, and the restoration of the order of worship are everywhere in this book regarded as separate in time. On the contrary, they designate the same juncture of time at the end, as seen in the prophet's perspective, which appears from their indiscriminate application, or in other words, from the substitution of one for another; cf. vii. 25 with 26; viii. 14 with 25 et seq.; ix. 24 with 26, 27; xi. 45 with xii. 1. . . . For the rest, the profanation of the temple which an Antiochus Epiphanes imposed on Israel during three years, continues to be a historical exemplification of the facts revealed to Daniel's prophetic vision, in the face of the 1290 days, and despite the fact that in the nature of the case it accords but relatively with them in a formal aspect."*—Verse 12. Blessed is he that waiteth (or "is steadfast to the end") and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days. In view of its connection with the foregoing, the meaning of this exclamation can only be as follows: "After 1290 days have expired, the tribulation shall end; it shall not be completely ended, however, until forty-five additional days (one and a half months) have elapsed, hence, until a total of 1335 days has been reached." Here again we believe ourselves obliged to rest satisfied with finding a symbolic and approximate value in the relation of the several numbers to each other; cf. the remarks on this point in a former connection, Eth.-fund. principles, etc., on chap. viii. No. 1. Among the various attempts that have been made to explain with historical accuracy the difference of forty-five days between the time fixed by v. 11 and that given in v. 12, none have succeeded in realizing an entirely satisfactory result: e.g., (1) that of Hitzig, based on the assumption that the 1335 days extend to the reception from Tabæ of the tidings respecting the death of Antiochus, forty-five (?) days subsequent to his demise; (2) the

* The precarious character of all combinations bearing on this question may appear from the following calculation by Hitzig (p. 226 et seq.): "Antiochus (1 Mac. i. 10) ascended the throne in the year 137 æ. Sel., and he died (1 Mac. vi. 16) in the year 149; consequently his reign falls between April, B.C. 176 and March, 163. But we possess a coin of Seleucus bearing the number of the year PAZ (see Eckhel, Doctr. num., III. 222), which shows that Seleucus still reigned at least at the beginning of the last quarter of B.C. 178. Antiochus became king during the month of October, 176, at the earliest; and if he reigned not quite twelve years, according to Apollonius, Syr., c. 106, we may perhaps regard the eleven years 175-165 as being full, and obtain, in addition, the fraction of the twelfth year by including a remnant of 176 possibly, and certainly by adding the first months of 164 (at least as far as April). Accordingly if, as we believe, the author referred in v. 11 to the death of Antiochus as the end of the period, it follows that the latter died 140 days after the dedication of the temple (see on viii. 14), on the fifteenth to eighteenth day of the second month 149 (Jewish), i.e., on the thirtieth of the eighth month (Artemisius) 148 Sel. This result harmonizes excellently with that coin, and also with Apollonius (?). On the other hand, when Eusebius (Chron., l. 343) assigns eleven years to the reign of Antiochus, from Olymp. 151, 3, to Olymp. 154, 1, or from B.C. 174 to 164, there is an error, not only with respect to the point of departure, but also with regard to the end, since the death of the king transpired during the second half of the Olympiad; Antiochus died in Olymp. 153, 4." Bleek ventures a similar calculation (Theolog. Zeitschr., p. 298 et seq.), in which the words "perhaps, probably, I believe," occur suspiciously often.

‡ [This excess or deficiency is occasioned by the erroneous interpretation of the "2900 evening-mornings" as being 1150 days (cf. on ch. viii. 14), and by taking the three and a half years too strictly.]

* [It seems to us that the following explanations of Stuart fairly and sufficiently meet the difficulties or "discrepancies" raised by the author: "The 1290 days are more specific than the phrase, 'time, times and a half,' in ver. 7, and also in vii. 25. The latter ('time,' etc.) is, as it were, a round number, three and a half first equalling the one half of the sacred number seven, and the fractional part equalling the half of one year. In such a case minute exactness of course is not to be expected. But the thirty additional days here (over 1290 days = forty-two months = three and a half years) are doubtless designed as an exact account of time during which the detestable (desolating) abomination continued in the temple. The terminus a quo is the time when Antiochus first removed the daily sacrifice, which probably was near the end of May or at the beginning of June in B.C. 168. Judas Maccabeus removed this $\pi\rho\sigma\epsilon\upsilon\chi\eta$, and purified the temple, Dec. 25th of B.C. 165, making the time in question, i.e., three and a half years, as nearly as history will enable us to state it. There can hardly be room for doubt that the statement in our text is minutely correct. The work of Judas there is the terminus ad quem of the period in question."] assumption of Füller, that the 15th Xanthicus (April) of the year B.C. 164 (?), when a letter from Antiochus V. Eupator to the Jews reached Jerusalem, according to 2 Macc. xi., which contained the welcome proffer of peace, marks the end of the 1335 days; and (3) the theory of Bertholdt, Hävernick, Von Lengerke, Wieseler, etc., that while the 1290 days extended to the dedication of the temple, the 1335 days reached down to the death of Antiochus, forty-five days afterward. Against the latter opinion it may be objected that the interval between the dedication of the temple and the death of Antiochus was unquestionably longer than forty-five days; or, in other words, that Epiphanes did not die as early as the month of Shebat in the year 148 æ. Sel., as those scholars (including Wieseler in Herzog's Real-Encyclop., I. 387, Art. Antiochus) assume, in contradiction of 1 Macc. vi. 16 (cf. also Hitzig, p. 226, and Füller, p. 357 et seq.).* The two former theories, on the other hand, are open to the objection that the reception of the news from Tabæ of the king's death, and also of the offers of peace from Antioch, were events of far too little importance to lead the writer (whether prophesying ex eventu, or by virtue of a disclosure of the future from God) to assign to either of them the dignity of marking the final conclusion of all troubles. The letter from Eupator was merely an offer of peace, and

and not the peace itself; and at the time both of its arrival and of the tidings from Tabæ, the horizon of Judæa was far too dark to enable a pseudo-Daniel, writing at that day, to announce the end of all the sufferings of his nation as having already arrived, or as being immediately at hand (cf. 1 Macc. iv. 35; vi. 17 et seq.), on the ground merely that such messages had been received. The mode of escape from the difficulty that is adopted by Kirmas, Bleek, Delitzsch, et al., is however still more questionable than the reference of the 1335 days to any of the events that were adduced in support of the foregoing theories. It assumes that some other fact of an encouraging nature, which is no longer found in our historical documents, formed the terminus ad quem of the 1335 days of the prophet; and is clearly nothing more than an expedient prompted by embarrassment and helpless discouragement, which feelings our theory of the merely symbolic value of the designation of time serves to justify better than any other hypothesis. Cf. Kliefoth, p. 514: "In extending this period of 1290 days by forty-five, the design probably was merely to indicate that whoever should live in patience and religious faith beyond the 1290 days, i.e., beyond the death of the wicked oppressor Antiochus, should be accounted blessed. The forty-five days are mentioned for the purpose merely of expressing that idea of surviving, and the form of the expression was governed solely by a desire to retain the analogy of v. 11." Also Kranichfeld, p. 416: "The period of final conflict which leads to the victory is here described as being very brief, comparatively, for the purpose of comforting and encouraging the pious ones; it is not measured by years, but merely by fractions of months. The half of a cycle of three months here takes the place of the limited period in the mind of the writer, according to ix. 26; viii. 25, etc.; and by the arithmetical measurement of time by days which is current in this book, it obtains the forty-five days which lie outside of the period of 1290 days or three and a half times," etc. Cf. also the Eth.-fund. principles, No. 2.

Verse 13. Concluding exhortation and promise. But go thou thy way (rather, "on") till the end. 𐤁𐤏𐤍𐤁, properly, "and thou," with conclusive 𐤁, but which may also be taken in an adversative sense, because it leads over from the foregoing to the close in an encouraging manner. 𐤏𐤁𐤏𐤁 𐤏𐤁 is of course to be understood according to the analogy of v. 9: "go on, toward the final point of the predicted events;" not "go thy way" (Hitzig), nor yet "go toward thy end" (Hävernick, Fuller, Kliefoth, etc.), for 𐤏𐤁 is clearly shown by the article to refer to the same end as that mentioned in v. 9.—For thou shalt rest and stand in thy lot at the end of the days; i.e., thou shalt rest in the grave, in the quiet sleep of death (cf. Isa. lvii. 2, and supra, v. 2). The meaning is, "that thou mayest rest, and enter on thy lot," etc., i.e., that thou mayest receive thy portion of the inheritance at the judgment of eternal recompense; cf. chap. vii. 18, 27; Rev. xx. 6. The thought refers back undeniably to vs. 2, 3, hence to the Messianic recompense, of which Daniel also should par-

* [The author is far too positive concerning the irreconcilability of this period with the death of Antiochus, as the following computation by Stuart will suffice to show: "It appears from chap. xi. 40-44 above, that Antiochus made another and final invasion of Egypt, near the close of his life, after which he marched against Palestine. Mattathias and his sons, in the mean time, had been organising the party of the pious, and Antiochus was exceedingly indignant at the efforts which they made and the success with which they were attended. In 1 Macc. ii. 26-37, we have an account of the situation of Antiochus while in the 'glorious land.' His treasury was empty. He had already robbed the temple of all which it contained that was of any value, and he was necessitated to look to another quarter. He left half of his army, therefore, with Lysias, one of his favorite officers, and passed over the Euphrates in order to rife the countries of the East. First he went through and subdued Armenia (𐤏𐤁𐤏𐤁 𐤏𐤁𐤏𐤁, v. 37), and then turned off to rob the temple at Elymais, where he met with disgrace, and finally with death. Not long after the departure of Antiochus, Lysias began the contest in Palestine in serious earnest; but Judas uniformly triumphed in all his encounters; and so decisive was one of them over Lysias, that Judas proceeded to purify the temple and to restore its worship, 1 Macc. iv. 36 seq. All this must have occupied some months; and the consecration of the temple took place the 25th of Dec. 165 B.C. Of course Antiochus had had sufficient time for his conquest in Armenia and for his advance to Elymais before the winter had far advanced. It was in early spring that he undertook the robbery of the temple in Elymais; after which, on his retreat, the news met him of total defeat in Palestine, and helped to increase the malady under which he was then laboring. In 1 Macc. vi. 1 seq., is an account of the close of the life of Antiochus, and of his failure at Elymais. If we now count onward, from the consecration of the temple by Judas to the time when Antiochus deceased, we shall perceive at once that the period of 1335 days is in all probability the period of Antiochus' death. From the time that the daily burnt-offering was removed by Apollonius, at the command of Antiochus, to the time of the reconsecration, were 1290. From the same terminus a quo to the death of Antiochus were 1335 days, i.e., forty-five days more than is included in the preceding period. History has not anywhere recorded the precise day of Antiochus' death; so that we cannot compare the passage before us with that. But we are certain as to the order of events, and as to the season of the year, as well as the year itself, in which the death of this king took place. Of the general accuracy there can be no doubt; and such are the chronological designations of this book that we may safely rely, in this case, on its minute accuracy."] take, and a majority of interpreters recognize that fact; but they generally pervert the meaning of וַתִּשְׁמַר, so as to make it apply to the resurrection (standing up) for the purpose of being thus recompensed. The correct view in this respect is advocated, e.g., by Ewald, Kamp-hausen, Kranichfeld, etc.—Hitzig's interpretation is very flat and exceedingly forced (in partial imitation of Grotius and Dathe): "And thou, go on to the goal, and thou mayest be content (!), and attend to thy office (!) for the end of days."—[וְגֵרָלִי, lot, of the inheritance divided to the Israelites by lot, referred to the inheritance of the saints in light (Col. i. 12), which shall be possessed by the righteous after the resurrection from the dead in the heavenly Jerusalem. לְגַלְגָלִי, to = at the end of the days, i.e., not = מִתְקַרְרֵי הַיָּמִים, in the Messianic (rather Antiochian) time, but in the last days, when, after the judgment of the world, the kingdom of glory shall appear.—Well shall it be for us if in the end of our days we too are able to depart hence with such consolation of hope!"—Koik]

ETHICO-FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES RELATED TO THE HISTORY OF SALVATION, APOLOGETICAL REMARKS, AND HOMILETICAL SUGGESTIONS.

1. The fundamental dogmatic thought that is especially prominent in this closing section is the future resurrection of the dead and their eternal destiny, as predicted in vs. 1-3, and as again repeated and confirmed in the closing words of v. 18. That in the meaning of the book this resurrection is not to be regarded as confined to Israel only, but rather as universal in its scope, has been shown in the remarks on v. 2. It remains only to briefly answer the important question respecting the relation of that prediction to the Maccabean age, which primarily afforded a typical and preliminary realization only of the prophecies of Daniel in general. Is it necessary, for instance, to take the entire prophecy in a figurative sense, as Derser does, and to apply it merely to a spiritual or national resurrection of the nation from its former condition of apparent helplessness and death? Or are we, with Bertholdt, Hitzig, and the remaining rationalistic exegetes, to charge the prophet with having committed a gross error, in conceiving of the end of the world, the resurrection, and the judgment as immediately consequent on the death of Ant. Epiphanes?—Neither of the two would be correct; on the contrary, we are again reminded of the perspective character of prophetic vision in this connection, according to which the interval between the preliminary and the ultimate end was overlooked, from the point of view occupied by the prophesying seer long before either came to pass. By virtue of this perspective vision, the Old-Test. and the New-Test. Antichrists become one, which is true also of all the circumstances and results connected with their appearance. "As Antiochus became a type of Antichrist, so the oppression of the Old-Test. community of God's people by him became a type of the oppression of the New-Test. congregation of the people of God by the latter. And as little as it surprises us that Joel iii. 1 et seq. should make the preliminary signs of the end follow immediately upon the pouring out of God's Spirit, with which the last world-period begins, without remarking the period intervening between them; or as easily as we can explain the fact that Amos ix. should predict the restoration of the fallen tabernacle of David and the final return of Israel to its native land, immediately after the judgment which he denounces upon the nation, thus overlooking the whole of the immense period in the course of which Israel indeed returned to its country, but was a second time expelled by the Romans; or as little as we charge untruthfulness upon the prophet Ezekiel, when, in chap. xxxvi., he announces to the mountains of Israel the future return of the nation, and adds that God would show greater kindness to them than ever before, because this was not fulfilled on their first return; or as natural as we find it that in chap. xi. Isaiah should connect a description of the glory and peace of Christ's kingdom, which shall only be realized at His second coming, with the words, "there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse," which are regarded as bearing on the appearance of Christ in lowliness, thus viewing Christ's first and second advents together; so little should it surprise us or seem incompatible with the nature of prophecy, that the present prediction should represent the Seleucid persecution as being immediately followed by the full and final deliverance of the nation, without observing that a long series of years intervenes between the two. . . . Call it prophetic limitation, or whatever else we will, it is nevertheless the manner of the prophets; and the fact that we find it exemplified in the present instance is to us an evidence that the prophecy is genuine. Why do its opponents neglect to show how the prophecy respecting the resurrection of the dead immediately after the decease of Antiochus can be reconciled with their view concerning the composition of the book? If it was written immediately before the death of Antiochus, what was there to excite the hope that the time of blessing and the resurrection of the dead should follow immediately afterward? And if it was felt that such a hope was warranted, and it was not realized, were men not deceived? Who would have attached further value to such a mistaken prophecy?—But if it was composed after the death of Antiochus, it becomes wholly inconceivable that the false prophet should have compromised his pretended prophecy by this conclusion. But the features that are inconceivable on the presumption that the prophecy is spurious, are readily explained on the view that it was the actual Daniel who prophesied thus, centuries before Antiochus. The truth of his prophecy was in that case so incontrovertibly assured in the time of Antiochus, that

* Cf. Derser on the passage: "Many Israelites who lived during the persecution . . . in rocky caverns, where the dead were bestowed, or who seemed to lie in the dust like a lifeless corpse, shall, so to speak, awake to renewed life through the goodness and power of God, and shall perform actions by which they shall live forever in history. On the other hand, the apostate Jews — shall be branded with everlasting shame."

the apparent failure of its prediction concerning the resurrection of the dead (or, more properly, the delay of its fulfilment) was no longer sufficient to cast a doubt upon it. In one word, this passage of our book, usually considered so difficult, is so little worthy to be regarded as the heel of Achilles in the case, that it rather constitutes its strength, before which its assailants are put to shame" (Füller, p. 343 et seq.).—It should, however, be observed in this connection that the leading idea in the prophecy in vs. 1-3 is not the prediction of the resurrection, but rather the universal and eternal recompense to be meted out to them. The rising of the many "sleepers in the dust of the earth," as predicted in v. 2, is at bottom a mere auxiliary thought, or a preparation for the principal feature of the prophecy, consisting in the promise of everlasting life to the pious, and the denouncing of everlasting shame and torment upon the wicked. Inasmuch as the judgment upon the Old-Test. Antichrist, as foretold in a former passage (chap. xi. 45), forms, in a measure, the opening act and point of commencement of this great recompensing judgment, all subsequent instances of such judgment must appear as a continued series of displays of the Divine righteousness, whose final conclusion at the last judgment will constitute the highest and most perfect, but not the only fulfilment of this prophetic passage. Among such displays of God's justice may be reckoned the end of the tyrant Herod and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, the subjugation of the Eastern churches by Islamism and the overthrow of the Middle-age Papal church by the Reformation.—As the eternal recompense, so the awaking of the dead, which forms its substratum and preliminary condition, reaches far into the history of time and earth, extending itself close to the historical position of our prophet, even though Jesus Christ, as the first fruits of them that sleep, began the blessed series of those who shall have a part in the "resurrection of the just" (Luke xiv. 14; xx. 36; 1 Cor. xv. 20 et seq.), and though, consequently, He was the first who could say with entire truth, "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear him shall live" (John v. 25; cf. vs. 28, 29). Both the preliminary judgment of the world, which is transpiring in the events of history, and the ethical resurrection in Christ Jesus of the spiritually dead, which is the basis and pre-condition of the future resurrection of all flesh,—both these have their beginning at the very point where the prophet's scope of vision ends, and by that fact attest the truth and the Divine origin of his predictions, to which the Lord would assuredly not have repeatedly appealed and referred, had He not considered this book equal, in its inspired character, to any of the remaining prophets of the Old Covenant (cf. the Introd. § 6).

2. The prophecy, which forms the second leading thought of this section, relates to the point of time of the end. It repeats in substance the mystical (?) measure of time noticed in a former section, by which the last severe trouble of God's people should continue during three and a half times, and adds a further period of one and a half months, during which the last remnants of suffering and trouble shall be removed. It was shown above that the historical conditions of the Maccabæan period afford but little countenance to the assumption that these periods of 1290 and 1335 days were invented to accord with the course of events in the experience of the past. It was also shown in a former instance (on chap. vii. 25) that the underlying idea, which is common to all the parallel mystical limitations of time (the half-week, the three and a half times, the 1150, 1290, 1335 days), is that the time of suffering should be shortened,—that the time of tribulation should indeed begin, but should be broken through at the middle, and by the grace of God should quickly be brought to its close. It is consequently a time to which the words of the Saviour respecting the shortening of the days of tribulation (κολοβωθῆναι, Matt. xxiv. 22; Mark xiii. 20) will apply. It will be sufficient to notice, in this connection, that this mysterious period, which received a first approximate [!] fulfilment in the great religious persecution of the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes, appeared a second time in the Jewish war, which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus (A.D. 66-70), and that a third and final fulfilment of the same period is in anticipation, in the last days before the return of Christ, according to Rev. xii. 14; xiii. 5, when the church shall be overtaken by a time of severe trial and purification. Cf. Auberlen (Daniel, p. 287), who, somewhat vaguely and generally characterizes the three and a half times as "the period of the world-power, during which the supremacy over the kingdom of heaven is given to the earthly kingdoms," and then proceeds: "So, then, this number is resumed in the Apocalypse, in order to characterize the times of the heathen, during which Jerusalem is trodden under foot, and in which, consequently, the kingdom of God has wholly lost its outward and visible existence in the earth—hence the times from the Roman destruction of Jerusalem to the return of Christ (more correctly, without doubt, the last and most momentous epoch of that time, or the epoch of the New-Test. Antichrist). Cf. Luke xxi. 24, and Rev. xi. 2, both of which speak of the treading under foot of the holy city by the heathen, to continue, according to the former passage, until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled, and, according to the latter, until forty-two months (= 3½ years = 1260 days) are past. To this negative designation Rev. xiii. 5 adds a positive, according to which the forty-two months denote the duration of the power of the beast, i.e., of the world-power. The only remaining passage in the Apocalypse which mentions the 1260 days, chap. xi. 3, might likewise be explained by this opinion. . . . The congregation therefore finds room in the heathen world, but it is also given over to the dominion of the world-power; it rests under the protection of that power, but also under its pressure; it is a suffering and militant church to this day. Precisely this correlation of protection and oppression forms the specific feature of the relation of the congregation to the world-power throughout the history of the church." Delitzsch (p. 285) is more cautious, that is, he avoids the excessive extension of the three and a half times until they cover a period of many centuries, and contents himself with observing that "in the antitypical history of the last times, these measures of time, the three and a half years, 1290 and 1335 days, shall yet become important;" and Kliefoth (p. 503) contends for that interpretation of the three and a half times which holds that they denote "the highest development of the power of Antichrist, and his end," immediately before the manifestation of Christ.

Probably the opinion of those is likewise not to be at once rejected, who hold that there was also a typical relation between the three and a half times of Daniel and the public life of Jesus, which covered three to four years, whether they regard the latter period as a period of continued trial and suffering, which became more intense toward its close (cf. Luke xiii. 6-9: the three years of laborious and vain attempts on the part of the Lord to convert the barren fig-tree, Israel), or whether they find in it the first half of the mystical week mentioned in chap. ix. 27, and let the second, which corresponds directly to the three and a half years, follow immediately afterward (cf. supra, the history of the exposition of chap. ix. 24-27). Ebrard has recently put forth a particularly noteworthy effort to carry out the latter of these views, with special regard to the chronology of the leading events in the life of Christ, although his attempt involves much that is artificial and arbitrary (Christliche Dogmatik, 2d ed., II. 747; cf. his Kritik der evang. Geschichte, 3d ed., pp. 165, 196 et seq.;—and for a criticism of his views, cf. Bähring, in Schenkel's Allg. kirchl. Zeitschrift, 1867, p. 579).

3. Homiletical suggestions.—As in the Oratio eschatologica by Christ (Matt. xxiv. par.) and especially in its intermediate parts (vs. 29-36), so in the present section there are two principal questions whose investigation devolves on the homiletical student; and they succeed each other in the same order as in that section of the gospels: (1) the question concerning the pre-conditions and the course of the end of the world and the final judgment (see vs. 1-3); and (2) the question relating to the preceding development, or to the time of the end of the world (see v. 5 et seq.). In answer to the first question, vs. 1-3 indicate that the sufferings and sorrows of God's people shall attain to an unprecedented height, as a necessary preparation for their deliverance by the Messiah; and further, that the general resurrection of all the dead, whether pious or godless, forms a prerequisite and preparation to pave the way for the judgment of the world, which is to dispense eternal rewards and punishments. The revealing angel answers the second question in vs. 7, 11, and 12, so far as to state that the last times shall constitute a period of suffering, through which the faithful ones must urge their way, but which shall be shortened and broken through at the middle by the grace of God,—in which is contained, at the same time, a reference to the sudden and unexpected introduction of the final time of the end, or to the coming of the judge of the world like a thief in the night (Matt. xxiv. 36, 42, 44; Luke xxi. 34 et seq.; 1 Thess. v. 2 et seq.). The solution of both questions leads to an exhortation to patient, contented, and watchful waiting for the fulfilment of the prophecy respecting the last end (vs. 4, 9, 13—cf. Matt. xxiv. 32 et seq., 42 et seq.; xxv. 1 et seq.). Thus all the leading features of the Scriptural doctrine of the last things (Mors tua, judicium postremum, gloria celi, et dolor inferni, etc.) are comprehended within the narrow limits of this chapter, and are there properly arranged for practical and edifying discussion, either in a single study or in several.

Single passages.

On v. 1, Luther: "This does not signify physical sufferings, which were far greater at the destruction of Jerusalem, in Rome, and in many other cities and countries; but the suffering of souls, or the spiritual affliction of the church, as prefigured by the sufferings of Christ. For physical sufferings are temporary, and cease with the body. But the question here is whether the church shall fall or stand, which the devil had attacked in two directions through the agency of Antichrist: on the one hand, by an Epicurean contempt for the sacraments and the Word of God, on the other, by the terrors and despair of conscience, in which no proper comfort of the graces (was found), but only wretched tortures, which vexed men with the sufficiency of their own doings and with their works (of which, however, the Epicureans and heathen know nothing); hence, that it was time that Michael should arouse himself, and not suffer Christendom to be destroyed at its last gasp, but to comfort and collect it again by his beneficent word of grace." —Melancthon: "Semper oportet nobis notam esse et infirmam animis hanc doctrinam, quod Ecclesia sit subjecta cruci, et cur sit subjecta, videlicet, quia vult Deus intelligi ab Ecclesia iram adversus peccatum, quam mundus contemnit. . . . Agnoscant igitur pii Ecclesie ærumnas, et propter Dei gloriam ac propriam salutem et publicam necessitatem acriter incumbant in Evangelii studium, et toto pectore Deum innocent, ut Ecclesiam conservet, defendat, et augeat.—Quatuor autem consolationes h. l. traduntur, quæ piis omnibus semper in conspectu esse debent: 1. Prima est, quod Ecclesia non sit penitus interitura, sed tunc quoque in illis periculis duratura. 2. Secunda consolatio, quod ibi sunt futura Ecclesie membra, ubicumque erunt amplexcentes puram Evangelii doctrinam; erit enim, ut inquit, dispersio populi (cf. v. 7). 3. Tertia consolatio, quod in his tantis periculis habitura sit Ecclesia defensorem Filium Dei (Michaelen). 4. Quarta consolatio est, quam hic quoque proponit Angelus: Quum ærumnas non sint futura perpetue, hac spe facilius eas feramus, quod piis promittitur gloriosa liberatio et æterna letitia; impii vero denuntiantur æterni cruciatus."—Starke: "God permits the persecution of His church to reach its highest point that His help may be so much the more glorious."

On vs. 2, 3, Jerome: "Oppresso Antichristo et spiritu Salvatoris extincto salvabitur populus, qui scriptus fuerit in libro Dei, et pro diversitate meritum alii resurgent in vitam æternam, et alii in opprobrium sempiternum. Magistri autem habebunt similitudinem celi, et qui alios erudierunt, stellarum fulgori comparabuntur. NON ENIM SUFFICIT SCIRE SAPIENTIAM, NISI ET ALIOS ERUDIAS; TACITUSQUE SERMO DOCTRINÆ, ALIUM NON EDIFICANS (cf. 1 Cor. xiv. 3 ss.), MERCEDEM OPERIS RECIPERE NON POTEST."—Melancthon: "Facilius ferimus hujus vite miseria, cum quasi metam prospectamus, et scimus aliquando Ecclesiam ex tantis malis elucturam esse. . . . Videmus nunc quidem misere dissipatum esse populum Dei : quare non procul abest resuscitatio mortuorum."—Starke : "Since the faithful martyrs, who loved not their lives unto the death, are to have the preference over others in the resurrection (1 Cor. xv. 23 et seq.), should it contradict the righteousness of God that the greatest persecutors of the church, as the first-born sons of hell, should be raised before the general resurrection of the dead, and be the first to be cast into hell with soul and body (comp. Rev. xix. 20 with Rom. ii. 9)?—Forward, then, ye teachers of the Gospel ! do not become wearied in your office ! Rather devote tongue, pen, and life to point men to Christ as the true righteousness ! Suffer in patience everything that the wicked world can do to you on that account ! The magnitude of your gracious reward is well worth such industry and patience !" On v. 4, Jerome : "Etiam in Apocalypsi Joannis liber videtur signatus septem sigillis intus et foris. . . . Librum autem illum potest solvere, qui Scripturarum sacramenta cognovit, et intelligit signata et verba tenebrosa propter mysteriorum magnitudinem, et interpretatur parabolas, et occidentem litteram transfert in spiritum vivificantem."—Oslander : "The Divine prophecies are only then correctly understood when they are in course of fulfilment (cf. 2 Pet. i. 20)."

On vs. 7, 11, 12, Melancthon : "Meta sunt temporum mirabili consilio Dei constituta. Et quancumque Christus diem illum soli patri notum esse inquit nec vult nos curiosos querere certum diem aut annum, sed semper velut in statione paratos expectare illum letissimum diem, quo se ostendet universo humano generi et cum sua Ecclesia triumphabit ; tamen brevis hujus mundi varie significata est."—Calvin : "Quamvis Daniel non stulta curiositate inductus quaesierit ex Angelo de fine mirabilium, tamen non obtinet, quod petebat, quia scilicet voluit Deus ad modum aliquem intelligi, quæ prædixerat, sed tamen aliquid manere occultum, usquedum veniret maturum plena revelationis tempus. Hæc igitur ratio est, cur Angelus non exaudiat Danielem. Pium quidem erat ejus votum (nequus enim optat quicquam scire plus quam jus esset), verum Deus scit quid opus sit, ideo non concessit, quod optabat."—Geier (in Starke) : "The last times will be terrible and dangerous ; but they have their definite limits."

On v. 10, Theodoret : Οὐδὲ γὰρ δεῖ πᾶσιν ἀπλῶς προσκείσθαι τὰ θεῖα, ἀλλ' οἱ μὲν νοήμονες διὰ τῆς ἀνωθεν αὐτοῖς χορηγουμένης γνώσεως συνήσουσιν, οἱ δὲ ἀνομία καὶ δυσσεβεῖς σκώζοντες οὐδὲν τῶν ἐγκειμένων νοῆσαι δυνήσονται, ὅταν δὲ ἔλθῃ τὰ πράγματα, σαφῶς τὰς περὶ τούτων μαθήσονται προφητείας.—Luther : "For however brightly and powerfully the Gospel moves, and however strong the church may be, there must still be heretics and false teachers to prove her, in order that the approved ones may be manifest ; and these same heretics are fond of taking sides with kings and great lords. Consequently the heretics will continue to the end. . . . But to the godless he (the prophet, or, rather, his prophecy) is of no service, as he himself remarks : the wicked shall remain wicked, and not regard it. For this prophecy and similar ones were not written that we might (beforehand exactly) know history and the troubles of the future, so as to feed our curiosity as with an item of news ; but that the pious might comfort themselves and rejoice over them, and that they should strengthen their faith and hope in patience, as those that see and hear that their wretchedness shall have an end, and that they, delivered from sin, death, the devil, and every evil, shall come to Christ in heaven, in his blessed eternal kingdom."

On v. 13, Tübing. Bibel : "How blessed will it seem to rest in the bosom of the Lord, after the work of this life is done, until the day of restitution shall come, when we shall arise, every one to the gracious lot that shall fall to him."—Starke : "At length the sufferings of the faithful reach a joyous end ; then follow rest and sweet refreshing, and finally a glorious resurrection, when with their glorified bodies they shall enter into the joy of their Lord." Blessed is he who with Daniel shall receive a similar lot. Amen.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

PREFACE BY THE GENERAL EDITOR.

THE volume on the MINOR PROPHETS is partly in advance of the German original, which has not yet reached the three post-exilian Prophets. The commentaries on the nine earlier Prophets by Professors KLEINERT and SCHMOLLER appeared in separate numbers some time ago¹; but for Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, Dr. Lange has not, to this date, been able to secure a suitable co-laborer.² With his cordial approval I deem it better to complete the volume by original commentaries than indefinitely to postpone the publication. They were prepared by sound and able scholars, in conformity with the plan of the whole work.

The volume accordingly contains the following parts, each one being paged separately:—

1. A GENERAL INTRODUCTION to the PROPHETS, especially the MINOR PROPHETS, by Rev. CHARLES ELLIOTT, D. D., Professor of Biblical Exegesis in Chicago, Illinois. The general introductions of Kleinert and Schmoller are too brief and incomplete for our purpose, and therefore I requested Dr. ELLIOTT to prepare an independent essay on the subject.

2. HOSSEA. By Rev. Dr. OTTO SCHMOLLER. Translated from the German and enlarged by JAMES FREDERICK McCURDY, M. A., of Princeton, N. J.

3. JOEL. By OTTO SCHMOLLER. Translated and enlarged by Rev. JOHN FORSYTH, D. D., LL. D., Chaplain and Professor of Ethics and Law in the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y.

4. AMOS. By OTTO SCHMOLLER. Translated and enlarged by Rev. TALBOT W. CHAMBERS, D. D., Pastor of the Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church, New York.

5. OBADIAH. By Rev. PAUL KLEINERT, Professor of Old Testament Theology in the University of Berlin. Translated and enlarged by Rev. GEORGE R. BLISS, D. D., Professor in the University of Lewisburg, Pennsylvania.

6. JONAH. By Prof. PAUL KLEINERT, of the University of Berlin. Translated and enlarged by Rev. CHARLES ELLIOTT, Professor of Biblical Exegesis in Chicago.³

7. MICAH. By Prof. PAUL KLEINERT, of Berlin, and Prof. GEORGE R. BLISS, of Lewisburg.

8. NAHUM. By Prof. PAUL KLEINERT, of Berlin, and Prof. CHARLES ELLIOTT, of Chicago.

9. HABAKKUK. By Professors KLEINERT and ELLIOTT.

² The commentary of Rev. W. PRESSL on these three Prophets (Die nachexilischen Propheten, Gotha, 1870) was originally prepared for Lange's Bible-work, but was rejected by Dr. Lange mainly on account of Pressel's views on the genuineness and integrity of Zechariah. It was, however, independently published, and was made use of, like other commentaries, by the authors of the respective sections in this volume.

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

TO THE

MINOR PROPHETS.¹

I.

Meaning of the Words Prophet and Prophecy.

THE ordinary Hebrew word for prophet is Nābi (Heb. נָבִי), derived from the verb נָבֵא which is connected by Gesenius with נָבַע. The former of these verbs is used in 1. Nabi. the Niphal and Hithpael species in the sense of speaking under a divine influence: the latter signifies in the Kal, to boil forth, to gush out, to flow, as a fountain. If this etymology is correct, the noun will designate a person, who bursts forth with spiritual utterances under the divine impulse, or simply one who pours forth words. Freytag defines the corresponding word in Arabic (نَبِيّ), editus, elatus fuit, annuntiavit, renuntiavit alter alteri, se prophetam dixit, propheticum munus vindicavit sibi.

The form נָבִי is like that of נָבִי, and is taken by some in a passive sense, literally, one who is divinely inspired. This is the opinion of Bunsen and Davidson. But Ewald, Hävernick, Oehler, Hengstenberg, Bleek, Lee, Pusey, McCaul, and the great majority of Biblical critics, prefer the active sense of announcing, pouring forth the declarations of God, as more in accordance with the usage of the word.

Two other Hebrew words are used to designate a prophet, namely, רֹאֵה and חֹזֶה. Both these words signify one who sees, and are usually rendered in the LXX. by 2. Roeh and βλέπων, or ὄρων, sometimes by προφήτης (1 Chron. xxvi. 28; 2 Chron. xvi. 7, Chozeh. 10). The three words occur in 1 Chron. xxix. 29, where they seem to be contrasted with each other: "Now the acts of David the King, first and last, behold they are written in the book of Samuel the seer (Roeh), and in the book of Nahum the prophet (Nābi), and in the book of Gad the seer (Chozeh). Roeh is used twelve times in the Bible (1 Sam. ix. 9, 11, 18, 19; 2 Sam. xv. 27; 1 Chron. ix. 22; xxvi. 28; xxix. 29; 2 Chron. xvi. 7, 10; Is. xxx. 10), and in seven of these it is applied to Samuel. It was superseded in general use by the word Nābi, by which Samuel himself was designated as well as by Roeh (1 Sam. iii. 20; 2 Chron. xxxv. 18), and which seems to have revived after a period of desuetude (1 Sam. ix. 9), and to have been applied to the company of prophets mentioned in 1 Sam. x. 5, 10, 11, 12, and in xix. 20, 24. The verb רָאָה, from which it is derived, is the common word in prose signifying "to see;" חָזַק — whence comes the substantive חֹזֶה — is more poetical. חֹזֶה, another derivative, is the word constantly used for the prophetic vision. It is found in Samuel, Chronicles, Psalms, Proverbs, and in most of the prophets.

It has been much debated whether there is any difference in the usage of these words, and if any, what that difference is. Some consider Nâbi to express the official prophet, that is, one who belonged to the prophetic order, while Roëh and Chozeh denote those who received a prophetic revelation. The case of Gad is supposed to afford a clue to the difficulty. In 2 Sam. xxiv. 11, this prophet is described as the "Nâbi;" in 1 Chron. xxi. 9, as David's "Chozeh;" and in 2 Chron. xxix. 25, as the King's "Chozeh," while Nathan is styled in the same place "the Nâbi." Hence it has been suggested that Chozeh was the special designation of the prophet attached to the royal household; and that this individual might, at the same time, be a Nâbi. Perhaps it is safe to say that the same persons were designated by the three words Nâbi, Roëh, and Chozeh, the last two titles being derived from the mode of receiving the divine communications; the first, from the utterance of them to others. In any view of the case there can be little doubt that Nâbi was employed to designate one who belonged to the prophetic order. When Gregory Nazianzen (Or., 28) calls Ezekiel ὁ τῶν μεγάλων ἐπόπτης καὶ ἐξηγητὴς μυστηρίων, he gives a sufficiently exact translation of the two titles Chozeh or Roëh, and Nâbi.¹

The word Nâbi is uniformly translated in the LXX. by προφήτης, and in the A. V. by "prophet." The proper sense of πρὸ is before, in front, as opposed to ὀπίσθε, behind. Hence, according to the best lexicographers, the idea of priority in time is given as secondary to that of antecedence and priority in place. This view would give to πρὸ in πρόφημι and πρὸφήτης, a local instead of a temporal signification. Προφήτης would, in that case, denote an authoritative speaker in the name of God; and it is applied in this sense, in the Classics, to the official expounders of the oracles, and to poets, as the prophets of the Muses, i. e., as speaking in their name, at their suggestion, or by their inspiration.

The classical passage as to the meaning of the word Nâbi is Exodus iv. 14-16: "And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Moses, and he said, Is not Aaron the Levite thy brother? I know that he can speak well. And also, behold, he cometh forth to meet thee: and when he seeth thee, he will be glad in his heart. And thou shalt speak unto him, and put words in his mouth; and I will be with thy mouth, and with his mouth, and will teach you what ye shall do. And he shall be thy spokesman unto the people; and he shall be, even he shall be to thee instead of a mouth, and thou shalt be to him instead of God." Take in connection with this Ex. vii. 1: "I have made thee a god to Pharaoh; and Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet" (Nâbi); and the meaning of the word becomes plain. It means, one who speaks for another; who utters the words that another has put into his mouth. His communications may have reference to the past, to the present, or to the future; and may also extend to absolute and universal truth. These communications constitute prophecy.

The restriction, in modern usage, of the term prophet to one who predicts future events, and prophecy to the prediction of these events, has arisen from the fact that a large portion of the prophetic writings, and precisely that very portion which is most likely to impress the reader, is of this description. But these words do not admit of any such restriction in the Scriptures of both the Old and the New Testament. In these they admit of the sense of declaration and interpretation.

In the latter sense it was used by Lord Bacon, who speaks of an exercise called propheying. "The ministers within a precinct," says Lord Bacon, "did meet upon a week day in some principal town, where there was some ancient grave minister that was president, and an auditory of gentlemen, or other persons of leisure. Then every minister successively, beginning with the youngest, did handle one and the same part of Scripture, spending severally some quarter of an hour or better, and in the whole some two hours. And so the exercise being begun and concluded with prayer, and the president giving a text for the next meeting, the assembly was dissolved." Jeremy Taylor uses the word, in the same sense, in his treatise On Liberty of Propheying. A book was published at Oxford, in 1838, bearing the title, On the Prophetic Office of the Church, in which the adjective "prophetic" has evidently no reference to prediction.

The Law provides for the Prophetical Institution (Deut. xviii.); hence it was no expedient resorted to on special emergencies. Though the prediction (Deut. xviii.) specially relates, as the gospel history shows, to the one distinguished Prophet, "of whom Moses in the Law did write," yet the context (vers. 20, 21, 22) clearly shows that a succession of inferior prophets was included. The gift of prophecy was closely connected with the general design of the Old Economy, the foundation of which was the Law recorded in the Pentateuch. In the Law, as an epitome, the rest of the Old Testament is contained, as to its seminal principles. The later books are virtually a development and application of what is comprised in the Pentateuch. To make this development and application the prophetical order was instituted.

The Prophetical Institution provided for in the Law.

The Scriptures do not represent an unbroken series of prophets, each inducted into office by his predecessor. At least, they are silent on this point, except in the cases of Joshua and Elisha, the former of whom was inducted into office by Moses, and the latter by Elijah. The prophets are described as deriving their prophetical character immediately from God, and do not seem to have attached much importance to a series of incumbents, each receiving his commission from another, or from others. It was different with the priesthood, whose succession and induction into office were strictly prescribed.

From the days of Joshua to Eli "there was no open vision" (1 Sam. iii. 1). Under the judges the original constitution remained unchanged, though the nation was subjected to many vicissitudes of fortune. But in the time of Samuel marked changes passed over the state, and others were imminent. Kingly government was established; the priesthood was to be transferred, the kingdom to be dismembered, and the nation to be led into captivity. Changes so serious needed special interposition. Hence the revival and enlargement of prophetic revelation. From Samuel to Malachi prophet followed prophet, in unbroken continuity, predicting the great changes that were coming upon the nation, and denouncing the sins that provoked the justice of heaven.

Many portions of the prophetic writings are of such a character, that the writers could not have recorded them without a special communication from heaven. They are, strictly speaking, Revelations. Other portions are not of this nature. They are such as must have been familiar to the sacred writers. Historical incidents were continually occurring around them of which they were cognizant. While it is evident that a supernatural knowledge was necessary in the former case, it is not so evident in the latter. They might have recorded historical events, as other historians have done, without any special divine aid. They might have done so, but they did not. In the former case they spoke by revelation, and in the latter by the inspiration² of the Holy Spirit. This they claim, and the writers of the New Testament accord it to them (2 Tim. iii. 16; 2 Pet. i. 21). They preface their announcements with "Thus saith the Lord."

Nature of prophetic inspiration.

In regard to the nature of prophetic inspiration, it is sufficient to state that it was plenary, or fully adequate to the attainment of the end. It is vain and needless to attempt any description of its mode. So far as anything can be inferred from incidental or explicit statements of the Scripture, the most usual method of communication would appear to have been that of immediate vision. Micaiah saw (1 Kings xxii. 17); Isaiah saw (Is. vi. 1); Seer and Vision are used for prophet and prophecy.

Some have supposed that the prophets, under the influence of inspiration, were in a condition expressed by the Greek word ἑκστασις, i. e., in a state of subjection to a higher power. Their own faculties, according to this view, were held in complete abeyance. Such a condition of mind was regarded as a natural and necessary sign of inspiration, on the part of the pretended prophets and diviners of the heathen. They exhibited the outward signs of violent excitement, resembling insanity. Hence the etymological affinity of the Greek words μαντῖς, μανία, and μανομαν. The early fathers uniformly speak of this maniacal excitement as characteristic of the inspiration claimed by the heathen diviners; and describe the inspiration of the Hebrew prophets as distinguished by the opposite peculiarities of calmness, self-possession, and active intelligence. Their minds may have been, on certain occasions, in a highly elevated state; but we have no reason to think that their mental condition was a morbid one. The action of the Holy Spirit did not supersede the exercise of their own intelligence: He spoke in them, not by them as mere instruments; and they, while uttering or recording his communications, preserved each his distinct individuality.

² A distinction is made between revelation and inspiration. By revelation is meant a direct communication from God to man, either of such knowledge as man could not of himself attain to, or which was not, in point of fact, from whatever cause, known to the person who received the revelation. Inspiration, on the other hand, is that actuating energy of the Holy Spirit, guided by which the human agents chosen by God have officially declared his will by word of mouth, or have committed to writing the several portions of the Bible. — See on Inspiration, pp. 40, 41.

It is the general opinion that Samuel instituted companies, or colleges of prophets; and that "the sons of the prophets" mentioned in Scripture, were young men in a course of preparation for the prophetic ministry. We find one of these companies, or colleges, during Samuel's life-time, at Ramah (1 Sam. xix. 19, 20); others afterwards at Bethel (2 Kings ii. 8); Jericho (2 Kings ii. 5); Gilgal (2 Kings iv. 38); and elsewhere (2 Kings vi. 1). These colleges were probably, in their constitution and object, similar to our theological seminaries, which are sometimes called "Schools of the Prophets." Into them were gathered promising students, and there they were trained for the office which they were destined to fill. So successful were these institutions, that from the time of Samuel to the completion of the Canon of the Old Testament, there seems never to have been wanting a due supply of men to keep up the line of official prophets.

To this it may be objected that the ministry of the prophets depended on the gift of inspiration, for which no human training could compensate, or prepare them. But although they could not act as prophets without inspiration, they might be prepared for those parts of their work which depended upon literary culture.

The prophets, though inspired, were not omniscient. They were the spokesmen of God, the mouth of God to communicate his messages to men. They had visions; they saw: pictures were presented to their spiritual intuition; but their understandings were not so miraculously enlarged as to grasp the whole of the divine counsels, which they were commissioned to enunciate. We have the testimony of the prophets themselves (Dan. xii. 8; Zech. iv. 5; 1 Pet. i. 10, 11) that they did not comprehend them. These passages, however, have been pushed so far by some as to make it appear that the prophets were only speaking machines. This extreme must be avoided as well as the other, which would make them omniscient. The writer of the article on Prophecy, in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, commenting on 1 Pet. i. 10, 11, says, that the prophets "after having uttered predictions on those subjects occupied themselves in searching into the full meaning of the words that they had uttered." This statement is perhaps not sufficiently guarded. The Apostle writes: ἔρευνῶντες εἰς τὶνα ἢ ποῖον καιρὸν, in which τίνα is interrogative and agrees with καιρὸν, and not with πράγματα understood. If the Apostle had designed to say, that the prophets searched into what things they had uttered, he would have written: εἰς τὶνα, καὶ ποῖον καιρὸν. The expression should, therefore, be rendered, searching what time, or what manner of time. This conveys a very different idea, and makes the object of the prophets' search, not the meaning of the words which they had uttered, but some additional knowledge concerning the subjects of which they had spoken. Zech. iv. 5 may mean no more than that the prophet did not understand the symbols mentioned in the preceding verses.

In Dan. xii. 8, the prophet declares that he "heard, but understood not." This evidently relates to what was suggested to his mind by the declarations of ver. 7, where it is said that the end of the wonders shall be after "a time, times, and a half." Daniel does not inquire like the angel, in ver. 6, "how long" (עַד-מָה) "shall it be to the end of these wonders?" but "what shall be the end" (מָה-יְהִי) "of these things." מָה-יְהִי (end, latter state, final lot) means the same as עַד (end) in ver. 6, the interrogative מָה (what) used by Daniel is inappropriate. His question, therefore, must have respect to the state of things at the close of the "time, times, and a half," ver. 7.¹

A full discussion of this point is not necessary to the present purpose. The prophets, in many cases, saw "through a glass darkly;" but they did not, like mere automata, utter words which they did not understand. They were inspired and guided by the Holy Spirit, whose will they revealed. "Unto them it was revealed, that not unto themselves, but unto us they did minister the things which are now reported unto you by them that have preached the gospel unto you with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven" (1 Pet. i. 12).

The prophets had a practical office to discharge. It was part of their commission to show the people of God "their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sins." — (Is. lviii. 1; Ezek. xxii. 2; xliii. 10; Micah iii. 8.) They were, therefore, ^{Relation of the prophets to the people.} pastors and ministerial monitors of the people of God. It was their duty to admonish and reprove, to denounce prevailing sins, to threaten the people with the terrors of divine judgment and call them to repentance. They also brought the message of consolation and pardon (Is. xl. 1, 2). They were watchmen set upon the walls of Zion to blow the trumpet and give timely warning of approaching danger (Ezek. iii. 17; xxxiii. 7, 8, 9; Jer. vi. 17; Is. lxii. 6).

The relation of the prophets to the people bore a greater resemblance to that of the Christian ministry than to that of the priests. The latter approached God in behalf of men, by means of sacrifice; the former approached men in behalf of God. They were his ambassadors, beseeching men to turn from their evil ways and live. The functions of the prophetic office were, therefore, not identical with those of the priesthood. The prophets were not priests, with the exception of Jeremiah and Ezekiel (Jer. i. 1; Ezek. i. 3).

They do not seem to have sustained any definite or fixed relation to the government. They were not officers of state, though they exerted an influence upon rulers and state affairs. This they did not by official formal action, but as special messengers from God, whose divine legation even the apostate kings of Israel acknowledged. Sometimes the kings refused to hear the prophet's message; but such obstinacy was the sealing of their doom.

It is not easy to determine the mode of life which the prophets led. It was probably subject to no uniform and rigid law. Some have inferred from Elijah's hairy ^{Mode of life of the prophets.} dress and John the Baptist's imitation of it, that they were distinguished by a peculiar dress and an ascetic mode of life. But the conclusion is too hasty. Their dress sometimes may have been a "sermo propheticus realis," to teach the people what they ought to do, and not a piece of asceticism. They do not seem to have been anxious of attracting notice by ostentatious display; nor did they seek wealth, but some of them, and probably the most of them, lived in poverty and want (1 Kings xiv. 3; 2 Kings iv. 1, 38, 42; vi. 5). It is probable that the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (xi. 37, 38) alludes to the sufferings and privations of the prophets especially, in their temporal humiliation, a vivid representation of which we have in the lives of Elijah and Elisha, in the books of the Kings; and in the case of Jeremiah, who concludes the description of his sufferings (chap. xx.) by cursing the day of his birth. Repudiated by the world in which they were aliens, they typified the life of Him, whose appearance they announced, and whose spirit dwelt in them. Their persecution and suffering did not arise from opposition to them as a distinct class, leading an unsociable, ascetic mode of life, but from opposition to their faithful ministry. From the very nature of that ministry, it was exempted from the rules of outward uniformity. Eichhorn has justly mentioned as a characteristic difference between the heathen and the Jewish prophets, that whereas the former tried to enhance their authority by darkness and seclusion, and mysterious accompaniments, the latter moved among the people without any such factitious advantages.

Other topics, concerning the prophetic office, the functions and mode of life of the prophets, will readily occur to the careful reader of the Holy Scriptures. The mere mention of some of these must suffice. The prophets were the national poets of Israel. Music, poetry, and hymns were a part of the studies of the class from which, generally speaking, they were derived. They were annalists and historians. A great portion of their writings is direct or indirect history. According to the testimony of Josephus the whole of the Old Testament was written by them. They were preachers of patriotism. Their patriotism, as subjects of the theocracy, was founded on motives of religion. The enemy of the nation was the enemy of God. Hence their denunciation of an enemy was a denunciation of a representative of evil; their exhortations in behalf of Jerusalem were exhortations in behalf of God's kingdom on earth.

III.

Contents and Sphere of the Prophetical Writings.

As the function of the prophet was not limited to the disclosure of the future, but included in it the expounding and application of the Law, the declaration of God's will in regard to present duty and of absolute and universal truth, so the prophetic volume is not confined to prediction. In accordance with this twofold character of the prophetic office, it contains two elements, which may be called the moral or doctrinal, and the predictive.

These two parts are not disjoined in the prophetical writings, neither were they disjoined in the design and communication of prophecy; but it will conduce to a better understanding of the subject to view them separately. The sequel, therefore, will exhibit a brief summary of the principal doctrines of the former, and the scheme of the latter.

By the sphere of prophecy are meant the parties for whom it was given, and the objects which it more immediately contemplated. Prophecy, in its stricter sense of containing pre-intimations of good things to come, is for the benefit of the church. The church, consequently, is its proper sphere. Only in an incidental and remote manner could it have been intended to bear upon those without; for it was the revelation of the Lord's secret in regard to the future movements of his providence, which belongs peculiarly to them that fear him (Ps. xxv. 14). It was not a revelation, however, for such as might needlessly seek to pry into the future, but for the higher purpose, especially in times of darkness and perplexity, of furnishing the light that might be required for present faith and duty. It is not God's common method to lay open his hidden counsel respecting things destined to come to pass, even to the children of his covenant; for such knowledge, if imparted with any measure of fullness and precision, would be a dangerous possession, and would tend to destroy the simplicity of their trust in God, and beget an unhealthy craving after human calculations and worldly expedients. It is only, therefore, within certain limits, or in cases that may be deemed somewhat exceptional, that God can grant, even to his chosen, a prophetical insight into future events. In so far as it may be needful to awaken or sustain hope in times of darkness and discouragement, to inspire confidence in the midst of general backsliding and rebuke, at the approach of imminent danger to the life of faith, to give due intimation of the brooding evil, — at such times and for such purposes, God's merciful regard to the safety and well-being of his people may fitly lead Him to provide them with an occasional and partial disclosure of the future; but the same regard would equally constrain Him to withhold it when not necessary for the moral ends of his government.

The cases of Balaam and Daniel, both of whom primarily disclosed to the enemies of God's kingdom the things destined to come to pass, may seem to conflict with the view that the church is the sphere of prophecy. Both these men, however, occupied a kind of exceptional position. They stood apart, not only from the prophetical order of men in Israel, but also from the common affairs of the church. Hence the writings of Daniel, notwithstanding their high prophetical character, have had a place assigned them in the Jewish Canon distinct from the writings of strictly prophetical men. But in regard to the point immediately before us, the grounds of exception are more apparent than real. For in the case of both Balaam and Daniel it was mainly for the light and encouragement of the church that the word of prophecy came by them; only the circumstances of the times were such as to render the camp of the enemy the most appropriate watch-tower, where it should be received and primarily made known. At both periods Israel had come into direct collision with the kingdoms of the world; in the one case as a new, in the other as a small and shattered power, standing over against others of mighty prowess, and, as might seem, of all-prevailing energy.¹

There are prophecies against Babylon, Tyre, Egypt, and other kingdoms, which, as being delivered to the people of God to comfort them by revealing to them the fate of their enemies, cannot be considered as exceptions to the view taken. The prophecy of Jonah, however, against Nineveh, is of a different character and seems to be exceptional. The prophet was sent to a heathen power to denounce the judgments of God against it. He did not, in his own land and among his own people, preach against Nineveh, but he entered the Great City itself and denounced the judgment of God against it. Jonah was a typical character and his mission to Nineveh may have been typical of the mission of Israel to be "a light of the Gentiles," and intended to awaken the nation to a consciousness of its mission; for not only the Messiah but the Israel of God was sent to be a mediator or connecting link between Jehovah and the nations.¹ The prophecy of Jonah, therefore, may not be really exceptional, as it may have been intended as a type to the ancient church of the mission, which it had neglected and forgotten. It had acted like Jonah, but with greater success, when he attempted to flee to Tarshish, in a merchant vessel, to evade the commission, which God had given him to discharge.

Doctrinal Prophecy.

It does not fall in with the aim of this introductory treatise to exhibit, in detail, all the doctrines taught in the prophetic writings. It is sufficient to notice briefly the principal ones, and to state their relation to the Law and the Gospel.

The prophetic Scriptures speak of God as an eternal, self-existent, and spiritual Being. They speak of Him as a person, — a self-conscious, intelligent, moral and voluntary agent, doing all things according to the purpose of his own will. They ascribe to Him all the attributes of such a Being in infinite perfection.

Doctrine of God.

No doctrine is more plainly taught than the unity of God. "I am the first, and I am the last; and besides me there is no God" (Is. xlv. 6). At the same time the doctrine of a trinity of persons — a doctrine more fully developed in the New Testament — is clearly intimated. In Is. vii. 14 and ix. 6, 7, we read of the birth of a child, whose mother was a Virgin. That this child was the eternal son of God, equal with the Father, is proved—(1) from his name Immanuel, which means God with us, i. e., God in our nature; (2) from his titles, Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, Father of Eternity, and Prince of Peace; (3) from the character of his Kingdom: it is everlasting and universal. The prophet Micah predicted (chap. v. 1, 5) that one was to be born in Bethlehem, who was to be the Ruler of Israel, i. e., of all the people of God. Although he was to be born in time and made of a woman, his goings forth were from of old, from everlasting. He was to manifest, in his government, the possession of divine attributes and glory. His dominion was to be universal and its effects peace.

Unity and Trinity.

We also read of the Spirit of Jehovah, to whom are ascribed intelligence and will. The possession of these implies personality. In Ezekiel (i. 4-28) it is the Spirit that animates the fourfold cherubim and their mystic wheels. It is the Spirit, who entered into the prophet and set him on his feet, and lifted him up between the earth and heaven, and brought him in a vision to Chaldæa, and said to him, "Son of man, I send thee to the children of Israel. . . . Say unto them, Thus saith the Lord" (Ezek. ii. 2-9). It was the Spirit that breathed life into the dry bones (Ezek. xxxvii. 9-14). Micah asks: "Is the Spirit of the Lord straightened?" (ii. 7). "I am full of power by the Spirit of the Lord" (Micah iii. 8). Joel foretells the Pentecostal effusion of the Spirit (chap. ii. 28, 29). Many other passages might be adduced from the prophets, containing distinct notices of the presence and power of the Spirit. These passages, as parts of a progressive revelation perfected in the New Testament, cannot be made, by any process of criticism, to mean a mere divine influence.

The God of the prophets is the Creator of all things (Is. xlii. 5); and the upholder of all things (Jer. x. 23; xviii. 6; Dan. v. 23). They do not deify the laws of nature: these are only his ordinances and servants. They are the modes of his operation. He sits behind the elements that He has formed, giving birth and movement to all things. "When he uttereth his voice, there is a multitude of

particular

waters in the heavens, and he causeth vapors to ascend from the ends of the earth; he maketh lightnings with rain, and bringeth forth the wind out of his treasures" (Jer. x. 13). "Whatsoever the Lord pleased, that did He in heaven, and in earth, in the seas, and all deep places" (Ps. cxxxv. 6). He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man. "The young lions roar after their prey, and seek their meat from God. These all wait upon thee; that thou mayest give them their meat in due season. That thou givest them, they gather: thou openest thy hand, they are filled with good" (Ps. civ. 14, 21, 27, 28). "O Lord, thou preservest man and beast" (Ps. xxxvi. 6). "Thy right hand upholdeth me." (Ps. lxiii. 8). These passages teach a universal, particular, and present Providence, controlling all things and directing their issues. It is not restricted to man, but extends to the beasts of the field. It is not confined to the Jewish theocracy, where it is displayed by more palpable manifestations; but it embraces Egypt and Babylon, Assyria and Persia, Moab and Ammon, the isles of the Gentiles, in a word, all the nations of the earth.

This Providence is asserted, when the event in question is brought about with no sensible disturbance of the ordinary influence of human motives; with no derangement of what is commonly called the natural course of things. Cyrus, for instance, whom the Greek historian describes, no doubt truly, as pursuing his career of conquest, in his own proper character, was only an instrument appointed for purposes of the divine government, which purposes the prophet Isaiah unfolds to us. Moses was a deliverer from Egypt, and Cyrus from Babylon: the former acted under an express legation, and was clothed with the power of working miracles; the latter had no such extraordinary power given to him. Yet divine Providence wrought by both; and so that Providence, in its ordinary course, is certain, active, and universal. Such is the account of the present constitution of things, which the tenor of prophecy affirms. In conformity with this account, the prophets deliver their predictions of future events, not as if they were announcing the bare truth of the future facts, but a purpose and design. They indulge a strain of prediction, which carries in itself the seed of its accomplishment, and sometimes declare themselves to have been constituted the agents of the divine counsels. "I the Lord have spoken it, and I will do it" (Ezek. xxxvi. 36), is subjoined to the event declared. "Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it?" (Amos iii. 6). "See," saith the Lord to Jeremiah, "I have this day set thee over the nations, and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, and to build, and to plant" (Jer. i. 10). This language is figurative, for the prophet himself was not to do these things; but it is plain who was to do them. Again, "Hast thou not heard long ago, how I have done it, and of ancient times that I have formed it? Now have I brought it to pass, that thou shouldest be to lay waste defenced cities into ruinous heaps" (Is. xxxvii. 26). The Assyrian desolator, in his grasping ambition, was the unconscious servant of an unseen Power, the instrument of that unerring wisdom that rules the world.

Prophecy is more or less a commentary upon the doctrine of divine providence. It represents the future event, which it brings to view, as a part of that system of things in which the Creator is present by the direction of his power, and the counsels of his wisdom, appointing the issues of futurity as well as foreseeing them; acting with "his mighty hand and outstretched arm" seen or unseen; ruling in the kingdoms of men, ordering all things in heaven and earth.

The anthropology of the prophets is as full and complete as their theology. Man was created by God (Mal. ii. 10); he has a common origin (ibidem); he has the power of reason (Ezek. xii. 2; Is. i. 18); a capacity for holiness (Is. i. 18); for knowledge and progress (Is. ii. 3, 4, 5); he is ruined and cannot save himself (Hos. xiii. 9; Jer. ii. 22; xiii. 23); he is a subject of God's moral government and owes entire obedience to his law (Dan. iv. 34, 35; Ezek. xviii. 4, 5, 9; xxxiii. 11-16; Is. i. 19, 20); worship and homage must be rendered to God (Mal. i. 11; iii. 10; Is. lx. 6, 7). The relations of men to one another are clearly stated, and the duties arising out of these relations enforced; in a word all the duties of the decalogue are strictly enjoined.

Under the old dispensation, as well as under the new, the favor of God was secured by faith. The Apostle Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans (i. 17), quotes, in confirmation of the doctrine of justification by faith, Habakkuk ii. 4. Throughout the prophetic writings we find exhortations to trust in Jehovah and the result of confidence in Him. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee: because he trusteth in thee. Trust ye in the Lord for ever: for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength" (Is. xxvi. 3, 4). This confidence, in its ground and object, is not necessarily identical with evangelical faith, yet it is the same in principle. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews enumerates its effects; but in some of his instances, we are hardly warranted in assuming the existence of that faith, which justifies the sinner. Yet the doctrine of a justifying faith is clearly taught, and in some passages necessarily implied, in the law, and in the prophets, as the Apostle Paul asserts and proves, in his Epistle to the Romans (Rom. iii. 21; chap. iv. 3; compare Gen. xv. 6; Is. liii. 11; Jer. xxxiii. 15, 16).

The prophets inculcate with remarkable clearness and decision the doctrine of repentance. "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and He will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon" (Is. lv. 7). "Then shall ye remember your evil ways, and your doings that were not good, and shall loathe yourselves in your own sight for your iniquities, and for your abominations" (Ezek. xxxvi. 31; xx. 43). They preach the necessity of it, in order to escape ruin (Ezek. xiv. 6; xviii. 30). They invest it with a high moral dignity (Is. lvii. 15). They encourage it by promises (Hos. vi. 1, 2, 3; Joel ii. 12, 13).

Repentance.

The doctrinal teaching of the prophets is intermediate between the Law and the Gospel. It is a step in advance of the Law and preparatory to the Christian dispensation. It goes beyond the Law, in respect to the greater distinctness and fullness of some of its doctrines and precepts; it is a more perfect exposition of the principles of personal holiness and virtue; its sanctions have less of an exclusive reference to temporal promises and incline more to evangelical; the mere ritual of the Law begins to be discountenanced by it; and the superior value of a spiritual service is enforced. The Law had said: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might" (Deut. vi. 5). Nothing could go beyond this commandment, in its extent; but where nothing can be added to extend a law, much may be added to expound it, animate its spirit, and direct its practice. It is precisely this that the prophets do. They everywhere recognize the authority of the Law of Moses, exalt its practical force, and improve its obligations. Thus like Him, to whom they all bear witness, they do not destroy the law, but fulfill it. In them we have the unfolding of those germinal principles, which attain to their full development in the teaching of Christ, the Head and Crown of the prophetic order.

The doctrinal teaching of the prophets intermediate between the Law and the Gospel.

V.

Predictive Prophecy. — Its Structure.

A twofold view may be taken of predictive prophecy, — its structure and verification. The former constitutes the present theme of consideration.

Twofold view.

A question may arise in regard to the personal liberty of men, who are the subjects of prophecy. If God has determined an event by prophecy and the agents to accomplish it, how can these agents be considered as acting freely? This question has difficulties, the solution of which does not fall in with the scope of this dissertation. All who receive, in sincerity, the statements of Scripture, must admit that the foreknowledge, or certain determination of the future actions of men, is compatible with their moral freedom. "Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain" (Acts ii. 23). No greater difficulty lies against prophecy in regard to man's free agency than against preordination generally. Pharaoh acted freely, though God raised him up to show in him his power, and to declare his name throughout all the earth (Ex. ix. 16). So also did Cyrus and Nebuchadnezzar, though they were the chosen agents of God in accomplishing his purposes. It never once occurred to these men that they were mere blind instruments; for they were conscious of their freedom.

Predictive prophecy and free agency.

Another question may arise as to the absolute certainty of the fulfillment of a predicted future event. The question here is not whether any fixed purpose and determination of God is liable to be changed by the contingent actions of men; for in that respect, the truth, founded in God's nature, must stand fast forever. "God is not a man, that He should lie; neither the son of man, that He should repent: hath He said, and shall He not do it? or hath He spoken, and shall He not make it good?" (Num. xxiii. 19.) The question is, whether prophecy ought to be regarded, in every instance, as announcing what is fixed and conclusively determined by God; or whether it should not to some extent, and if to some, then to what extent, be viewed as the proclamation of God's mind respecting his future dealings, on the supposition of the parties interested standing in a certain relationship to his character and government. In the latter case the prediction might assuredly be expected to take effect, in so far as the relations contemplated in it continued; but in the event of a change in these relations, then a corresponding change in regard to the prediction may reasonably be expected. This is the real question at issue among those who concur in holding prophecy to be a supernatural disclosure of God's mind and will.

"As everything future," says Olshausen on Matthew chap. xxiv., "even that which proceeds from the freedom of the creature, when viewed in relation to the divine knowledge, can only be regarded as necessary; so everything future, as far as it concerns man, can only be regarded as conditional upon the use of his freedom. As obstinate perseverance in sin hastens destruction, so genuine repentance may avert it; this is illustrated in the Old Testament, in the prophet Jonah, by the history of Nineveh, and intimated in the New Testament by Paul, when (like Abraham praying for Sodom) he describes the elements of good existing in the world as exercising a restraint upon the judgments of God (2 Thess. ii. 7); and 2 Pet. iii. 9, the delay of the Lord is viewed as an act of divine long-suffering, designed to afford men space for repentance. Accordingly when the Redeemer promises the near approach of his coming, this announcement is to be taken with the restriction (to be understood in connection with all predictions of judgments), 'All this will come to pass, unless men avert the wrath of God by sincere repentance.' None of the predictions of divine judgments are bare, historical proclamations of that which will take place; they are alarms calling men to repentance,—of which it may be said that they announce something for the very purpose that what they announce may not come to pass."

Hengstenberg (art. "Prophecy," Kitto's Cyclopædia) says: "Some interpreters, misunderstanding passages like Jer. xviii. 8; xxvi. 13, have asserted with Dr. Köster (p. 226 ff.), that all prophecies were conditional, and have even maintained that their revocability distinguished the true predictions (Weissagung) from soothsaying (Wahrsagung). But beyond all doubt, when the prophet denounces the divine judgments, he proceeds on the assumption that the people will not repent, an assumption, which he knows from God to be true. Were the people to repent, the prediction would fail; but because they will not, it is uttered absolutely. It does not follow, however, that the prophet's warnings and exhortations are useless. These serve 'for a witness against them'; and besides, amid the ruins of the mass, individuals might be saved. Viewing prophecies as conditional predictions nullifies them. The Mosaic criterion (Deut. xviii. 22), that he was a false prophet who predicted 'things which followed not nor came to pass,' would then be of no value, since recourse might always be had to the excuse, that the case had been altered by the fulfilling of the condition. The fear of introducing fatalism, if the prophecies are not taken in a conditional sense, is unfounded; for God's omniscience, his foreknowledge, does not establish fatalism, and from divine omniscience simply is the prescience of the prophets to be derived."

"These two forms of representation," Dr. Fairbairn remarks (Fairbairn On Prophecy. New York: Carlton & Porter, 1866), "may both be characterized as somewhat extreme, and neither of them can be applied to the actual interpretation of the prophetic Scriptures, without coming at many points into conflict with the undoubted facts of the case."

Dr. F., considering an exact classification impossible, on account of the concrete character of the prospective delineations of prophecy, and the readiness with which these in their diverse aspects run into each other, traces out a few broad and easily recognized distinctions, which, for all practical purposes, may be held to be sufficient.

1. "There is, first, a class of prophecies, the direct and proper object of which is to disclose God's purposes of grace to men, and indicate in its grander outlines their appointed course of development. As the ultimate ground of these purposes is plainly in God himself, and the bringing of them into accomplishment is emphatically his work, it is evident that, in respect to this line of things, there can be no room for the operation of any conditional element except in regard to the subordinate relations of place and time. Whether to be sooner or later in effecting the results aimed at, whether to be effected in this particular mode, or in some other that might be conceived, in such things, as the plan of God necessarily comes into contact with earthly relations and human agencies, it must presuppose a certain adaptation in the state of the world and the conduct of individual men. Hence, in these respects, announcements might be made at one time, which, as seen from a human point of view, appeared to have undergone a relative change at another; but the things themselves and all that essentially concerns their history and progressive operation in the world, being entirely and absolutely of God, must proceed in strict accordance with the intimations he gives of his mind respecting them.

"As examples of this great class of prophecies," Dr. Fairbairn points "to the original announcement of salvation by the triumph of the woman's seed over that of the tempter; to the promise given to Abraham that through his seed all the families of the earth should be blessed; to the successive limitations made as to the fulfillment of this promise in its main provisions, by its special connection with the tribe of Judah, the house of David, and a virgin-born son of that house; to the representations made of this glorious Being himself, of the constitution of his person, the place of his birth, the nature and circumstances of his career on earth, the character of his government, the final results and glories of his kingdom, with the opposite destinies of those who might set themselves in array against it. In regard to all that in this respect was purposed in the divine mind, and announced from time to time in the prophetic Word, there could be no room for any such conditional element as might in the least affect the question whether they should actually come to pass or not; for they were matters entering into the very core of the divine administration, and indissolubly linked to the great principles on which from the first all was destined to proceed. As concerns them, we have simply to do with the omniscience of God in foreseeing, his veracity in declaring, and his overruling providence in directing what should come to pass.

2. "Another class of prophecies, in their ostensible character and design widely different from the preceding, yet much akin as regards the point now under consideration, consists of those which, from time to time, were uttered concerning the powers and kingdoms that stood in a rival or antagonistic position to the Kingdom of God. It is not such prophecies generally, as respected those powers and kingdoms, that are now referred to, but those which were given forth concerning them, addressed not so properly to them as to the people of God, and for the purpose of allaying what naturally awoke fear and anxiety in the minds of believers. Predictions like that of Jonah to the Ninevites belong to an entirely different class; for in this there was a direct dealing with the people of a heathen city in respect to their sin and liability to punishment; a preaching more than a prediction; and both preaching and prediction entering into the sphere of human responsibility, and intended to operate as means of moral suasion. Nineveh was not at that time viewed as occupying a hostile position to the interests of God's kingdom in Israel, but as itself a hopeful field for spiritual agency; more hopeful indeed than Israel itself, and fitted to tell with a wholesome influence even on the people of the Covenant. The mass of prophecies, however, uttered respecting worldly powers and states, had an entirely different object. Contemplating these as rival, and for the most part directly antagonistic forces, they were mainly intended to assure the hearts of God's people that whatever earthly resources and glory might for the time belong to those kingdoms, all was destined to pass away; that their dominion, however arrogant and powerful, should come to an end; while that kingdom which was more peculiarly the Lord's, and was identified with his covenant of grace and blessing, should survive all changes and attain to an everlasting as well as universal supremacy. Prophecies of this description, therefore, stood in a very close relation to those already considered; they but exhibited the reverse side of God's covenant love and faithfulness. If the purposes of grace and holiness connected with his covenant were to stand, all counter authority and rival dominion must be put down; the safety and well-being of the one of necessity involved the destruction of the other. And to certify believers that such would be the result, was the more immediate design of the prophecies in question ; of the later prophecy, for example, uttered respecting Nineveh by Nahum, when the city had become the centre of a God-opposing monarchy ; and of the many similar predictions scattered through the prophetic writings concerning Egypt, Babylon, Assyria, Edom, and the surrounding beathen states.

"It holds of this class of prophecies as a whole, that in their grand aim they disclose the settled purposes of God : purposes that grow out of the essential principles of his character and government ; and that the results they announce are consequently to be regarded as of an absolute character. As concerned the kingdoms themselves whose destinies they unfolded, they could scarcely be said to become, through the prophecies in question, except in a very limited degree, the subjects of moral treatment ; for the prophecies were communicated to the covenant people rather than to them, and comparatively few of the heathen concerned might ever have come to any distinct knowledge of what had been spoken.

3. "Leaving now the two classes of prophecies which from their very nature can possess little or nothing of a conditional element, we proceed to notice those which purposely and directly bore upon men's responsibilities ; those which by means of promise or threatening placed the subjects of divine revelation under the peculiar training of heaven. Here we find from the sacred records that the conditional element has often, as a matter of fact, been strikingly exhibited ; and it must always, we conceive, be virtually if not formally and expressly found intermingling itself with prophetic intimations of the kind in question. This conditionality rests upon two great and fundamental principles. The first of these is, that in God's prophetic revelation of his dealing with men as in the revelations of his mind generally, all is based on an ethical foundation and directed to an ethical aim ; so that the prediction should never be viewed apart from the moral considerations on account of or in connection with which it was uttered. And the other principle is, that in giving intimations to men or communities of approaching good or evil, God speaks as in other parts of Scripture in an anthropomorphic manner ; He addresses the subjects of his threatening or promise more from a human than from a divine point of view ; in other words, He adopts that mode of representation which is most natural to men, and which is best adapted for impressing and influencing their minds.

"Let us take, as an illustration of the proper working of these principles, the striking case of Nineveh already referred to. After having sent his prophet to announce the destruction of Nineveh in a specified time, the Lord suffered the prophecy to fall into abeyance, refrained from executing the threatened doom, or in the language of Scripture, He repented of the evil He said He would do to the city, because of the moral change that had meanwhile taken place among its inhabitants, as manifested in their turning from their evil ways." God acts on the principles of righteousness, and, in accordance with these, He must change his dealings toward men, when their relation to Him has become changed. Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right ? (Gen. xviii. 25). "Hear now, O Israel, is not my way equal ? Are not your ways unequal ? When a righteous man turneth away from his righteousness and committeth iniquities, and dieth in them ; for the iniquity that he hath done shall he die. Again, when the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness that he hath committed, and doeth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive" (Ezek. xviii. 25-27).

After these preliminary observations, we now proceed to trace the stream of prophecy from its beginning down to the close of the Old Testament Canon, when, as if expectant of the advent of its great subject, it comes to a sudden pause. A like cessation occurs between Joshua and Samuel, the reasons of which will be noticed in the proper place. With the exception of these two periods of cessation, and perhaps of some others, either not mentioned or not so distinctly marked, prophecy flows on with widening channel, until it reaches its appointed limits. In the time of Abraham it takes a double, though not a divergent course. This was necessary, as in him we have the first point of union, in prophecy, of the Jewish and Christian dispensations ; and from this era it takes up and preserves a twofold character related to them both.

The date and origin of the predictions of prophecy are coeval with the earliest history of man. This history is that of his creation, sin, and fall. No sooner had he fallen than prophecy intimated a way of recovery. The first prediction was given in mercy : it contained a promise adapted to man's forfeited condition. This was the promise of a Redeemer, who was appointed to bruise the serpent's head, that is, to spoil the tempter of his triumph, which could only be done by repairing the loss suffered by transgression. This original promise is the dawn of prophecy. Man was not driven from Paradise, until prophecy had given him some pledge of hope and consolation.

It is not our intention to enter into an exposition of this first prophecy. Its general meaning is that a redemption will succeed the fall. The person of the Redeemer, who is to bruise the serpent's head, is not clearly revealed in the terms of the prediction. We are not, however, to infer that our first parents had no more instruction on the subject than that contained in the terms of the promise. God may have communicated much to them, which the sacred historian has not recorded. Their faith may have been directed to One, whose sacrifice was typified by the sacrifices that they offered.

This first prediction may serve to point out something of the general aim and design of all the rest. At the least, it opens to us one comprehensive subject, in which the whole human race is concerned. And since this subject was the first that introduced the revelations of prophecy, we may reasonably suppose that it was a principal one always in view, and that other predictions, when they did not specifically relate, might yet be subservient, to it, by promoting other purposes, which purposes, however, centered in the chief design. For prophecy having begun with the prospect of man's redemption, could be directed, in its subsequent course, to nothing greater. And such the fact appears, when we draw to a point the multiplied predictions of the Old Testament.

The limits and range of prophecy were as extensive at the first as they were afterward. The promise of the redemption of our race was given to Adam. This was the first promise, and the last of the prophets could not go beyond it. For man's redemption begun in the present world, and completed in heaven, is a work which extends itself to the whole duration of his existence, and runs out into the infinitude of the divine mercy. The scope of prophecy was, therefore, as large at the first as it was in later ages. No prophet, as has been intimated, ever went beyond redemption, though more precise discoveries of it were made through every subsequent age of revelation.

During the antediluvian period, there is no intimation, in the Mosaic narrative, of the prophetic gift. But in the New Testament, we have two distinct references to such an exercise. The first is 2 Pet. ii. 5, which speaks of Noah as a preacher of righteousness. He is not called a prophet in this passage, but merely a preacher of righteousness. The act, however, of building the ark, was clearly prophetic of the approaching deluge; and Noah doubtless accompanied his action by words, when preaching righteousness he called upon the people to repent, so that they might avert the impending wrath. The second is Jude 14, 15: "And Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." This was the warning, uttered by prophecy, of the coming catastrophe, which swept the sinners of the antediluvian world from the earth; and it is a warning against all the ungodly that a similar doom awaits them, unless they repent.

The first general execution of God's general judgment upon sin was the Flood, which formed an epoch dividing the old world and the new. So great a crisis of the world's history was not permitted to pass without the intervening warnings of prophecy. To the one righteous man and his family the deluge was foretold. The ark itself was a visible prophetic warning to a wicked world.

The prophecy delivered to Noah, after the Flood, had reference to that overwhelming catastrophe. The occurrence of a heavy rain would naturally produce in the minds of men the fear of a second Deluge. To relieve them from any such apprehension, and to assure them of an orderly succession and return of the seasons, God graciously promised to Noah, that "While the earth remaineth, seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter shall not cease."

With this promise is connected a second grant to man of dominion over the creatures and over the earth. To confirm this promise God set his "bow in the cloud," that it should Prophecy delivered to Noah, immediately after the Flood.

"be a token of a covenant," that "neither shall all flesh be cut off any more by the waters of a flood; neither shall there any more be a flood to destroy the earth." Thus prophecy reflected its light from the bow that spanned the earth, after the waters had retired from its surface, and gave to man the assurance of natural mercies and blessings (Gen. viii. 22; ix. 2, 9-17).

"And he said, Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren. And he said, Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant. God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant." This passage contains a curse upon Canaan, and a blessing upon Shem and Japheth. Both the curse and the blessing, as the tenor of the prophecy clearly shows, are not to be restricted to the individuals named, but extend to their posterity. Just as in the subsequent prophecies concerning Ishmael, Jacob, Esau, and the twelve patriarchs, we look for the fulfillment among their descendants, so in the present instance we must look for it among the tribes and nations that sprang from these three sons of Noah.

This prophecy announces a high degree of prosperity to Shem and Japheth. The nature of this prosperity is indicated, in regard to Shem, in two ways: (1.) God is not called by the name Elohim, expressive of his general relation to the world, but by the name Jehovah, which refers to his revelation and to his institutions for man's redemption. (2.) Jehovah is styled the "God of Shem." Both imply that God would sustain to the posterity of Shem a relation entirely peculiar, favor them with revelations of his will, and make them partakers of his temporal and spiritual blessings.¹

The blessing pronounced upon Japheth (ver. 27), is differently understood by interpreters. The verb rendered "enlarge," forms a paronomasia with the proper name Japheth, and means: to persuade, to entice, to allure. Hence some interpreters (see Calvin on the passage) translate it thus: "Alliciat Deus Japhetum, ut habitet in tentoriis Semi." Other interpreters give to the word פָּתַח the meaning, to be broad, and understand it in the sense that God shall give Japheth a numerous posterity, who shall possess widely extended territories. This is the interpretation of most of the ancient versions, and is the one most generally received. The accomplishment of this prediction has been pointed out in the fact, that the descendants of Japheth have not only gained possession of all Europe, but also of a large portion of Asia.

Another difference of opinion has arisen in regard to the subject of the verb יִשְׁכֵּן. According to a very ancient interpretation אֱלֹהִים is to be supplied. The verse will then read: "God shall enlarge Japheth and shall dwell in the tents of Shem." This would intimate that, while God would enlarge Japheth, He would manifest himself in a peculiar manner to Shem. Taking this view of it, the prediction would be fulfilled, when the Shekinah (derived from the verb, in this verse, rendered "shall dwell"), the visible symbol of the divine glory, dwelt in the Tabernacle, afterward in the Temple, and finally in the highest sense, when "the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth" (John i. 14). This view, however, for exegetical reasons, has been rejected by the ablest critics, and Japheth is made the subject of the verb "shall dwell."²

Some, who take Japheth to be the subject, regard שֵׁם not as a proper name, but as an appellation — name, illustrious name, renown. "May God give to Japheth an extended country, may he dwell in renowned habitations." Gesenius adopts this view in his Hebrew Lexicon. (See Ges., Heb. Lex., s. v. שֵׁם.) But, Hengstenberg remarks, "It is in the highest degree unnatural to suppose that שֵׁם is here suddenly employed in a totally different meaning from that which it has in the verse before, and no one would resort to such an interpretation except from extreme necessity."³

Abraham came originally from Ur of the Chaldees. When he was seventy-five years old, the Lord said unto him: "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee: and I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee; and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed. . . . And the Lord appeared unto Abram, and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land " (Gen. xii. 1-7).

In these promises, prophecy begins to make its larger revelations of the objects of faith. Two predictions are here made to him and repeated in Gen. xiii. 14-17; xv. 1-7, 13-16; xvii. 1-8; xxii. 15-18. One of these relates to the possession of the land of Canaan by his posterity; and the other, to the universal blessing of mankind in him, and (xxii. 18) in his seed.

This mixed subject requires distinct notice, since we have here the first point of union in prophecy of the Jewish and Christian dispensations; and since from this era prophecy takes up and preserves a twofold character related to both. The possession of the land of Canaan by Abraham's descendants identifies itself with the organization of the Hebrew people into a nation. It therefore leads us into that dispensation which includes the Law of Moses and the Theocracy, under which were transmitted the divine promises and revelations down to the era of the Gospel. This is the part of the divine economy resting on the promise of the land of Canaan. The universal blessing of the human race is the original promise made to our first parents. It is repeated and confirmed to Abraham, with the provision that the blessing of "all the nations of the earth" should spring from his seed. Through the medium of this promise, and perhaps in other ways, Abraham saw the Saviour's day and was glad (John viii. 56).

Ishmael and Esau were the subjects of prophecy; but as they are not in the line of the inheritance, and of "the seed," it is unnecessary to say anything more than barely to mention the fact. The case of Isaac and Jacob is different. They are in the line of the promise, and form distinct links in the chain of its fulfillment. The promises made to Abraham were repeated and confirmed to them (Gen. xxvi. 2-5; xxviii. 13-15; xli. 2-4). The prophecy (xli. 2-4) in part repeats, in part fills up the one given to Abraham (xv. 13, 14). The addition made in the prophecy to Jacob is to show that Egypt was to be the land of the last intermediate abode and increase of his race, — a particular, which had not been specified before, but was now supplied at the time, when Jacob was invited by Joseph to go down to Egypt, during the famine. This was an important crisis in the history of his family, and required the interposition of prophecy to calm his fears and explain to him the end that God had in view in the circumstances that induced him to remove from Canaan to the land of the Nile.

Omitting the prophecy of Jacob respecting the sons of Joseph, we enter upon the consideration of that, delivered on his death-bed, concerning his own sons. He predicted to them distinctly some striking points in the future condition of the twelve tribes, which were to spring from them. These points were very unlike in their kind, and comprised a variety of determinate particulars. The general scope of this prophecy, however, is that it is directed to the land of Canaan, and that it distributes the tribes in that country with a particularity of lot, under a geographical restriction, which makes it clear that Canaan is the field of the prophecy, even if the explanation were not subjoined: "Behold, I die; but God shall be with you, and bring you again unto the land of your fathers" (Gen. xlviii. 21).

A very remarkable feature of this prophecy is, that it foretold that his twelve sons should be the founders of the same number of tribes, by a perpetuation of descendants to each. It was with reference to this fact that the inheritance of the land of Canaan was apportioned to them. That such a disposition of the inheritance should take effect, in all its particulars, would seem very improbable to any one viewing the matter from the contingency of a continued male offspring to each of the sons, in a numerous and distant issue. But the grant was from Him, who divided to the nations their inheritance, and who, when He separated the sons of Adam, set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel (Deut. xxxii. 8). Prophecy declared his purpose.

The time of this prophecy is worthy of notice. The aged patriarch, under the divine command, had settled, with his family, in Egypt. The land of Goshen had been given to them for their use. The "new king over Egypt, who knew not Joseph," had not yet appeared. Joseph was still governor of the land, and the prospects of his brethren were more flattering than they could have been in the land of Canaan. Lest, therefore, the antecedent predictions in regard to Canaan should be forgotten by their abode and domestication in a foreign country, the most specific disclosure is made to them as to their subsequent enjoyment and partition of their inheritance, which had been originally assured to their fathers. This was the third time that the promise of their return from Egypt was given; and their minds were now turned more distinctly and forcibly to the object of God's promise, by the distribution of Canaan among the twelve tribes, that were to spring from the twelve sons of Israel.

Much has been written concerning that portion of this prophecy, which relates to Judah. The critical investigation of it does not fall in with our present purpose. It contains a prominent revelation of two things: first, the prolonged duration of power in the tribe of Judah, as distinguished from the rest; second, the cessation of that power on the coming of Shiloh, to whom the gathering of the people should be. The meaning of the prophecy, says Hengstenberg, "is, that the tribe of Judah should not lose the dominion until he attain to its highest realization by Shiloh who should be descended from him, and to whom all the nations of the earth should render obedience."¹

There is a singular fitness in the union of this Messianic prediction with the other branches of the dying patriarch's prophecy. For his prophecy is the first place in Scripture, which exhibits or implies the constitution of the twelve tribes, under which their state was afterward to be moulded and governed. As soon as prophecy recognized this division and arrangement of the tribes, it set its mark upon that tribe, which was destined to have the preëminence over the others, and the privilege of a nearer union with the advent of Christ. When the form of tribes began to be seen, the Christian subject, in relation to those tribes, is immediately introduced. It was joined with the first general promise of Canaan; it was joined with the partition of that land, and specifically with the tribal constitution.

Patriarchal prophecy was a preparation for the covenant of Canaan. And because it was so, there is on that account a great analogy seen to subsist in the distribution of the light of prophecy, and the succession of the Mosaic and Christian covenants. Patriarchal prophecy sustains very much the same relation to the former, that later prophecy does to the latter. Not only is the promise of Canaan in patriarchal prophecy most explicit; but the years are numbered to the beginning of the possession of it. Four hundred years were foretold to Abraham (Gen. xv. 13). A definite time was likewise foretold to Daniel (Dan. ix. 24, 25, 26, 27). The varied predictions of patriarchal prophecy tend to Canaan, as the predictions of later prophecy centre in the Gospel. This general analogy, which obtains in the structure of prophecy, in its two principal periods, — the one preceding the Law, the other subsequent to it, — may contribute to fix our judgment, in each case, of its use, and to illustrate the accordance and harmony in its most essential features.

There is, however, a great difference in the prophecies of these two periods. Before the Law prophecy says nothing of Moses, the Jewish legislator, and the mediator of the covenant of Canaan. After the Law, when the people of Israel were in possession of the land promised to their fathers, prophecy abounds with predictions, not only of the Gospel covenant, but also of the Messiah. His person, his nature, his work, and his character. This distinction is due to Him, who is Lord of all. "Moses verily was faithful in all his house as a servant; but Christ as a Son over his own house" (Heb. iii. 5, 6).²

The deliverance from Egypt was the step, in God's providence, preparatory to the institution of the Law, and to the possession of Canaan connected with it; and this deliverance itself was the accomplishment of one principal part of antecedent prophecy.

In its relation to the past the Law depended upon the Abrahamic covenant (Gal. iii. 17-24). That covenant, as we have already seen, had a twofold character. It contained the spiritual promise of the Messiah, which was given to the Jews, as representatives of the whole human race, and as guardians of a treasure, in which all families of the earth should be blessed. This would prepare the Jewish nation to be the centre of the unity of all mankind. But it contained also the temporal promises subsidiary to the former, and needed in order to preserve intact the nation, through which the race of man should be educated and prepared for the coming of the Redeemer. These promises were special, given distinctly to the Jews as a nation, and, so far as they were considered in themselves, calculated to separate them from other nations of the earth. It follows that there should be in the law a corresponding duality of nature. There would be much in it that is peculiar to the Jews, local, special, and transitory; but the fundamental principles, on which it is based, must be universal, because it expresses the will of an unchanging God, and springs from relations to Him, inherent in human nature, and, therefore, perpetual and universal in their application.

The nature of this relation of the Law to the promise is clearly pointed out. The belief in God as the Redeemer of man, and the hope of his manifestation as such in the person of the Messiah, involved the belief that the spiritual power must be superior to all carnal obstructions, and that there was in man a spiritual element, which could rule his life by communion with a spirit from above. But it involved also the idea of an antagonistic power of evil, from which man was to be redeemed, existing in each individual, and existing also in the world at large. The Promise was the witness of the one truth, the Law was the declaration of the other. It was added because of transgressions. In the individual it stood between his better and his worse self; in the world, between the Jewish nation, as the witness of the spiritual promise, and the heathendom, which groaned under the power of the flesh.¹

The relation of the Law to the future might be viewed under various aspects. But our object is to view it in its bearing upon the coming of our Lord and the dispensation of the Gospel. In doing this we are guided by the general principle laid down in Heb. vii. 19: "the law made nothing perfect." In its moral aspect it bore the stamp of insufficiency. It declared the authority of truth and goodness over man's will, and it took for granted the existence of a spirit in man, which could recognize that authority; but it did no more. Its presence detected the existence and the sinfulness of sin, as alien alike to God's will and man's true nature; but, at the same time, it brought out with more vehement and desperate antagonism the power of sin dwelling in man as fallen (Rom. vii. 7-25). It only showed, therefore, the need of a Saviour from sin, and of an indwelling power, which would enable man to conquer the power of evil. Hence it bore witness of its own insufficiency and led men to Christ (Gal. iii. 24).

The Law had relation to Christ in its sacrificial and ceremonial aspect also. The whole system of sacrifices was typical; and on their typical character their virtue depended. The priesthood was typical. Sacrifices declared the need of atonement; the priesthood, the possibility of mediation; and yet in themselves they did nothing to realize either. Thus again the Law led to Him, who is at once the only Mediator and true sacrifice. In this way the Law, especially in its sacrificial and ceremonial aspect, was a standing prophecy of Christ. It trained and guided men to the acceptance of the Messiah, in his threefold character of Prophet, Priest, and King; and then its work being done, it became, in the minds of all those who trusted in it, not only an incumbrance but a snare. To resist its claim to allegiance was, therefore, a matter of life and death in the days of the Apostle Paul, and, in a less degree, in subsequent ages of the church. "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom. x. 4).

The first prediction concerning Christ after the promulgation of the Law, was that of Balaam, which was coincident with the approach of the Israelites to Canaan. This diviner was summoned by the King of Moab to interrupt, by his curse, the progress of God's chosen people. His will to that effect was not wanting; but it was overruled. A word of true prophecy was put into his mouth, and he was constrained to bless those, whom he wished to curse. "I shall see him, but not now; I shall behold him, but not nigh; there shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth."

Some have sought the star and sceptre of Balaam's prophecy and professed to have found them in David. A sceptre may be found in him; but the sceptre and the star of the prophecy are probably to be found in Him, who is "the root and the offspring of David, and the bright and morning star" (Rev. xxii. 16). The vision of the prophet's mind carried him into futurity, and perhaps the expression, "I shall see him, but not now," is expressive of something more than an ideal vision: it may be the mysterious foreboding of that real sight, which all shall have, when "He cometh with clouds and every eye shall see Him" (Rev. i. 7).

Though some deny the application of this prophecy to Christ, and think that it is completely fulfilled in David, it is only, we think, in those points, wherein the kingdom of David is typical of that of the Messiah. Men in the age of David would not be likely to find its fulfillment in him; for they found in his time other predictions opening the designs of God to a greater extent. It was a principle of ancient prophecy that it was constantly advancing, in some or other of its prospects, until the point of rest was given to so many of them, in the advent and religion of Christ.

"The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me; unto him ye shall hearken."

The prophet like unto Moses.
15-18.

The scope of this prophecy is decided by its origin and occasion. The Israelites could not endure the voice and fire of Mount Sinai. They asked for an intermediate messenger between God and them, who should temper the awfulness of his voice, and impart to them his will in a milder way. In answer to their prayer, God declares that they had well spoken, and that He would accordingly raise up unto them a Prophet such as they desired (Deut. xviii. 16, 17, 18).

Three general views of this passage have found their separate advocates. The first is that נָבִיא is used in a collective sense, and that it includes the prophets of all periods; the second, that it has exclusive reference to Christ; the third, that נָבִיא is used in a collective sense; but at the same time the promise is completely fulfilled only by the mission of Christ, in whom the idea of the prophetic order was completely realized.

The context (vers. 20-22) would seem to indicate that an order and succession of prophets were contemplated; but that is not inconsistent with the view, that the Prophet like unto Moses was to be some one Person, whose mission should be to reveal the divine will in a way differing from the terrors of the Law given from Mount Sinai. In this sense it is understood in the Gospel history (John v. 46, and i. 45; Luke xxiv. 44; Acts iii. 22, 23; Acts vii. 37; Matth. xvii. 5).¹ So it has been understood from the earliest times by most interpreters in the Christian Church and by the older Jews.

To justify its application to Christ the resemblance between Him and Moses has been drawn out into a variety of particulars, some of which may be regarded as fanciful. The great and essential characters of similitude between them are in the fullness and luminous intuition of their communications with God, the magnitude of the revelations made by them, and the institution of a religion founded upon these revelations.

There is another resemblance included in the scope of the prediction, resting in a quality, which began with Moses. Before his time the greater part of prophecy had been communicated in oracles and visions from God to individuals. When the patriarchs were inspired to prophesy, it was only upon the occasion; they had no constant recognized office of that nature. "A prophet raised up from among his brethren," and set forth as the declared interpreter of God's will, a living oracle of divine communication, was unknown until the mission of Moses. In this particular he resembled Christ, the Prophet of the New Testament.

The circumstances, under which the children of Israel were organized into a nation in the wilderness, are without a parallel in the history of any other nation. They were placed under the regimen of their law, obedience to which was strictly enjoined upon them. In case of disobedience, Moses, their prophet, denounced upon them, along with the dissolution of their polity, captivity, and dispersion, sufferings of unexampled severity (Deut. xxviii., xxix).

It is a striking fact in the delivery of this prophecy, that it comes from the legislator of the commonwealth. It is concurrent with the foundation of that commonwealth. It is not like man's wisdom to anticipate the downfall of his own works, at the moment when they come fresh from his hands. But it is like the wisdom of God to predict the fall of things, which are appointed to a great change, at a time when appearances are most remote from it, and when the state of things dictates other feelings and opposite anticipations. The approaching settlement of the chosen people in Canaan, is the time when their ruin and their expulsion from that land are introduced to view. In the land of Canaan they found a domicile for their Law, and an investiture of their covenant; and then prophecy ceased for a season.

From Moses to Samuel there is an interval without prophecy; from Samuel to Malachi there is continuity of prophecy; from Malachi to Christ there is another interval without prophecy.

That there was an intermission of the prophetic gift may be proved by the following arguments:—

(1.) The silence of the sacred record.

(2.) By the union of Samuel with Moses, when the prophets of God are mentioned together (Jer. xv. 1; compare Ps. xcix. 6).

(3.) By the implication of Paul, who reckons the government of the judges to Samuel, the prophet, as distinguished from them (Acts xiii. 20; compare iii. 24).

(4.) By the express statement of the historic text, which informs us that "the word of the Lord was precious in those days: there was no open vision" (1 Sam. iii. 1).

During the period of intermission, we read of Deborah, the prophetess; but her title to that name was probably due to her inspiration and to a call to government, or to her gift of composing sacred hymns. In the latter sense, Miriam, the sister of Moses, is styled a prophetess (Ex. xv. 20). The prophetic power showed itself in her under the form of poetry, accompanied with music and processions.

There was a reason for this intermission of prophecy in the condition and circumstances of the people. During the period of cessation there was no change seriously or permanently affecting the constitution of the government. The people, it is true, were subject to many vicissitudes of fortune. When they sinned, God gave them into the hands of their enemies; when they repented, He delivered them. But these vicissitudes did not shake the frame of their polity, their priesthood, or their law. They were merely the exemplifications of the issue of obedience, or disobedience. They gave no destructive shock to their institutions. No change occurred of magnitude sufficient to demand the prophetic interposition.

In the time of Samuel a different state of things arose. The commonwealth wore not only a disturbed appearance, but also approached the time of great innovations. A regal government was to be set up; the priesthood was to be transferred; the kingdom was to be divided; after which idolatry was established among the ten tribes; then followed a series of calamities ending in subjugation and captivity. In the midst of these calamities the Covenant was placed under such dubious and questionable circumstances as to render prophecy highly expedient to the elucidation of passing events, and to the instruction of men in regard to the future course and result of the divine proceedings. For it was one office of prophecy to give adequate information concerning the special institutions of God's covenant, and to predict the changes to which these institutions were from time to time subjected. No ordinance of any importance was allowed to pass away without the express and definite announcement of prophecy. This is verified in regard to the gift of Canaan, the Mosaic Covenant and worship, the Hebrew people as the peculiar people of God, the temporal kingdom of David, and the Temple. All these appointments have passed away, but none of them was abolished without the distinct announcement of prophecy.

Corresponding to the disturbed state of the commonwealth of Israel and to the changes that were awaiting it, were the revival and subsequent enlargement of the prophetic revelation. Prophecy took its stand at the commencement of these changes and innovations. As Moses was the prophet of the age of the Law, so was Samuel the prophet of the first age of the monarchy of Israel.

From the time of Samuel, prophecy is continuous and progressive. It proceeds, without any material chasm, or suspension of its revelations, through the succeeding line of complex history, down to the days of Malachi, the last of the Old Testament prophets, when it came to a close again for a long season, and interposed its other great cessation prior to the Gospel advent. This, then, is the reign of predictive revelation.

Cessation of prophecy between Moses and Samuel

Proofs of the intermission of the prophetic gift from Moses to Samuel.

Reason for this intermission of prophecy.

The proper age of the prophets, or the reign of predictive prophecy dates from the time of Samuel.

From the time of Samuel, prophecy is progressive and enlarged. and the proper age of the prophets. It is the middle period of the first dispensation, standing equally removed, in time and in some of its characters, from the Law and from the Gospel; and the service of prophecy, during this period, forms a connecting link of information between the two. It was a period that had its succession of inspired messengers following each other in order from first to last; and it had its predictions embracing every remarkable change affecting the chosen people, as well as a continuation of predictive prophecy carried forward and reaching to the Gospel age. Its communications are also enlarged. It branches out in different directions. It enters into the Jewish, Christian, and Pagan subjects. The restricted Jewish subject comes first, as in the predictions of Samuel. The Jewish and the Christian are next combined, as in the prophecies of David and Isaiah. Afterward the Christian and Pagan are clearly and formally connected in the prophecies of Daniel. All these subjects, either apart or in union, are filled up from time to time with various accessions of prediction, extending on every side the range of the revelation.

In this series of predictions, one subject is prominent. It is the Christian. It is, of all others, the most frequently introduced and the most copiously treated. "To Christ give all the prophets witness." Whatever matters they may treat of, to Him and his religion they direct our attention with a remarkable concurrence and agreement. The consummation of the designs of God in his particular covenant with the house of Israel, is referred to the days of the Messiah. The succession of the kingdoms of the earth is equally deduced to the Messiah's Kingdom. It may, therefore, be truly said of prophecy and of its scope, that it presents the Redeemer and his everlasting Kingdom as its centre, and the end of the revelations of God.

It has been already stated that, during the time of the Judges, the people of Israel were subject to many vicissitudes of fortune; and that, at the close of that period, the commonwealth was approaching a time of great innovations. In this crisis of the Chosen People, second only in importance to the Exodus, there appeared a leader, second only to Moses.¹ This was Samuel, to whom the Lord especially revealed Himself. He was the subject of divine communications when he was a child; and when he grew up, "all Israel from Dan even to Beersheba knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord" (1 Sam. iii. 20). The two books which give an account of the first establishment of the monarchy are called by his name, as fitly as the books which give an account of the establishment of the theocracy are called by the name of Moses.

Samuel was not a founder of a new state of things, like Moses; but he was appointed to regulate the great change, which ensued in the choice of a king to rule over Israel. At first he remonstrated against the wishes of the people, but afterwards yielded by divine direction, and anointed Saul of the tribe of Benjamin. When Saul, for his transgression, was rejected, David, of the tribe of Judah, was anointed by the same hand to succeed to the throne.

Samuel, as judge, was the representative of the past;² as prophet, he was the representative of the new epoch, which was now dawning on his country. He is explicitly described as "Samuel the Prophet." "All the prophets from Samuel and those that follow after." "He gave them judges until Samuel the Prophet." The line of prophets, who followed in unbroken succession until the time of Malachi, begins with him. The prophetic institution, in its outward form, may be traced back to him. In his time we first read of a "company of prophets," corresponding to what, in modern phraseology, are called "Schools of the Prophets."

The characteristic of Samuel's prophecy was almost exclusively of a civil nature, being directed to the public state of the Commonwealth of Israel. Its chief mission was to watch over the change introduced by the establishment of the kingly government. This Samuel, in his official character as prophet, did with diligence. He anointed, counseled, and directed Saul; and then by divine authority he appointed the sceptre to David. The transference of the priesthood from the house of Eli, the other chief subject of his prophecy, is of a like kind; for it made no change in the religion of the Israelites, but only in the public ecclesiastical order of it. The distinctive character of prophecy, at this period, is, therefore, its civil nature. As such it was adapted to its time, but it was something different from the prophecy of almost every other period. The predictions of Samuel, considered in their adaptation to the circumstances of the time, could not be said to have been framed under favor of these circumstances. For his predictions concerning Eli and Saul, the priesthood and the throne, were delivered in the face of their power; his favorable prediction respecting David seemed to be beyond the range of human probability. His first prophecies challenged a jealous scrutiny; his last was placed beyond the command of his influence and direction. In each case his authority, as a prophet, was, strictly tried.

² Some intimations, in the history of his times, would lead us to infer that he did not entirely relinquish the office of judge after the accession of Saul to the throne (1 Sam. xi. 7; xiii. 8-14; xv. 13-35).

Now the predictions of prophecy begin to take a wider range, and to present a greater variety of matter.

After the experience of so many changes and calamities, anxiety and doubt might take possession of the mind of the Israelite, on the occasion of another change,—the accession of David to the throne. This anxiety and doubt, did they exist, were removed by the interposition of prophecy. Having foreshown the exaltation of David, and the preëminence of his tribe, it proceeded to establish his house, and complete his greatness by a promise of the kingdom in his family. The predictions to this effect are literal and clear: "Moreover I will appoint a place for my people Israel, and will plant them, that they may dwell in a place of their own, and move no more; neither shall the children of wickedness afflict them any more, as beforetime, and as since the time that I commanded judges to be over my people Israel, and have caused thee to rest from all thine enemies. Also the Lord telleth thee that he will make thee a house. And when thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build a house for my name, and I will stablish the throne of his kingdom forever. I will be his father, and he shall be my son. If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men: But my mercy shall not depart away from him, as I took it from Saul, whom I put away before thee. And thine house and thy kingdom shall be established forever before thee: thy throne shall be established forever" (2 Sam. vii. 10-16). The eighty-ninth Psalm dilates the same prediction.

Prophecy in the time of David.

David's life and reign were not peaceful. They were full of warfare and danger. He was persecuted by Saul and obliged to seek an asylum in an enemy's land. His own son rebelled against him, and his subjects rose in insurrection. He was engaged in frequent wars with the surrounding nations. These troubles continued until he was advanced in life. He closed his career, however, in peace. But troublous as his own reign was, he had the prediction that his throne should be established, and that the reign of his son should be one of security and peace. "Behold a son shall be born unto thee, who shall be a man of rest; and I will give him rest from all his enemies round about; for his name shall be called Solomon, and I will give peace and quietness unto Israel in his days" (1 Chron. xxii. 9). This son the Lord chose to build a house for his name (1 Chron. xxviii. 3-6). We have here the stipulation of peace in the reign of Solomon, and of a long stability in his succession. These were the promises made to this chosen King of Israel, and, in him, to his people.

Temporal prophecy contained in this prediction.

But the temporal is only one of its subjects. In the person of David, prophecy makes some of its greatest revelations. In him, as in Abraham, the temporal and evangelical predictions are united. His reign is a cardinal point of their union, and of the entire scheme of prophecy in what has been called its double sense. He was a prophet himself, inspired to reveal many of the Christian promises. In the prophetic psalms, the most of which are ascribed to David, the attributes of the reign and religion of the Messiah are foreshown to us. We have set before us, by the royal prophet, a King set upon the holy hill of Zion, his law, the opposition made to Him by the kings of the earth, their rage defeated, his sceptre of righteousness, his unchangeable priesthood, his divine Sonship, his death and resurrection, his dominion embracing the whole world (Psalms ii., xvi., xlv., lxxii., lxxxix., cx).

In David, as in Abraham, we find the union of temporal and spiritual prophecy.

As there is a great increase of prophetic light, during this period, subsequent prophecy often reverts to it. There is no individual, one only excepted, of whom more is said by the prophets, than of David. "The throne of David," "the sure mercies of David," are frequently mentioned in the progress of prophetic revelation; and the single person, who formed the principal theme of the divine oracles, was He, who was both the Son of David and his Lord, to whom the glory of David's kingdom and the prophecies relating to it preëminently belong.

As the Messiah was to be born of the seed of David, according to the flesh, there was a congruity in originating some of the clearest and most remarkable prophecies concerning Him, at the time of the exaltation of the house of David; for the Messiah was to be the heir of David's throne, the King of Israel, the Ruler of the people of God. We observe the same order in the call of Abraham, and in the constitution of the tribes. When God first separated the family in which the Messiah was to be born, the seed of blessing was revealed to the founder and patriarch of that family. When the family began to divide and branch into tribes, the tribe of Judah was designated by prophecy as that from which Shiloh was to spring. When the kingdom of David is set up, the reign and power of the Messiah are brought into view. The congruity is not limited to the time of David's exaltation, for he was a typical king. The evangelical end is not only foreshown with the temporal appointment, but it is stamped upon it. In the house of David is founded a kingdom; but Christ has his kingdom, his protecting power and rule over the people of God, as truly as Solomon and other heirs of the house of David had theirs. The temporal kingdom bears some image to the other: they are two analogous subjects and fit to be combined together, as prophecy has combined them. This analogy and combination bring before us the double sense, as it has been called, of some prophecies, which is best explained by the principles of typology.

The prophecies of this period, relating to the Messiah, partake principally of the regal character; and David, the king and prophet, is made the promulgator of them; and an excellent provision was made for the expression, and to secure the memory of them in the language of poetry. They passed into the devotions, public and private, of the Church of Israel.

It had been foretold that the reign of Solomon should be distinguished for its peace and tranquility. It was also distinguished for its wealth and power (1 Kings iv. 20-26). David had subdued all the enemies of Israel; and in actual extent the boundaries of the Chosen People, in the time of Solomon, did not reach beyond the conquests of his father. He had dominion over nearly all the territory comprised in the original grant to Abraham. "The Lord magnified Solomon exceedingly in the sight of all Israel, and bestowed upon him such royal majesty as had not been on any king before him in Israel" (1 Chron. xxix. 25).

The greatest monument of Solomon's reign was the Temple. It had been a command and a prediction that he should build this edifice in his days (1 Chron. xxii. 8-11). This glorious fane was commenced under the auspices of prophecy (2 Chron. vi. 16, 17). The royal builder, at its dedication, made mention, in the hearing of all Israel, of past and subsisting predictions, which mention, in the hearing of those who could have given a ready contradiction, in case they were false, certified that they were fulfilled and known.

The Temple itself was a prophecy. The building of it was directed for the reason that God had given "rest to his people," and henceforth would not suffer them to wander, or be disturbed, so long as they enjoyed the privilege of being his people. "Moreover I will appoint a place for my people Israel, and will plant them, that they may dwell in a place of their own, and move no more" (2 Sam. vii. 10). This promise of rest is connected with the Temple; for it was spoken by the prophet Nathan, when God confirmed the design of building it. A fixed sanctuary of their religion was the most appropriate pledge that they could receive of the stability of their national fortunes. It must have been a gratifying pledge to a people, who had been pilgrims in Canaan, strangers in Egypt, wanderers in the Desert, and who again, in Canaan, had sought a home for their religion, in the removals of their migratory Ark. "Whereas I have not dwelt in any house since the time that I brought up the children of Israel out of Egypt, even to this day, but have walked in a tent and in a tabernacle" (2 Sam. vii. 6).

It may be said that the Temple did not have a lasting continuance. The people were carried into captivity, and the Temple was destroyed. To this it may be replied that the Temple was never designed to act as a charm to avert the divine judgments, in case of disobedience. It fell with the people and rose with them. It was the place which God had "chosen to set his name there." It was the acknowledged and authorized seat of their worship, upon which their covenant stood. Except around that Temple the Israelites have never been able to settle themselves as a people; except in it, they have never been able to find a public home for their nation and their religion. God made it their "resting-place"; and if it exists no more, it is a proof that they have ceased to be his people. The long desolation of the Temple, and their removal from the seat of it, are, therefore, proofs that their polity and peculiar law have, in the purposes of Providence, come to an end.

In case of disobedience, on the part of his people, God forewarned Solomon, that the Temple, which was to be a "resting-place," on condition of obedience, should be destroyed. "But if ye at all turn from following me, ye or your children, and will not keep my commandments and my statutes which I have set before you, but go and serve other gods and worship them; then will I cut off Israel out of the land which I have given them; and this house, which I have hallowed for my name, will I cast out of my sight; and Israel shall be a proverb and a by-word among all people: And at this house, which is high, every one that passeth by it shall be astonished, and shall hiss; and they shall say, Why hath the Lord done thus unto this land, and to this house?" (1 Kings ix. 6-8; see also 2 Chron. vii. 19-22).

The destruction of the Temple foretold to Solomon, at its dedication.

Such was the oracular communication from God to Solomon, on the completion of the sacred edifice. As Moses, the founder of the Commonwealth of Israel, was inspired to forewarn the people, at the beginning of their national existence, of their future afflictions and dispersions, so the builder of the Temple, had foreshown to him, at the time of its completion, a view of its destruction, by the avenging hand of the Almighty, as one of the special acts of his judgment against his people, in case of their disobedience and apostasy.

The glorious empire of Solomon came to ruin. With all his wisdom, which has placed him above the wise of every age, he was guilty of much folly. He attained to the maximum of polygamy: his harem numbered "seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines" (1 Kings xi. 3). "His wives turned away his heart after other gods (xi. 4), and he introduced polytheism (xi. 5, 7). Thus was he led away from the paths of David, his father, "and the Lord was angry with Solomon" (xi. 9). Along with this depravation of morals and religion followed, naturally, a depravation of that just and wise policy of government, which had won for Solomon the admiration and love of his subjects. Oppressive burdens were laid upon the people, which produced discontent.

Prediction of the dismemberment of Solomon's kingdom.

These things provoked the Lord to anger, and He "said unto Solomon, Forasmuch as this is done of thee, and thou hast not kept my covenant and my statutes, which I have commanded thee, I will surely rend the kingdom from thee, and will give it to thy servant. Notwithstanding in thy days I will not do it for David thy father's sake: but I will rend it out of the hand of thy son. Howbeit I will not rend away all the kingdom; but I will give one tribe to thy son, for David my servant's sake, and for Jerusalem's sake which I have chosen" (1 Kings xi. 11-13).

The glory of the kingdom of Israel ended with the peaceful and prosperous reign of Solomon. On the accession of his son, Rehoboam, ten tribes revolted and formed a separate kingdom under Jeroboam. Judah and Benjamin adhered to the house of David. This was a convulsion affecting the whole body of Israel. Their monarchy, so lately compacted, was rent in pieces; their public union, under which they had been made subjects of the divine covenant, was broken; and a cause of discord was rooted between the members of the commonwealth, which God had planted in Canaan, in a community of country and religion. Such a change would raise a question of their covenanted relation. Where did the promises of God attached to that relation rest? Did they rest with Israel? or with Judah, or with both? or were they forfeited? Prophecy answered the question. The event itself had been foretold in Solomon's reign by the prophet Ahijah (1 Kings xi. 29-39). It was also preceded by many predictions, which supplied discriminating marks of the purposes of Providence now in operation. There were Jacob's predictions of the ascendancy of the tribe of Judah, and the continuance of the sceptre with it until the advent of Shiloh (Gen. xlix. 8-10). There were the recent promises of favor to the house of David (2 Sam. vii. 12-16). There was the Temple at Jerusalem, the local seat of their religion. And last of all there was the prophecy of Ahijah, which fully met the case, both in the particular form of the event, and in the reason of it. As to the event, the prediction of Ahijah limited the defection to ten tribes, and fixed the time of it in the reign of Solomon's son. The reasons of the event were the corruptions introduced by Solomon (1 Kings xi. 33). The event was preceded, therefore, by the announcement of prophecy, sufficiently adequate to solve all questions, in regard to the transmission of the covenant.

It may be said that the partition of the kingdom might have been easily foreseen, inasmuch as the ten tribes, in the time of David, had shown a disposition to act together, and to oppose themselves to the dominion of the tribe of Judah. Consequently they might be expected, under provocation, to withdraw and form a separate government. To this it may be replied that the occasion and pretext of the revolt did not exist until after the prediction of it was delivered. It took its rise from the rigor of Rehoboam's government; but it was foretold in the reign of Solomon, and foretold with a particularity, which existing political reasons could not warrant. Moreover, though the revolt took place, on the excitement of human motives, it was established and confirmed against the current of such motives. God forbade the attempt to subdue it. "But the word of the Lord came to Shemaiah the man of God, saying, Speak unto Rehoboam the son of Solomon, King of Judah, and to all Israel in Judah and Benjamin, saying, Thus saith the Lord, Ye shall not go up, nor fight against your brethren: return every man to his house; for this thing is done of me. And they obeyed the words of the Lord, and returned from going against Jeroboam" (2 Chron. xi. 2, 3, 4).

 placing it under a jealous and divided care. The people of Samaria professed to receive the Pentateuch and to hold the Law of Moses. The predictions in the Pentateuch, concerning the tribe of Judah, were, therefore, subjected to their rigid scrutiny. So also the prophecies delivered against them, after the dismemberment, by prophets sent from the kingdom of Judah. A prophet of Judah was sent to prophesy against the altar erected at Bethel by Jeroboam. Had no such prophet been sent among them, it would have been easy for them to prove it. This case is somewhat similar to the safeguard furnished for the accurate transmission of the Scriptures of the Old Testament by the jealousy of Jews and Christians.

The moral cause of the disruption of the kingdom of Israel was idolatry (1 Kings Prophecy relating to the kingdom of the ten tribes.
 -xi. 33). Hence Jeroboam had a warning against the sin, which furnished the occasion for the establishment of his kingdom. But he was no sooner seated on the throne than, for political reasons (1 Kings xii. 26, 27), he founded a system of open idolatry; and for its preservation he appointed a priesthood, and ritual, and erected an altar (1 Kings xii. 28-33). The golden calves in Bethel and in Dan were the public monuments of this apostasy. "Behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt," was the creed of the new kingdom (1 Kings xii. 28). The enormity of this sin was that it made idolatry the national religion, whereas, in former times, its contaminations had been surreptitiously, sometimes openly, associated with the institutions of Moses. The people readily acquiesced in the king's apostasy. Under the compact of this sin, he incorporated them in allegiance to his throne. Hence the reason of the brand affixed to his memory: "Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin" (1 Kings xiv. 16).

Prophecy did not remain silent in this crisis of wickedness. God sent his prophet from the land of Judah to pronounce sentence of condemnation upon the system of idolatry, which Jeroboam had established (1 Kings xiii. 1-10). This interposition of prophecy was for a sufficient cause. It was a timely remonstrance with the ten tribes in regard to the crime, which became the chief source of their growing corruption, and thereby the cause of their reprobation, misery, and ruin. The remonstrance was made on the scene of their offense, and accompanied with a miracle, which should have served as a memorial of reproof to meet the transgressor, whenever he came before the forbidden altar. But this warning prophecy was given without effect. From Jeroboam, the first king of the ten tribes, to Hoshea, the last, there is no king excepted from the imputation of the general depravity. The whole line of kings is one of unmitigated irreligion and wickedness. King after king has this historic epitaph: "he did evil in the sight of the Lord."

A few righteous remained among the people. The prophet Elijah imagined that, like the Seraph Abdiel, he only was "faithful found among the faithless;" but God revealed to him, that there were seven thousand in Israel, who had not bowed unto Baal (1 Kings xix. 18).

The prophecy, during this period, was adapted to the prevailing irreligion. It abounds in commination and reproof. The mission of the two great prophets, Elijah and Elisha, falls in the earlier part of this period — a mission directed chiefly to the kingdom of the ten tribes and its kings, and enforced by miracles to convince and awaken an apostate people. The duration of Elisha's ministry reaches nearly to that of Jonah; and from Jonah we enter into the series of the prophetic canon. This is the continuity of prophecy. There is also another proof of the same continuity, in the prophecy given to Jehu, during the ministry of Elisha, that his children should reign after him to the fourth generation. This prophecy does not expire until after the prophecies of Amos and Hosea have begun; and these prophets begin to foreshow the destruction of the kingdom of Israel. Consequently the series of prophecy is so far complete.

The result is that the kingdom of Israel has its entire history written in the perpetuity of its wickedness, as recorded in the ministry of its prophets. The general document is: "Jeroboam drove Israel from following the Lord, and made them sin a great sin. For the children of Israel walked in all the sins of Jeroboam, which he did; they departed not from them; until the Lord removed Israel out of his sight, as he had said by all his servants the prophets. So was Israel carried away out of their own land to Assyria unto this day" (2 Kings xvii. 21-23).

The prophecies concerning Israel furnish a melancholy contrast to those relating to Judah. The case of Israel was to be hopeless: Judah was to be restored.

At the time of the disruption of the kingdom, reason could not determine, for anything that then appeared, which would be the more prosperous, or stable of the two. That of Samaria, her greater territory and numbers considered, seemed to have the advantage. But prophecy supplied data, which would assist in forming a judgment concerning their comparative stability. We have already seen that there were promises on the side of the tribe of Judah and the family of David, which may be understood, by plain inference, to negative the hopes of the other tribes. For these promises made to the tribe of Judah virtually cut off the other tribes by a speedier termination of their power.

Temporal prophecy relating to Judah, from the division of the kingdom in the days of Jeroboam, until the Babylonian captivity.

But the question was not left to depend upon inference. It was decided positively by direct prophecy. Of the four greater and twelve minor prophets, whose books we find in the Canon of Scripture, the most ancient are Jonah, Joel, Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah. The prophecy of Jonah relates to the city of Nineveh. Joel speaks of coming judgments upon the land, of a restoration of Judah and Jerusalem from captivity, and of blessings upon them. Hosea speaks directly to the point, as it regards the relative destiny of the two kingdoms. Speaking in the name of the Lord, he says: "I will no more have mercy upon the house of Israel; but I will utterly take them away. But I will have mercy upon the house of Judah, and will save them by the Lord their God" (Hos. i. 6, 7). The whole book of this prophet inculcates the speedier dispersion and desolation of the house of Israel. Both Israel and Judah are threatened; but the burden of his prophecy is upon Ephraim, Bethel, and Samaria. Amos wails in elegiac strains: "The virgin of Israel is fallen; she shall no more rise: she is forsaken upon her land; there is none to raise her up" (Amos v. 3). Isaiah predicted that "within threescore and five years shall Ephraim be broken, that it be not a people" (Is. vii. 8). Looking through his prophecies, we find predictions that Judah should be preserved. They were to fall under the power of the Assyrians; but they were to be delivered (chap. x). They were afterward to fall into the hands of the Babylonians (chap. xxxix). But a restoration was to ensue, and the restorer is mentioned by name (xliv. 28; xlv. 1). The medium of their restoration was to be the capture of Babylon (xlv. 1-3; lxvii. 1-15; comp. chap. xliii.). The Medes and the Persians were to be the powers engaged in the siege (xlii. 17; xxi. 2). The city of Jerusalem and the Temple were to be rebuilt (xliv. 28).

The most cheering evangelical promises were made during the decline, and after the overthrow of the temporal kingdom. When the First Dispensation began to be shaken, the objects and promises of the second began to be substituted in its place. A new kingdom, and a new covenant are presented to view; and the blessings and mercies, which are most peculiar to the expected dispensation, are placed in a clearer light than ever before. The promises of them are also greatly multiplied. The evangelical teaching of the prophets, during this period, was an approach to the economy of the Gospel, which abolishes the ritual law and establishes the moral. In this light, it was a preparation for the future change. It also furnished opportune instruction to the people of Israel, at a time when the ritual law was rendered difficult or impracticable. On the one hand, there was intestine trouble; on the other, foreign invasion: their heathen enemies were beginning to spoil their land; the temple was about to be destroyed, and the public institutions of their religion were soon to be suspended. In this state of affairs, it must have been consolatory to the pious men of the nation to learn from the prophets, that personal religion was that, which God most esteemed, and which He had always preferred. Thus the prophetic teaching was adapted to the difficulties of their situation.

During the first part of this period, there seems to have been a pause in evangelical prophecy. In the time of David large revelations concerning the Messiah were made; but after the disruption, prophecy was directed to the state of the two kingdoms. The two great prophets, Elijah and Elisha, were ministers of the temporal prophecy. Their mission, so far as we can gather from the records of their times, was confined to the Northern Kingdom, and it had passed before the Gospel subject appears again in view, unless some of the Psalms, of an unknown date and of a prophetic spirit, may be ascribed to this intermediate time.

The other prophets, during this period, were Jonah, Joel, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah, Nahum, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, Habakkuk, and Obadiah.

The book of Jonah contains no prediction of a direct Christian import. The subject of his prophecy is Nineveh. He was, however, in his own person, a type, or prophetic sign of Christ. The miracle of his deliverance from the belly of the whale was the type of Christ's resurrection (Matt. xii. 40). Moreover, the whole import of his mission partakes of the Christian character; for his preaching exemplified the divine mercy to a heathen city. It brought the Ninevites to know "a gracious God, and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repenting Him of the evil" (Jonah iv. 2). Whether all this is to be considered a formal type of the genius of the Christian religion or not, it is certainly a real example of some of its chief properties, in the efficacy of repentance, the grant of pardon, and the communication of God's mercy to the heathen world. Viewed in this light, the book of Jonah forms a point of connection with the Gospel.

The prophet Joel foretells, in the plainest terms, the effusion of the Holy Spirit (ii. 28-32). The Apostle Peter applies this prophecy to the descent of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 16-21).

The prophet Amos predicts the restoration of the tabernacle of David (ix. 11), which the Apostle James refers to Gospel times (Acts xv. 15, 16).

Hosea contains much of a Christian import cited by our Lord, by Matthew, and by Paul. Compare Matt. ii. 15, and Hosea xi. 1; Matt. ix. 13, and Matt. xii. 7 with Hos. vi. 6; Rom. ix. 25, 26 with Hos. ii. 23; and 1 Cor. xv. 55 with Hos. xiii. 14.

Isaiah is styled by way of eminence the evangelical prophet. His book contains the scheme of the Gospel in its grand outlines. In it we have clearly set forth the mission of Christ; his divine nature; his supernatural birth in his incarnation; his work of mercy; his kingdom of righteousness; his humiliation, sufferings, and death; his atonement for sin made by his death; the effusion of the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit; the universal diffusion of his religion; the blindness and incredulity of the Jews in the rejection of it; the adoption of the Gentile world into the Church; and the peace of the righteous in death (Is. vii. 14; ix. 6, 7; and all his later prophecies from chap. xl. to chap. lxvi.).

Micah foretells the birth-place of Christ; his divine nature; the promulgation of the Gospel from Mount Zion and its results; and the exaltation of Christ's kingdom over all nations (Mic. v. 2; comp. Matt. ii. 6; iv. 1-8).

The book of Nahum has no Christian prophecy, either direct or typical. It will be best understood as a continuation of, or supplement to the book of Jonah. The prophecy of both is directed against Nineveh. But that of Jonah was followed by the preservation of that city; that of Nahum, which abounds more in details, by its capture and destruction. They form connected parts of one moral history, the remission of God's judgment being illustrated by the one, the execution of it by the other.

Zephaniah predicts the restoration of Jerusalem, and the happy state of the people of God in the latter days (chap. iii. 8-20).

Jeremiah foretells the abrogation of the Mosaic law; speaks of the Ark as no more remembered; foretells the propagation of a more spiritual religion than the old; the mediatorial kingdom of the Messiah, whom he calls "Jehovah our righteousness;" describes the efficacy of his atonement; the excellence of the Gospel in giving holiness as well as pardon; the call of the Gentiles; and the final salvation of Israel. (Jer. xxx. 9; xxxi. 15; comp. Matt. ii. 17, 18; xxxii. 36-41; iii. 15-18; xxxi. 31-34; comp. Heb. viii. 8-12, and x. 16, 17; xxiii. 5, 6. There are many other passages, which perhaps refer directly to the restoration from Babylon; but they speak of it in such a way as to convey the idea that it is intended to be typical of a more glorious restoration.)

In the book of Habakkuk there are two passages, which cannot be excluded from some relation to the Gospel. The first is, "The just shall live by faith" (ii. 4), cited in Rom. i. 17 and in Heb. x. 38. Here we have a Christian principle, though the prophet probably had no particular Christian truth in view, when he uttered it. Faith — the habit of trusting in God, or in his revealed Word — is the principle of divine life; so, in every age, complete salvation has been a matter of faith rather than of sight. The other passage is chap. iii. 17, 18, which contains a confession of the prophet's own faith — a faith separated from all earthly and temporal hopes. As such it is of a pure evangelical character.

It is somewhat uncertain when Obadiah delivered his prophecy, but it was probably immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. Some give it an earlier date. For our present purpose it is not important to determine the precise time. Its predictions are directed against the Edomites. But verses 17-21 evidently refer to Messianic times. The fulfillment of these verses, Keil and Delitzsch affirm, can only belong to the Gospel dispensation, "and that in such a way that it commenced with the founding of the Kingdom of Christ on the earth, advances with its extension among all nations, and will terminate in a complete fulfillment at the second coming of our Lord."

It is a fact to be observed that prophecy, relating to heathen states and kingdoms, becomes most copious and explicit in the time, when those states and kingdoms are most powerful. When the people of God are threatened with invasion by these heathen powers, or when they are groaning under oppression by them, then prophecy foretells the overthrow of their power and the extinction of their glory. The success of the heathen was in some measure the triumph of idolatry; for they were accustomed to ascribe the honor of their victories to their false divinities. The return of the victor was the occasion of celebrating the praise of his idol. The religion of the conquered partook of the disgrace of their defeat. Accordingly the memorials of these times of reproach and distress in Israel show how much the faith of men and the credit of true religion were assailed by the boasts of their conquerors. The cry of the oppressed Israel was: "Wherefore should the heathen say, Where is now their God?" (Ps. lxxix. and lxxx.). "Remember this, that the enemy hath reproached, O Lord, and that the foolish people have blasphemed thy name" (Ps. lxxiv. 18). "The ways of Zion do mourn, because none come to the solemn feasts: all her gates are desolate: her priests sigh, her virgins are afflicted, and she is in bitterness. Her adversaries are the chief, her enemies prosper" (Lam. i. 4, 5).

The pious Israelite, under these mournful circumstances, derived his consolation from prophecy. The nations that oppressed him, had their rise, their victories, their changes and downfall delineated on the prophetic page. The controlling providence of God was thus explained, when it was most liable to be called in question. His people were most instructed as to his ways and purposes, when their sufferings and their fears were at the greatest height. His moral government was illustrated in their own predicted afflictions, in the foretold victories of their present conquerors, and in their expected deliverance.

The great use of prophecy concerning heathen nations was in part the same as that of all other temporal prophecy, namely, to demonstrate the providence of God. The disclosure of an event before it took place would more forcibly exhibit the divine direction of things than an explanation of it after it had occurred; for it manifested the divine prescience, counsel, and ordination together.

Had the prophets confined their revelation to the affairs of the Hebrew people, the proof of God's providence would have been imperfect; for his overruling sovereignty, in the sphere of other kingdoms, might have remained a question. But the revelations of prophecy resolved every doubt in regard to the matter. They proclaimed his universal providence and sovereignty over all nations. "Thus saith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden, to subdue nations before him; and I will loose the loins of kings, to open before him the two leaved gates; and the gates shall not be shut; I will go before thee, and make the crooked places straight: I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron" (Is. xlv. 1, 2). "The Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will. Whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, and his kingdom is from generation to generation" (Dan. iv. 32-34).

The state of religion, in the heathen world, rendered this exercise of prophecy expedient. For one of the most prevalent notions of false religion was that of local and tutelary deities. Polytheism set up its gods over particular regions, or kingdoms, within which it circumscribed their power. Under such an idea, the God of Israel might have appeared the deity of one place, or people. Hence the expediency of declaring his universal sovereignty.

There was, moreover, in the heathen world, a universal reverence paid to oracles, or systems of divination. These had their origin in the natural desire of seeing into futurity, which may sometimes have been abused by the craft of policy, and which of itself degenerated into the superstitions of augury, necromancy, and other forms of delusion. To the Israelite all these modes of exploring futurity were forbidden, as the devices of heathenism (Deut. xviii. 14; Lev. xix. 31). But the prohibition was made reasonable by the genuine gift of prophecy, which showed the omniscience of God in the affairs of those countries, in which the oracles of superstition were consulted. "For these nations, which thou shalt possess, hearkened unto observers of times, and unto diviners: but as for thee, the Lord thy God hath not suffered thee so to do" (Deut. xviii. 14). This was the practice of the ancient Canaanites. The Egyptians and the Chaldeans, in a later age, infused more of the mystery of pretended science into the same kind of superstition. But the inspired prophets of Israel furnished the antidote and the refutation of all this science, when they could contrast with its falsehood the truth of their own predictions. "Thus saith the Lord, that frustrateth the tokens of the liars, and maketh diviners mad, that turneth wise men backward, that maketh their knowledge foolish; that confirmeth the word of his servant, and performeth the counsel of his messengers" (Is. xlv. 25, 26). By this test God vindicated his own foreknowledge, and put the pretenses of human skill, and of idol oracles to confusion.

Prophecy relating to the heathen nations commenced at a very early period. The remote judgment of God upon Egypt was revealed to Abraham (Gen. xv. 14); he had an intimation that it would fall upon the Amorites; and he witnessed the nearer judgment upon Sodom and Gomorrah. These were nations placed within his view and connected with the future state of his family, the Hebrew people. The revelation, thus opened to Abraham, continued, in subsequent times, to hold the same order; for the temporal prophecy continued to embrace the Hebrew Church and nation, and other states and kingdoms, so far as the people of Israel were affected by them, or could see the tenor of God's providence illustrated in their history. "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do?" (Gen. xviii. 17), is the introduction to the prophecy which revealed to the Father of the faithful the doom of Sodom and Gomorrah. "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but He revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets" (Amos iii. 7). This is the range of prophecy concerning his own people. "I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations" (Jer. i. 5). This is the mission of Jeremiah at the time when prophecy took its largest scope among the kingdoms of the earth, and when God's government and providence were to be most conspicuously displayed in their rise and fall, their conquests and desolations. In the time of Moses the like union of prophecy concerning the heathen nations with that concerning Israel may be observed; and throughout the principal age of prophecy from Samuel to Malachi, the connection is constantly maintained. There is then a general consistency in the prophetic system, in this particular of it; and the analogy begins in the revelation to Abraham, to whom was exemplified the entire scheme of prophecy, in its simplest form, in all its parts, Christian, Jewish, and Gentile.

The principal heathen nations that were made the subject of prophecy were the Egyptians,¹ Edomites,² Moabites,³ Ammonites,⁴ Philistines,⁵ Tyrians,⁶ Assyrians,⁷ Babylonians,⁸ Persians,⁹ Greeks,¹⁰ and Romans.¹¹ The predictions against these nations were mostly given amidst the decays of the Jewish covenant, and were intended to rebuke the pride of the nations, to administer consolation and instruction, and above all to lead the thoughts of men to that Kingdom which cannot be moved. In the midst of the captivity Daniel saw in symbol the character and overthrow of the great monarchies of the earth, and in vision he beheld the Ancient of days ascend the throne of universal dominion.

The captivity in Babylon, as we have already seen, had been foretold. It was, therefore, a fulfillment of preëxisting prophecy. It was a severe and remarkable dispensation of Providence. In former times the people of Israel had suffered great calamities. They had often been brought under the power of their enemies; the ark, the symbol of God's presence, had been carried, for a short time, into the land of the Philistines. But the captivity was the severest blow that had hitherto befallen them. Their land was laid waste; their ark was destroyed; their temple was burned to the ground; and Jerusalem was reduced to ashes. "How hath the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger, and cast down from heaven unto the earth the beauty of Israel, and remembered not his footstool in the day of his anger! The Lord hath purposed to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion; He hath stretched out a line, He hath not withdrawn his hand from destroying; therefore He made the rampart and the wall to lament; they languished together. Her gates are sunk into the ground; He hath destroyed and broken her bars; her king and her princes are among the Gentiles; the law is no more; her prophets also find no vision from the Lord" (Lam. ii. 1, 8, 9).

Prophecy during the captivity in Babylon.

The prophets, during the captivity, were Jeremiah, only in part, Ezekiel and Daniel. The prophecies of Jeremiah have already been mentioned; and it is not necessary to refer to them again. He was allowed his choice either to go to Babylon, where he would doubtless have been held in honor at the royal court, or to remain with his own people. He chose the latter. Subsequently he endeavored to persuade the leaders of the people not to go to Egypt, but to remain in the land, assuring them, by a divine message, that if they did so, God would build them up. The people refused to obey, and went to Egypt, taking Jeremiah and Baruch with them (Jer. xliii. 6). In Egypt he still sought to turn the people to the Lord (xliv.); but his writings give no information respecting his subsequent history. It is asserted that the Jews, offended by his faithful remonstrances, put him to death in Egypt: Jerome says at Tahpanhes.

Prophecy during the captivity.

The duration of the captivity was foretold by Jeremiah (Jer. xxv. 11, 12. Compare Dan. ix. 2). Seventy years were to be accomplished in the desolations of Jerusalem. Ezekiel, who, like Jeremiah, was a priest as well as a prophet, was carried away captive eleven years before its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar. When he was among the captives by the river Chebar, "the heavens were opened and he saw visions of God" (chap. i. 1).

Temporal prophecy during the captivity both Jewish and Pagan.

The predictions of Ezekiel were delivered partly before and partly after the destruction of Jerusalem, which calamitous event forms their central point. Before this sad calamity his chief object was to call to repentance those who were living in careless security; to warn them against indulging the hope that, by the help of the Egyptians, the Babylonian yoke would be shaken off (chap. xvii. 15-17); and to assure them that the destruction of their city was inevitable and fast approaching. After the destruction of the city his principal care was to console the exiled Jews by promises of future deliverance and restoration to their own land.

The predictions of Ezekiel are remarkably varied. He has instances of visions, — "When, by the vision led,

His eye surveyed the dark idolatries
Of alienated Judah;" 1

(chaps. viii.-xi.); symbolical actions (iv. 8); similitudes (chaps. xii., xv.); parables (xvii.); proverbs (xii. 22; xviii. 1 ff.); poems (xix.); allegories (chaps. xxiii., xxiv.); open prophecies (chaps. vi., vii., xx., etc.).

In his predictions against the heathen nations, he confines the number of these nations to seven. This was probably intentional on the part of the prophet, otherwise we would scarcely find Sidon separately brought forward alongside of Tyre, xxviii. 20 ff. (Ewald, p. 307; Hitzig, p. 187.) Also the order in which these prophecies stand connected, deviating as it does from chronological sequence, has a deeper foundation in the subject-matter. "First the judgment is predicted against the neighboring nations, Ammon, xxv. 1-7; Moab, vers. 8-11; Edom, vers. 12-14; and the Philistines, vers. 15-17; these rising up in open enmity to the theocracy, represent in this the might of heathendom, as it has turned away from God, and is arrested in the very act of rebellion against Him." Then follow the prophecies against Tyre and Sidon (xxvi.-xxviii.). "In Tyre is represented the image of vain-glory, and of fleshly security, which looks away from God, and thus plunges ever deeper into the sinfulness and inanity of the natural life." "Finally, both of these sides meet together in Egypt (xxix.-xxxii.), that ancient enemy of the covenant people, now strengthened so as to become one of the empires of the world, and as such taking its stand in unbending defiance and vain-glory; yet now, like all the rest, on the point of being hurled down into an abyss from the summit of its ancient splendor" (Häv., Comm., p. 405).

The position of the prophecies against the foreign nations, in the middle between the threatening predictions before Jerusalem was destroyed and the announcements of salvation after this catastrophe, is due to the internal bond of connection, which is real and causal. It is brought about by means of the following thought: "Though the covenant people fall under the heathenish worldly power, still this is not a victory of heathenism over the true theocracy. Far from this, heathenism, with all its might and glory, must fall; and on the other hand the theocracy shall rise again from its ruins to new life in glory." (Comp. Häv., Comm., p. 404.)¹

"The book of Daniel bears the same relation to the Old Testament, and especially to the prophets, as the Revelation of John to the New, and especially to the prophetic sayings of Christ and his Apostles. Daniel is the Apocalypse of the Old Testament. Other books of the Old Testament as well speak of the great Messianic future; other books of the New Testament as well speak of the second coming, or Parousia of Christ. But, while the other prophets bring only the particular situation of the people of God at the time into the light of prophecy, and while the Apostles give disclosures on special eschatological points, as the wants and necessities of their readers demand them; Daniel and the Revelation of St. John are not so much called forth by a temporary want, and given for a special end, but they have the more general aim of serving as prophetic lamps to the congregation of God in those times, in which there is no revelation, and in which the Church is given into the hands of the Gentiles (καρπὸς ἐθνῶν, Luke xxi. 24). We have thus recognized Daniel as the light which was sent for the comfort of those who were "wise," to lighten the darkness of the half millennium, from the Captivity till Christ and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. And, in like manner, the Apocalypse of John was given to the saints of the new covenant, as a guiding star, to lead them on their pilgrim's journey through the world, from the first coming of Christ, or rather, from the destruction of Jerusalem till his second coming, when He shall establish the Kingdom of glory (comp. Tit. ii. 11-13; Rev. i. 7; xxii. 17, 20). The last days indeed form also the subject of Daniel's visions (chaps. ii. and vii.), and therefore we must necessarily expect an intimate connection between these chapters and the Apocalypse. But, while Daniel writes for Jews, and from the Old Testament stand-point, John, standing on New Testament ground, writes for Gentile Christians, a difference rich in consequences.

"Such being the object for which the Apocalyptic books were given, it will easily be seen why there is, strictly speaking, only one Apocalypse in each Testament, though there are many prophets in the Old, and many prophetic disclosures in the New. There are two great periods of revelation, that of the Old and that of the New Testament. And each of these is followed by a period without revelation; that which succeeded the exile, and that which succeeded the Apostles (the Church-historical period). The Apocalyptic books are the two lights which shine out of the former periods into the latter. And hence, each Apocalypse is among the latest works of its respective Canon; it is written at a time when revelation, about to lapse into silence, gathers once more its whole strength into a final effort. We are taught this by the very name Apocalyptic. It is from ἀποκάλυψις (Rev. i. 1), a revelation in a peculiar emphatic sense, needed for the times without revelation; a guiding-star in the times of the Gentiles."²

At the very beginning of the book of Daniel we find the opposition between Israel and the heathen world-power, and more particularly that power in the stage of its development, which commences with the Babylonian exile, which forms the historical basis of Daniel's prophecies. The book opens with a statement of the beginning of the captivity (i. 1, 2) ; and mentions (ix. 2) its termination.

"The new revelation which the people of God required for the period beginning with the Babylonian captivity, was to teach them how to regard the powers of the world which they were to obey ; to teach them their nature and purpose, and then to show them the relation in which the work of salvation which was to begin in Israel, stood to them. A new subject was thus given to prophecy, which, in the nature of things, could not have been given before the captivity, but which now forced itself, as it were, by an internal necessity."¹

Chap. ii. contains an emblematic representation of the kingdoms which form the chief subject of the book. The image, which Nebuchadnezzar saw, represents the Babylonian monarchy under his own dynasty, the Medo-Persian empire, the Grecian, and the Roman. The last is divided into ten kingdoms, and gives way to the kingdom of the Messiah, represented by a stone cut out without hands, which became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth. In later chapters, one or other of these kingdoms again and again appears.

In chap. vii. the first four of these kingdoms are represented by beasts, all highly significant. So they appeared to Daniel, whose eye was spiritualized. Of the ten kingdoms into which the fourth is divided, three are subdued by a little horn (ver. 8). The power represented by the little horn exercises its tyranny until the triumph of the saints. This view of the four empires has special reference to their religious connections, as the former view had to their political.

Chapters viii., x., xi. contain prophecies concerning the Medo-Persian and Grecian empires.

From this brief outline of the temporal prophecy of the book of Daniel, it will be seen that it throws a prophetic light over the whole future. The great world-powers pass away, and the scene closes with the universal establishment of the kingdom of the Messiah.

The book of Ezekiel is not directly quoted in the New Testament ; but in the Apocalypse there are many allusions and parallels to its closing chapters (xl.-xlviii.), which contain symbolical representations of the Messianic times. Other portions of his prophecies, of a general Messianic character, are chap. xxxiv. 11-19 ; and chaps. xxxvi.-xxxix.

Messianic prophecy
during the

Daniel foretells the coming of the Messiah, the atoning power of his sufferings (ix. 24-27), and the universal dominion, which is to be given to Him over all the kingdoms of the world (chaps. ii. and vii.). In this apocalyptic book the kingdom of God takes, in the person of the Son of Man, the place of the kingdom of the world.

The Son of Man, in Daniel, is not the people of Israel, as some expositors have affirmed, but the Messiah. This is evident from the fact that He comes with the clouds of heaven, which cannot very well be predicated of the people of Israel. Again, the saints are mentioned in the vision (ver. 21) ; if then they are introduced in person, they cannot be represented by the Son of Man. The expression Son of Man must, therefore, be taken to designate the Messiah, and to designate his people only secondarily, and as represented by Him (comp. Gal. iii. 16-28 ; 1 Cor. xii. 12).

"It is quite in keeping," says Auberlen, "with the universal horizon of Daniel's prophecy, that Messiah is not designated as the son of David, but in general, as the Son of Man ; no more as King of Israel only, but as king of the world. The prophetic horizon has returned to its original extent, as it was in the Protevangel in Paradise. There, as now again here, all mankind — humanity — was within the field of prophecy."

This brings us "to view the picture of the Messiah presented by Daniel, in its relation to the prophecy, which immediately precedes it. From the view we have already given of the history of Israel, it will appear to the careful reader that, in the development of the Old Testament Theocracy, the Babylonian captivity is the exact counterpart to the epoch of David. This one epoch is the culminating point of the glorious exaltation of the people of the covenant, the other of their deepest humiliation. Hence the types with which the kingdom of David has furnished Messianic prophecy, disappeared at the time of the exile, which substituted others in their place. These types are twofold, as would be expected from the nature of the case. On the one hand, the sufferings of the people are reflected in the picture of the suffering Messiah ; and this is the basis of the prophecy of the servant of Jehovah, which Isaiah beheld in his visions (xl.-lxvi.). To this class, also, the ninth chapter of our book belongs. On the other hand, in this very time of suffering, the truth that in the kingdom of God the cross is the only way to glory, shines forth more brightly than ever before, and there is a lively hope that after "the scattering of the power of the holy people" is accomplished (Dan. xii. 7), the kingdom of God will be set up among men with a power and extensiveness previously unknown. This is the prophetic vision of the Son of Man (Dan. vii.). All these expressions are equally significant. Servant of God denotes zealous and patient obedience to God: Son of Man refers to the ground on which man is to obtain again that original destiny and dignity as head of creation, which was conferred upon him (Gen. i. 26-28.) Both designations of the Messiah have taken the place of the Davidic type. The Messiah is no longer represented as the Theocratic King coming to the covenant people, but He appears a centre of unity both for the covenant people and the Gentile world. We see here a similar progress to that which took place in the times of the Apostles from Judaism to Christianity. It will be easily seen that this progress is intimately connected with the historical position of the people during the captivity. Even in the picture of the Messiah during the Davidic period, the two sides of suffering and victory begin to appear prominently. The Messianic psalms are divided into psalms of humiliation and of triumph. And what we here see in its germ, we afterwards see fully developed at the time of the captivity. On the one side the atoning power of Messiah's sufferings is disclosed (Is. liii. and Dan. ix.); on the other there is revealed that dominion of the Messiah which, in the development of universal history, is given to Him over the individual kingdoms of the world (Dan. ii. 7). Prophecy has thus gained not only in depth, but in breadth of view."¹

At the close of the seventy years' captivity (the time predicted by Jeremiah, xxv. 12 and xxix. 10), Cyrus "made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom and put it also in writing, saying, Thus saith Cyrus King of Persia. The Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth; and He hath charged me to build Him a house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah. Who is there among you of all his people? his God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem, which is in Judah, and build the house of the Lord God of Israel (He is the God), which is in Jerusalem. And whosoever remaineth in any place where he sojourneth, let the men of his place help him with silver and with gold, and with goods and with beasts, besides the free-will offering for the house of God that is in Jerusalem" (Ezra i. 1-4; compare Isaiah xlv. 28, and xlv. 1-5).

This edict of Cyrus was founded upon the prophecy of Isaiah; but how he became acquainted with that prophecy we are not informed. He certainly was acquainted with it, for his proclamation was a public recognition of it to his empire. As such, it would draw notice to the prediction of Isaiah, and tend to spread something of the knowledge of the true God wherever it was conveyed. But however this might be, it had one certain and important use in securing the favor of succeeding kings of Persia to the Hebrew people, for the safety of their affairs, and the complete restitution of their city and temple (Ezra v. 13-17; vi. 1-15; ix. 9). To this subject and the annunciation of the Gospel the predictions of the post-exile prophets are almost entirely confined. These prophets are Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi.

The return of the Jewish people from Babylon, and their reestablishment in their own land, were not beheld with favor by the Samaritans and other surrounding enemies. The rebuilding of their temple and of their walls was forcibly interrupted and delayed. The struggle affected their restoration as a Church and a people, and hazarded the exercise of their religion. But prophecy supplied the encouragement, which the conflict of their fortunes required. It did so by assurances of the repression of their enemies, and complete reestablishment of their city, temple, and public peace.

Haggai delivers four prophetic messages (i. 1; ii. 1; x. 20), three of which are intended to reprove the Jews for neglecting the temple, and to promise that the divine favor will attend its erection. The fourth, addressed to Zerubbabel, the head and representative of the family of David, and the individual with whom the genealogy of the Messiah began after the captivity, promises the preservation of the people of God, amidst the fall and ruin of the kingdoms of the world.

¹ The Prophecies of Daniel. By Carl August Auberlen. Andover: Published by W. F. Draper. 1867.

Zechariah, also, speaks words of comfort to encourage the hearts of his countrymen. "Thus saith the Lord; I am returned to Jerusalem with mercies: my house shall be built in it, saith the Lord of hosts, and a line shall be stretched forth upon Jerusalem. My cities through prosperity shall yet be spread abroad; and the Lord shall yet comfort Zion, and shall yet choose Jerusalem" (Zech. i. 16, 17). "For thus saith the Lord of hosts; As I thought to punish you, when your fathers provoked me to wrath, saith the Lord of hosts, and I repented not: so again have I thought in these days to do well unto Jerusalem and to the house of Judah: fear ye not" (Zech. viii. 14, 15). Such is the scope of Haggai and Zechariah's predictions as they relate to the affairs of the Jewish people.

Along with their predictions concerning the rebuilding of the temple, the post-exile prophets introduce Messianic and evangelical prophecy. In Zechariah especially we find portrayed, in mystic vision and by typical representation, the kingdom and priesthood of Christ, the establishment of the Christian Church, and the course of nations resorting to the future temple. In this we have a second application of the same systematic form of prophecy, which was employed in the establishment of the temporal kingdom. The nearer subject, in each instance, supplies the prophetic ground and the prophetic images for the more remote Christian subject. In the first instance, the kingdom of Christ is delineated in connection with, and by analogy to, the actual kingdom, which was seen rising to view; in the second instance, his personal priesthood and his Church are delineated, in connection with, and by an equal analogy to, the priesthood and temple of the Hebrew Church, at the time, when that priesthood was reinstated in its functions, and that temple was rebuilt. As an example of this symbolical prediction, take Zech. vi. 10-15. The attempt of Archbishop Newcome to apply this prophecy to Zerubbabel is in vain; for Zerubbabel wore no crown, neither was he a priest upon his throne.

In the prophetic delineations of the future fortunes of the theocracy, in this book, the temporary and local relations of the present fall into the back-ground and the Messianic views predominate. In chapters ix.-xi., the struggle of the theocracy with the powers of the world is predicted, its victory and their subjection, by the appearing of the Messiah, and under his official authority as the Shepherd. In chapters xii.-xiv. the prophet predicts the last assaults of the powers of the world upon Jerusalem; the conversion of Israel to the Messiah, whose death had been caused by the sin of the people; the ruin of the old theocracy, the annihilation of all the foes who fight against the Lord, and the final completion and glorification of the kingdom of God.

In Haggai there are two Messianic prophecies (ii. 6, 7 and ii. 22, 23). The first promises the future glory of the second temple and the coming of the desire of all nations; the second predicts the exaltation of Zerubbabel, the offspring of David, and the overthrow of all earthly thrones.

Malachi foretells the coming of the messenger of the covenant to the temple, and the sending of Elijah, the prophet, as his forerunner (Mal. iii. 1 and iv. 5).

With Malachi terminates the prophecy of the Old Testament. His last predictions are like the earliest. They rebuke corruption and promise deliverance. They uphold the authority of the first dispensation and reveal the second.

A few words of recapitulation may contribute to the formation of a clearer view of the brief and imperfect survey of the scheme of prophecy, which has been exhibited.

The survey shows that the character of prophecy is not simple and uniform, nor its light equable; and that it was dispensed in various degrees of revelation. It shows, moreover, that the principal age of prophecy is from Samuel to Malachi; that from the Fall to the Flood, and thence to the call of Abraham, its communications were few; that in the patriarchal age they were enlarged; that, during the bondage in Egypt, they were discontinued, but renewed with the Law; that a cessation of them, during four hundred years, followed the Law, and that a cessation of equal duration preceded the Gospel.

It shows, further, that the subjects of prophecy varied. While it was all directed to one general design, in the evidence and support of religion, there was a diversity in the administration of the Spirit, in respect to that design. In Paradise, it gave the first hope of a Redeemer. After the Deluge, it established the peace of the natural world. In Abraham, it founded the double covenant of Canaan and the Gospel. In the age of the Law, it spoke of the second prophet, and foreshadowed, in types, the doctrines of the Christian dispensation. It foretold the future fate of the chosen people, who were placed under the preparatory dispensation. In the time of David, it revealed, with the promise of the temporal, the kingdom of Christ. In the days of the later prophets, it foretold the changes of the Mosaic covenant, the fate of the chief pagan kingdoms, and completed the annunciation of the Messiah and his work of redemption. After the Captivity, it gave a last and more urgent information of the approaching advent of the Gospel.

Thus prophecy ended as it had begun. Its first revelations in Paradise, and its concluding predictions, in the book of Malachi, are directed to the same point.¹ That point is Christ. "To Him give all the prophets witness" (Acts x. 43). "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy" (Rev. xix. 10).

VI.

Prophetic Style.

Each writer has a peculiar manner of expressing his thoughts, and this we call his style. The sacred writers form no exception: each one maintains his individuality. When we read Isaiah, we say this is not the style of Jeremiah, or of Ezekiel; and when we read John, we say this is not the style of Paul.

The individuality of the sacred writers is beautifully illustrated by Gaussen, in his work Individuality of style on Inspiration.² "As a skillful musician," says Mr. Gaussen, "who has to execute alone a long score, will avail himself by turns, of the funeral flute, the shepherd's pipe, the dancer's bagpipe, or the warrior's trumpet; thus the Almighty God, to proclaim to us his eternal Word, has chosen of old the instruments into which He would successively breathe the breath of his Spirit. He chose them before the foundation of the world; He separated them from their mother's womb.

"Have you visited the Cathedral of Freyburg, and listened to that wonderful organist, who, with such enchantment, draws the tears from the traveller's eyes; while he touches, one after another, his wonderful keys, and makes you hear by turns, the march of armies upon the beach, or the chanted prayer upon the lake during the tempest, or the voices of praise after it is calm? All your senses are overwhelmed, for it has all passed before you like a vivid reality. Well, thus the Eternal God, powerful in harmony, touches by turns with the fingers of his Spirit, the keys which He had chosen for the hour of his design, and for the unity of his celestial hymn. He had before Him, from eternity, all the human keys; his creating eyes embraced at a glance, this key-board of sixty centuries; and when He would make this fallen world hear the eternal counsel of its redemption and the advent of the Son of God, He laid his left hand on Enoch, the seventh from Adam, and his right hand on John, the humble and sublime prisoner of Patmos. The celestial hymn, seven hundred years before the Deluge, began with these words: 'Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to judge the world;' but already in the thought of God and in the eternal harmony of his work, the voice of John was responding to that of Enoch, and terminating the hymn, three thousand years after him, with these words: 'Behold he cometh, and every eye shall see him, yea, those that pierced him! even so, Lord Jesus, come quickly, amen!' And during this hymn of three thousand years, the Spirit of God did not cease to breathe upon all his ambassadors; the angels stooped, says an Apostle, to contemplate its depths; the elect of God were moved, and eternal life descended into their souls."

These ambassadors did not all speak, or write alike. "It was sometimes the sublime and untutored simplicity of John; sometimes the excited, elliptical, startling, argumentative energy of Paul; sometimes the fervor and solemnity of Peter; it was the majestic poetry of Isaiah, or the lyrical poetry of David; it was the simple and majestic narrative of Moses, or the sententious and royal wisdom of Solomon; — yes, it was all that; it was Peter; it was Isaiah; it was Matthew; it was John; it was Moses; but it was God!"

But apart from the style, which is the expression of the mental and moral idiosyncrasies of the prophets, there is a style which characterizes them as prophets. This arises from the method of prophetic revelation. With the exception of Moses and Christ, intercourse with heaven was maintained by means of vision and dreams (Num. xii. 6). The distinction between these two, in general terms, seems to be this : the vision referred to what was seen ; the dream, to what was spoken and heard. The prophets, while retaining their consciousness and the use of their rational powers, were raised to a spiritual sphere, where they saw the vision and heard the words of the Almighty. Such seems to be the meaning of the phrases, "I was in the Spirit and heard"; "The hand of the Lord was upon me"; "The Spirit of the Lord came upon me." When in this condition their intellectual and emotional nature was quickened. They knew by intuition, and their hearts glowed with seraphic ardor. This was "the normal state of the prophets, when they were receiving divine communications." They were in "the region of spirit as contradistinguished from that of sense and time." At the same time they retained their personal characteristics and native susceptibilities. The Holy Spirit, both "in his more peculiar, and in his more common operations upon the soul, has respect to its essential powers and properties, and adapts himself in his most special communications, not only to the general laws of thought, which regulate the workings of the human mind, but also to the various idiosyncrasies and acquired habits of particular individuals." While this is true, it is plain that communications made to men, who were elevated to the spiritual sphere, cannot have the form and dress of outward reality. They are to be separated from the things of actual life, and confined to the region, in which they were made. Bearing this in mind, we will be freed from the necessity of understanding literally the instructions given to Hosea to marry an unchaste woman, and the command to Ezekiel to lie three hundred and ninety days at a stretch on one side, and forty days upon the other (Ezek. iv. 5, 6), together with symbolical actions of a similar kind. Such typical actions were ideal and intended to present an image of the actual world in the territory of real life. Dr. Fairbairn justly remarks, that such things, "understood to be representative, and teaching actions in the purely spiritual sphere, could not, by anything of an unbecoming nature, which they might contain, "produce the pernicious effect which must have attended them, had they obtruded themselves upon the senses; they were for the mind alone to contemplate, and it would naturally do so with a respect to the moral bearing of the representation." The principle of interpretation of such typical representations is, therefore, in the words of Dr. Fairbairn, the following: "As, according to the rule, divine communications were to be made to the prophets in ecstasy or vision, so whenever we have to do merely with the record of these communications, the actions related, as well as the things seen and heard, should be understood to have occurred in the spiritual sphere of prophetic revelation; and outward reality is to be predicated of any them, only when the account given is such as to place the symbolical act in undoubted connection with the facts of history. Or it may be put thus: The actions are to be held as having taken place in the spiritual sphere alone, if they occur simply in the account of God's communications to the prophet; but in actual life, if they are found in the narration of the prophet's dealings with the people. In the one case the mere publication of the account constituted the message from God; while in the other, an embodied representation was given of it in the outward act."

The depth, sublimity, and force of the prophetic writings cannot be fully comprehended without an acquaintance with the symbols employed in them. A knowledge of these symbols furnishes a key to many of the prophecies, whose treasures can only be discovered by him, who knows how to use it. Many works have been written on symbolology; but perhaps much still remains in that field to reward the patient investigator.

Symbolical style of the prophets. Symbols from the natural world.

There was a natural tendency in the prophets to adopt figurative representations of future things. The various objects of the world of nature were used for this purpose. These natural objects, known and familiar to all, were used as images of things bearing some resemblance to them in the history of God's kingdom among men. They were used, however, in their broader and more common aspects, not in a recondite sense known only to a few. They were applied, moreover, in a consistent and uniform manner. The prophets did not shift from the symbolical to the literal, without any apparent indication of change, nor from one aspect of the symbolical to another essentially different.

"The Law," on the authority of an Apostle, "was a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things" (Heb. x. 1). It had the "shadow of heavenly things" (Heb. viii. 5). "Which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ" (Col. ii. 17). These passages teach that the institutions of the Old Covenant stood in a typical relation to the institutions of the New.

The history of the Old Covenant under which the prophets lived, furnished another source of symbolical and typical representation.

When the prophets, therefore, announced the better things to come, they represented them as a fuller development of the things existing under the Old Covenant, or as a grander exemplification of the truths and principles which they embodied. Much of their imagery too was drawn from their more sensuous system of worship. This is a combination of type with prophecy, which is very natural; for as every type possesses a prophetic element, we may expect them sometimes to run into each other. In this way the typical in the past, or present, is represented, by a distinct prophetic announcement, as going to appear again in the future. For example, Hosea (viii. 13), speaking of the Lord's purpose to visit the sins of Israel with chastisement, says, "They shall return to Egypt." The old state of things should come back upon them, or the evil, which was to befall them, was to be after the type of what their forefathers had experienced under the yoke of Pharaoh. Yet the new was not to be the exact repetition of the old; for, in the next chapter (ix. 3), the prophet says, "Ephraim shall return to Egypt, and they shall eat unclean things in Assyria"; and again (chapter xi. 5), "He shall not return into the land of Egypt, but the Assyrian shall be his king." "He shall return to Egypt," and he shall not return to Egypt; in other words the Egyptian state shall come upon him.

This mode of representation is not peculiar to the prophets. We find examples of it in the classics. The Sibyl, in Virgil, when disclosing to Æneas the fortunes of himself and of his posterity in Latium, represents them as a repetition of what he had experienced in Troy.

"Non Simois tibi, nec Xanthus, nec Dorica Castra Defuerint: alius Latio jam partus Achilles, Natus et ipse Dea."

We have already remarked that the prophets, when they saw their visions, were transported into an ecstatic state, and rendered capable of holding direct intercourse with heaven.

Poetical style of the prophets.

They "pass'd the flaming bounds of space and time:
The living-throne, the sapphire-blaze,
Where angels tremble, while they gaze,"
They "saw."

In such an elevated spiritual and mental condition, the language of poetry became the natural vehicle of their glowing thoughts and figurative representations. The poetical diction of the prophets is, therefore, connected with their prophetic state. The ecstatic state was the source of the poetical element in prophecy.

Among the Hebrews and some other nations of antiquity, there was but one word for prophet and poet. It was thought that every prophet must be a poet, and every poet to some extent a prophet. Hence it arose that the prophetic gift was measured by the poetical, and the prophetic books were assigned to a golden, or a silver age, according to their rank as poetical compositions. But prophets and poets have distinct spheres, and different ends in view. "The distinctive characteristic of the prophetic representation lies peculiarly in this, that it is not confined to any precise mode; but as its aim rises above all kinds of human discourse, so it avails itself of all, according as they are best adapted to that aim. The poet has his definite manner, and cannot so readily change and vary it, for his immediate aim is not to work upon others; he must satisfy himself and the requirements of his own art. But the prophet will and must work upon others; nay work upon them in the most direct and impressive manner; and so for him every method and form of representation is right which carries him straightest to his end."¹

The poetical element in prophecy was regulated by a practical aim. Hence we find in the prophetic writings the simplest narratives, the most practical addresses, and poetical descriptions in close juxtaposition. All was made subservient to the higher ends of spiritual instruction.

In addition to Prophetic Poetry, Hebrew Literature has two other kinds — Lyric and Didactic. The Lyric Poetry of the Bible consists chiefly of the effusions of pious feelings, and forms the greater portion of the Psalms. The Hebrew Didactic Poetry is mostly comprised in the book of Proverbs. The Prophetic Poetry abounds more than these in metaphors, allegories, comparisons, and copious descriptions. It excels also in imagination and in energy of diction.

³ Ewald; quoted by Dr. Fairbairn, On Prophecy, p. 184.

The characteristic form of Hebrew Poetry is parallelism, which is divided into (1) Synonymous, in which the second line is entirely or almost a repetition of the first; (2) Antithetic, in which the second line is the converse of the first; (3) Synthetic, in which the idea contained in the first line is further developed in the second.

The observance of this parallelism in the interpretation of the prophetic and poetical books of Scripture will preserve the interpreter from errors, into which he might otherwise fall.

VII.

Schools of Prophetic Interpretation.

The symbolical character of prophecy opens an ample field for the indulgence of fancy and imagination; and some interpreters seem to look upon it as a gymnasium for the exercise of the imaginative faculty. They see things that the prophets never saw. They speak with as much assurance as if they knew not only the grand scheme of divine Providence, but also every part of its machinery. The rings, which Ezekiel saw, and which "were so high that they were dreadful, inspire no dread in the minds of such interpreters, but appear to them in their mathematical dimensions of hubs, spokes, felloes, and tire. The "terrible crystal" does not dazzle their eyes. Like Dante they describe with the accuracy of eye-witnesses and ear-witnesses. Prophecy to them is merely history written beforehand; and consequently all that it reveals of the future must be as literal as history itself.

Others go to the opposite extreme. They change the nature of prophecy, by denying that its object was to give any precise, or definite outline of the future, and regard it as the expression of men's fears or longings, as to the coming destinies of the world.

There are others, who rob prophecy altogether of its predictive character. It contains, according to their view, nothing that lies beyond the reach of human foresight. The precise and definite knowledge of the future, implying as it does a miracle, is, in their opinion, impossible.

The fundamental principle of literalism is that "Prophecy is nothing but the history of events before they come to pass." It is history anticipated, and all that it reveals of the future must be taken as literally as history itself. The great argument in behalf of this view is the exact fulfillment of many prophecies — especially of prophecies relating to the advent and history of Christ. Even here the principle fails; for Christ did not sit literally upon "the throne of his father David." The valleys were not literally exalted, nor were the mountains and hills literally made low (Is. xl. 4) before Him. It was this extreme literalism on the part of the Jewish interpreters that led to his crucifixion. It lay at the foundation of the worldly views of his disciples (Matt. xviii. 1; Mark ix. 34; Luke ix. 46; Acts i. 6).

Tested by the principle of this school, the first prophecy (Gen. iii. 15) would be denuded of all serious import, did it literally mean that the descendants of Eve, on the one side, would receive injuries from serpents, and that, on the other, serpents would have their heads crushed by them. Certainly something more was intended to comfort our first parents, when driven from Paradise and mourning under the curse induced by their fall.

The prophets did not expect to be understood literally, when they spoke of the future glory of the Church as consisting in the complete reestablishment of the old economy, the erection of the temple, the enforcement of its ritual, and the concourse of all nations to its courts; for in other places they speak of a new covenant, of the abrogation of the old one as not worthy to be remembered. It must require a great stretch of credulity to adopt the literal interpretation of the concluding chapters of Ezekiel. His rebuilt temple takes, in the Apocalypse, the form of a holy city with "no temple therein." So also many things that are said of Zion and Jerusalem cannot be taken in a literal sense; for the language, while referring to the present dispensation, takes its coloring from the Old Economy, which was to vanish away. Take the last prophecy of the Old Testament (Mal. iv. 5); can any one adopt its literal interpretation, unless Elijah is yet to come?

It cannot be doubted that numerous and exact correspondences between the prophetic delineations of Scripture and the past and present state of the world can be pointed out, and that the language of prophecy has, in many instances, been literally verified by the facts of history. Hence the popularity of those works, which have been written to show these correspondences and exact fulfillments. They have contributed to awaken a lively interest in the subject of prophecy, and have furnished an argument for the truth of the Bible, by directing attention to certain predictions, whose accomplishment cannot be denied. "But it is perfectly possible that the efforts in this direction may have somewhat overshot the proper mark; that the advantage obtained on one side may have been pushed so far as to create a disadvantage on another; that the evidence of a close and literal fulfillment of particular prophecies, by being carried beyond its due limits, may have given rise to views and expectations respecting the structure and design of prophecy in general, which are neither warrantable in themselves nor capable of being vindicated by a reference to historical results. Such indeed has proved to be the case."

One extreme begets another. Some minds are so constituted that they cannot occupy a middle ground. When they see the untenableness of one position, they choose the very opposite. It is with something of this disposition that a class of interpreters, convinced of the falsity of the principle that prophecy is history written beforehand, hold that very little, if any, is so written. They say, if prophecy is history written beforehand, it should be written as history. Instead of giving any precise, or definite outline of the future, it is regarded by them as the expression of men's fears and longings in regard to the future destinies of the world. Dr. Arnold has said: "If you put, as you may do, Christ for abstract good and Satan for abstract evil, I do not think that the notion is so startling, that they are the main and only proper subjects of prophecy, and that in all other cases the language is, in some part or other, hyperbolical; hyperbolical, I mean, and not merely figurative. Nor can I conceive how, on any other supposition, the repeated applications of the Old Testament language to our Lord, not only by others, but by himself, can be understood to be other than arbitrary."

This school of interpretation occupies less tenable ground than the literalists; for it eliminates from prophecy everything that is properly productive. Hence there is no revelation from God to his people, in regard to the future movements of his providence in the world. Prophecy is nothing more than an expression of men's fears and longings. We would say it is rather a response from God to these fears and longings, to sustain the hope of his people in times of darkness, and to inspire confidence in the goodness and rectitude of his moral administration.

It is difficult to conceive how anticipations, fears, and longings could take so definite a form, and so detailed a character as many portions of the prophetic writings exhibit. Unexpected events, and the names of the persons who accomplished them, are foretold. The prophecies relating to Nineveh and Babylon delineate so circumstantially what befell those cities, as to exclude them from the sphere of mere anticipation, or human foresight. Dates, names, and particulars of the minutest kind belong to certain foreknowledge, not to anticipations, longings, and fears.

The fundamental principle of the neological school is that there cannot be distinct prophetic foresight of the distant future. Distinct foresight of the distant future would be a miracle of knowledge, and there can be no such thing as a miracle. "The writings of the prophets," says a representative of this school, "contain nothing above the reach of the human faculties. Here are noble and spirit-stirring appeals to men's conscience, patriotism, honor, and religion; beautiful poetic descriptions, odes, hymns, expressions of faith almost beyond praise. But the mark of human infirmity is on them all, and proofs or signs of miraculous inspiration are not found in them."

The effects of such a principle upon the interpretation of the prophetic writings can be easily seen. All predictions of the future are, according to these neological interpreters, vaticinia ex eventu; or they relate to things which might have been easily foreseen without a special revelation. To this foregone conclusion all exegetical results must yield or be accommodated. Hence the arbitrary processes of the destructive criticism employed for the discovery of arguments, philological, historical, rhetorical, and moral against the genuineness of many passages in the prophets. It is necessary to refer only to the treatment by neologists of the later prophecies of Isaiah and the book of Daniel as exemplifications. Of course "all conclusions founded, or necessarily depending, on the false assumption" of this school of interpreters, "must," in the words of Dr. Alexander, "go for nothing with those who do not hold it, and especially with those who are convinced that it is false." That it is false every interpreter, who receives the doctrine of the inspiration of the Scriptures, believes.

It is admitted that there is a historical element in prophecy. So far from standing in isolation, prophecy is interwoven with sacred history. The latter is its frame-work. In the facts of history prophetic revelations take their rise and form. But it does not follow from this that one is the measure of the other. History is the occasion of prophecy; but the latter rises above the former and sheds a supernatural light upon its movements. Prophecy is the antedated history of a divine agency in the affairs of the world, an agency now veiled in clouds and moving unseen, now revealing itself in dazzling brightness. This providential history dictated by One, who is not subject to the limitations of space and time, pays very little regard, in many instances, to these necessary conditions of all human agency. A thousand years in the sight of God are as a moment. His prophet looking down the vista of time saw visions of the future as we see the stars in the firmament. The stars seem near to each other; but they are separated by billions of miles. So future events seemed near to each other, in the visions of the prophet, but in reality they are sometimes separated by millenniums. As an illustration of this it is sufficient to refer to the prophecies of Zephaniah and the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew, in which our Saviour foretells the destruction of Jerusalem, and, in close connection with it, the signs of the day of judgment.

literalism.

It is, moreover, well to bear in mind that the fulfillment of many prophecies is germinant. In other words they are fulfilled by installments, each installment being a pledge of that which is to follow. Such a prophecy is that of Joel (ii. 28, 29) concerning the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. It was not completely fulfilled on the day of Pentecost. It is going on fulfilling at the present time. Of course to make history the measure of such prophecies is impossible until the whole course of both history and prophecy is run.

Again, the combination of type with prophecy renders it necessary to distinguish between prophetic representations and direct historical narrative. Taking this combination into consideration, it is impossible to interpret many prophecies as anticipated history in a literal sense. "Every type was so far a prophecy, that under the form of sensible things, and by means of present outward relations, it gave promise of other things yet to come, corresponding in design, but higher and better in kind. And hence, when a prophetic word accompanied the type, or pointed to the things which it prefigured, it naturally foretold the antitypical under the aspect, or even by the name of the typical." This relation of the typical to the antitypical furnishes the key to the interpretation of many of the prophecies relating to Christ and the future glories of the Church. In these prophecies it is scarcely possible to understand David, Zion, and Jerusalem, as the David, Zion, and Jerusalem of the Old Testament, or to understand the things predicted of them as a literal reproduction of the things of the Jewish Economy. They evidently refer to things in the sphere of the antitype, prefigured in the sphere of the type; and these things differ as much from the things that prefigured them, as the antitype differs from the type. Material types of spiritual objects do not imply a material fulfillment.

It is not denied, in what has been said, that many announcements of prophecy are capable of yielding clear and specific historical results, that they have been literally fulfilled; but merely that prophecy is written like history, and that one is the measure of the other. There is a palpable reason why prophecy should not be written like history, lest the clearness of its predictions should prompt the efforts that lead to their accomplishment. In fact it has been alleged that such is the case, in regard to some prophecies written in a style closely approximating that of historical narrative. "The best form for the purposes of argument," says Dr. Chalmers, "in which a prophecy can be delivered, is to be so obscure as to leave the event, or rather its main circumstances, unintelligible before the fulfillment, and so clear as to be intelligible after it." Even in reference to some of the most historical parts of the visions of Daniel, Hengstenberg has remarked, that no one ignorant of the history, and with only this prophetic outline in his hand, could make his way to any precise and circumstantial account of the events.¹

VIII.

Canon of the Prophetical Predictive Books.

The Jews made two classes of prophetical books, one of which may be denominated prophetical historical books; and the other, prophetical predictive books. The first class contains Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings, which they styled the earlier prophets [נְבִיאִים רִאשׁוֹנִים]; the second class, the prophets proper, called by them the later prophets [נְבִיאִים אַחֲרֹנִים]. The latter are subdivided into the greater prophets [נְבִיאִים גְּדוֹלִים], namely, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel; and the lesser [נְבִיאִים קְטַנִּים], namely, in the order of our authorized version, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. These form twelve separate books in our Bibles; but they were reckoned one by the Jews, who regulated the number of the books in the Hebrew Scriptures by that of the Hebrew alphabet, which consists of twenty-two letters.

The book of Daniel stands, in the Hebrew Canon, among the Kethubim, between Esther and Ezra; in the LXX. and Vulgate, in the German and English Versions, it is placed after Ezekiel, as the fourth of the greater prophets. Its position in the Hebrew Canon seems, at first sight, remarkable. But it is supposed to be a natural consequence of the right apprehension of the different functions of the prophet and seer. Daniel had the spirit, but not the work of a prophet; and as his work was a new one, so was it carried out in a style of which the Old Testament offers no other example. His Apocalypse is as distinct from the prophetic writings as the Apocalypse of St. John from the apostolic epistles. The heathen court is to one seer what the isle of Patmos is to the other, a place of exile and isolation, where he stands alone with his God, and is not, like the prophets, active in the midst of a struggling nation.¹

All these books were received into the Hebrew Canon as possessing divine authority, and they are found in all the ancient catalogues. Ezra, according to tradition, collected and arranged all the sacred books, which were admitted to be inspired, previous to his time; and the work was continued by the Great Synagogue, until the Canon was closed by the admission of the book of Malachi, the last of the Hebrew prophets.

The following table is copied, with some changes, from that of Otto Schmoller, the author of the Commentaries upon Hosea, Joel, and Amos. Other dates, in some cases, are assigned by different Commentators, whose arguments, in support of them, can be found in the special Introductions to the several books. They are all briefly exhibited in O. R. Hertwig's tables for an Introduction to the Canonical and Apocryphal Books of the Old Testament:—

HOSEA.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. *Person of the Prophet.*¹

THE name יְהוֹשָׁע, which occurs in ver. 2, as well as in the superscription, ver. 1, signifies deliverance, salvation. It was a name not uncommon among the Jews. The last monarch of the kingdom of Israel² furnishes another familiar instance. It was also the original name of Joshua, having been changed by Moses to יְהוֹשׁוּעַ. The LXX. write the name Ἰωσή (for which Paul, however, in the citation from our Prophet, writes Ἰωσή), the Vulgate Osee, and Luther, more conformably to the Hebrew pronunciation, Hosea. The Prophet's name = Deliverance, stood thus in marked contrast to the aim of his mission, — the announcement of ruin and destruction. And yet it well agreed with his vocation as a messenger of God, to return to whom would have been the only but the sure way to deliverance. So also the final "deliverance" of God's people was the grand object kept in view through all the terrors of the judgment denounced upon apostate Israel. Thus the position at the beginning of the Book of the Twelve Prophets, occupied by Hosea, was truly significant.

As to the origin of the Prophet we have no direct information. Only the name of his father, Beeri, is mentioned in the superscription. But we may be justified in seeking his home in that region which is clearly presented as the scene of his labors, namely, in the Kingdom of Israel. It is true that we have, in Amos, an instance of a prophet sent from Judah into the Kingdom of Israel, as also in the case of the prophet mentioned in 1 Kings xiii. But if Hosea also had been so commissioned, the fact would probably have been recorded as something unusual, as was done in the case of Amos. Yet prophets were not unknown in the Kingdom of Israel (e. g., Jonah under Jeroboam II., 2 Kings xiv. 25, and, previously, Elisha with the school of young prophets trained by him). But the perfect familiarity with the circumstances and topography of the northern kingdom, displayed by Hosea, furnishes positive evidence that he belonged to that region (comp. chap. v. 1; vi. 8, 9; xii. 12; xiv. 6 ff.). That, in chap. ii., he calls it directly "the land," and, in chap. vii. 5, terms its king "our king," would seem to prove, further, that he resided there, while his diction betrays an Aramaic coloring, in forms as well as in particular words. His frequent casual references to Judah do not invalidate the evidence of a northern origin. For it was impossible that a prophet of Jehovah, were he ever so much a citizen of the kingdom of Israel, should lose sight of Judah; for Judah was the kingdom of David, and it was to it alone that those promises related, which formed the sure ground of the Messianic hope, that the Lord would not cast off his people utterly and forever, but that a time was coming when they should rise gloriously from out of their desolation. The prophet could call attention all the more impressively to the strictness of the divine righteousness as displayed towards Judah; for even that nation was not to be spared, but was to be punished for its apostasy; how much less, then, should the kingdom of Israel fancy itself secure in its gross unfaithfulness to God! Finally, if the superscription, in the first line of which the period of the

It is constructed mainly from hints scattered through the book itself. Dean Stanley gives an eloquent sketch of the Prophet in his Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, II. 409 f. — M.]

Prophet's ministry is defined according to the succession of Kings of Judah, should be adduced as proof that Hosea did not belong to the Northern Kingdom, it might be shown that this proves nothing, since it is not certain that the superscription proceeded from the Prophet himself. It may have been prefixed to his writings in the kingdom of Judah some time after their composition, and this mode of indicating his era would then have been quite natural.¹

With regard to the circumstances of Hosea's life we know absolutely nothing. What tradition has to say upon this subject is utterly devoid of support and quite worthless.

With regard, however, to the character and disposition of the Prophet and his inner life generally, much could be gathered from his book. But this is to be gained more fully from what is unfolded in the book itself, and we shall therefore postpone our inquiry until we come to examine the subject as presented there.

There can be no doubt as to where the scene of the Prophet's labors lay. It was the more northerly of the two divided kingdoms, the Kingdom of Israel. The prophecies which he has left to us in his book are almost exclusively occupied with that kingdom, the events, religious, moral, and political which had transpired there, and the destiny which was awaiting it. Judah is, indeed, not unfrequently mentioned, partly in contrast to Israel (Ephraim), partly as being guilty of the same transgressions. In the latter relation it is named with greatest frequency in chaps. v. and vi., but afterwards only in isolated passages: viii. 14; x. 11; xii. 1. But Judah is always referred to incidentally, and in such a way that no doubt is left upon the mind, that the Prophet, though giving to Judah a prominent place, did not regard it as the sphere of his mission. The supposition that later, at least, he betook himself to the kingdom of Judah and there composed his book (Ewald), cannot be established.

If we seek for the period in which the Prophet lived and labored, we meet at once with a definite statement in the superscription (ver. 1), which defines this period as "the time of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and Jeroboam, son of Joash, king of Israel." This would assign to the active ministry of the Prophet a very long duration. "For between the death of Uzziah and the first year of Hezekiah there intervened thirty-two years. But the Israelitish king, Jeroboam II. died, at the least calculation, a considerable period before Uzziah. The interval was probably twenty-six years, although the discordant statements of the books of the Kings with regard to the relation of the Kings of Judah and Israel prevent us from assigning with certainty the precise period. Thus, according to the superscription, the ministry of Hosea must have begun long before Uzziah's death, and if we place it only a short time before the death of Jeroboam II., it must, since it reached to the beginning of the reign of Hezekiah, have been of very long duration, about sixty years." (According to the ordinary reckoning Jeroboam died B. C. 783, and Hezekiah ascended the throne in 727.) This result is calculated to excite doubts of the correctness of the superscription. We therefore seek grounds of support in the book itself. It appears to be quite certain from it that Hosea appeared before the fall of the dynasty of Jehu, which affords us the terminus a quo. For it is with the announcement of the destruction of this house that his book opens. "But it was only," remarks Ewald rightly, "the idolatry promoted by the house of Jehu, that was denounced; the people were still, to all appearance, great and powerful." More especially, there is as yet no allusion whatever to internal commotions, or to the subversion of the order of things in the state. We can hardly refer his first appearance to the period succeeding the death of Jeroboam II., during which the kingdom was probably in a state of anarchy for from eleven to twelve years. And if the supposition of such an interregnum should be pronounced untenable, we have still less room for Hosea's appearance after Jeroboam's death; for with his son Zachariah the house of Jehu lost the throne, thus bringing about the event threatened by the Prophet, Zachariah having retained possession only half a year. The dynasty of Jehu then actually appeared to be firmly established, but was undoubtedly being undermined internally even in the time of Jeroboam. To this period, therefore, concerning which we have a brief notice in 2 Kings xiv. 23-29, and which is there expressly spoken of as a time in which Jehovah gave help through Jeroboam, for "He had not yet declared that He would blot out the name of Israel from under heaven," to this period towards its conclusion, we can assign, with almost perfect confidence, the terminus a quo of Hosea's ministry. It is a matter of greater difficulty to fix the termi- nus ad quem. We are certain, at the outset, only of this much, that Hosea labored and wrote before the sixth year of the reign of Hezekiah; for it was in that year that the event transpired which he had so plainly announced, the destruction of the Kingdom of Israel, by the Assyrians. But how closely are we justified in approaching this limit? That Hosea lived during the gloomy period of the disorders occasioned by the usurpations under Zachariah, Shallum, and Menahem, described briefly in 2 Kings xv. 8-20, is a well established fact, for these events are most vividly mirrored in his discourses (see especially chap. vii.). But the Assyrians stand in the foreground with special prominence, as the power in which help was sought, and to which "gifts" were sent in time of distress, — foolishly, for it was in these actions that the Prophet discerned so clearly the sure way to destruction through Assyria. We must therefore descend at least to the reign of Menahem; for it was then that Assyria under Pul, first came in contact with Israel, Menahem paying him tribute, and thus purchasing from Assyria assistance in his efforts to maintain his kingdom.¹

Ewald does not feel himself at liberty to seek any later period, and therefore does not go down as far as the reign of Pekah, thus excluding the period of King Uziah in Judah. For it was under Pekah that Tiglath-Pileser, summoned by Ahaz to assist him against Pekah, who had formed an alliance with Rezin, king of Syria (2 Kings xvi. 5-9), wrested from the kingdom of Israel the northern and eastern portions of the country, more particularly Galilee and Gilead (2 Kings xv. 29). Yet of these important transactions the Prophet appears to know nothing historically, Gilead and Tabor, in his view, comprising between them the whole of the kingdom, and Gilead, so often mentioned, appearing throughout as an unconquered territory. But these grounds are not unassailable. In the first place we do not even know to what extent the conquest was carried. It may have been only a plundering expedition. It is certain that these districts stood only in the relation of tributaries to Assyria. But, especially, we do not know how long this state of subjection lasted. May we not be allowed to assume, in the absence of other information, that the later expedition of Shalmaneser against Hoshea (2 Kings xvii. 3) was occasioned by the circumstance that Hoshea had regained possession of the territory formerly subdued by Tiglath-Pileser? In that case, however, we must take into consideration the interval between the utterance of the discourses and the composition of the book. "In them, therefore, allusions might well be found to events and circumstances which at the time when the book was composed, belonged to the past" (Hengstenberg). Thus for example, Hosea might have survived the first Assyrian invasion under Tiglath-pileser, even though, in his discourses, Gilead appears to be still a component part of the kingdom, which in other passages, e. g., chap. xii. 12 (11), it is not necessary to assume. For a tributary relation to Assyria and utter destruction are things entirely different. Scarcely anything then stands in the way of the attempt to bring the terminus ad quem down to the days of Pekah and Hoshea. On the other hand, there are many things which seem to demand such an attempt. The whole position which Assyria assumes with Hosea seems to show that what he spoke and wrote did not fall on the first contact with Assyria under Menahem, which had a comparatively favorable issue, but that Assyria had already displayed her power, so fraught with danger to Israel and causing such destruction, as was done by Tiglath-pileser in the reign of Pekah. And many indications seem to point directly to the reign of the last king Hoshea; one instance is the denunciation of the double relation, into which Israel entered simultaneously with Assyria and Egypt (chap. vii. 11; xii. 2). Ewald would refer this to two political parties. But nothing is known of any connection with Egypt under Menahem at least; and even though chap. vii. 11 could be interpreted in this interest, the expression employed in xii. 1 indicates so clearly an alliance and an offering of gifts, that we are only justified in supposing that transaction to be referred to, of which we have certain information, namely, the double game which, according to 2 Kings xvii. 3, 4, Hoshea played with Assyria and Egypt. We may obtain still clearer testimony to the correctness of this view, if, in

¹ [This was the first occasion recorded in the Scriptures, and also, probably, the turning-point in the history of Israel's relations with Assyria, which terminated so disastrously to the former. If we may trust, however, the translation of the inscription upon the black obelisk brought by Layard from Nimrūd, which was erected by Shalmaneser I., we are pointed to the reign of Jehu as the period of the first contact. It is stated there that Benhadad II. and Hazael (enemies of Israel) were among the conquered foes of the great Assyrian, and that Yahua (Jehu), the son of Khumri (Omri, who must therefore have been considered the founder of the Kingdom of Samaria) paid tribute to him. In this translation all authorities concur. Sir Henry Rawlinson infers also from 2 Kings xv. 19, that Menahem "had neglected to apply for the usual confirmation of his kingdom," and that this was the cause of Pul's invasion. He draws a like inference with regard to Amaziah of Judah from 2 Kings xiv. 5. If these opinions are correct, it would appear that the countries were brought into frequent contact before the first occasion alluded to in the Old Testament. — M.]

chap. x. 14 Shalman be understood directly to stand for Shalmaneser, so that the first expedition of Shalmaneser, mentioned in 2 Kings xvii. 3, would be referred to as having already been made, and as a new invasion is here threatened, the last expedition of that king which brought ruin upon the kingdom would be regarded as impending. But the passage is obscure, and the conclusion which must be adopted is that the terminus ad quem can be only approximately ascertained. But, at all events, no direct testimony can be adduced against the correctness of the designation of time made in the superscription, which extends the ministry of the Prophet to the reign of Hezekiah.

Accordingly Hosea was, most probably, an older contemporary of Isaiah, whose ministry began in the long reign of King Uzziah in Judah, though much later than that of Hosea, and extended to a period much later. He would also be contemporary with Micah, if he actually lived until the beginning of Uzziah's reign. On the other side he comes in contact with Amos; for the latter prophet lived in the contemporary reigns of Uzziah and Jeroboam II.; and if it was the case that Hosea did not appear until after the death of Amos, he must have been closely connected with him, not merely in time, but also in their common vocation. For it was the mission of Amos also, though belonging to the tribe of Judah, to proclaim the divine judgments upon the kingdom of Israel. Hosea, therefore, takes up the thread where Amos had let it drop and keeps spinning it out until the destruction of the kingdom. He also manifestly makes reference to Amos, comp. Hos. viii. 14 with Amos ii. 5 (i. 4-7, 10, 12; ii. 6); Hos. ix. 3 with Am. vii. 17; Hos. xii. 8 with Am. viii. 5; Hos. xii. 10 f. with Am. ii. 10 ff. While Amos is probably cognizant of the power, Assyria, by which God was to execute his judgments upon the kingdom of Israel, but does not name or even allude to it, in Hosea it is named plainly and very frequently, and he must denounce any association of Israel with this World-Power, which had approached already so near. Hosea falls, in any case, in the last of the three periods of the history of this kingdom. The times in which he lived, as defined above, form a twofold period, or two periods, outwardly at least, very diverse. One was the period of the vigorous rule of Jeroboam II. who raised the kingdom to an unprecedented position of eminence and power, although internal conditions of decay were abundantly present, which the Prophet was commissioned to prove. The other was the period of the visible decline and decay of the kingdom after the fall of the house of Jehu and under the succeeding kings, induced inwardly by a religious and moral ruin, and not deferred, but only hastened, by an untheocratic policy, which sought support among foreign powers, and delivered the nation into the hands of the Assyrians. The information given in the historical books concerning this whole period must have its due place in the study of the Prophet. Comp. 2 Kings xiv. 23-29; xv. 8-31; xvii. 1-6, and, as supplementary to it, the pragmatistical treatment of the subject, assigning the causes of the destruction of the kingdom, 2 Kings xvii. 7-23. The truest picture of the whole period is presented by the Prophet himself in his whole book, to the examination of which we accordingly pass.

We have in the Canon under the name of Hosea one book in fourteen chapters.

With regard to its contents. We have seen above that it is mainly occupied with the more northerly of the two kingdoms, although the kingdom of Judah is not therefore kept out of sight, being alluded to repeatedly, especially in chaps. v. and vi., in conjunction with Israel. What then has it to say with reference to that kingdom? A single glance into our book is sufficient to inform us. It is chiefly occupied with a most severe testimony against the national apostasy from Jehovah, and the deep and prevailing moral and civil corruption which appears throughout as the fruit of that apostasy, and in immediate connection therewith, an announcement of divine judgments, which increases in severity until the utter destruction of the kingdom itself is foretold. But this does not exhaust the purport of the book; for, like the other prophetic writings, it contains too an abundant storehouse of promise. By the side of the severe threatenings, though these occupy by far the larger space in the book, there are found words of promise most richly unfolded, not merely as a hope of future conversion and thus of the return of better days, but as a definite announcement that the time was coming when the people, purified by chastisement and returning in grief and penitence to their God, should again find acceptance with Him, and that thereby their kingdom should be restored, not in its then abnormal and divided condition, but as one united body, under a King of the line of David.

It is just with our Prophet that this exhibition cannot satisfy. He presents these general truths in a form peculiar to himself; he would at least, beside the one, the threatening, place the other, the promise, but he labors to regard from a single point of view the position which Jehovah bears to Israel and so specially to the kingdom of the ten tribes, and from this to explain both the threatening and the promise; to view them, namely, in the light of Jehovah's love to Israel as his people.

In this love of God (and not simply in his righteousness) are rooted, according to Hosea, even the threatening and announcement of punishment, with which he is chiefly occupied. For it was because Jehovah's love embraced his people from the beginning that He could not suffer any apostasy from him, but must become angry at it, must chastise it, must even slay and destroy it utterly, that is, in its corporate existence. All threatening and chastisement is really the indignation and zeal of love,¹ born of sorrow and therefore all the more intense. Hence the announcement of punishment sounds forth in tones of terrific severity. But they also have their end in themselves. Love is indeed angry and most deeply so, but it is and remains nothing but love, for it is pained that it must be angry, and with all its wrath it can only aim to remove that which interrupts and prevents the display of itself to the object beloved, and must ever aim to secure salvation, reconciliation, and restoration, else it would itself stand in the way of realizing its object, and would thus contribute most surely to its own failure. From this stand-point, promise is seen to be as necessary as threatening, and in proportion to the severity of the latter must be the richness of the former, as flowing from the love of God, and not simply from a certain compassion coexisting with his punitive righteousness, or from his faithfulness, by which the covenant is maintained, as though his truthfulness alone were to be kept unimpeachable. If, therefore, we do not wish to rest content with a superficial view of the book, we must regard its meaning from this stand-point as expressed in the following estimate: "The prophetic exhibition of the love of God, wounded sorely and in numberless ways by Israel's guilt, and therefore necessarily a chastening love, though ever remaining unchanged in its inner nature, which being so deeply grounded would not destroy, but heal and recall to itself." Such are the words of Ewald, who has so correctly perceived and so beautifully expressed the fundamental thought of our book, but who views it too subjectively, too much as the mere outflow of the author's own personal feelings, instead of something flowing from a deep insight into the nature of God himself. Yet he makes these admirable observations: "To this prophet the love of Jehovah is the deepest ground of his relation to Israel; that love was always active in forming the Church; it was injured and disturbed by Israel; it chastens now in deep pain, but can never deny itself or be extinguished; it would still deliver and will at length save all. All this is exhibited with the most glowing sympathy, and in a great variety of ways. But no image is here more expressive than that of marriage. As the wife is united to her husband by indissoluble and sacred bonds, and the faithful husband justly feels angry at the unfaithful wife, punishes her or even casts her off for a time, but never can really cease to love her, so has the ancient Church, the mother of the churches now living, borne children, during her unfaithfulness to Jehovah, who resist Him unworthily, and yet the love of Jehovah never departs from them, although he is angry and punishes them."

This last sentence may indicate also why we regard this relation of love between Jehovah and Israel not merely as the doctrinal background of the contents of our book, but an expression of those contents themselves. For Hosea, from the very opening, presents expressly this relation of Jehovah and Israel under this figure of the husband, who just because he is united to his wife by the bond of love, must as surely be indignant with her and punish her, as he must also be unable to let her go, but must hold out to her the prospect of a cordial reinstatement in her former relations.

The figure becomes indeed less prominent as the book advances, but appears through the whole sometimes more obscurely, sometimes more clearly, and even emerges again into the foreground in several passages. The conception of Israel's conduct is based upon this image, partly as it is designated infidelity, whoredom, which applies not merely to idolatry itself, but sets forth the principle that underlies the false, untheocratic policy of the kingdom of the Ten Tribes in its alliances with the world-powers; and partly and still more as everything that is said of Jehovah's conduct towards Israel, of warning, of threatening, of punishing, of promising, is rooted wholly in this fundamental idea of Jehovah's love to Israel as his spouse drawn from the analogy of wedded love, — except that this image of wedded love is interchanged with the figure of paternal love, equally strong in another direction, as especially in chap. xi. in accordance with the fact that the subject of that chapter is Jehovah's conduct towards Israel in his childhood. This latter relation is thus placed parallel to a relation of personal love based upon a moral course of life. This view explains why our book, in a way so peculiar to itself, refers so much to Israel's earlier history. For it is natural that love should remind the one beloved, who had become unfaithful and refused to reciprocate affection, of the beginning of their attachment; that the husband should recall to the wife, when such a rupture of the marriage tie has taken place, the first love with which he met the bride (as the father also reminds the backsliding son of the love displayed toward him in childhood). On the other hand when the course of infidelity is complete, he is led to remember the beginnings and foretokens of such behavior in earlier days, and he explains the present in the light of the past, justifies his anger and chastening in the present and his bitter complaints over the unfaithfulness of his wife, by adducing the complaints made and the punishments which had to be inflicted in former times. If the recollection of the past thus intensifies the bitterness of injured love, it is equally potent, on the other side, in preventing the extinction of love; for to the wounded and deeply injured one it again presents the attachment in its whole extent, and forces the thought upon him irresistibly and imperceptibly: "This is the one upon whom thou hast bestowed thy love, with whom thou hast been and art united in love, and whom, therefore, thou canst not let go from thee utterly and forever."

If we now consider the contents of the particular divisions of the book, we find this much to be clear at the outset; first, that chaps. i. and ii., and next that chaps. iv.–xiv. are closely connected. With regard to the first and smaller division, chaps. i. and ii., the fact is more incontestable than with regard to the second and longer one, which, in any case demands itself a subordinate division. The question is now, how we are to reckon chap. iii. It has been attached by some to chaps. iv.–xiv. as their introduction. But the correct view will be found to be given in the words of Hävernicks, that "the symbolical method of representation unites the first three chapters into one whole." And if we are reminded of the somewhat abrupt introduction of chap. iii., we must observe that an explanation of the symbol is given in vers. 4, 5, — an explanation in plain words, in fact the first one which occurs, of the discourse in chap. ii., which from ver. 4 onwards is figurative throughout, representing Israel as an adulterous wife, so that we here arrive at a conclusion which clearly expresses the sense of what precedes.

It will more clearly appear that the view which regards chap. iii. as belonging with chaps. i. and ii. is the correct one, if we remember that the contents of chap. i. (and therefore also of chap. ii.) certainly fall in an earlier period than the discourse in chaps. iv.–xiv. (as chaps. i.–ii. relate expressly to the "beginning of the word of Jehovah to Hosea"), namely, in the period preceding the fall of the house of Jehu (chap. i. 4), while chaps. iv.–xiv. belong to the second period defined above, after its fall; for it is in that portion that Assyria first appears, which is decisive. If now the symbolical narrative in chap. i. must have appeared earlier than chaps. iv.–xiv., it is only proper to suppose that chap. iii., so analogous to it, falls in the same period, that we have here generally fragments drawn from the earlier part of the Prophet's ministry, and that therefore chaps. i.–iii. form a connected whole. It is thus natural to assume that the symbolical mode of presentation, in general, characterizes the earlier period of the Prophet's labors.

We thus assume two main divisions: chaps. i.–iii. and chaps. iv.–xiv., and in favor of such partition have not only internal grounds but also an external argument, namely, that each part is the product of a distinct period. The one of earlier origin is, however, comparatively small, and the opinion is plausible that the Prophet, in committing the whole to writing, prefixed the former part as a kind of introduction to the greater prophetic discourses which constituted the main division, like a vestibule inviting an entrance. The contents, also, are appropriate to this purpose with their symbolical actions and figurative discourses. It has something enigmatic, surprising, straining the attention, and so preparing the way for reaching and hearing what is expressed in a simple, literal form.

The first introductory portion (chaps. i.–iii.) which contains "the beginning" of the divine revelation to Hosea, describes the (spiritual) adultery of the kingdom of the ten tribes in its apostasy from Jehovah to idolatry, and the conduct of Jehovah towards this unfaithful spouse.

The most severe punishment even to rejection is threatened against it, but, as the end and aim of such punishment, new and higher blessedness is held out in prospect.

This is set forth in three sections, each of which contains both threatening and promise, with the aim of showing clearly how little these are to be separated, how, rather, both have a common source in the love which Jehovah has to Israel, since He stands united with it in (spiritual) marriage.

1. Chap. i. 2—ii. 3. The Prophet must symbolically, by a marriage with a wife of whoredom, hold up to Israel its sin, and, by the names of the children born of this marriage, announce its rejection (i. 2-9). Yet its future acceptance and reunion are immediately pictured with a few outlines (ii. 1-3).

2. In copious, extraordinarily vivid, and; especially in the latter portion, most sublime language, Jehovah unbosoms Himself to his unfaithful spouse, Israel. He utters a severe accusation against her, and proclaims that she shall be punished by falling into a condition of extreme want, that she shall be laid waste (vers. 4-15). But with this new "leading into the desert" a change occurs; Jehovah concludes a new alliance, rich in blessing, with the spouse returning in penitence to Him (vers. 16-25).

3. Chap. iii. The Prophet must again show symbolically by his conduct towards the wife of whoredom, whom he was commanded to marry, that God still loves his adulterous wife, Israel, and would only in his love humble her, that she might return to Him.

The second division, the main portion of the book (chaps. iv.-xiv), the product of a later period, as we saw above, is in form distinguished from the earlier part by the entire absence of symbolical acts, the discourse being literal throughout. The purport is, however, similar in its essential features, inasmuch as here also punishment and even destruction (on account of its apostasy) are announced to the kingdom of Israel. But at the same time also it is predicted that it shall be received back on the ground of its expected conversion; indeed a time of richest blessing is at last held out to it in prospect. Jehovah appears here also as one who loves Israel, and must therefore punish it for infidelity, though as unable to give it up, and as being forced to be again merciful and to bless according to the law of love. The object is accordingly essentially the same; this inability to give up Israel, this ultimate favor and blessing form here also the picture of the future. But it costs labor, as it were, to realize this aim; the threatening is so severe. This constitutes by far the largest portion of the whole, and only after it has disclosed its full severity, does promise break through, when Jehovah seems as it were to call to mind his former love for his people, thus showing that from the beginning love did not fail, but that even his accusings and threatenings arose from deeply wounded love. This suggests already that the ground upon which the prophecy proceeds, is changed. Idolatry, as unfaithfulness to Jehovah is, it is true, always the fundamental offense on account of which judgment is declared, but to this is added not only moral pollution, but also dissolution of the state, and especially the pursuance of a false policy altogether opposed to the character of a people of God, which sought help in external aid against the distresses which invaded them, partly in Assyria and partly in Egypt. It is the unfaithfulness of Ephraim towards Jehovah, mainly in this form of a political attitude entirely untheocratical, against which the prophet appears, and on account of which he announces judgment, the punishment threatened being destruction by those very world-powers, Egypt, and especially Assyria.

This second main division, of such large extent, calls itself for a division. But this is a matter of great difficulty. It is, however, certain that the attempt to assign the several chapters to different periods of time, and thus to view the succession of the chapters as determined by the order of their composition (Maurer and Hitzig among others), must be unsuccessful, even if it be conceded that these chapters did proceed originally from different occasions. It is remarkable, for example, that in chaps. iv., v., vi., Judah is mentioned frequently along with Ephraim, while afterwards it retreats more into the background, so that it is natural to infer different situations as their occasions. But as the whole lies before us at present, there is a certain unity apparent, though it is difficult to follow definitely the course of thought. We must abandon the supposition of a strictly logical arrangement of the parts in view of the nature of the language, marked, as it is, by excitement and constantly surprising abruptness. Different expositors adopt most widely differing divisions, while others abandon the attempt altogether.

It is clear, at the outset, that from chap. iv. onwards accusation of Israel occupies the chief place, as describing its degradation and guilt; and Ewald has rightly perceived that chap. iv. is to be separated as containing a general charge, relating to the apostasy generally of the people from Jehovah, and the moral deterioration thereby induced. Then in chap. v. the denunciation is more specially directed against those of exalted position (comp. vers. 1), and as its subject, in addition to the general unfaithfulness to Jehovah, something special enters, namely the false, untheocratic policy of "going after Egypt and after Assyria." This is, at all events, the new element here, and in attempting to exhibit the progress of thought, this point must so far be made prominent. In chap. vi. this does not appear, but the chapter is so closely connected with chap. v., that no partition is supposable. On the other hand the denunciation of the untheocratic policy becomes still more marked in chap. vii., being there directed chiefly against the court itself, while chaps. v. and vi. seem to be aimed more particularly at the priests. Hence chap. vii. also is to be combined with these chapters. So in all these chapters the threat of punishment is uniformly united with the accusations. But actual announcement of judgment appears first in chap. viii., accusations however being still uttered. Compare the beginning, chap. viii. 1, and it seems to show more especially that the punishment, namely, the transportation into Egypt and Assyria, and therefore, the destruction of the state, the carrying away into captivity, is presented as the reverse side of the calling upon Egypt and going to Assyria. For the same reason chaps. ix. and x. are to be added with chap. viii. Chap. x. 15 forms a fitting close to this section. But the contrast to the transportation to Egypt and Assyria appears again only in chap. xi. 11, so that we stand first upon new ground in that passage.

Thus with chap. xi. begins a new section, and with it enters promise. Jehovah's love to Israel, which seemed to be utterly swallowed up in the announcement of judgment, here breaks forth. At first, indeed, only in the form of a reminder of its manifestations in early times, how it was vouchsafed to Israel in childhood. This is naturally expressed in a sorrowful complaint against that Israel, who now in his manhood requites that love so ill, displaying in his apostasy the basest ingratitude. Hence we have again in chap. xi. 5, the most severe threatening. But Jehovah has again brought his love to remembrance; it is He that loves Israel, as had been already shown in the beginning; this love is his essential disposition towards Israel, and thus cannot in the present belie itself; it oversteps wrath and appears as mercy, and promise breaks forth on its shining way, like the sun after dark and long distressing clouds. The brief recollections of former times in chaps. ix. and x. only served to give point to the keen accusings. But in chap. xi. the sun breaks forth brightly. It is promise that now prevails.

But the storm is not yet past. In chaps. xii. and xiii. denunciation and announcement of punishment reappear. Yet, if they are still severe, they are much less protracted. But, chiefly, there seems to be a new standpoint gained. It is the past that is dwelt upon, namely, what had transpired between Jehovah and Israel in former days. But this is a great step gained. Hence the weighty words are twice uttered: "I am Jehovah, thy God, from the land of Egypt" (chaps. xii. 10; xiii. 4). This thought does, it is true, serve to sharpen the complaint, and with it to sharpen the threatening; but that people cannot be given up who have, from the beginning, Jehovah as their God. Hence in chap. xiv. 2-4, the exhortation to return, which shows clearly his determination not to give them up; and now, upon the ground of their expected conversion, love at last flows forth in the fullest promise, which is no longer merely a cessation of punishment, as in chap. xi. 9 ff., but, positively, holds out in prospect a glorious state of blessedness.

The course of thought is accordingly not perfectly undeviating, but, especially towards the close after the highest point has been reached, rather deflected, as it tends towards the conclusion through the wrestling of love and justice, which it thus expresses. Ewald assumes after chap. xi., a sort of preliminary conclusion, marking an interruption in writing. It is, at all events, correct to assume that the train of thought has then reached a certain completion, after which the former order of the discourse is again taken up.

The following scheme will exhibit our attempt to divide the section:—

Jehovah pleads with Israel, his beloved but unfaithful spouse (comp. chap. iv. 1).

I. First discourse (chaps. iv.-xi.).

1. Chaps. iv.-vii. The complaint, addressed —

a. (Chap. iv.) against the people as a whole, on account of their idolatry and deep depravation of morals promoted by the priests.

b. (Chaps. v.-vii.): against the rulers (priests, chaps. v.-vi.), court (chap. vii.), especially on account of their ungodly and calamitous alliance with the powers of the world.

2. Chaps. viii.-x. The judgment, extending even to the carrying away of the people to bondage under Assyria.

3. Chap. xi. Mercy; God cannot utterly destroy Israel, whom He has always loved, but will again have compassion upon them even though they have most vilely requited his love.

II. Second discourse (chaps. xii.-xiv.).

1. Chap. xii. Complaint is once more resumed, and —

2. Chap. xiii., judgment is most emphatically declared; but —

3. Chap. xiv., in hope of conversion, love finally flows forth in the promise of richest blessing.

[Those who may wish to become acquainted with the various methods of dividing the book which have been proposed, will find them exhibited and discussed in the Biblical Repertory, Jan. 1859, art. "Book of Hosea," by Prof. Green, of Princeton. A division having much to recommend it is that adopted by him from Keil, according to which each of the two main sections (chaps. i.-iii., iv.-xiv.) is divisible into three smaller ones (i. 2-ii. 1, ii. 2-23, iii.; iv. 1-vi. 3, vi. 4-xi. 11, xi. 12-xiv. 9). Each of these smaller sections in both of the main divisions is marked by its beginning with denunciation and ending with promise. — M.]

In harmony with the fundamental thought of our book, as above presented, according to which it describes the sorrow and indignation of Jehovah's love, so sorely wounded by Israel's infidelity, the language is of a peculiarly emotional and impassioned character, reflecting unmistakably the rush and swell of the feelings. "This anguish of love at the faithlessness of Israel so completely fills the mind of the Prophet, that his rich and lively imagination seeks perpetually by variety of imagery and fresh turns of thought, to open the eyes of the sinful nation to the abyss of destruction beside which it is standing. His profound sympathy gives to his language the character of excitement, so that for the most part he merely hints briefly at the thoughts instead of studiously elaborating them, passes with abrupt changes from one figure or simile to another, and moves forward in short sentences and oracular utterances, rather than in gently rounded discourse." (Keil.) Jerome (Præf. in XII. Proph. Min.) says of him: "Commaticus (literally, cut up = short) est et quasi per sententias loquens." Eichhorn (Introduction, § 555, p. 286) says not unaptly: "The style of the Prophet is like a garland woven of various kinds of flowers, comparisons intertwined with comparisons. He breaks off one flower and throws it away, only to break off another immediately. He flies like a bee from one bed of flowers to another, bringing the honey of his varied sentences." With these features are connected manifold anomalies in the structure of his clauses, rugged transitions, ellipses, asyndetical constructions, inversions, and anacolutha. Add to this that his diction is marked by rare words and forms and unusual combinations, and it may be conceived how difficult is the exposition of the book. "One must often read between the lines if he would establish the connection between the several thoughts and sentences. We will not be charged with overstatement, if we assert that the Prophet is in this respect one of the most difficult of the prophets of the Old Covenant, and indeed of all the Biblical writers." (Wünsche.)

The abruptness of the language, reaching often to obscurity, does not merit any censure, for this peculiarity is to be explained from the contents and the subject of which the Prophet was full. "His heart," remarks Wünsche, "full of the deepest anguish, on account of the destruction and the inevitably approaching dissolution of the State, makes him neglect all artistic and harmonious treatment and exhibition of his theme." And Ewald says with perfect correctness: "In Hosea there is a rich and lively imagination, a pregnant fullness of language, and, in spite of many strong figures, great tenderness and warmth of expression. His poetry is throughout purely original, replete with vigor of thought and purity of presentation. Yet at one time we find the gentle and flowing predominate in his style, while at another it is violently strained and abrupt, and his irresistible pain causes him often to give a hint of his meaning without allowing him to complete it. There is also thrown over the whole language the burden of the times and of the heart so oppressed by them."

If, finally, we inquire into the composition of our book, we find no ground whatever for maintaining that the author was any other than the Prophet himself, or for the assumption that, although the several discourses came from Hosea, they were yet first compiled by another and later editor. It has been thought that their aphoristic character justifies such a hypothesis, but we are convinced that this is not so marked as one would certainly suppose at first sight, and that the several portions are not only governed by one fundamental idea, which would probably have become still more obscured in the hands of a later redactor of such fragments, but that the several parts are brought into a definite order and connection.

There can therefore be scarcely a doubt that our book came from the hands of the Prophet precisely in that form in which we possess it to-day. "On closer examination the book is seen to form a complete whole executed according to a fixed artistic plan, and with corresponding beauty. This artistic plan and execution only need to be rightly understood in order to show us that it was finally published as a whole, and in its present form, by the Prophet himself." (Ewald.) But as to the relation in which this book stands to the numerous prophetic utterances of Hosea, we are compelled to assume that we have not in this book those discourses presented in their original form. If this had been the intention of the Prophet, we should have had a greater number. Moreover the book is framed too decidedly according to a certain plan, making it clear that it was designed to form a continuous and regular composition. We have therefore to regard it as a selection from his discourses, or more correctly, as a free and independent working-up of the substance of them by the Prophet himself. His several utterances are combined by him into one complete picture. He would employ not only his lips but also his pen, and by his writings would testify concerning the holy anger of the love of God, and thus appeal to the consciences of the people.

But here the question may be asked, whether our book is the first product of Hosea's pen, whether, more particularly, earlier writings are not embodied in it. At the outset it is certainly to be assumed that Hosea was in the habit of writing down his several discourses. But keeping this in view, the difference between the first part of the book (chaps. i.-iii.), and the second (chaps. iv. ff.) is so significant, the contents of the first part, moreover, falling in an earlier period, that Ewald's conjecture has much to support it: that chaps. i.-iii. contain the substance of an earlier composition of Hosea, which he embodied in the present one when he executed it. Even if we hesitate to go so far as this, we must probably assume that the separate sections of chaps. i.-iii. had been published already by the Prophet, since we have in the narratives of the symbolical actions merely the drapery in which they were to be presented to the world and not actual occurrences (see below). For in those chapters punishments were announced which were inflicted at a time earlier than the completion of the whole book. The Prophet could incorporate into his book only at a later period earlier actual events; but these symbolical transactions existed only in the mind of the prophet, and in publishing them he must have come forth at a time when these parabolic narratives could address themselves to the conscience of the people, and therefore a considerable period before the composition of the whole book, which, as we now have it, contains, in its second part, discourses of a much later time. Such publication of the symbolical transactions might indeed have been at first only oral; but the contents of these sections seem less appropriate to that mode of announcement.

The preservation of the whole book in the destruction of the kingdom of the Ten Tribes may be readily explained. "Through the intercourse which was kept up between the prophets of the Lord in the two kingdoms, it was carried soon after its composition into Judah, and became widely diffused in the circle of the prophets, and was thus preserved, as Jeremiah especially has made frequent use of it in his predictions. Comp. Aug. Küper, Jeremias, Librorum SS. Interpres atque Vindex. Berlin, 1837, p. 67 ff." (Keil.)

After what has been said it will scarcely be necessary to add anything special in the way of exhibiting the importance of our prophetic book in Old Testament history and doctrine. Into the internal relations of the kingdom of the ten tribes, against which he, like his older cotemporary, Amos, directs his words of rebuke and threatening (by which these two prophets mark a new step in prophecy, in distinction from Joel and Obadiah, regarding the heathen not merely as the objects but also as the instruments of the divine judgment, which is inflicted with the greatest severity against the people of God themselves),—into the internal relations of this kingdom Hosea gives us the deepest insight, and affords a most essential addition to the knowledge which we have thereon from his older cotemporary. As to its doctrinal teaching, however, there can be no doubt as to the significance of a book, which regards the relation of Jehovah to Israel so profoundly and specially from the standpoint of holy love, of a holy wrath of love, and looks so far into the depths, into the intensity as well as into the sincerity, of such love as, in the examination of the contents and fundamental thought of the prophecy, we have shown that it does. In this he stands above his nearest predecessor, Amos. That prophet also discerns the favor of God shining again at last upon his people after the tempests of his wrath. But he grounds it upon the consciousness that this judgment is and shall be only one of trial and not of destruction, and that room is thus prepared for mercy through the revelation of wrath, while Hosea traces back this duality in the divine revelation to the nature of God Himself, by his more profound conception of the divine love.

Our book is therefore truly a classic for the right understanding of the Old Testament conception of God with its interaction of love and wrath, and of the nature of the Old Testament revelation concerning God. Only such a God who can so be angry and so love, who in all His love so displays anger and in all His anger so displays love, could give up his Only-begotten Son to the accursed death for the deliverance of rebellious man.

§ 3. The Symbolical Transactions in Chaps. I. and III.

What is recounted in these chapters is so peculiar, and has always been regarded under such different views, that a more intimate discussion cannot here be foreborne: and to it we shall therefore devote a separate section in the Introduction. In this the results of the exegesis of the passages in question are of course to be anticipated, and must therefore be referred to here. This much is however certain that, according to the narrative, mention is made of a marriage of the Prophet with an unchaste woman at the command of God himself. Here we have a stone of stumbling. It is true that the ground of moral offense contained herein does not exist according to some interpreters, inasmuch as the "wife of whoredom" whom the Prophet is to marry, is regarded as being such in the spiritual sense in which a "whoring" of Israel is spoken of = serving idols; that Hosea had scruples about marrying a whorish, that is, an idolatrous woman; and that it is commanded him not to stand aloof from her but to exhibit symbolically in his own domestic fortunes, that is, by his union with such a woman, Jehovah's relation to his people. But this view is quite untenable. For idolatry cannot be a symbol of idolatry, a marriage with an idolatress cannot be a symbol of a like marriage, namely, the marriage of Jehovah with an idolatrous people. This, altogether apart from the consideration that such a command of God to the prophet is not conceivable, that such marriage would have produced upon the people an effect exactly opposite to the one intended, namely, the presentation of idolatry to the consciousness as something sinful, if we can suppose that any effect was produced. Umbreit also seeks to establish more firmly the interpretation of the woman's whoredom as spiritual whoredom, by maintaining that Hosea, in order to represent God's marriage with Israel, was commanded to enter into marriage with Israel; but, since all Israel had become adulterous towards God, that he was obliged in order to enter the marriage relation with Israel, to unite himself to a whore in the spiritual sense = idolatress. Such a wife thus represents, as an individual, the whole people. And this outward marriage of the Prophet is the symbol of his spiritual marriage with his people. But Kurtz remarks rightly against this hypothesis, that the notion that the Prophet himself was to enter into a spiritual marriage with Israel is quite unfounded, that such a conception is not once found in the Old Testament, which knows only of a marriage of Jehovah with Israel; that the Prophet by his external marriage could symbolize only that spiritual marriage of Jehovah, and not his own spiritual marriage with Israel. For this reason his marriage, in order to represent the marriage of Jehovah with adulterous Israel, must be a marriage with a whorish woman in the outward sense.

Thus it is beyond question that it is such a marriage of the prophet that is here described, but the question is now: Must we assume an actual outward event in the life of the Prophet or not?

It is clear that we have before us a transaction which has a symbolical significance and is therefore in so far a symbolical transaction; but the question is just this, Is this an actual event intended as a symbol of a higher truth, or do we move outside the sphere of objective reality? The latter supposition does certainly seem, on the first view, to be excluded by the language employed, which does not give us the slightest hint that we have presented to us anything else than outward reality, but rather creates the impression that it is a record of actual events. And it is not to be maintained that the narrative has to do with something physically impossible, that it bears directly upon itself the stamp of unreality in the external sense. But it appears all the more probable that something morally impossible is described; for would it not be in the highest degree incredible that a prophet should marry an unchaste woman, and that at the express command of God? Hence the literal interpretation has been rejected already by the Chaldee Paraphrase and by the Jewish Commentators. But this plea is itself not altogether without difficulties. The reference to Lev. xxi.

7-14, at all events, proves nothing: for what is there forbidden to a priest cannot be directly transferred to a prophet (comp. Kurtz: "That prohibition is based upon the consideration that the priests were to represent the ideal holiness of the people, and is rooted in the same ground as is the law that a priest must be free from physical blemishes. The latter injunction is as far as possible from implying that physical defect is sin in an Israelite, and the same holds with regard to the former"). And then it is one thing to have intercourse with an unchaste woman, in order to practice fornication with her, and quite another to marry such a woman. The one is as assuredly sinful as the other is in itself not so, any more than it was for Jesus to be a friend of publicans and sinners. For the prophet would not have entered into such an alliance that he might be assimilated to the woman, but in order to raise her up to his own level, to rescue her from her sinful habits: "Non propheta perdidit pudicitiam fornicariæ copulatus, sed fornicaria assumpti pudicitiam, quam antea non habebat" (Jerome).

Such an alliance in the Prophet would have been in the very highest degree surprising. But it may be asked, Was it not intended to be so, in order that the people, in their astonishment at such an anomaly, should ask what it meant, and might then learn to their shame, that it held up to them a mirror in which they could perceive their own relations with God? The Prophet would reinforce his oral preaching by a preaching of outward action; this marriage would have been a lasting actual proclamation of punishment to the people, not impeding the influence of the Prophet, but furthering it.

But on a closer examination of this view, which understands actual events to be described, most serious objections to it are immediately suggested. A beautiful picture could have been drawn exhibiting the morally reforming influence of this alliance upon the light-minded wife and the neglected children of the first marriage, and how worthy of God it would have been, answering to his compassionate love seeking that which was lost! But of this there is not a syllable — not a syllable could be said. Rather, this idea, which alone could neutralize the moral objections against this alliance with an unchaste woman, is completely excluded by the whole spirit and aim of the command which the Prophet received. It is just the present "whorish" conduct of Israel, the still existing and continued and persistent infidelity towards Jehovah, that is represented by this marriage of the Prophet, and punishment and rejection are then exhibited as the necessary fruit and consequence of such conduct. Thus the "wife of whoredom," whom the Prophet is to and does marry, is necessarily to be regarded as one who does not amend her ways, or is withdrawn from her life of sin by her alliance with the Prophet, but who even now in this alliance with him is conceived as practicing unchastity, who shows and proves herself to be unfaithful to her husband. Otherwise she would not be at all an image of Israel as thus situated, nor would this marriage be at all an image of the present conduct of Israel towards their husband, Jehovah. Strictly speaking, this wife of whoredom would have been bound, so long at least as her marriage with the Prophet was to testify to Israel of its sin, not to forsake her sinful life (until special corrective measures, related in chap. iii. should be taken with her, so that she might become a testimony of that which God, still retaining his love for Israel, would do to them).

There is no need to prove that the assumption of an actual occurrence would lead to an ethical monstrosity. With the design of this marriage to exhibit the conduct of Israel towards Jehovah, is most clearly connected a circumstance, which shows more plainly than ever the non-reality of the related transaction, namely, that the Prophet is expressly enjoined to take a wife of whoredom and children of whoredom. This is at first sight surprising, but becomes quite intelligible if we think of the design, of that which was to be exemplified, the conduct of Israel and all its individual members. Israel in the concrete is represented only by the latter; but this separation of a part from the whole is very frequently found in relation to Israel. Israel as the whole then appears as the mother, the individual members as the children (comp. chap. ii. 4 ff.). Now both Israel as a whole and all the members of the people are unfaithful to Jehovah, they "commit whoredom." If therefore the actual condition of affairs in its whole extent is to be represented by a marriage of the Prophet, he must take to wife a woman still practicing unchastity, and, at the same time, have children, who are children of whoredom, that is, naturally (see also below in the exegesis) not those who were the fruit of the illicit commerce of the mother (a woman characterized as a woman of whoredom could, in fact, have no other, and the remark would be quite superfluous), but children who stand in the same relation to whoredom as the mother does, that is, who practice whoredom as she did, and bear therefore a faithful resemblance to her. How then is the Prophet to "take" these children of whoredom? Naturally the notion of such "taking," which in the case of a woman means marrying, must be modified in the case of children. Two senses are supposable. One is that he obtains them by marriage as children already born to his wife. In that case he is obliged to find out an unchaste woman, who has children that already commit whoredom; and not only so, but they must actually continue that habit; for otherwise the symbol no longer meets the conditions of the case, the sign no longer agrees with the thing signified. In short, under the assumption of an objective reality in this transaction, we come again to an ethical monstrosity. But the case is still worse, if we understand "taking" the children in the sense of begetting them with the wife (and this view is the more probable one; see the exegesis below). For Jehovah is married to Israel, and they are unfaithful to Him; and Jehovah has begotten children by this marriage — the individual members of the people — and they also are unfaithful to Him, they "commit whoredom." So the Prophet, in order to manifest this, must not only take a wife of the above description, but also beget children by her who are of the same character as she, are unchaste like her. It might be known antecedently that they would be so; they are, so to speak, predestined to such a character; if it were otherwise, they would fail to perform their part, they would not represent what it was intended they should. To speak of actual reality in such a case is now a sheer impossibility. The thing signified, that which is to be represented, is revealed too clearly through the sign, that which is to set forth the relation; only one thing could make it plainer, namely, that the Prophet should add: of course this was not really done! — but one must be almost blind to suppose, even for a moment, that it could be. The symbol is arranged simply in accordance with the thing to be symbolized, without reference to the consideration that in concrete reality it would encounter invincible obstacles: naturally such reference does not need to be had, because the transaction was not realized in concreto and in facto, but was only a plastic symbolizing of a certain condition of affairs which was to be denounced.

We must now go a step backwards. That which morally excites such objections lies not merely in the fact of this marriage with an unchaste woman, of whom again unchaste children were to be born, but also in its design. It is to be observed that the alliance spoken of has its aim purely out of itself, terminates in nowise upon itself, but is merely a mean to an end. This end is not the begetting of children. They are certainly to be begotten, but they are themselves only means to an end, with their significant names, which they receive in order to announce to the people their rejection. This marriage was thus to be contracted purely for the purpose of symbolizing another fact which lay altogether without the sphere of marriage. Such a conclusion cannot be disputed unless there is imported into the words something foreign to them. Let the words be followed closely, let not separate expressions: he went and took, etc., be emphasized, but the whole be accepted and understood as it reads, with no interlarding of all sorts of notions, about the use and plausibility of this alliance, of which nothing is indicated, and the narrative will be seen to relate to a marriage and procreation of children which are purely symbolical and described solely as serving the purposes of an emblematic representation. And that this transaction, considered as an occurrence of outward reality, is something inconceivable, opposed to the spirit and significance of marriage, is so clear, that the Prophet did not need to give the least hint of its unliteral character (if, indeed, that had been the custom of the Prophets). No; an actual marriage is not concluded simply in order to symbolize something different; the marriage is a symbol of a higher covenant. But its design is not realized in such symbolizing. That would be a trifling with the idea of marriage, agreeing but little with the profound conception of that state, which the Prophet brings to light in this very act of conceiving the relation between Jehovah and Israel as a marriage. I can give a name to a child born of a marriage, for the purpose of indicating something by it symbolically; but it would be something quite different if I were to enter into the married state simply for this purpose. And hence the reference to Is. vii. 14; viii. 3, 4, where, however, an outward act is narrated, is altogether unsuitable. If recourse is had to the words of the text, it may be replied that many prophetic passages, e. g., Jer. xxv. 15 ff., Zech. xi., show clearly that the simple words of the narrative are not decisive. In such passages the words, taken literally, even when relating to symbolical transactions, seem to record an occurrence entirely objective, though no one supposes that they really do so. In other passages this inference is more patent, while here it is obscured, though only apparently so; for that which it is ethically inadmissible to suppose should be done by the command of God, is just as incredible as the occurrence of that which is physically impossible.

We have now to consider, finally, in what a brief period the action is performed, the rapidity with which the several acts are, and are intended to be, presented. It is the rapidity which, if the word may be allowed, is well suited to a dramatic conception, but not to concrete reality. By literalists the fact is entirely ignored that this symbolical course of teaching would have required three years at least for its complete unfolding. And in connection with the other considerations the remark of Simson (in spite of the strictures of Kurtz) is perfectly just: "After each of the four principal scenes which make up the symbolical narrative (vers. 2, 4, 6, 9), the explanation and occasion of the symbol follows, connected with 'for' in such a peculiar way, that it may be gathered indubitably, simply from this connection and the whole manner of expression, that the figure is not presented in its actuality, but is only devised for the sake of making evident to the senses the lessons it unfolds." Thus the view which regards the actions described as real occurrences is seen to be untenable if we do not even go beyond the first section; nor do we need to add to the other arguments the relation of chap. iii. to our section. On the contrary, we think that arguments have been too much drawn from that portion of the book, and therefore too largely based upon external grounds, and for this reason less convincing than they should be.

Now after this negative result, that the narrative is not to be regarded as relating actual occurrences, the question first arises: What then does it relate? A vision? So the Jewish commentators, and in recent times especially Hengstenberg. This view does indeed surrender the externality of the transaction, but it holds to its actuality, only assuming that it was not experienced outwardly but inwardly. With regard to this hypothesis of a vision, it is admitted that a "beholding" lies at the foundation of all prophetic announcement, that is, a vision in the wider sense (comp. the remarks on Amos, chap. vii.). But we are not justified on this account in assuming at once that the Prophet was in an ecstatic state. There is not the least hint of such a thing given in our passage; for nothing is said of a vision in the narrower sense, and hence we are unwarranted in adopting such an assumption here. He certainly "beheld," as all the prophets did, that which he here relates in parabolic discourse. It is thus that the narrative is most properly designated.

But it may be asked: If, according to the above reasoning, it leads to a series of monstrosities to regard the (symbolical) transaction as an actual occurrence, was it allowable for the Prophet even to present it in a parabolic dress? This objection, which it seems to be, is possible only under a misapprehension of the whole aim of the exhibition. The action represented is certainly bold, is surprising, is, we say directly, exorbitant. But it was just intended to be so. It was intended, as we remarked above, to rouse the hearer into uttering the question: What? do I hear aright? What do you say the prophet must do? The thing to be set forth, the thing signified, is something abnormal, contradictory, something which it seems could never occur, that Israel should "commit whoredom, departing from their God"; and not this merely, but also (which, to be sure, is the necessary consequence of the former) that God should reject this His people, His spouse, to whom He had always been faithful, to whom He had been so beneficent. Since this condition of affairs to be represented, the "thing signified," was of such a character, it must be set forth by the description of an occurrence of a like kind, that is, one which is just as abnormal, contradictory, and unprecedented, thus necessarily rousing the attention to consider how a prophet could marry a whore at the bidding of God, and by her beget children, who should receive, also at God's command, names indicative of punishment, from their resemblance to their mother. There is therefore intentionally something monstrous, something ethically impossible, held up to the people as though it had happened, in order that it might be forced upon their consciousness, how utterly abnormal, how monstrous, how opposed to the right order of things, is that which they had done to God, and which He must do to them. That, therefore, which the prophet relates to the people is related to them, because it is something monstrous; but being so, it was just as certainly not a statement of actual fact for this very reason. If we were to maintain the opposite, we should mistake the design of the prophet. He would say: As Israel has acted towards God, and as He must treat his people in return, so would I, the prophet, act if I were to marry a whorish woman. As impossible as the latter is, so impossible should the former be; and yet alas it is a reality!

But it may be objected: The prophet's marriage would indeed represent to the people their apostasy from Jehovah, and the names of the prophet's children would bring perpetuaally to their consciousness the judgment which they must expect in return ; but if that marriage did not take place, and the children never existed, how could such a design be carried out ? Now, this objection is based simply upon an unwarranted supposition, and the inference drawn therefrom must be false. It is taken for granted that such an argumentatio ad oculos by outward action must have been made by the Prophet, that the Prophet intended to do so, judging from the statements of the book, and that therefore we have a narrative of actual occurrences, while it is never said that the prophet had any such intention. The Prophet may just as well have intended to appeal to the people, not by means of outward action, but by a discourse in which certain actions were the drapery of those truths which were to be proclaimed. Whether this discourse was originally oral or not, as other prophetic discourses usually were, or whether it existed from the beginning in a written form, we do not know. If the former supposition is correct, we are not obliged to assume, any more than in other prophetic discourses, that it possessed precisely the same form as that which we now have, since it would have the form appropriate to oral discourse. It is quite wrong, however, to insist that such a mere recital, — heard to-day and forgotten, perhaps, to-morrow, — could have but little influence, and make but little impression, for at least its fixed written form followed with its words speaking perpetually to the conscience. And it has been said already above in § 2, that such a fixed form was probably given to it before the composition of the whole book, as at present constituted, and during the period in which the discourses of the first part were pronounced.

But another argument still is adduced against the supposition of a parabolic recital, which is seen to be so necessary from all that has been said. It is urged that this would derogate from the character of the prophetic word ; that the Prophet speaks expressly and repeatedly of a command of the Lord which he had received ; that, if the whole were only a feigned transaction, the words, "the Lord said," would be degraded into a meaningless, rhetorical phrase, which would be opposed to the divinely objective character of Prophecy. Certainly our whole position would be viewed with distrust, if this drapery of narrative in which the Prophet clothes his message of instruction and rebuke, which he records, and in which he makes mention of an express command of God, were to be regarded by him as only an arbitrary device (rhetorical or as being appropriate to the plan of the book). But what is there to support such an assumption ? In this, as throughout his prophetic ministry, the Prophet rather acted and spoke from a divine impulse. He had beheld what he had to say to the people, reproach of their sinfulness and threatening of punishment, and how he had to say it, that is, he had received from God in spirit an authorization and an impulse to adopt this form of rebuke, to present his divine commission in the form of feigned events. It has been further remarked (e. g., by Kurtz), that we have the words : go, take, etc., and not : go, tell the people that thou hast taken a wife, etc. But this objection is without force. For the expression : "The Lord said to Hosea, go, take to thyself," etc., is itself included already in the parabolical discourse as well as vers. 4, 6, 9 ; and to insist that the Prophet must have given some hint that he was not intending to record an actual occurrence, argues a somewhat crude notion of the obligations of a writer. A parabolic discourse must not bear the appearance of being so ; on the contrary it must present itself as describing actual events (comp. e. g., Judges ix. 8 ; 2 Sam. xii.), though it does not really do so. It bears in itself a sapienti sat which shows that it does not, — and thus our narrative is really twofold. In general the fact is evidently always overlooked, that we have before us in these seemingly historical portions, not a statement concerning the Prophet, but the written discourse of the Prophet himself ; that, therefore, behind the words there stands, so to speak, the prophet writing. It is not his duty to record events as an historian ; and the inference is unwarranted, that he must do so because what he says has the form of an historical record. Hence, according to correct conceptions as to what different kinds of composition require, no objection based upon the form of representation can be made to the parabolic view. And the circumstance that the Prophet is spoken of in the third person, cannot be adduced as a proof that he does not here speak and narrate (figuratively), and that a statement is made concerning him. It cannot, at least, by any one who regards the whole book to be the composition of the Prophet and not a mere compilation by another. Moreover, in chap. iii. the Prophet introduces himself as speaking of himself in the first person. And, finally, it proves nothing that the name and origin of the woman are given. Even if the names are not applied appellatively (see in the exegesis), nothing would be more natural than to invent names for the occasion, which would be a device appropriate in a symbolical discourse.

If we now turn to chap. iii. and hold the identity of the woman named there with the one in chap. i., the question is decided of itself. For if the marriage, mentioned in chap. i., of the Prophet with this woman, was not an actual occurrence, it is self evident that his dealings towards her in chap. iii. are not more historical. If he did not in reality marry this woman, then he did not actually perform what, in chap. iii., he is commanded to do, love her. The woman is, in chap. i., only a feigned person, and if the same person is meant in chap. iii. she cannot be a real person. But if we regard the woman of chap. iii. as not identical with that of chap. i., we have, in the fact that the Prophet becomes connected with another woman, disregarding his marriage with the one mentioned in chap. i., we have here, I say, a clear indication, applying to the whole narrative from the beginning, that these descriptions do not relate to actual events in the Prophet's life. For it is plain that the assumption of his separation from the first wife, or of her death in the interval, is only a device to escape from a dilemma. Such circumstances must have been stated, if actual events had been related; but not a syllable is found to this effect, simply because it was assumed that no one would think of real occurrences.

But, leaving the consideration of the circumstances connected with the woman mentioned in chap. i., and regarding simply by itself the command given to the Prophet in chap. iii. according to his own representation of it, we find the matter here to be somewhat different.

The fact is to be set forth that Jehovah preserves his faithfulness to Israel in spite of their unfaithfulness, and therefore does not utterly cast them off, but only adopts, for their good, corrective measures springing from such abiding faithfulness. Thus something is to be exemplified which would not be expected, since rejection would be the more natural course, but nothing which should not be, nothing which could be found fault with or would invite censure. And accordingly the symbol, or that which the Prophet was commanded to do, was not something ethically inadmissible or monstrous, but only something difficult, unusual, because involving great self-denial, namely, that he should remain faithful to an unfaithful wife. And what is declared to have been done by him is in the same way not something inadmissible, but only something unusual; for by a series of corrective measures the unfaithfulness of the wife is to be brought home to her heart, while, at the same time, it was to be shown that she would not be rejected. Now though it might appear as if very little could be urged in disproof of the actual occurrence of the event described (that is, if it be viewed as an isolated account), yet here also grave objections arise upon a closer examination. Even if the woman of chap. iii. is not to be identified with that of chap. i., the former is hardly conceived of as being of another character than the latter. The woman is not one who was previously chaste and afterwards became unchaste, but one whose adultery is only the manifestation of her former disposition, and a continuation of her previous mode of life, and the Prophet would thus be represented as entering into such intimate relations with her — whether he married her or not would not be certain — which again would border closely upon the morally offensive and become for the Prophet an impossibility. Here the canon is again to be applied, that acts, which are of an essentially immoral nature and fall under moral criticism, cannot be regarded upon external grounds as having been actually performed by divine command. Thus a husband might, it is true, be so controlled by the thought of God's faithfulness, as even to remain faithful to an unfaithful wife, that is, from moral and religious considerations, whether suggested by himself or by another. But this is not the case presented here: the narrative speaks not of an act undertaken or a course of conduct discontinued upon any such ground, but simply of a positive command of God, which was not intended to remind the husband of a duty demanded of him, but which was issued with the design of a manifestation of God's attitude towards the people of Israel, a design altogether foreign to the nature of marriage or the injunction of fidelity.

The Prophet is represented as doing what he here does purely for this external purpose; not from the recognition of a duty, and not to call attention to such duty: he does it plainly in order to symbolize something different. This is perfectly agreeable to the parabolic mode of presentation; but as soon as we come to hold the notion of an actual transaction, the moral sense revolts against it as against a trifling with things which belong essentially to the sphere of the moral and religious life, and therefore cannot be employed as means to serve another purpose. Finally, if we had real transactions presented to us and not a symbolical form, it could not be very well supposed that the woman, accepting the gift of the Prophet, would be inclined to obey his command. The possibility of the opposite would rather have to be assumed, which was manifestly not the case. But in the parabolic narrative this happens naturally just as the purposes of instruction require.

On the question treated in this section compare the thorough discussion by John Marck, Diatriba de Muliere Fornicationum, Leyden, 1696, reprinted in his Comment. in 12 Proph. Min., ed. Pfaff, 1734; and in more recent times especially Hengstenberg, Christologie, i. 205 ff., who denies the actual occurrence of the events described, and the minute investigation of Kurtz, Die Ehe des Propheten Hosea [The Marriage of the Prophet Hosea], 1859, reprinted from the Dorpat Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche, who holds as strongly to the literal interpretation.

[The question so fully discussed above is encumbered with difficulties so great as to seem almost insuperable, and it is probable that it will never be satisfactorily settled. Instances might even be quoted of the same interpreter holding directly opposite opinions within a very short period of time. If the history of interpretation were to be thoroughly surveyed, it might perhaps be found that the majority of distinguished names have been arrayed on the side of the literal view. It may be remarked, however, that among modern interpreters, the more reverent and cautious of those of Germany seem, as a general rule, to favor the theory that the prophet was not to fulfill the commands actually and outwardly. Among the Anglo-American Commentators, on the other hand, the preponderance of opinion still is, as it always has been, in favor of the literal interpretation. So among the recent writers, Pusey and Cowles. The opinion that the Prophet beheld the events in vision has been maintained by Pococke and lately by Fausset. This theory is discussed at length by Cowles in a dissertation appended to his Commentary, to which the reader is referred. It may be remarked, generally, that the main support upon which the defenders of the literal interpretation rely, is the nature of the language employed, bearing, as it does, not the slightest indication that the commands were to be fulfilled in any other than a literal manner, and that the opponents of this theory take their stand chiefly upon the supposed moral impossibility of the literal fulfillment. The conclusion which each reader will arrive at for himself will depend mainly upon the relative force which these considerations may have upon his mind. — M.]

HOSEA.

SUPERScription. CHAPTER I. 1.

The word of the Lord that came unto Hosea, the son of Beeri,¹ in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam, the son of Joash, king of Israel.

PART FIRST. CHAPTERS I. 2-III. 5.

CHAPTERS I. 2-II. 3.

A. The Rejection of the Kingdom of Israel, and especially of the House of Jehu, on account of their "Whoredom," is symbolically announced. — Chap. i. 2-9.

2 The beginning² of the Word of the Lord by Hosea. And the Lord said to Hosea [In the beginning when Jehovah spoke with Hosea, then Jehovah said to Hosea]: Go, take unto thee a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms; for the land hath committed great
3 whoredom, departing from the Lord [Jehovah]. So he went and took Gomer the 4 daughter of Diblaim; which [and she] conceived, and bare him a son. And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto him, Call his name Jezreel; for yet a little while, and I will 5 avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu, and will cause to cease the 6 kingdom of the house of Israel. And it will come to pass in that day, that I will 7 break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel. And she conceived again, and 8 bare a daughter. And God said unto him, Call her name Lo-ruhamah [Unpitied];³
9 for I will no more have mercy upon the house of Israel; but I will utterly take them 10 away [that I should keep on forgiving them]. But I will have mercy upon the house of 11 Judah, and will save them by the Lord [Jehovah] their God, and will not save them 12 by bow, nor by sword, nor by battle [war], by horses, nor by horsemen. Now when 13 she had weaned Lo-ruhamah, she conceived, and bare a son [And she weaned Lo-Ruhamah 14 and conceived and bare a son]. Then said God, call his name Lo-ammi [Not-my-people], for 15 ye are not my people, and I will not be your God [yours].⁴

B. And yet Israel will be again accepted by God.

CHAPTER II. 1-3.

1 Yet [And] the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered; and it shall come to pass, that in the place where⁵ it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said

2 unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God. Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head; 3 and they shall come up out of the land: for great is the day of Jezreel. Say to your brethren, Ammi [My-people], and to your sisters, Ruhamah [Compassionated].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 [Ver. 1. — פִּנְיָאִי — explained by Gesenius as meaning, fountain; by Fürst et al.: one who explains, comp. Deut. 1. 5. If a symbolical meaning is sought, the latter is probably to be preferred; if not, the signification must remain undecided. There seems to be no necessity for holding a symbolical sense. — M.]

2 Ver. 2. — הַיּוֹמָה. By the construct state in which the first word stands the following (יְהוָה being not an infinitive but a preterite), becomes a sort of substantive phrase subordinate to תְּחִלָּתָא. [תְּחִלָּתָא is thus made equivalent to an adverb of time — when at first (Ewald). The construction would thus be similar to that of the phrase יְהוָה יְהוָה, Ex. vi. 28; 1 Sam. xxv. 15 et al. See Ewald, Gr., § 296, 3. For the view which regards the first clause of the verse as a "kind of superscription," see the exposition and Green, Heb. Gr., § 255, 1, 2. — M.] — יְהוָה יְהוָה, according to the familiar Heb. emphatic mode of expression, the יְהוָה is here marked as complete.

3 Ver. 6. — רַחֲמָנָא is usually regarded as a participle with נָא fallen away. But according to Keil it is rather the 3 fem. præter. (In the pausal form on account of the Athnach, as in II. 3, 25) — "she finds no sympathy, is not compassionated." [This is a question which must remain undecided, as the word occurs only in pause. Yet the common view is preferable, because (1) the part. is the better form for an appellative, as it approaches more nearly to a noun, and (2) if the verb became an appellative it would probably remain a fixed form, or at least not be subject to such changes as the 3 præter. undergoes in pause. The part. would of course retain the Kamets in any case. — M.]

The difficult words נָא יְהוָה probably give a further explanation of the יְהוָה — to forgive: I will no longer have compassion on them that I should forgive them (Meier: נָא is climactic — how much less forgive them). The object: sin, is certainly then to be supplied as also in Gen. xviii. 24. But, according to the context, it is easier to supply this than to translate with Hengstenberg: I will take away from them, namely, what they have, or everything they have. In chap. v. 16, נָא in the sense of taking may without difficulty be construed absolutely. But here, especially with the dative, an object is expected.

[Pusey, Henderson, Cowles, et al. follow E. V. in rendering: But I will utterly take them away. Newcome: But I will surely take them away. Ewald agrees with Meier in the translation given above. Henderson admits that נָא followed by יְהוָה elsewhere means to forgive, and that it might have the same sense here if it were only preceded by the copulative וְ, but that נָא meaning but excludes such repetition. Here it is forgotten that נָא may mark consecution or result, as it does frequently, comp. Gen. xi. 15; Is. xxix. 16; Ps. viii. 5, with many other passages. But Schmoller as well as Keil, who discern the true connection and meaning of the words, have overlooked the occurrence of the inf. before the future of the same verb. All the other critics give to this combination the force of emphasis or intensity. Is it not better to suppose that repetition is implied, which is the fundamental notion? And if the last clause is explanatory of the preceding, the יְהוָה of the one must find its counterpart in the frequentative construction of the other: I will no longer have mercy on them that I should continue to forgive them. Greater fullness of meaning and appropriateness is also seen to mark this part of the verse: God had overlooked their sins often before, but He would not keep on overlooking them forever. — M.]

4 [Ver. 9. — לֹא אֶהְיֶה לָּךְ: I will not be for you, i. e., not be yours, not belong to you. There is no need of maintaining that "God" is understood, as Henderson, Cowles, and the English expositors generally do. The sense is complete without supposing an ellipsis. Houbigant (followed by Newcome) has gone so far as to transpose the letters of the last two words into אֶהְיֶה לָּךְ. But this has no support in the MSS. or Versions, and is besides very improbable, not to mention that it supposes the omission of the latter לָּךְ. — M.]

5 CHAP. II. 1. — בְּמִקְוֵי אֲשֶׁר. We might be inclined to render: in the place of [its being said]; the usage of the expression elsewhere is however too clearly opposed (comp. Lev. iv. 24-28; xiv. 13; Jer. xxii. 12; Ezek. xxi. 35; Neh. iv. 14). But בְּמִקְוֵי with the subject following is perhaps — instead of, in Is. xxxiii. 21.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Superscription. It has been shown already in the Introduction (§ 1) that the chronological limits assigned in the title must be admitted to be essentially correct. Difficulties have been suggested to the minds of some from the circumstance that when the duration of Hosea's ministry is given, it is, in the first line, placed in relation to the reigns of Judah, and that a king of Israel is mentioned only in the second line. To argue from this, however, that Hosea belonged to the kingdom of Judah, is inadmissible; for as we saw in the Introduction, all other evidence goes to prove that he was a resident of the Northern Kingdom.

But a further difficulty is felt. Only one king of Israel is named, whom Hosea long survived, and the succession of Judaic kings brings down the life of the prophet far beyond the time of that single monarch, Jeroboam II. Hence it is alleged that the second part of the superscription does not agree with the first.

Keil seeks to solve this difficulty by assuming that the Prophet acknowledged only the legitimate rulers of the kingdom of Judah as the real kings of the people of God; and that he defined the limits of his ministry according to the real succession of that kingdom. He introduces along with the names of those kings, that of the Israelitish monarch, under whom he began his prophetic course, not only to indicate that occasion more definitely, but chiefly on account of the significant position occupied by Jeroboam in the kingdom of the Ten Tribes. He was the last king through whom God vouchsafed any aid to that state. The succeeding rulers scarcely deserved the title of king.

But this explanation, brought forward in order to defend the originality of the superscription, can scarcely be acquitted of the charge of arbitrariness. (The precedence assigned to the Judaic kings would be better explained on the hypothesis that Hosea, at a later period, took up his residence in Judah and there composed his book.) Ewald, who, to be sure, does not admit in its full extent the correctness of the chronological statements of the superscription, supposes that the allusion to the kings of Judah was added by the latter hand (which also inserted Is. i. 1), while the remainder is the old original superscription, which, however, he thinks belonged at first only to chaps. i., ii.

The question, whether the superscription in its present form is quite original, must be allowed to remain undecided.

[As serving however to defend the genuineness of the superscription, comp. with the view of Keil adduced above, the following full and forcible presentation of the probable design of the prophet in its insertion given by Hengstenberg in his Christology: "Hosea mentions, first and completely, the kings of the legitimate family. He then further adds the name of one of the rulers of the Kingdom of Israel, under whom his ministry began, because it was of importance to fix precisely the time of its commencement. Uzziah, the first of the series of the kings of Judah mentioned by him, survived Jeroboam nearly twenty-six years. Now, had the latter not been mentioned along with him, the thought might easily have suggested itself, that it was only in the latter period of Uzziah's reign that the prophet entered upon his office; in which case all that he says about the overthrow of Jeroboam's family, would have appeared to be a vaticinium post eventum, inasmuch as it took place very soon after Jeroboam's death. The same applies to what is said by him regarding the total decay of the kingdom which was so flourishing under Jeroboam; for, from the moment of Jeroboam's death, it hastened with rapid strides toward destruction. If, therefore, it was to be seen that future things lie open to God and his servants 'before they spring forth' (Is. xlii. 9), it was necessary that the commencement of the Prophet's ministry should be the more accurately determined; and this is effected by the intimation that it took place within the period of the fourteen years during which Uzziah and Jeroboam reigned contemporaneously.¹ That this is the main reason for mentioning Jeroboam's name is seen from the relation of ver. 2 to ver. 1. The remark made in ver. 2, that Hosea received the subsequent revelation at the very beginning of his prophetic ministry, corresponds with the mention of Jeroboam's name in ver. 1. But this is not all. . . . There was a considerable difference between him and the subsequent kings. Cocceius remarks very strikingly: 'The other kings of Israel are not viewed as kings but as robbers.' Jeroboam possessed a quasi legitimacy. The house of Jehu to which he belonged, had opposed the extreme of religious apostasy. It was to a certain degree recognized even by the Prophets. Jeroboam had obtained the throne not by usurpation but by birth. He was the last king by whom the Lord sent deliverance to the Ten Tribes; comp. 2 Kings xiv. 27."

The English commentators hold to the originality of the superscription, with the exception of Noyes, who speaks of it as "doubtful." The arguments which establish it are mainly these: (1.) The very fact of its existence in its present form from the earliest known period. (2.) The analogy of other prophetic books as well as of many other portions of the Old Testament, the genuineness of whose superscriptions has never been successfully impugned either by German critics or their English followers. (3.) The improbability of any other hypothesis. Any "redactor" (Ewald and others) could have had no reason to insert such a peculiar title. Its anomalous character shows it to have been the work of the author himself. Any other would either have made no allusion to the kings of Israel, or would have given a complete list of the contemporary ones. There is a purpose manifest here which a collector would not have conceived, and which it was beyond his province to convey to the world by embodying it in an addition to his author's writings. (4.) The exact correspondence between the character of the superscription, the contents of the book, and the position of the author, as partly shown above, and as might be further proved abundantly.

The superscription therefore is original, and original in its present form. As to the place of its composition there is no improbability in the opinion, mentioned by Schmoller above, that with the rest of the book it was composed in Judah. But this cannot explain, as he supposes, the anomalies of the superscription. It only increases the difficulties. Why was an Israelitish king mentioned at all? This question remains unanswered, while the old difficulty of the non-allusion to succeeding kings of Israel remains in all its force. The true solution must therefore be sought not in any local conditions of the Prophet, but in his necessary relations as a Prophet of God to the two kingdoms, as determined by their respective characters, and in his desire to assign definitely the limits of his ministry. — M.]

A. Vers. 2-9. The Prophet announces symbolically to the Kingdom of Israel that it will be rejected on account of its Whoredom."

Vers. 2, 3. In the beginning of Jehovah's speaking with Hosea . . . and bare him a son — וַיִּבְרָא, literally, in Hosea, that is, into Hosea. The simple translation in, as expressive of an inner revelation which he received, is excluded even by the usage of the language (comp. Zech. i. 9, 14); as also is the explanation: by Hosea. This "into," however, must not be modified into simple "to him." This would have been — אֵלָיו. וְ evidently expresses here a closer, personal relation into which the speaker enters with another person, while אֵלָיו, "to," merely indicates the direction of the discourse. It therefore betokens an energy of speaking, probably also in connection with a certain continuity; answering best to our "speaking with" (comp. besides the passages cited above, also Num. xii. 6, 8; Hab. ii. 1). The whole clause, וַיִּבְרָא, could be regarded as a kind of superscription = The beginning of that which Jehovah spoke with Hosea. The discourse would then begin with וַיִּתְּקֶר. But it is preferable to attach the whole clause, as a specification of time, to the following וַיִּתְּקֶר, and to take וַיִּתְּקֶר, which is therefore = in the beginning, as an accusative of time: In the beginning, when Jehovah spoke. The sense would be: When Jehovah began to speak with Hosea, then, etc. [For the internal structure of the clause, see the first Grammatical Note. — J. F. M.] This means that God has begun his revelation to the Prophet with the command immediately following; in other words, that the prophet must enter upon active duty with the following testimony against the spiritual adultery of the kingdom of Israel: Go take to thee a wife of whoredom and children of whoredom.

¹ [This will show the groundlessness of the opinion of Noyes, that "from the contents of the book it is probable that he did not exercise his office until after the death of

"Wife of whoredom:" וְנָשִׁים occurs only in the plural, expressing a plurality of acts. — וְנָשִׁים, a woman whose element is whoredom, with whom the וְנָשִׁים is a thing not merely incidental. From this designation, as applied to the woman it is evident that it was just in her marriage with the prophet that she would show herself to be an וְנָשִׁים, and would thereby become an adulteress (though naturally this does not exclude the idea that the Prophet begets children by her). The truth to be represented demands this view of the case. For it is Israel married to Jehovah that commits whoredom.

But who are the וְנָשִׁים? "Children" mentioned along with the "wife," naturally make the latter appear to be the mother. But they cannot be called children of whoredom simply for the reason that their mother is an וְנָשִׁים. They can have that designation only because they themselves stand essentially connected with וְנָשִׁים. But in what relation? It is readily suggested: "they are related to it as its results = they are the fruit of the וְנָשִׁים, of the mother, are born of the mother in consequence of her unchastity, are of illegitimate birth." But, according to this explanation, the genitive would have a sense different from that which it has in the former connection, and this creates a difficulty. If a woman, who practices lewdness and is in fact wholly given up to it, is called וְנָשִׁים, it is most natural to assume that the construction exactly similar and immediately following should be understood in like manner to express action and disposition. וְנָשִׁים therefore = children who act and are disposed like their mother, children of the same character as their mother. And this must be admitted to be the correct explanation when it is remembered what is to be represented by the woman and her children, namely, Israel conceived of as the mother of a people, and its children. And the fact which is to be established with regard to Israel and its children is, that they all practice whoredom; comp. the explanatory clause, כִּי יִרְוּהָ הָעַמִּים. It is not said that the children are of adulterous origin, but that the whole people — the people as a whole and in their individual members, or, according to the Hebrew personifying mode of conception, the mother and her children, commit lewdness. "Go, take to thee:" לֵךְ וְנָשִׁים is, according to the constant Hebrew usage, equivalent to our phrase, "to take a wife," i. e., to take a woman to be a wife, to marry. And וְנָשִׁים (ver. 3), which expresses the fulfillment of the command given with וְנָשִׁים, has certainly no other sense. In our verse, another object, still, וְנָשִׁים, is joined to וְנָשִׁים. This is done by zeugma, in the sense: Accipe tibi uxorem et suscipe ex ea filios scortationum. He is, accordingly, to ally himself with an unchaste wife, and the children which he begets with her are to be like their mother. This is just the position of Israel. Israel, Jehovah's spouse, committed lewdness, and the children, who belonged both to Jehovah and to her, acted just as their mother did. Wife and children grieved equally the Husband and Father. The reference here is therefore not to children which the woman is supposed to have had before her marriage with the Prophet. The force of the painful experience of grief over his own children, through which the Prophet was to pass, would then be lost. By these children of whoredom we are not to understand directly just the three children mentioned afterwards, for the expression is a general one, but they do certainly fall under this category, and it is only they who are named.

The command which the Prophet receives is supported by the words: for the whole land is whoring, whoring away from Jehovah (falling away from Jehovah). וְנָשִׁים: evidently a metaphorical expression here designating apostasy from Jehovah to idolatry, according to the conception of Israel's relation to Jehovah as that of a marriage. He who serves idols accordingly commits whoredom and breaks the marriage vow, is unfaithful to a lawful spouse, because surrendering himself to a stranger, with whom no marriage relation can exist. This notion of infidelity is further indicated expressly by the addition: וְנָשִׁים is a significant composite preposition, which expresses not merely absence from Jehovah, but conveys the notion that a relation, the direct opposite of וְנָשִׁים, has been entered into, and therefore expresses forcibly a position of infidelity, of a discontinuance of fidelity. On this notion of וְנָשִׁים in a spiritual sense, see the Doctrinal Section. As וְנָשִׁים expressed the intensity of the apostasy, so וְנָשִׁים expresses forcibly its extent. As the sequel shows, it is the inhabitants of the kingdom of Israel who are meant. This whole sentence gives the ground of the command which the Prophet receives to take a wife of whoredom. He is to take a wife who commits bodily unchastity because the whole land commits whoredom spiritually. Why? The most natural answer is: In order to hold up to the people a mirror in which they might behold their guilt, and thus to bring to their consciousness more surely and powerfully than could be done by mere didactic discourse, how greatly they, by their idolatry, had sinned against their God, and dishonored Him. God would thus be represented as standing in a position which would hardly be imputed to a man, namely, that of living in marriage with a woman given up to adultery; or that such a relation would be as dishonoring to God as marriage with a whorish woman would be to a prophet. But the taking of this wife had, besides, the express purpose of begetting children with her, who by their names should announce to Israel the punishment incurred by its guilt. For to the people (represented, by the woman and her 'לְדֹי' was to be presented the consequence of their whoredom, and it was to be brought to their consciousness what punishments their rightful husband, Jehovah, would inflict as the consequences of their infidelity.

The children, as 'לְדֹי' represent the children of Israel in their guilt, but, at the same time, by their names, the punishment thereby entailed, and as those names, significant of punishment, are affixed to those who represent the guilt, the fact is expressed that the punishment is directly consequent upon the guilt.

It is clearly incorrect to lay stress upon 'לְדֹי' and the alliance of the Prophet with the woman, by itself considered, and so give to the thought a positive turn: that, by the Prophet's marriage with a lewd woman, and by the announcement of its results and by the names of the children, it was intended to be illustrated how Jehovah entered into a marriage with the faithless nation of Israel through Hosea, and that the children and the consequences of such marriage would represent severe chastisements from the hand of love (Löwe). This notion is imported into the sentence. In so far as it is correct, it belongs to chap. iii. and not here. But of an alliance being entered into between Jehovah and the disloyal people, there is nothing said even there, simply because Jehovah had, on his part, entered into such a marriage with the people long before. To infer from the fact of the Prophet's marriage that God entered into the same alliance would be a false application of the image. The Prophet cannot be conceived of as standing already in that relation. He must contract this marriage in order to symbolize Jehovah's marriage with the people already existing. It would be just as baseless, however, to infer from this marriage contracted by Hosea with the woman, that the original covenant between God and his people at Sinai is to be represented; that God had concluded the alliance with the people as with a pure virgin, and that they became unchaste after they came under the covenant; that therefore also 'לְדֹי' is not a woman who has already practiced lewdness, but that an undefiled virgin is to be understood, of whom, however, it was foreseen that she would become unfaithful and bear children of adultery. Apart from the emphasis placed upon the words 'לְדֹי', this view is seen to stand in direct contradiction to the causal sentence: "for the land," etc. Because the land commits whoredom must the prophet take a maiden who will become unchaste? No. "The marriage which the prophet was to contract was simply intended to symbolize the relation already existing between Jehovah and Israel, and not the way in which it had come into existence. The wife does not represent the nation of Israel in its virgin state, when the covenant was being concluded at Sinai, but the nation of the Ten Tribes in its relation to Jehovah at the period of the prophet, when that kingdom, considered as a whole, had become a wife of whoredom, and in its several members resembled children of whoredom." (Keil.)

Ver. 3. Took Gomer, a daughter of Diblaim.

The command is obeyed without delay. 'לְדֹי' occurs elsewhere only as the name of a nation: Gen.

x. 2, 3; Ezek. xxxviii. 6. If the name be taken here symbolically, the derivation from 'לְדֹי' might afford the signification, "completion," i. e., not annihilation, utter ruin; but, completion of whoredom = completed whoredom (so already Aben Ezra, Jerome). According to Fürst it is also possible to explain, "fire-glow," literally, a being consumed with passion. 'לְדֹי' occurs only as a proper name. In attempts to interpret it, it is usually explained as = 'לְדֹי', fig-cakes (so already Jerome), in which an allusion is perceived to chap. iii. ver. 1, where raisin-cakes appear as an image of that idolatry which ministers to sensuality. "Daughter of fig-cakes" would then = loving fig-cakes, or more generally, delicia dedita. The identification of 'לְדֹי' and 'לְדֹי' has its difficulties, however. Fürst supposes that the root 'לְדֹי', besides the sense, press together, from which we have 'לְדֹי', fig-cake, has also the signification, enclose, and thus gains the meaning, embracing (strictly, as in the dual form: double-embracing, copulation), therefore: daughter of embraces. And this would naturally mean, not the fruit of such embraces, but (as in the other explanation, expressing a connection or intercourse), abandoned to embraces, complexibus dedita. The interpretation of these names is accordingly attended with difficulties. For we cannot say that in themselves they necessarily demand such an explanation, at least so far as our knowledge of the Hebrew language permits us to judge. But it cannot be adduced against the admissibility of such interpretation that the names are not elucidated for us as are those in vers. 4 ff. "This may be simply explained from the circumstance that the name was not given to the woman, but that she had it already when the prophet married her" (Keil). If the names have really these meanings, it is clear that a woman designated, "consummata in scortatione, complexibus dedita," would be a striking picture of Israel, uttering a severe rebuke.

[Henderson, holding the literal interpretation of the narrative, maintains that there is no need of assuming any symbolical meaning whatever for these names. On the other hand, if the narrative be not the record of actual occurrences, the necessity of a symbolical interpretation of the names is manifest. Most of the English expositors who note the names show a general agreement with the explanations: completed whoredom, and: given up to dainties. — J. F. M.]

And she conceived and bore to him a son. The taking of the wife had evidently in view the birth of children. That the woman conceived by the prophet, and that the son is to be regarded as his, is clear even from the simple connection of the words, but is placed beyond question by the express addition: bore to him. The opinion that the children were illegitimate, has arisen only from the false assumption, at variance with the context, that the woman must have formerly been a virgin; for the designation, 'לְדֹי', must then be justified, and if she were not such before marriage, she must have become unchaste after it.

Vers. 4, 5. Then the Lord said to him: Call his name Jezreel — in the valley of Jezreel. The names of the children were to be significant, in view of the announcement of punishment, and must therefore be determined by God. That of the first child was to be Jezreel. This was to the house of Jehu a nomen cum omine, on account of the significant connection of the "plain of Jezreel" with that family. It should remind them of that place and of that which occurred there. It cried out to them according to the meaning of the word, "God will disperse," and thus threatened punishment for what was there transacted; and also, according to what follows, presented to their fears the "plain of Jezreel" as the place where the punishment should be inflicted. Blood-guiltiness of Jezreel. Jehu had, by one fearful massacre, exterminated the whole house of Ahab in the city of Jezreel (2 Kings ix. 30; x. 17). This city was situated in the plain of Jezreel, which lay in the well-known Valley of Kishon. Now there appears this difficulty: Jehu did this at the express command of God through Elisha (2 Kings ix. 1 ff.), and the deed was afterwards commended by God (x. 30), and yet it is to be avenged as murder upon Jehu's house. It might be said that in the mind of the author of the books of the Kings, and in that of the prophet, there were different views with regard to the violent overthrow of Ahab's house. But the prophet also could regard the overthrow of a family like that of Ahab only as a merited judgment of God, and hold the same view with reference to the extension of the massacre to Ahaziah of Judah and his brethren, by reason of their connection with the house of Ahab. The correct solution may be seen in the words of Keil: "The apparent contradiction is resolved simply by distinguishing between the act itself and the motive by which Jehu was instigated. Regarded in itself, as a fulfillment of the command of God, the extermination of Ahab's family was an act for which Jehu could not be held criminal." But the motive which actuated Jehu was not at all the desire to fulfill the will of the Lord; for, even if he did not use the command of God as a cover for his own selfish and ambitious feelings, he did yet in no way enter into the intention of the Divine injunction. God desired that the kingdom of Israel should be cleansed from idolatry by the extermination of the house of Ahab and the elevation of a new dynasty. In that purpose lay the justification of the deed, which was to be simply a judgment of God upon idolatry. But Jehu, though ceasing from the worship of Baal, retained the worship of the calves. He fulfilled God's command indeed, but only went half way. After he had gained the throne, to which God had destined him, he struck out for himself a false path, from a false policy in which he thought it advisable to retain the worship of the calves, and thus rendered God's intentions nugatory. Thus was the bloody deed of Jehu divested of all real value, and thus it entailed a burden of guilt upon him and his house (wherefore also the possession of the throne was promised to him only to the fourth generation). This section of the book shows directly that the idolatry countenanced by Jehu and his house is to be brought into connection with his deed as an act of blood-guiltiness, for "the whoring of the land" is expressly designated as the sin to be punished (ver. 2). Such apostasy from Jehovah (this is the first announcement), is to be punished by the way in which the deed of blood in Israel is regarded and avenged as a sinful act of blood-guiltiness. The ground of the resentment towards that act therefore does not lie in the deed itself, but the punishment is inflicted for something else without which it would not have been incurred. The objection therefore is not just which maintains that this deed cannot be the crowning crime of Jehu and his house. Nor is there any discrepancy between the prophet and the books of the Kings, where all the members of that house are adduced as guilty by not departing from the sin of Jerusalem. [Pusey: "Jehu, by cleaving against the will of God to Jeroboam's sin, which served his own political ends, showed that in the slaughter of his master he acted not as he pretended, out of zeal (2 Kings x. 16) for the will of God, but served his own will and his own ambition only. By his disobedience to the one command of God he showed that he would equally have disobeyed the other, had it been contrary to his own will or interest. He had no principle of obedience. And so the blood which was shed according to the righteous judgment of God, became sin to him who shed it in order to fulfill not the will of God but his own. Thus God said to Baasha: 'I exalted thee out of the dust and made thee prince over my people Israel,' which he became by slaying his master the son of Jeroboam and all the house of Jeroboam (1 Kings xvi. 2). Yet because he followed the sins of Jeroboam, 'the word of the Lord came against Baasha for all the evil that he did in the sight of the Lord in being like the house of Jeroboam, and because he killed him' (ver. 7). The two courses of action were inconsistent: to destroy the son and the house of Jeroboam; and to do those things for which God condemned him to be destroyed. Further yet; not only was such execution of God's judgments itself an offense against Almighty God, but it was sin, whereby he condemned himself, and made his other sins to be sins against the light. In executing the judgment of God against another, he pronounced his judgment against himself, in that he that judged, in God's stead, did the same things (Rom. ii. 1)."] M.]

Will visit: alluding to extermination which corresponds to the act of Jehu. It followed not long after the death of Jeroboam II. in the murder of his son through the conspiracy of Shallum (2 Kings xv. 8 ff.). But the threatening goes further: will utterly destroy the kingdom of the house of Israel. "House of Israel" here designates the kingdom of Israel in a special sense, the kingdom of the Ten Tribes, as distinguished from the house of Jehu (ver. 7). The kingly office in general should cease in the kingdom of Israel, and that would naturally be a cessation of the kingdom itself. But this was connected with the fall of the house of Jehu, because, in consequence of that event, a state of the wildest anarchy ensued, so that only one king, Menahem, had a son for successor, the rest being all overthrown and slain by conspirators. The fall of that house was therefore "the beginning of the end, the beginning of the process of rejection" (Hengstenberg).

Ver. 5. And it happens in that day, that I break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel. "That day" is the day on which the destruction of the kingdom takes place. "Bow of Israel" "by synecdoche for the military force on which the strength of the kingdom and consequently its existence rested" (Keil). The valley of Jezreel is the plain in which the city Jezreel lay, in the Apocrypha and Josephus: τὸ μέγα πεδῖον Εσδραίων, or simply: τὸ μέγα πεδῖον. There the threat was to be fulfilled, because it was there that the bloody deed was committed. It was, moreover, the natural battle-field of the northern kingdom (comp. Judges iv 5; vi. 33). Israel forms here an unmistakable paronomasia with Jezreel. The words, and especially also the mention of a locality, point clearly to a battle, here an overthrow, by which the before-named destruction of the kingdom should be effected, and thus in this sentence not only is the punishment indicated, but the mode of its infliction stated. The enemy who should effect this annihilation of the kingdom is not yet indicated. No definite enemy is named before the second part of the book where Assyria is brought forward. (It is not mentioned in the books of the Kings where Assyria dealt this blow.)

Vers. 6, 7. And she conceived again and bore a daughter, — by horses and riders. The second child is a daughter who receives the sym-bolical name: לֹא רַחֲמָהּ [See Gram. Note]. That the second child should be a daughter is not a voucher for the necessity of the literal view, but is grounded in the inner connection between the female sex and compassion. The announcement that there was no more compassion, becomes so much the more emphatic as the representative of the nation which was not to find compassion was a daughter. For the "female sex finds more compassion than the male," and yet there is no compassion to be found. That must be a sad case indeed! The explanation is incorrect which supposes that the daughter signifies a more degenerate race (e. g., Jerome). For I will no longer have any compassion. An explanation, telling what the name of the daughter implies, namely, the exhaustion of Divine compassion. The kingdom owed its preservation in the midst of the prevailing idolatry only to the undeserved compassion of God. [On the rest of ver. 6, see Gram. Note.]

Ver. 7. But I will have compassion on the house of Judah. A keen reproach for the house of Israel; if they were like the house of Judah, they too would find compassion; but they are not so; they live only by the compassion of Jehovah as is plain from the words. Why Judah finds favor, and Israel does not, is indicated in the words that follow, in the peculiarly emphatic expression: I will deliver them through Jehovah their God (comp. Gen. xix. 24). Here allusion is made to the connection in which Judah stands with Jehovah, while it contains, at least by implication, the thought that Judah owes its deliverance directly to the fact that it acknowledges Jehovah to be its God, and not, as is further said, to its military force, while Israel on the contrary, trusting in its military strength instead of in Jehovah who is its God no longer, shall for that very reason, and in spite of its warlike resources, utterly perish. By war is an unexpected expression as occurring along with the other words; but it naturally means not: by weapons of war, but obviously: by waging war. The bow and the sword are named as the weapons, and the words: by war, show more definitely that the employment of those weapons is meant. Horses and riders, according to a familiar mode of expression, indicate the force which completed the military strength in which so much pride was taken. The occurrence of these words at the close is specially emphatic. When Jehovah delivers, He needs no weapons of war, no horses or riders, nor can these give any help without Him.

Vers. 8, 9. And she weaned Lo-Ruhamah, will not be yours. The weaning and the conception are to be taken together, that is, as soon as she had weaned, she again conceived, in order to indicate the continuity of the announcement of evil. There is no interruption until the end of the rejection. [Henderson: "The mention of the weaning of Lo-Ruhamah seems designed rather to fill up the narrative than to describe figuratively any distinct treatment of the Israelites." J. F. M.]. Not my people: thus should the people in the kingdom of Israel be designated. The covenant relation between God and his people is to be completely dissolved. לֹא רַחֲמָהּ לָךְ = I will not belong to you [see Gramm. Note]. On the relation of the three threatenings to one another, see the Doctrinal Section (2). On the whole narrative see Introd. § 3:

B. Chap. ii. 1-3. And yet Israel shall be accepted again.

Immediately upon the announcement of the judgment extending even to the complete rejection of the kingdom of Israel, follows, to the surprise of the reader, an announcement of deliverance. The verses, in distinction from the Hebrew arrangement, should form one section with chap. i. The arrangement by which vers. 1 and 2 are joined to chap. i., and a new chapter begun with ver. 3, as is done by the LXX. and Jerome, and after them by Luther, is more incorrect still.

Chap. ii. 1. And the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, — children of the living God. The promise in ver. 1 a, agrees almost verbatim with the promise of Gen. xxii. 17 and xxxii. 13, an agreement which is designed. The rejection of the Ten Tribes just announced forms a strong contrast to the promise there made to the patriarch with regard to the boundless increase of his posterity. Now if the promise is firmly believed one might have doubts of the rejection, or if the threatening of the Prophet were to be accepted one might feel that he had mistaken the promise. Hence the Prophet goes back directly to that promise, and shows how the promise is in no way annulled by the threatening, but that the latter agrees well with the former, which will certainly reach its fulfillment. (Comp. also the reference to that promise in Is. x. 22, in opposition to false security, and in Jer. xxxiii. 22). The promise given to the fathers is just the pledge that a time of deliverance will come again! The announcement of deliverance in ver. 1 ff. is rooted in that promise. Thus the words are strictly to be regarded as a citation = and yet what was promised will come true, that, etc., כִּי יִשְׂרָאֵל is therefore naturally to be understood of the people of Israel generally (against Keil). For the promise is made with reference to the whole people, and in ver. 2 mention is made expressly of a union between those who had been divided. But that enlargement of the whole body cannot take place with the return of those whose rejection is now announced. Hence the second member of the verse turns to them. For those who are here called "not my people" are naturally identical with those referred to in chap. i. 9. In the place in which it is said to them, etc. There is no need of inquiring what place is meant, whether Palestine or the Land of Exile. The expression has rather the more general sense: "Just as it has been said — so will it now rather be said," etc. The one will answer exactly to the other. Children of the living God. Instead of simply: my people, or, people of God, which would be expected at first, we have here a much stronger expression. יִשְׂרָאֵל naturally in opposition to dead idols, whose service brings the people to ruin. They are not merely a people of God, but his chil dren: they shall have in Him not merely a God but a Father (see below in the Doctrinal Section). There is no allusion here to the moral ground of this gracious acceptance, and such a notion must not be introduced. For to the darkness of the first part (chap. i.) the light is here contrasted quite abruptly and in a way quite unprovided for. The connecting link is not found before the more profound exhibition of the subject in chap. ii. It is understood, of course, that only a remnant is to meet with compassion, but it is not here expressed.

Vers. 2, 3. And the children of Judah and the children of Israel are gathered together — Ruhamah. The acceptance of the rejected ones by God will be followed by a reunion of those who had been separated (inwardly as well as outwardly — on the one side belief in God, on the other idolatry). Comp. Jer. i. 4, which rests upon our passage, and iii. 18, and still more fully Ezek. xxxvii. 15 ff. The children of Israel, by being contrasted with the children of Judah, receive here their more restricted and special meaning, as belonging to the Ten Tribes. The words: appoint for themselves one head, denoting one common king, express this union still more definitely (comp. chap. iii. 5; Ezek. xxxiv. 24; xxxvii. 24). And go up out of the land. These words are difficult. "The land" is, according to most, the land of Exile, and a return from it would therefore be expressed. It is certain that the Prophet does not in our section predict a leading away into exile; for "the place," etc., in ver. 1 is not necessarily to be understood of a foreign land. Yet the remark of Reinke is not incorrect: When it is said of Israel that they are no more a people of God, and will no more receive compassion, the fact is presupposed that they could remain no longer in the Holy Land which they had received as God's people and had retained through his mercy. Already in Lev. xxvi. and Deut. xxviii. banishment into an enemy's country was threatened to the people as the punishment of obdurate apostasy. It may be objected, however, that by this explanation, the Prophet would seem to have presupposed an exile of Judah, while he says absolutely nothing of it, but, on the contrary, distinguishes in chap. i. 7, Judah from Israel. Difficulty is felt further in the indefinite expression: עֲלֶה מִן הָאָרֶץ, which gives no hint of a land of exile. Reinke, however, as after him Keil, gives this explanation: The prophet refers to Ex. i. 10 and borrows the expression from that passage, a supposition put beyond doubt by chap. ii. 16, 17, where the re-acceptance of Israel is represented as a leading through the wilderness to Canaan, and a parallel is drawn to the leading forth out of Egypt, as in chaps. viii. 13; ix. 3, the carrying into Exile is described as a carrying into Egypt (comp. also already Deut. xxviii. 68). Egypt was thus a type of the heathen world, over which Israel was to be dispersed; the deliverance from Egypt a type and earnest of deliverance from captivity and dispersion among the heathen. Well: but would עֲלֶה מִן הָאָרֶץ, an altogether general expression, intelligible in itself, have been a strictly technical term for "going up out of Egypt"? And upon the single passage, Ex. i. 10, in which, moreover, no allusion is really made to a withdrawal from Egypt as from a land of captivity, but Pharaoh only speaks of a departure of the Israelites from it, could such a linguistic usage have been based, that עֲלֶה מִן הָאָרֶץ would have been understood correctly without any explanation? No other passages occur upon which such a usage could have been founded, and none in which it actually occurs. In chap. ii. 15, e. g., "Egypt" is expressly mentioned. No matter how much, therefore, may be said for this explanation as being actually correct, it cannot be approved unconditionally. Others therefore understand "the land," simply of Palestine. "Going up out of the land," is thus viewed either as a marching up to Jerusalem (Simson), and to this the context gives much support, especially in the reference to the reunion of Israel and Judah under one head (David). This would imply that Jerusalem would become again the common central point of the nation. But to this also objection may be made (in another direction) to the too general expression עֲלֶה מִן הָאָרֶץ. The terminus a quo would then be quite irrelevant. Why then mention this terminus a quo, and omit the terminus ad quem — to Jerusalem (Zion), which is the important point?

Hence עֲלֶה מִן הָאָרֶץ is regarded by others as a marching forth to victory (Ewald), as David did. The comparison with Mic. ii. 14 f. is certainly a fitting one. The preceding words, about their marshalling, and uniting and appointing one head, also suit this view well; one is led to think in this of a rising up to vigorous action (because viribus unitis). This explanation demands the mention of the place whither this עֲלֶה was to be directed less than the others. But perhaps it is indicated in the following still more obscure sentence: for great is the day of Jezreel. This naturally refers back to chap. i. 4, 5. But there Jezreel was the place of overthrow of divine judgment. Keil supposes the same thing is meant here also, that that day of defeat was great, i. e. decisive, glorious, because it formed the critical occasion by which the return of the recreant and their reunion with Judah were rendered possible! Others think of the appellative meaning of the name Jezreel, which certainly appears in chap. ii. 24, 25: God sows. This use of the term is supposed to express the notion that the Valley of Jezreel, in consequence of the overthrow there suffered, becomes a place where God sows the seed of the people's renovation. Keil also admits this as a secondary allusion. But to understand by יִזְרְעֵאל, that day of disaster, and to suppose that a day of defeat is called great on account of its good remote results, is a far-fetched notion. Here in chap. ii. 1, 2, in the announcement of deliverance, we find ourselves upon other ground than that of chap. i. 4 ff. What is here praised as great, is not and cannot be the same as that which in chap. i. is announced as punishment, but must be something of an opposite character. But if we leave out of view that day of battle, we have left only the vague notion: time of God's sowing, i. e., when God plants as He had before rooted out, i. e., the time of reacceptance; and such a time is designated as great by גָּדוֹל. But our sentence cannot be supposed to give utterance to such a general thought. The confirmatory כִּי does not suit such a view; for יִזְרְעֵאל alludes too definitely (as Keil has perceived correctly) to chap. i. 4, and therefore refers to a definite event; only not the same event, but one which is its counterpart. The sense evidently is this, that there where Israel was overthrown, and its bow broken, a victory will yet be achieved: thither will the children of Israel and Judah gather themselves together under one king, marching up out of the country. And still the appellative significance of Jezreel may be retained; for by this victory God makes a new sowing or planting. Thus, as the threatening is connected with the names of the children, chap. i. 4 ff., so also is the promise: in the first name without any modification, in the other two by the change into their opposite by the omission of the N. [The English expositors usually take the reference to be primarily to the return from the Babylonian captivity. Some of them (of whom Cowles is the latest) refer the fulfillment only to the consequences of the reign of Messiah, the "Head" chosen not only by the united children of Israel and Judah but also by the world. Henderson, denying any multiple sense in prophecy, interprets the "head" to be Zerubbabel, "because the Messiah, whom most suppose to be intended, is nowhere spoken of as appointed by men, but always as the choice and appointment of God." But (1) it is not said that they will appoint their leader to be the Messiah. That is of course God's appointment. (2.) The Messiah thus appointed must necessarily be the chosen leader of his people. It is the service of a "willing people" in which they engage. Even God always offers Himself to his people as their king. They are to choose whom they will serve. This argument is evidently only the plea of one who has a theory to uphold. As to the main application of these verses, it is probably best to regard its promise as partially and but to a very small degree fulfilled in the case of those out of the Ten Tribes who returned to Jerusalem after the Exile, and to be constantly undergoing its fulfillment in the increase of the true Israel until the "great multitude which no man could number of all nations" (the 144,000, the mystical number of those sealed of the twelve tribes of Israel), shall be completed. That the Messianic application is almost exclusively the true one is evident both from the grand comprehensiveness of the promise, and from the paucity of evidence as to subsequent reunion to any extent of the representatives of the two kingdoms. — M.]

Ver. 3. — Say to your brethren, Ammi, and to your sisters, Ruhamah. According to some the children of the Prophet are addressed. Those who had first called out to the people by their own names: Not-my-people! and Unfavored! are now to call out to them the opposite, the son to his brethren, the daughter to her sisters, that is, to the rest of the Israelites. According to others, it is the people who obtain mercy that are addressed, whose members are to salute one another with the new name bestowed on them by God (Hengstenberg, Keil, Umbreit). The latter is to be preferred. For the verse is naturally connected with the close of ver. 2, and it should therefore present the rejoicing shouts of the victors. Their victory is to them a pledge of their acceptance by God, which is to be celebrated by these joyful shouts, according to the requirement of the Prophet, or rather of God through him.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. One of the most profound conceptions of the Old Testament is that which regards the covenant relation between Jehovah and Israel as a marriage. As a consequence, Israel's idolatry and apostasy from God appear as whoredom or adultery; for idols are paramours as contrasted with Jehovah the husband.

The fundamental elements of this conception are found as early as in the Pentateuch: Ex. xxxiv. 14, 15; Lev. xvii. 7; xx. 5, 6; Num. xiv. 33; (xv. 39); Deut. xxxi. 16; xxxii. 16, 21. Ex. xxxiv. 14, 15 must be regarded as the most important and the fundamental passage.

Other passages are Judges ii. 17; viii. 33; 1 Kings xiv. 24; xv. 12; xxii. 47; 2 Kings ix. 22; xxiii. 7; 1 Chron. vi. 25; 2 Chron. xxi. 11, 13. Further in the Psalms (if we leave Ps. xlv. out of the question); Ps. lxxiii. 27; cvi. 39.

Such passages of later time, as those from Chronicles, naturally presuppose the prophetic development of this doctrine. This is found first in our Prophet, who has made that conception the fundamental idea of his discourses, in some of which it is directly discussed, while it permeates others as an essential principle (e. g., in chap. xi.). On the ground of these discourses it is more fully presented by Jeremiah (especially chaps. iii.; v. 7; xlii. 27, etc.), and Ezekiel (chaps. xvi.—xxiii.). It is only hinted at in Isaiah (chaps. i. 21; liv. 5; lvii. 3; lxii. 5). It is not met with in the other prophets. For Nahum iii. 4 ff. does not belong here (although the expressions show allusions to our prophet). Nor does Isa. xxiii. 16 ff.; for there it is not idolatry that is represented by the whoredom of Nineveh and Tyre. In addition, on the positive side, namely, the love of Jehovah to Israel, we must name the Song of Solomon, which bears besides, unmistakable allusions to our Prophet. In the New Testament this conception returns, naturally modified in form, in the description of the great Whore, Rev. xvii. ff. (embracing, at the same time, the ideas that are found in the last-named passages concerning great and commercial cities). But the positive notion of a marriage of Jehovah to his people is found again in a New Testament form in Eph. v. 22 ff., though there in an inverted order; for an actual marriage is first taken, and a parallel is then drawn between it and the relation of Christ to the Church.

For the meaning and significance of this whole conception of Jehovah's relation to his people, our Prophet is, according to the above remarks, the best commentator in all his writings, and especially in chap. ii. See therefore the remarks upon that chapter.

2. "God will not be mocked" is the truth which the writings of the Prophet, written in letters of flame, bear upon their front in the announcement of the destroying judgments which God must and will inflict upon his apostate people. The mode of this announcement in our chapter through the three children with symbolical names, is full of instruction. The very fact that they represent the apostate children of Israel and declare by their names the punishment for this apostasy, sets forth unmistakably the close connection between sin and guilt, namely, that punishment is, so to speak, attached to sin. And the sudden appearance of the three children without any interval expresses evidently the certainty and unavoidableness of the infliction of the divine judgment. The three symbolic names, moreover, were given for the purpose of intensifying and emphasizing the announcement of the judgment. If the first name simply presages the fact of a retribution by an overwhelming judgment, the second unveils with terrible clearness its ground in the divine nature: it is that they shall no more find compassion, that God has turned away from them. And the result of all this is that the nation ceases to be a people of God. Thus the whole significance of this judgment is exhibited. Destruction, the cessation of mercy, might be felt by any other people or kingdom; but with the people of God its influence was different, it was to them the loss of its special prerogative. Such a judgment has therefore a significance which is not merely political or social but also theocratic, and must be inflicted with a terrible severity elsewhere unfelt.

But it is most palpably enounced in our chapter how far judgment is from being the end of God's ways toward his people. Immediately after the three strokes of destruction, so to speak, had been dealt, the sun of divine favor breaks forth from the darkest clouds of divine judgment in the brightest splendor of words of deliverance, as three names are again sounded forth each more distinctly than the former. This great transformation is presented without the least preparation, evidently as an enigma, thus exciting the greatest desire for its solution. The connecting link between these two announcements so broadly contrasted; namely, on the side of God, love, in which even his wrath against his faithless people is rooted — if He were indifferent He would not be angry, — and on the side of man, a return to Him in consequence of the chastening of his judgments, is not yet displayed here. This is done by the longer exposition given in the following chapter.

3. A man may be the instrument of God and, by his acts, execute his will, and yet be rejected: so Jehu. Our position is determined by the relation which we inwardly bear to that will, according to the simple truth that God regards the heart, whether we make the desires of God our own and are willing to be nothing but his instruments and to serve Him, or whether we assert and claim a place for our own interests, and thus in truth seek our own will and not the will of God. If we in this seek our own ends, the result is inevitable; our execution of the divine will is impeded and disturbed, if it is not rather only a seeming fulfillment and our labors abortive.

4. The New Testament conception of sonship with God, has as its Old Testament correlative that of a people of God. This places God in a close, unique relation to men. But God appears there as only Lord and King, though bestowing blessings and offering the conditions of life; and man, to whom He thus stands in relation, is not the individual but only the people of God as a whole. Therefore also this government of God has for one of its aims the restoration and preservation of the outward conditions of national existence, including the natural basis of such a community, the land itself. Under the New Covenant there is also a people of God, but the individuals, who constitute the whole, are all regarded as children of God.

But in another direction the Old Testament notion of a people of God tends undeniably towards the New Testament conception of sonship, and thus shows itself to be a germ ever developing with living power as the earnest of its fruit. All Israel appears as a son of God in the significant passage, Ex. xi. 22; comp. further Hos. xi. 1. The Israelites themselves are also called "sons of God," Deut. xiv. 1; xxxii. 19, and here in our chapter. But these are only single whispers, and the grand distinction must not be overlooked, that this expression is applied only to the totality of the people, even when it relates to their great multitude. Moreover our passage is contained in an announcement with regard to the future, and we must hold beyond question that the prophets go beyond the stand-point of the Old Covenant. It is just as Paul declares in Gal. iv. 1 ff. Israel indeed actually held the position of sonship toward God, but ἐφ' ὅσον χρόνον δ κληρον. υἱοῦς ἔστιν οὐδὲν διαφέρει δούλου. Only the incarnation of the Son of God Himself in an individual person could confer the privilege of the relation of individual and personal sonship towards God, the υιοθεσία of individual personality.

5. How is the promise in chap. ii. 1-3 fulfilled? We might at first be inclined to seek the fulfillment in the return of the people from Babylonish Exile. For that event certainly marks the turning-point where God's judgment upon his people reached its end and his favor again shone upon them. But in truth we cannot yet discern the accomplishment of the prophecy in that event. It could hardly be the subject of the promise, inasmuch as the Prophet only speaks and knows here of a judgment upon the Ten Tribes. But if a return from the Assyrian Exile and a consequent reunion with the kingdom of Judah had taken place, we might expect to see in these events a fulfillment of the promise. But such a return and consequent remission of the judgment upon the kingdom of Israel never took place; and the return from the Babylonish Exile affected that kingdom but very slightly, and brought about only to a very small degree a season of deliverance. God's favor returned, indeed, inasmuch as this period was an assurance that God had not utterly rejected his people, and the hope of the fulfillment of the prophetic promises became so much the brighter. But it was not the fulfillment itself. No; to arrive at that we have only to look at our promise a little more closely.

Before the eye of the Prophet there is evidently standing here a picture of a people of Israel, not only innumerable increased and united into one kingdom, but also actually realizing the idea of a people of God ("sons of the living God"). That is, the time which he promises is in his mind directly the "time of fulfillment," which we, upon the ground of other prophecies, since Hosea himself scarcely speaks of the Messiah (not even in chap. iii. 5), must designate the Messianic. Hence we can in no case seek the fulfillment in events which transpired before the advent of the Messiah.

But now the Messiah has come in Jesus of Nazareth. Is this promise of prophecy already fulfilled? Is this picture of the future already realized? If we keep to the words of the Text we must answer, No.

In fact the coming of the Messiah did not bring for Israel, as a whole, the time of deliverance, but on account of its guilt, rather a time of rejection, and the consequence was the infliction of a new and still more complete judgment. It is quite clear also that we cannot find the fulfillment of the present promise in the acceptance of the Messiah by the comparatively few who did accept Him. Must we then say that God did indeed design for the people in the Messiah such blessings as are here promised; but that, since they rejected Him, the promised time will never be theirs? In one respect this is perfectly true. But we cannot rest satisfied with it. The prophetic promise with all its rich fullness of meaning would then simply fall to the ground.

But still more unjustifiable is the assumption that the promise is to be regarded as only suspended for the people of Israel during the time of their obduracy, and to expect its fulfillment in that nation when it shall be converted to the Messiah. For this opinion, though so much favored of late, simply holds mechanically and restrictively to the letter, with a complete misconception of the nature of the Old and New Testament and their mutual relations, and of the higher plane to which divine Revelation rose with Christ, and supposes it possible that Revelation could retreat from the standpoint of the fulfillment to that of the Old Testament preparation, where Israel as a people represented the kingdom of God. It would assume also that allusion was made to the one kingdom only, for the purpose of showing that the distinction between children of Judah and children of Israel was lost by the extinction of the whole kingdom, even of the kingdom of Judah, independently of the consummation of the reunion under one head here promised. And therefore a promise which takes that division for granted and holds out the prospect of its removal and conversion into a higher unity, cannot be regarded as one whose fulfillment (according to the plain sense of the words) is still to be expected; or is that division of the two kingdoms, which no longer exist, yet to take place, in order that it may at some time be removed? If we have to give up the main position of this assumption of a literal fulfillment yet to be accomplished, on account of its intrinsic impossibility, all support is taken away from the notion that the promise will be realized in and for the people of Israel upon the soil of the Holy Land. It falls to pieces from internal weakness.

Instead, therefore, of dreaming of a future fulfillment in the literal sense, we must rather say, that the Prophet knows of a people of God only in the form of Israel, and hence what he hopes and promises for the people of God he hopes and promises for Israel, and in the form conditioned by Israel's history. But it has become clear to us under the New Testament through Christ: Israel was only a type, necessary for its time and chosen by God, of the true people of God, only a shell which contained the kernel in the mean while, but at the same time was also to protect it until the time of its maturity. But the shell was too small and must be burst; the kernel had not and has not sufficient room, and it would be reversing the order of things, after the kernel is laid bare to retain the shell. It is not the outward Israel that is God's people; it was just the period of its ruin, just the rejection of the Messiah at his coming by the external Israel that opened the way for this. It was made clear that a people as such was insufficient for this high calling, to be the chosen people of God, as the prophets themselves distinguished more and more between the mere external Israel and the true Israel, and saw the heathen coming to Zion and entering the breach. And though Israel is still held as the central point, the fulfillment is not in outward form, but ideally, inasmuch as Christ came the "Saviour of the Jews;" Israel therefore remaining the root in which the others were engrafted. We can understand now the promise of the innumerable increase (chap. ii. 1). Literally it would apply to the people of Israel, but can only apply to them as the people of God; and even though the older prophets say nothing as yet of the calling of the Gentiles, as Micah and Isaiah do, we have now assuredly a right to abandon the notion of an increase of the external Israel, and to see the fulfillment in the founding of a people of God by Christ just in the time of the final ruin of Israel, who have become, especially by the conversion of the heathen, a numberless multitude, and will become still more numerous. Then the reunion of the divided kingdoms is an essential element in the Messianic picture of the future held up in prophecy, as this very passage shows. This is altogether natural. Since prophecy knows a people of God only in the form of the people of Israel, it was necessary, if salvation was to be brought by the reign of the Messiah, that the breach, so harmful to God's people, and the fruitful source, even more than the consequence, of apostasy from Jehovah, should be removed. If Israel was to be described as becoming converted to God, it must also be represented as returning to its unity under the divinely chosen House of David. This element also in the promise belongs naturally to its form, the form which it must naturally assume under the Old Covenant. As in the New Testament it was declared that the outward Israel was not to constitute God's people for all time, this element lost its significance; we cannot expect a literal fulfillment of this promise, but the idea which lies at its foundation has been and is being realized, that is, the idea of the real unity of God's people under one head of the house of David, who was, however, more than the son of David, namely, under Christ. These promises have thus a higher range than the Prophet conceives, and find their fulfillment in a far higher sense than he hopes, and as they are thus more than mere human aspirations and pious wishes, they are seen to proceed from the Spirit of God, who preformed and provided the New Covenant in the Old. So little does this view do away with the divine authority of the prophetic word, that it is rather its only real attestation and adequate expression, unlike the other literalizing view disproved above.

But if the reproach of spiritualizing should be brought against this conception, our defense is that we only spiritualize in reference to Old Testament promises, along with the Apostles, and would not be more realistic than they, who (1 Pet. ii. 10; Rom. ix. 25, 26), although fully aware of the literal sense of our passages, yet do expressly refer them to the conversion of the heathen. Peter in the same connection (ver. 9) sets the New Testament people of God, Christians, directly in the place of those of the Old Testament, and therefore the former are now the true Israel. This extension with reference to the heathen is also quite consequent. If the words: not my people, were once pronounced over Israel, it was because they had sunk quite to the level of the heathen. And if they are to be received again, they would be received just as those who had actually become like heathen; and it is no longer right to exclude the heathen, who are behind them in no respect. But there is this difference between the reacceptance and the first choice. When the Israelites were chosen they were not in positive opposition to God, but now they are so; and therefore a longer exclusion of the heathen would be a particularizing to a greater extent than their disciplinary training demanded; it would be a violation of justice. For the rest: Paul declares clearly that Israel itself shall not be excluded (Rom. xi. 26). Only thus should the people of God attain to its full increase (And surely, in the fact of the preservation of Israel in its nationality even under the New Testament, we may see a promise of this conversion, although that wonderful preservation by God's providence is to be regarded in its most patent aspect as a part of the judgment decreed upon Israel by God. It is preserved as a living witness of the rejection decreed by God on account of its unbelief and rejection of the Messiah.) Only Paul says not a word, when promising Israel's conversion, that would lead us to think that a people of God, κατ' ἐξοχήν, will be continued, not a word of the "glory of the kingdom of Israel," though his heart beat so warmly (comp. chap. ix.) towards his nation in its outward sense.

Finally we have only further to remark that in our references to the Messianic period inaugurated by Christ, as the time of the fulfillment of the prophetic promises, "Messianic time" is taken in the fullest sense of the term, and the whole course of the New Testament dispensation, from its foundation to its completion, is regarded as one whole, so that we have not yet attained to the perfect fulfillment, although the promises of prophecy have been undergoing their realization since the time of Christ. "For it doth not yet appear what we shall be." The fulfillment is not yet complete, but we stand in expectation of it. This perfect realization consists least in the literal fulfillment with respect to the external Israel alone, but it too, in so far as it is converted to the Messiah, will have a share in the complete salvation ready for all who will be converted to God through Christ.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 2. STARKE: All departure from God's Word and from true religion is a spiritual whoredom. Blessed are they who beware of this!

Ver. 4. STARKE: As a good intention without God's counsel does not make a cause good, so it cannot be said that the divine will has been fulfilled, when it has been executed with a perverted heart and not in accordance with the divine purposes. (Comp. the Doctrinal and Ethical section, No. 3.)

WÜRT. SUMM.: God's wrath often falls upon posterity, and they must suffer for the sins of their forefathers, if they walk in their evil footsteps (Ex. xx. 5).

TUB. BIBLE: Public sins of a whole nation or of its kings and princes are followed by a general judgment of God, by which whole lands are destroyed.

[PUSEY: So awful a thing it is to be the instrument of God in punishing or reproving others if we do not by his grace keep our own hearts and hands pure from sin. — M.]

Ver. 6. WÜRT. SUMM.: Behold here the severity of the divine wrath. God is certainly compassionate, but his compassion is regulated by his holy righteousness. His compassion exceeds all human petitions and understanding; but his wrath goes beyond all human reckoning. Men may keep on sinning against our beloved God too long, so that when He has waited long exhorting them to repentance, and they do not follow Him, his words at last are: "Lo-Ruhamah Lo-Ammi." Beware of this and do not defer your repentance; for God may soon become as angry as He was merciful.

Ver. 7. CRAMER: When human help ceases, divine help begins. He is not limited to the use of means, but is Himself our Help and Shield.

[BURROUGHS: The more immediate the hand of God appears in his mercy to his people, the more sweet and precious ought that mercy then to be. Dulcius ex ipso fonte. Created mercies are the most perfect mercies. — M.]

STARKE: Woe to him whose God the Lord will no longer be. Let men therefore beware lest by presumptuous sin they trifle away all intercourse with God.

RIEGER: When God thus renounces those who were his people, it is much more lamentable than any severance between those who are married or betrothed. "I will be your God and ye shall be my people," was the formula of the covenant. They had broken the last condition by their unbelief; and thus they stirred up the Lord to anger so that He renounced the first. Yet He has not expressly retracted the whole formula of the covenant. He did not say: I will not be your God, but He cut short his words in anger: I will not be yours. Thus room is left for that mercy which shall awake anew for them.

Ver. 9. The threatenings are indeed terrible: but how merciful it was in God to announce the judgment before it comes; and the plainer and more striking these threatenings are the greater the mercy. This is a ground for hoping that the judgment will be averted.

Chap. ii. ver. 1. This is the order and method of God's dealings: He slays, not that He may keep under the power of death, but that He may bring to repentance. Thus He dispersed Israel among the heathen, and without any compassion and mercy, as it seemed to outward observation, rejected them utterly. For the Ten Tribes have not yet returned to their own land. But how abundantly has God compensated to them this misfortune! For those who were scattered among the heathen, He gathered again by the Gospel, and so gathered them that a great multitude of the heathen came to the knowledge of the kingdom of Christ along with the remnant in the kingdom of Israel. He points the people of Israel to this compensation, that they may not despond in such affliction, as we also assuage, by the hope of the future glory, prepared for us by the death of Christ, the sorrows of those calamities which we see before our eyes.

[BURROUGHS: If we expect God to be a living God to us, it becomes us not to have dead hearts in his service. If God be active for our good, let us be active for his honor. — M.]

Ver. 2. STARKE: The Church of the New Testament has only one Head, who is Christ. Blessed are we if we cleave to and follow Him!

[MATTHEW HENRY: To believe in Christ is to appoint Him to ourselves for our Head, that is, to consent to God's appointment and willingly to submit to his guidance and appointment; and this in concurrence and communion with all good Christians who make Him their Head; so that though they are many, yet in Him they are one, and so become one with each other. Qui conveniunt in aliquo tertio inter se conveniunt. — M.]

Ver. 3. The prophet gives the best application of the names which God bade him apply to his children in order that the Christian Church may be convinced thereby that all the former things are reversed, that wrath is done away, and that the unfathomable compassion and mercy of God stand open to every man. For how should God, after He gave his son, not with Him have given all things? This word "say" belongs to the office of public preaching. We are to understand by it that the servants of God in the New Testament are commanded to comfort believers, and to declare to them that they stand in mercy and are a people of God.

[PUSEY: The words "my people" are words of hope in prophecy; they become words of joy in each stage of fulfilment. They are words of mutual joy and gratulation when obeyed; they are words of encouragement until obeyed. God is reconciled to us, and willeth that we should be reconciled to Him. — M.]

CHAPTER II. 4-25.

A. Complaint and Threatening of Punishment.

VERSES 4-15.

- 4 Plead with your mother, plead !
For she is not my wife
And I am not her husband,
That she put away her whoredom from before her
And her adultery from between her breasts.
- 5 Lest I strip her naked,
And place her as (she was in) the day of her birth,
And make her like the wilderness,
And set her (so as to be) like a barren land,
And slay her with hunger.
- 6 And on her children I will not have mercy,
For they are children of whoredom
- 7 Because their mother has committed whoredom
And she that bore them has caused shame,
Because she said: I will go after my lovers,
Who furnished my bread and my water,
My wool and my flax,
My oil and my (pleasant) drinks.
- 8 Therefore behold I am hedging up thy way with thorns,
And will wall up a wall [raise a wall before her]
And she will not find her paths.
- 9 And she will pursue her lovers and not overtake them
And will seek them and not find;
And she will say: I will go and return to my former husband,
For (it was) better with me then than now.
- 10 And she did not know that I gave her
The corn and the wine and the oil,
And that I increased for her silver and gold,
(Which) they used for Baal.
- 11 Therefore will I take back my corn in its time
And my wine in its season,
And snatch away my wool and my flax
(Which was) to cover her nakedness.
- 12 And then will I uncover her shame
In the eyes of her lovers,
And none will deliver her from my hands.
- 13 And I will bring to an end all her joy;
Her feast-making, her new-moons, her sabbaths,
And all her festivals.
- 14 And will lay waste her vine and her fig tree
Of which she said: they are my reward
Which my lovers gave to me:
And will make her a forest,
And the beast of the field will devour her.

- 15 And I will visit upon her the days of the Baals ;
 To which she burnt incense,
 And (then) put on her ring and her jewels,
 And went after her lovers,
 And forgot me, saith Jehovah.

B. The Punishment leads to Conversion, and thus to the glorious Renewal of the Marriage Contract between Jehovah and Israel.

VERSES 16-25.

- 16 Therefore, behold, I am alluring her,
 And will lead her into the wilderness
 And speak unto her heart [speak with comfort].
 17 And I will give her her vineyards from thence,
 And the Valley of Achor as a door of hope,
 And she will answer then as in the days of her youth,
 As in the day of her coming up from the land of Egypt.
 18 And it will be in that day, saith the Lord,
 Thou wilt call : My husband,
 And thou wilt no more call me : My Baal.
 19 And I will remove the names of the Baals from her mouth,
 And they shall no more be remembered by their name,
 20 And I will make for them in that day a covenant
 With the beast of the field,
 And with the birds of heaven,
 And the creeping things of the earth,
 And bow and sword and war will I destroy from the land,
 And make them dwell in security.
 21 And I will betroth thee to me for ever,
 And betroth thee to me in righteousness and justice,
 And in mercy and in compassion ;
 22 And betroth thee to me in faithfulness,
 And thou shalt know Jehovah.
 23 And it will be in that day,
 I will answer, saith the Lord,
 Will answer the heavens,
 And they will answer the earth,
 24 And the earth will answer the corn and the wine and the oil,
 And they will answer Jezreel [God's sowing]
 25 And I will sow her for myself in the land,
 And favor "Unfavored,"
 And say to "Not-my-people":
 "Thou art my people,"
 And they shall say : "My God."

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 4. — וְהָיָה כִּי יִשְׁכַּבְתִּי עָלֶיךָ, av. lay. = וְהָיָה כִּי יִשְׁכַּבְתִּי עָלֶיךָ. Fürst regards it as signifying objects of idolatrous worship, therefore : little images, which are represented as being carried upon the breast. [But this is opposed to the parallel expression, וְהָיָה כִּי יִשְׁכַּבְתִּי עָלֶיךָ, which, as Hengstenberg says, is evidently to be taken as the species (adultery) of which the other (whoredoms, acts of unchastity) is the genus. As illustrating the fitness of this picture, Manger compares Es. xxiii. 3, and Horace, Od., i., 19, 7, 8. — M.]

[2 Ver. 8. — וְהָיָה כִּי יִשְׁכַּבְתִּי עָלֶיךָ. J. H. Michaelis and Jahn point in their editions וְהָיָה כִּי יִשְׁכַּבְתִּי עָלֶיךָ, her wall, and this reading, Hengstenberg assumes, without any discussion, to be correct. But there is an obvious unsuitableness in this. The wall could not be represented as being "her" wall unless it were conceived of as existing before the action on the part of Jehovah, which action was to make the wall. — M.]

3 Ver. 11. — לְכַסּוֹתָ, (which were) to cover. Such an ellipsis is quite common. The rendering of the LXX. οὐ μὴ καλύπτειν, conveys the sense, but is not a translation. It was quite unnecessary for Newcome, Horsley, Boothroyd, and others following Houbigant, who was misled by the LXX., to change the לְ into כֹּ. — M.]

4 Ver. 14. — אֶתְּנָהּ. This is usually derived from נָתַן, as also is the usual synonym, אֶתְּנֶנָּה. Hengstenberg labors to prove the derivation of both words from נָתַן and its 1st fut. : a "I-will-give-thee," similar to our "forget-me-not." The absence of daghesh-forte in both nouns would seem to prove the untenableness of this hypothesis. — M.]

5 Ver. 17. — עֲנֶהָ. Some take this from עָנָה, to be bowed down, here : to be humble. But this does not suit the sense of the verse. Besides, עֲנֶהָ would then = עָנָה.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This chapter is the essential supplement to chap.

i. It contains, in a more discursive style, an exposition, justifying and elucidating that which in chap. i. was presented only as a theme, and in some parts even enigmatically in its brief sentences. The complaint and threatening of destroying judgments were uttered without any preparation; and still more suddenly were they followed immediately by as glorious an announcement of salvation. Chap. i. must thus excite inquiries, not so much through the symbolical representation of the first part, as by these unexpected utterances, inquiries which demand an answer. Such answer is given by the Lord Himself in chap. ii. 4 ff., in a longer discourse. This is now altogether based upon the conception of Israel as an unchaste wife, which was only indicated in chap. i. and then disappeared, and is developed in two sections, of threatening and of promise. A complaint is first raised against the unchaste wife, and then the course of punishment is figuratively described, which, however, is seen to be really a chastening with the view to conversion from idolatry. This conversion itself is promised, and the way thus prepared for the announcement of salvation. Israel, returning as penitently as a wife to her husband, finds mercy with God. So the close, ver. 24 f., returns expressly to chap. i.-ii. 3, and the discourse is thus shown to be most closely connected with that section.

The complaint and announcement of punishment occupy vers. 4-15. The discourse takes a turn with ver. 16. The declaration of deliverance is introduced by the announcement of conversion, and from ver. 20 onwards becomes a glorious promise.

A. Vers. 4-15. Complaint, and Announcement of Punishment.

Vers. 4-6. Plead with your mother — for they are children of whoredom. The person who makes the demand is naturally Jehovah. Those who are addressed are not the children of the Prophet, chap. i. 4 ff. (Kurtz), but the children of the adulterous spouse, Israel (and therefore those who are designated children of whoredom, chap. i. 2). These children are distinguished ideally from their mother, because Israel is from one point of view regarded as the spouse. Israel viewed as a unit is the mother: the children then represent the individual Israelites (the mother can not be conceived as existing without the children). The children are now to plead with their mother. But this does not mean that a part of Israel did not serve idols, so that the better disposed among the people would be addressed (Keil, et al.). This would conflict with what has been said of the relation between the mother and the children. The children are conceived of as those who have to dread misfortune on account of the prevailing

"whoredom." They, in fact, however, represent just what the mother does; they are to suffer the same punishment with her, though in ver. 6 the punishment is as yet only mentioned expressly as that about to fall upon the children. But the distinction made between the mother and the children is only a rhetorical mode of presentation resorted to for the purpose of casting upon the mother, through the children, the reproach that she by her conduct was bringing misfortune upon them, and thus persuading her to abandon her lewdness. Not as though the children had acted differently from the mother, but now when the punishment is to be presented, the complaint is naturally directed against the latter. For if the children have sinned, they have followed their mother in doing so. She is the really guilty one in this punishment. The children are comparatively innocent, and have been only seduced, and yet they must suffer like their mother! And then they must participate in the sufferings which the mother endures for her own sins. They are therefore the ones who should be represented as pleading with the mother. This mode of representation is not pursued beyond the beginning of the chapter. For she is not my wife, expresses well the sin of the mother. It is as though Jehovah had said: "It is her sin that she deports herself as one who could not be my wife, and whose husband I could not be, and I cannot look upon myself any more as her husband." The next member of the verse shows the cause of this feeling, for it is the conduct of the mother that gives occasion to the children to upbraid her. The punishment would be: I know her no longer as my wife, and will be her husband no longer. But punishment is not introduced before ver. 5 — וְהָיָה.

The וְהָיָה involves the demand to cease from the present conduct. This conduct is "whoredom," but in the case of a wife it is also more, it is "adultery." From her face — from between her breasts. The whoredom (idolatry) of Israel is thus not secret, but is done openly. Israel is like a public barefaced whore, who displays her profession in her face and (bared) breasts.

Ver. 5. The demand is supported by calling attention to the punishment. Lest I strip her naked. This is perhaps connected with the foregoing so as to = as a punishment for the shameless exposure of her person which she wantonly practices, strip her bare in a way she does not like and of which she would be ashamed. Divested of the figure the expression would mean: lest I take from her everything that I have given her and reduce her to the condition in which she was before I delivered her and made her what she now is (comp. Ezek. xvi. 4 ff.). The prophet now turns to this earlier condition with the words: as in the day of her birth. Primarily this is an image of nakedness = like a new-born child, but not simply = without clothing, but = divested of everything, stripped of all she can call her own. Thus was Israel on the day of its birth. This birth took place when Israel was chosen to be the people of God. According to chap. xi. 1, this was done in Egypt. Israel was there naked, for it dwelt as an oppressed nation of slaves without a country. And make her like a wilderness, that is, reduce her to a situation where the necessities of life are wanting as they are to those in a desert, so that they die of hunger; and like a parched land, that is, a place in which there is no water, so that she may "die of thirst." This dying of thirst is only mentioned because her situation is compared to a desert; and the general sense is = reduce her to a situation of utter destitution from a condition of great abundance. A reference to Israel's sojourn in the desert cannot be well disproved (as by Keil) along with the mention of the day of her birth. Israel, it is true, was supplied with food and water by God. But the desert itself had neither food nor drink, as Israel felt only too keenly. And that desert is an image of the condition to which Israel is to be reduced by God.

Ver. 6. And will not have compassion upon her children. This verse is in sense still dependent upon יְהוָה of ver. 5. The want of compassion is a consequence of the conduct of the mother, but may be turned away by conversion. Even the children shall share the same lot, that is, all individually; none are to suppose that they shall escape punishment, — for they are children of whoredom. Because they are begotten of whoredom and also witnesses of it, the Lord who is to punish his adulterous spouse cannot endure them. Still the question of chap. i. 2 repeats itself here, whether בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל are not rather: children who commit whoredom. This is most natural, for the children are in fact identical with the mother.

Vers. 7-9. Because their mother hath practiced whoredom — it was better with me than now. The last explanation given of בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל would certainly be incorrect if ver. 7 were an explanation of ver. 6 b = They are children of whoredom, for their mother, etc. But such an explanation, continued too in the parallelism (ver. 7 a, and b), would make the sense extremely prolix. The same remark would apply if the verse were coördinate to ver. 6 b, and supported it along with ver. 6 a. Besides, this expression concerning the mother's sin would not be appropriate as justifying the punishment threatened against the children. The solution is to be found in the wider scope of ver. 7. For here the thought is so enlarged that it cannot be regarded simply as an explanation of ver. 6, and at the same time coördinate to the second member of that verse. Such a view supposes that if that verse is an explanation, ver. 7 must be so also. The thought is, however, evidently an independent one. Nor does it refer backwards, but, as its contents show, it reaches forward and is therefore rather to be connected with vers. 8, 9. (So Meier; even the Vulgate and Luther have detached it from ver. 6.) [So also Henderson, and Cowles in his exposition though not in his translation. — M.] — וְהָיָה כְּעִירָה here not = to become a disgrace, but = to commit shame. Luther: conduct herself shamefully. — Who gave my bread, etc. = food, clothing, and the enjoyments of life (Keil), comp. Jer. xlv. 17 ff. We may refer this to a condition of things which actually prevailed in Israel (comp. also ver. 16). If it did exist along with idolatry, it would be naturally suggested that it was due to the idols. In the figurative representation it is the reward which the adulteress received from her paramours (comp. ver. 14). [Keil: "This delusive idea entertained by the wife arose from the sight of the heathen nations roving about, who were rich and mighty, and attributed this to their gods." — M.]

Ver. 8. Therefore behold, I hedge up her way with thorns. The hedging up of the way, strengthened in the parallel member by the figure of raising up a wall, means in general to place an obstacle in the way, to set up a wall of separation, and that evidently between the wife and the paramours, Israel and the idols, so that the alliance between them will be dissolved. This is shown further by the words: and she will not find the path to them, and also in ver. 9. This causa dirimens is here intentionally referred to only in a general way, in a sort of enigmatical allusion. The "that" is expressed only once with its immediate sequence in ver. 9. The "how" does not appear till ver. 11 ff. It is already hinted at in the conclusion of ver. 9. It is the feeling of distress in strong contrast to the situation just extolled so highly as the gift of the idols. This privation must itself excite doubts as to the power of the idols, and still more must their impotence in the midst of her distress. Israel would indeed become at first more ardent in its worship of idols; to "pursue" after them, etc., the more their prosperity was regarded as their gift, the more would they be missed. But "she will not reach them and will not find them." It is represented, as though outwardly it were no longer possible to hold intercourse with the idols. This mode of representation, however, is connected only with the image of raising a hedge, etc., something which effects an external separation. But the expression is very suitable, especially as the idols denoted by the paramours, prove themselves to be a mere phantom, dead nothings, just when men turn to them for help. They are therefore really not found. Such experience of the nothingness of idols then awakens again a longing after Jehovah as the One, in whom alone help is to be found, a longing after the good bestowed by Him upon his people. The discourse here is just ready to pass over into the thought that this punishment is a chastening to lead to conversion (vers. 16 ff.), but upon the mention of former prosperity, it turns again to complaint, in order to complete the announcement of the punishment merited by the ungrateful forgetfulness of the giver of such prosperity. This is continued till ver. 15. (Hengstenberg: "There can be no doubt, that by the hedging and walling about, severe sufferings are intended, by which the people are encompassed, straitened, and hindered in every free movement. For sufferings appear constantly as the specific against Israel's apostasy from God. . . . We can by no means think of an external obstacle. Outwardly there was, during the exile, and in the midst of idolatrous nations, a stronger temptation to idolatry than they had in their native land. Hence we can think of an internal obstacle only, and then again, only of an absolute incapacity of the idols to grant to the people consolation and relief in their sufferings. If this incapacity is first ascertained by experience, men lose their confidence in them, and seek help where alone it is to be found." — M.)

Vers. 10-12. She knew not, etc. The reference is to ver. 7. Israel had shamefully ascribed to the idols what they owed to God. That God was the Giver they must have been inwardly conscious, in fact could have known it from the Law; but they ignored this truth, denied it, and naturally so, because they had departed from their God. The abundance of the natural productions of the country then led to an abundance of silver and gold, but—cutting reproach—that which they owed to God עָשָׂה לַיְהוָה, probably; they employed it for Baal, not: they made it a Baal, as the article especially shows. “Employed,” partly in making idol images, partly in the service of idols. Baal may be taken here for idols generally, since the actual Baal-worship was done away with by Jehu, though not entirely, comp. 2 Kings xiii. 6 (Keil).

Ver. 11. Now the punishment is expressed which was in vers. 8, 9, only hinted at, the withdrawal of the good things which had been so enjoyed. My corn = the corn which they received from me. In its time, that is, the season when corn and wine are expected. Hence the absence of them was the more distressing, but also more significant and striking, showing itself to be a punishment from God. Since He was not acknowledged as the Giver when He gave them, He will manifest Himself more clearly as such in taking them away. Which was to cover her nakedness. The resulting want should be complete, its consequence ignominious bareness = utter destitution. And then will I uncover her shame. = her lovers (idols) shall also look upon her nakedness to her disgrace. She would become so miserable, that even they shall despise her, though she once held herself so highly with them.

Vers. 13-15. And I will bring to an end all her joy, etc. A still more definite indication of the punishment before threatened. All joy must cease. But joy culminates, and has its purest expression in the festivals, the yearly feasts, strictly speaking. וְכָל. Upon these follows the monthly feast, that of the new moon, and the weekly one, that of the Sabbath. כָּל-יְמֵי חַיֵּיהָ then gathers all these up in one general expression. Even during the prevalence of idolatry the feast-days probably remained outwardly the same as before.

Ver. 14. The devastation mentioned here is probably intended to follow up the cessation of joy; for the vine and the fig tree are the finest productions of Canaan, not necessary to the support of life, but affording the choicest delicacies (comp. Joel i. 7-12). [Henderson: “These nouns are to be taken as collectives, or rather, as Horsley suggests, as plantations of vines and fig trees. These should be left uncultivated on the removal of the inhabitants to a foreign region, comp. Is. v. 6; vii. 23, 24. — M.]

Ver. 15. And will visit upon her the days of Baal, that is, the feast-days just mentioned, for they were celebrated in honor of Baal, and not of Jehovah. And put on her ring, etc. This is an expression which in its strictness belongs only to the image; for Israel is compared to a coquettish prostitute, who is in the habit of thus adorning herself. Yet there may be allusion to the festal attire worn at the idol-feasts. And forgot me. A sharp and mournful contrast to the vain adornments of the prostitute. For the sake of the paramours she was never weary of decking herself out; but no more thought of Jehovah. It is plain how completely this whole threatening was fulfilled by the Assyrian invasion. Yet it is to be observed that this itself is not threatened here, and still less banishment. In general, no enemy is yet named, at least none definitely, but only the laying waste of the land. [Henderson: “Their entirely abandoning themselves to the service of idols, and their dereliction from the God of their fathers, are brought forward at the conclusion of this description of their conduct, in order to heighten the aggravation of their guilt, and render the announcement of the kindly disposition of Jehovah toward them, at the beginning of the following verse, the more surprising.” — M.]

B. Announcement of the Conversion of Israel and the beneficent Renewal of the Covenant.

Vers. 16-19. Therefore behold I will allure her, etc. לִכְנֹן. We have had this word twice already in a similar construction (vers. 8 and 11) with the sense: because Israel has transgressed, therefore God will punish them. לִכְנֹן also here naturally means: therefore. Every other explanation, such as veranamen, or profecto, is arbitrary, and has arisen from the embarrassment occasioned by the difficulty which a “therefore” causes in this connection; for it is not clear from what a conclusion is drawn, whether from their sin or from their punishment or from their sudden desire to return (ver. 9). Nor is it clear what conclusion is drawn, whether punishment or a display of love. As regards the first question it is to be observed that the mention of Israel's sin immediately precedes (ver. 15 at the end) while their punishment had been previously described, whose converting influence ver. 9 had already indicated. The expression: I will allure her, might certainly form a contrast to the words: she forgot me = while she forgets me, I am mindful of her and recall her to my thoughts. But the whole can hardly be merely an inference from what is said at the close of ver. 15, for the reference to the sin is there only incidental and subordinate to the description of the punishment. לִכְנֹן therefore draws an inference not from Israel's sin in itself, but from that sin as being punished, and punished not without severity, as was before plainly stated. Hence we find that לִכְנֹן introduces a conclusion drawn from the contents of the whole preceding section = therefore because Israel has been punished for her sin and forgetfulness of me, and has been so reduced to a condition of distress that she longs after happiness in communion with me, I will allure her, etc. This reference to the whole of the preceding is certainly justified in our verse, since the discourse evidently takes here a new direction. If this is the sense of לִכְנֹן, the conclusion which is drawn is not an announcement of punishment, against which the expression, “I will allure her” is decisive, but an exhibition of love, and yet such a display as is virtually determined by the sin that is punished, and which is connected immediately with the punishment, in order to foster those first motions of longing into a steadfast resolution to return. [Pocock, Newcome, Noyes, and Henderson translate: nevertheless, notwithstanding. They failed to discern the inner connection between the passages divided by this particle, which, in fact, never has the meaning they assign to it. Cowles reaches the right conclusion, though not upon exegetical grounds: “Some have found a difficulty here, inasmuch as the grievous sins of Israel seem to be no natural reason for giving the blessings hereafter promised. But the reasons, viewed fundamentally, lie deeper than the sins of Israel, even in God's covenant love and faithfulness. He cannot bear that his own Israel should sink hopelessly under her sins into ruin. Therefore his pity moves Him to discipline and to mercy." So also Pusey with most of the German Expositors. — M.] And lead her into the desert: not as a punishment, for the allusion is to the leading of the children of Israel into the desert by Moses (comp. ver. 17). But this was really a deliverance, namely, from the afflictions of Egypt. At first it is such only negatively, implying that they will no longer continue in such distress. They are not yet in Canaan. Even the desert brought want and destitution with it: and this is brought first into view here. In so far the situation indicated by the leading into the desert coincides actually and outwardly with the punishment by affliction and calamity pictured in ver. 11 (the "wilderness" is the realization of that which is threatened in vers. 11 ff.). But this situation is presented here also under another point of view, namely (as being compared with the wanderers in the desert under Moses), that of a situation while surrounded with affliction yet leading in truth to deliverance, and the idea of punishment is thereby converted into that of chastisement. For the destitution felt in the desert meant here had its definite disciplinary aim, — to shut up the people to the discovery of their need of help, and to lead them to faith in God through the help and gracious guidance which they then experienced. Thus they in the desert, even though encompassed with need, were still upon the way to Canaan, the land of blessings, and salvation. This is made plain from what follows: And speak to her heart = comfort her (comp. e. g. Gen. xxxiv. 3; 1. 21; Is. xl. 2). These words imply an inward consolation by manifestations of love which immediately follow — the blessings that were withdrawn are again supplied.

Ver. 17. And I will give her her vineyards from thence = from the desert, so that they, as soon as they shall have passed the limits of Canaan, shall receive them, that is, the vineyards which Israel once possessed but had lost (ver. 14), therefore: her vineyards. What happened once is a type of that which shall happen again. And the Valley of Achor for a door of hope. The Valley of Achor here comes into view: (1) on account of its appellative signification: valley of trouble, affliction (Is. vii. 25). This shall be made a gate of hope (a valley = a natural gate): therefore a transformation of mourning into joy; (2) but also on account of its position near the border of Canaan. For Israel is conceived of as marching out of the desert into Canaan. It remains a question whether the occasion of the name is also to be taken into account. In this valley the anger of God was appeased by the stoning of Achan, and was removed from Israel to give place to renewed favor. Through that which then happened to Achan, this valley became a door of hope to Israel, which lay exposed to the anger of God. And this again sets forth the thought that punishment, affliction, shall become to them the way to renewed favor. The conception is more profound than if it merely set forth a change from one situation to another. But the image and the thing represented are not exact counterparts. Here Israel is the party who is punished and is again to find favor. But there Israel finds favor through the punishment of a single individual. [Hengstenberg: "The people when they entered into Canaan were immediately deprived of the favor of God by the transgression of an individual — Achan, — which was only a single fruit from the tree of the sin which was common to all. But God himself in his mercy made known the means by which his lost favor might be regained; and thus the place which seemed to be the door of destruction became the door of hope. . . . This particular dealing of God, however, is based upon his nature, and must therefore repeat itself when Israel again comes into similar circumstances." — M.]

And she shall shout aloud thither. The Lord comes to meet Israel (comp. ver. 16: shall comfort her); and Israel cries out towards the place whence he comes forth, looking back to the צפון. The meaning is, that with thankful acknowledgments she accepts these tokens of his love; not only receives them but answers to them by suitable conduct. Others suppose that צפון means here: to be afflicted, or to be humbled. But such a sense is unsuitable in this verse. Besides, צפון would be equal to simple צפון. [The view given above as to the meaning of this clause, and adopted by most of the German expositors, is defended at length by Hengstenberg, and is probably the correct one. All the English expositors, on the other hand, follow the old explanation which translates the verb: to sing, and see a special allusion to the song of Miriam and the Israelites after the crossing of the Red Sea. The chief arguments in favor of the former view are, (1.) The greater fitness of the idea of "answering," as exhibiting a change of character in the Israelites and their readiness to turn to God. Singing would merely indicate that their distress was removed, which was not the ultimate object of God's dealing with them. (2.) The meaning, "answering," is the leading usage of the Kal; that of singing is proper to the Piel. (3.)

צפון ought to be rendered "thither," which suits the idea of answering, especially as explained above, but not that of singing. — M.] As on the day, etc. Perhaps there is an allusion here to the song of Moses (Ex. xv.), in which Israel gave a grateful answer to the deliverance which God had wrought for them. צפון would then be rendered directly: sing. So the Vulgate and Luther (comp. 1 Sam. xviii. 7; xxi. 11; xxix. 5, to strike up a responsive song). Yet the general signification is probably to be preferred.

Ver. 18 is then attached to this צפון. My husband. That is, she will recognize in Jehovah her true spouse, regard Baal no longer as combined with God, thus (by a convenient escamotage so natural to the human heart which becomes inwardly apostate from God) to all appearance calling upon Jehovah, but really putting Baal in his place and thus dispossessing Him.

Ver. 19. And I will remove the name of Baal from her mouth = I will so act that thou shalt not take the name of the idols into thy mouth any longer, that is, shalt not honor them (for as long as they are honored they are taken into the mouth, are thought of), but wilt depart from them entirely, have nothing more to do with them. The promise is a literal fulfillment of Ex. xxiii. 13; (comp. also Zech. xiii. 2), and expressed in the same words.

Vers. 20–22. And I will make a covenant for them in that day, etc. A covenant for them, in their interest, so that they shall suffer no injury. Observe here how the figure of the woman as addressed is here departed from, only to be returned to in the next verse. The covenant with the wild beasts lays upon them the obligation not to injure mankind, and especially not to lay waste the land. That punishment was threatened for the immediate future (comp. ver. 14). Just for that reason it is now promised to the converted and favored people that they shall be defended from it. [Keil: "The three classes of animals that are dangerous to men are mentioned here, as in Gen. ix. 2. Beasts of the field as distinguished from the domestic animals (behemoth are beasts that live in freedom in the fields, either wild beasts, or game that devours or injures the fruits of the field). By the fowls of heaven, we are to understand chiefly the birds of prey. Remes does not mean reptiles, but active creatures, the smaller animals of the earth which move about swiftly."—M.] And I will break bow and sword and war. To break the weapons of war means to cause war to cease forever. This is expressly intimated in what is attached here by a zeugma. To break war in pieces, — to break bow and sword, and so to put an end to war. The whole is the fulfillment of Lev. xxvi. 3 ff.; comp. Is. ii. 4; xi. 6 ff.; xxxv. 9; Zech. ix. 10; Ezek. xxxiv. 25 ff. And not merely will a condition of security and peace be afforded, but also that after which Israel longs (ver. 18) will be given, namely, intercourse with God. Upon this alone is Israel's renewed prosperity based.

And I will betroth thee to me forever. A new marriage-contract is to be signed. Israel now converted, becomes altogether different, is regarded again as an unstained virgin, and is betrothed by God to Himself. What formerly existed, that she was once a faithless spouse, is left quite out of sight. For אֶרְשָׁה means: to woo a maiden, to betroth her. The words, "I will betroth her," are thrice repeated, to take all doubt away from the statement. This covenant is now to last forever without any interruption — in righteousness and justice, in mercy and compassion. We are evidently to understand here the righteousness which is displayed in Jehovah's appearing to favor his people and defending their cause against their enemies, from whose power he delivers them. Such righteousness and judgment are, with relation to the enemies, only negative, that is, they are displayed in punishing them; but, with relation to God's people, positive, so that righteousness really bears the sense of salvation, deliverance. In so far Luther is right, when he holds that such righteousness is the imputed righteousness of Christ. For there is certainly presented the notion of God's intervention to bestow favor upon man, and therefore of an act of justification, only not at first as connected with the accusings of conscience by reason of guilt, but in relation to God's punitive judgments against sin. These, so to speak, lose the right to destroy God's people any longer, because they are accepted by Him as converted. Keil explains the words as meaning, the righteous judgment by which God purifies his people, in order to eradicate everything which, on the side of the Church, could do prejudice to the covenant. But the discourse has already passed beyond this. The judgment has been already inflicted, and we are now upon the ground of the complete promises of salvation, when God no more appears against his people, but interferes in their behalf in accordance with the purification which has been effected. The disposition of mind in God represented by this righteousness and judgment is still further brought out by the two words: in mercy and compassion. Every idea of an intervention of God in his people's behalf upon the ground of their merit is thus excluded. What God exercises towards them is purely favor and compassion.

Ver. 22. But these shall never cease. Hence the addition: in faithfulness. Only thus does this engagement receive the pledge of its eternal duration, while by the preceding generally the possibility of its ratification is set forth. Righteousness and judgment, favor and compassion, are the conditio sine qua non and causa efficiens; faithfulness is the essential modus of the engagement. The end then is: And thou shalt know Jehovah. No interruption of such relation shall ever intervene between Jehovah and Israel; upon the establishment of such intercourse, a true knowledge of God will be imparted. This naturally does not mean a mere cognition of God, least of all a mere logical conception of Him, — in general, not a mere intellectual relation to Him based upon the operations of the understanding, but a personal living relation, that deeper notion which is certainly sometimes conveyed by יָדָע.

Vers. 23-25. And it will be on that day that I will answer, etc. The consequence of the covenant newly ratified is the readiness of God to bless his people most richly. The betrothal having been accomplished, the marriage presents are not wanting, and heaven and earth, standing in the service of the bridegroom and husband, must contribute their share. The heavens, etc., in a descending series, are represented as earnestly asking the personified objects above them respectively whether the blessing which they expect is to be dispensed. The heavens ask Jehovah, the earth the heavens, etc., or they look towards them with longing. And now this questioning, this earnest request (in the time of Israel's rejection) is "answered" cordially and assuringly. In how far, however, this original sense of עֲנֶה is carried out, or whether it does not pass over into the signification of our "agree with" = comply, listen to, cannot be definitely shown. It is, however, in accordance with the largely poetical conception to assume here a strict prosopopoeia. The first object of the representation is Jehovah; therefore the sense of the whole naturally is, that Jehovah, upon whom all blessing depends, will confer upon his Church the blessings He had withdrawn from it (comp. Deut. xxviii. 12 and the contrast, Deut. xxviii. 23 f.; Lev. xxvi. 19). [Keil: "By prosopopoeia the prophet represents the heavens as praying to God, to allow it to give to the earth that which will insure its fertility, whereupon the heavens fulfill the desires of the earth, and the earth yields its produce to the nation." Umbreit: "It is as though we heard the exalted harmonies of the united powers of creation sending forth their notes as they are sustained and moved by the eternal key-note of the creative and moulding Spirit." Henderson compares the personification in Tibullus, I, Eleg. vii. 25. The extreme beauty of the figure here has often been praised.—M.] Will answer Jezreel. The name Jezreel is here used unexpectedly instead of Israel. The same name which symbolized the judgment upon Israel (i. 4) is here employed directly to designate the favored people according to its appellative significance: God will sow, especially as in chap. ii. 2 the hope of victory was connected with Jezreel. Israel appears as the sowing of God, because planted anew by divine grace, as ver. 25 shows immediately. Thus the first name of evil omen is taken away and converted into its opposite. The same is true of the other two names. Israel will again be called "Favored," and the "People of God," because it is his. It is therefore said, beautifully completing the picture, that the people again know God as their God. Thus God's renewed favor, and the people's new heart, go hand in hand. On the fulfillment of the promise, see the Doctrinal Section, No. 4.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The whole tenor of our chapter presupposes that Jehovah's relation to Israel as his people is compared to a marriage. If we seek the tertium comparationis in this comparison, it is manifest upon a general view, that everything of an accidental or external nature is denied of this relation, that it is presented as a union inward, sacred, and indissoluble, involving indefeasible rights and obligations. But, more especially, there are two elements entering into the nature of marriage, which form the points of comparison, namely, love, by which the husband is bound to the wife, and its correlative the requirement of fidelity, or of exclusive reciprocal affection, which He makes of her. Hence the relation of Jehovah to his people is compared to a marriage because his love to Israel is as strong and intimate as that of a husband to his wife. As the husband chooses the wife from love, and perhaps, urged by love, takes a poor maiden and raises her to himself, and in his married life attests his affection by being her protector and benefactor who cannot show her too many evidences of his devotion, so is it with Jehovah towards his people (comp. vers. 10, 23, 24). Such love on the part of the husband must have as its correlative on the part of the wife, fidelity, undivided, exclusive affection. As certainly as the husband should expect this fidelity from his wife, so certainly shall Jehovah expect it from Israel; as strongly as the wife is bound to love him to the exclusion of all others, and as she does basely violate this duty by attaching herself to another, the same is true of the relation of Israel, God's people, to Jehovah. But if unfaithfulness on the part of the wife is a violation of duty, it is also worthy of punishment. And if the punishment (rejection) of an unfaithful, adulterous wife is justifiable, so also is the punishment (rejection) of God's faithless people. But this is only a chastisement wrung from love, and the source of deep anguish to the loving husband. Therefore the husband who loves his wife truly, with a love answering to the idea of marriage, while angry at her infidelity and employing the most severe means to punish it, only does so in order if possible to bring her back to her duty and as the only way to continue the alliance. Thus is it with Jehovah towards Israel. As his love has established the covenant with Israel, and displayed itself in it, so does it seek with its whole strength to preserve it unbroken through all interruptions, — in other words, to restore it.

2. The exhibition of God's relation to his people under the figure of a marriage permits us, on the other hand, to draw an inference as to the nature of the marriage itself. Such an exalted and sacred relation could only be thus represented under an exalted view of marriage. The lively, strong, unchangeable love of God to his people, and the demand of an unchangeable fidelity answering to such love, and turning aside to no other object, is the subject of the representation. This marriage is necessarily conceived of as a relation constituted by such love on the part of the husband and such fidelity on the part of the wife. Without these it is not contracted; where these are wanting or cease to exist, it is shaken to its foundation. The husband cleaves in love to his wife and to none other: true marriage is in its very nature monogamic; the wife must in fidelity belong to this husband and to none other.

How severe is thus the condemnation of all actual adultery, and of all unchastity as the source of adultery, as read in the strong complaints against Israel as the unfaithful wife! What a spirit of moral purity and of chastity is expressed here! We find here already just the view of marriage, and, on the other side, of adultery and whoredom, which meets us in the New Testament, e. g., in the writings of Paul. The prophet knows no better image than that of marriage to set forth the depth and sacredness of Jehovah's relation to Israel, and the Apostle knows no better image than the relation of Christ to his Church to set forth the depth and sacredness of the marriage union.

3. "She knew not that I gave her," etc. This is perpetually repeated. God blesses men with good things — undeservedly, even when they do not serve Him but "idols." But they do not know that it is his hand from which they receive everything. It is just the superabundance of his gifts, that makes them so self-exalted and completely forgetful of Him. God must then change this abundance into want, and make presumptuous men feel their own impotence. And how deeply God can humble men! Such visitations are then the means by which God draws them again to Himself, teaches them to know Him, how unjust and at the same time how foolish is their apostasy from Him, how little their "idols" can help them, rather how ill they reward them; and how good it is, on the other hand, to abide by the service of the true God ("it was better with me than now"). The fruit of such knowledge by humiliation is then the abandonment of idols and a turning to God.

4. That Hosea reverts with special fondness to the ancient history of Israel was already remarked in § 2 of the Introduction, and there shown to be connected with the fundamental idea of his prophetic discourses. In the later chapters (from the ninth onwards) this is specially apparent; but it is also found in our chapter, and thus in the earlier portion of his writings. In this he chiefly takes up the great deeds by which God manifested Himself to the fathers, — the exodus from Egypt, the journey through the Desert, the entrance into the Promised Land. These were the great fundamental acts of God in behalf of Israel, and were most deeply impressed upon the consciousness of the people; for they owed to these their very existence as his people, so that they could never forget them, not even in the season of their greatest decline. Prophetic discourse has in them therefore a sure, unassailable foundation upon which to take its stand. It can point out to the present, in a manner not to be resisted, the dealings of God in his specific relation to Israel his people, can draw from thence its most forcible arguments for its warning and chastening, as well as for its comfort and promises. It has been an advantage which it well understands and knows well how to use.

Special stress is in our chapter laid upon the journey through the desert as upon a season of great significance for Israel. Israel was in the wilderness: the milk and honey of the Promised Land were not yet; the flesh-pots of Egypt were no more. In the latter respect this season was one of deprivation and of want, and apparently of loss. But this was only apparent; for in reality it was not only a deliverance from the bondage of Egypt, which had both outwardly and inwardly injured the people, but God could draw so much nearer to the people spiritually as they were now reduced to corporeal distress, and attest and reveal Himself to them by his helpful and blessed mercy. It was just here that God concluded his covenant with Israel and made them his people, so that their real gain outweighed their apparent loss; and the people to whom God betrothed Himself was or became the people which found itself upon the way to the Promised Land. So the Prophet sees in the profound and fruitful significance of this journey, or rather of this leading through the Desert, a type of the blessing which a removal into the desert as a chastening would convey to the people who had become unfaithful to their God. They are deprived of their possessions, but so only stripped of the prosperity which had made them forgetful of God, and which was therefore an evil. And now when they have these no longer, and are thus freed from the fetters which have bound them spiritually, when, by foreign influences, so to speak, they are brought face to face with God, He has again free access to them; the time has come when God can again betroth Himself to the people who again return to Him, lead them again into the Promised Land, and restore them to a state of renewed prosperity and of richest blessing.

Those then who were led forth into the Desert did not realize the object of that experience. Nor was it individuals whom it was to profit, but the people as such. For them the journey through the wilderness was a season of trial in which they were being prepared to become God's people, who should take possession of the Promised Land. And so in the sense of the prophetic promise the individuals who should suffer the judgment of devastation were not the same as those for whom the day of the new salvation was to break forth. That was to be a new generation. But the people were still the same, in the sense to be stated more clearly immediately.

5. With regard to the promise of our chapter and its fulfillment, the remark made in chap. i. applies, namely, (a.) The fulfillment is not to be seen in the return of the Jews from the exile. This was, to be sure, a fulfillment, but only a small and feeble beginning. For the promise is to be regarded as essentially Messianic. And therefore we Christians, if to us the truth is fully and differently realized that Jesus Christ is the promised Messiah, must hold that this promise has found its fulfillment in Christ, and still finds it in Him; that is, in Christ the new "betrothal" of God to his people has already taken place; but the great salvation which is involved in this is as yet only partially realized, the completion is yet to come. The people of God are still marching through the desert; in Christ we are upon the sure way to the Promised Land, but that goal is not yet reached. (b.) Israel, to whom salvation is here promised by the Prophet, comes into view, not according to its natural nationality, but according to its divine destiny, or according to its typical significance as the People of God. They cannot perish beneath any judgment: for them a new day of salvation is waiting. But as this salvation is conditioned upon the coming of the Messiah, and we know clearly that the Messianic salvation is and shall be universal, so we are forbidden to restrict this great promised day of salvation to the external Israel, although the Prophet undeniably speaks of it, — Israel and God's people being as yet to him essentially one, — and must extend it to the people of God generally, therefore to all believers, believers of Israel together with those of the Gentiles incorporated into the ancient Church, which must ever remain the parent stem. To Israel, who had become "Not-my-people," many of the heathen who had been "Not-my-people" will unite themselves, and to them, with this whole complex "Not-my-people," will God say: "Thou art my people:" and they will say: "My God." So clearly and truly has Paul shown that the Gentiles must first become what Israel was, and that they shall and will really become so, that they shall actually overshadow Israel and so repair what they had lost. If these promises have not found and still do not find their fulfillment in the literal interpretation of what is said of Israel, it is clear that it is not a literal fulfillment of their contents, which speak of temporal blessings in the Holy Land, that is to be expected. Such limited blessings are inseparably connected with the limited range of application; but if the latter, the restriction to Israel, is only the shell and not the kernel, so is it with the former.

When the people of God were embodied in a nation, under the Old Testament, the possession of a definite country as the inheritance assigned them by God was something essential, and therefore, as the desolation of the country was a token of the Divine anger, so its fruitfulness, or in general a state of temporal prosperity, was necessarily an indication of the Divine favor. And so the temporal blessings predicted by the Prophet are the tokens of acceptance, of the returning favor of God. The latter, however, the return of favor, is the main element, the kernel which remains after the husk is stripped off. Yet the favor of God manifests itself still under the New Covenant in temporal blessings, while his wrath is declared in temporal punishments. But it does not need to be shown that the complete abandonment of the notion of a national and local settlement in a definite country, as belonging to the conception of a people of God, went further than this; that the New Covenant opens up a prospect of spiritual and inward blessings and enjoyments of which the former were only a thin shadow; and, in spite of this, to insist upon the literal sense is to beat in the face of the New Covenant, and to deny to the prophetic promises generally their lasting significance. For the legitimate consequence of such a theory is to declare that these are not and never shall be fulfilled; it is not simply to dream of a fulfillment expected still in the millennium, and to transfer to this epoch, which is not described any more definitely in the Apocalypse, conditions for which it is felt that room can be found nowhere else.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

GOD'S testimony against this apostate people: (1) threatening them with severe judgment; (2) and yet alluring them back with glorious promises.—The judgments of God, (1) invoked only by faithless apostasy from Him and base disowning of his favor; (2) aiming only at the complete conversion of the apostate and the joyful acceptance of the converted.

Ver. 4. PSAUF. Bibelwerk: Believers are bound to warn in love their brothers, sisters, or parents, who are remiss in the practice of true religion, and to bring them to the right way.

Ver. 7. God is the real Giver of all temporal and spiritual blessings. If, therefore, thou hast any want, seek its supply from God.

LANGER: It is much more easy and pleasant for a true child of God to serve Him in the enjoyment of his favor and with inward peace, than it is for an untaught child of the world to cleave to it with its restless service of sin.

[MATTHEW HENRY: Crosses and obstacles in an even course are great blessings, and are so to be accounted; they are God's hedges to keep us from transgressing, to restrain us from wandering out of the green pastures, to "withdraw man from his purpose" (Job xxxiii. 17), to make the way of sin difficult that we may not go on in it, and to keep us from it whether we will or not. We have reason to bless God for restraining grace and for restraining judgment. God is a bountiful benefactor even to those whom He foresees will be ungrateful and unthankful to Him. — M.]

Ver. 10. God ever remains the Possessor of the gifts He bestows. PFAFF. Bibelwerk: It is a shameful and inexcusable sin to misuse the gifts of God, in order to serve our evil desires or to promote evil ends. It is a great sin to devote the riches, which God bestows, to the service of idolatry or superstition.

[PUSEY: Since "men have as many strange gods as they have sins," what do they who seek pleasure or gain greatness or praise in forbidden ways or from forbidden sources, than make their pleasure or gain or ambition their god, and offer their time and understanding and ingenuity and intellect, yea their whole lives and their whole selves, their souls and bodies, all the gifts of God, in sacrifice to the idols they have made? — M.]

Ver. 11. PFAFF. BIBELWERK: God takes his gifts from us when we misuse them. He demands a heavy reckoning.

[MATTHEW HENRY: Those that abuse the mercies God gives them to his dishonor cannot expect to enjoy them long. — M.]

Ver. 12. HENGSTENBERG: Him who forsakes God for the world, God puts to shame before the world, and that all the more, the nearer he formerly stood to Him.

[MATTHEW HENRY: Those who will not deliver themselves into the hand of God's mercy cannot be delivered out of the hand of his justice. — M.]

Ver. 14. PFAFF. Bibelwerk: Thus on account of false worship of God and impious doctrine, are whole countries destroyed by the Lord. O, that true zeal would animate the great ones of this world to destroy the kingdom of Satan everywhere powerfully, so that the hand of the Lord may not smite them.

[HENGSTENBERG: The sacred writers are not ashamed to use a base word for such base traffic. They speak throughout of common things in a common manner; for the vulgar word is the most suitable for a vulgar thing. The morality of a people or of an age may be measured by their speaking of a vulgar thing in a vulgar manner, or the reverse. — M.]

Ver. 15. PFAFF. Bibelwerk: This is the way of the gracious and merciful God: if He does first lead us into the desert and make us feel the rod of his wrath, He speaks kindly to us afterwards when we repent, and applies his mercy to our stricken hearts, which are thus made more capable of using it aright.

[MATTHEW HENRY: The best way of reducing wandering souls to God is by fair means. By the promise of rest in Christ we are invited to take his yoke upon us, and the work of conversion may be forwarded by comforts as well as by convictions.

PUSEY: God has mercy, not because we deserve it, but because we need it. He draws us because we are so deeply sunken. He prepares the soul by these harder means, and thus the depths of her misery cry to the depths of his compassion: and because chastisement alone would stupefy her, not melt her, He changes his wrath into mercy, and speaks to the heart which, for her salvation, He has broken. — M.]

Ver. 17. Strife and tribulation are to believers by God's grace a door of hope (Rom. v. 4). It is a peculiar and special work for God's children to praise Him with mouth, heart, and life, for so many blessings received.

PFAFF. Bibelwerk: Behold, O soul, the consequence of thy true repentance. Thou hast new hope, new joy, new faith in Jesus the Bridegroom of our souls, the abandonment of all false and hypocritical worship, new blessings from God, security, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost!

[PUSEY: To each returning soul, the valley of trouble, or the lowliness of repentance, becometh a door of patient longing, not in itself but because God giveth it so; a longing which reacheth on, awaiteth on, entering within the veil, and bound fast to the throne of God. — M.]

Ver. 19. KEIL: The abandonment of idolatry and mixed religion is a work of divine grace which renews the heart and fills it with abhorrence of idolatry in its gross or refined forms.

Ver. 20. Only then can men live with full enjoyment and security in the world, when they feel assured that they have a merciful God.

[MATTHEW HENRY: Tranquillus Deus tranquillat omnia. — M.]

Ver. 21. RIEGER: When the kind alluring of God finds entrance into us, when it educes an answer of humble penitence, how the faithful God becomes inclined to make all his covenant good to us, and to let no good thing fail of all that He has spoken.

PFAFF. Bibelwerk: How highly are the souls of believers esteemed by God that He should betroth Himself to them, and that to eternity, and present Himself and his love to them literally as their own! For in this He presents to them his dear righteousness, the righteousness of Christ, which is of infinite worth; He acquits them in judgment; He displays toward them mercy and compassion by the forgiveness of sins. He even betroths Himself to them in faithfulness, and thus implants the true knowledge of Him in their souls. Prove, O soul, whether thou art as intimate with Him: Dost thou enjoy with Him a blessed and true communion of love? Why is it then that thou dost still love so much the world and sin, and that thy mind is ever occupied with other objects than Jesus?

[SAINT BERNARD: How can it be that so mighty a king should become a Bridegroom, that the Church should be exalted into a bride? That alone which is all-powerful hath power for this. Love that is strong as death. How should that not raise her up, which has already made Him to stoop? If He hath not acted as a spouse, if He hath not loved as a spouse, been jealous as a spouse, then hesitate thou to think thyself espoused. — M.]

Ver. 23, 24. If God be for us, who can be against us. Faith will assuredly gain a hearing. Behold, all creatures are ready to serve believers. Everything must drop blessings upon them.

PRAFF. Bibelwerk: God pours down upon believers from the lofty heaven of his mercy a shower of spiritual gifts, yes, even the oil of the Holy Spirit Himself. It is our part to open the mouths of our heart, and most eagerly receive those blessings which God's mercy vouchsafes to us.

[MATTHEW HENRY: See what a peculiar delight those that are in covenant with God may take in their creature comforts, as seeing them all come to them from the hand of God; they can run up all the streams to the fountain, and taste covenant love in common mercies, which makes them doubly sweet. — M.]

Ver. 25. PRAFF. Bibelwerk: There is thus always time left for repentance, and the Lord still preserves a seed for Himself, which He makes fruitful and increases. If He then is so rich in mercy, O let us become ready to receive it by a true repentance and conversion, and not suppose that this great work can be accomplished in a lifeless spirit or with a hypocritical behavior.

CRAMER: True faith knows God not only as God, but as its God.

RINGER: All in this life that is truly good is included in this: My God! if said not from habit, but with a full title to its use. This is a word of faith, by which we place our whole reliance upon the almighty, true, and compassionate God; it is a word of hope by which we provide ourselves with all good perpetually in God, who is a Rock of Eternity, a word of love and fellowship by which we delight ourselves in the goodness of God, and give ourselves wholly up to Him.

[PUSBY: To say my God, is to own an exclusive relation to God alone. It is to say, my Beginning and my End, my Hope and my Salvation, in whom alone I will hope, whom alone I will fear, love, worship, trust in, and obey, and serve, with all my heart, soul, strength, and mind, my God and my All! — M.]

CHAPTER III.

The Love which Jehovah preserves towards the "Adulterous" People, and the Chastening in Love which He undertakes for their Conversion, again symbolically represented.

- 1 THEN said the Lord [And Jehovah said] unto me, Go yet,¹ love a woman beloved of her friend, yet an adulteress, according to the love of the Lord [Jehovah] toward the children of Israel, who look [and they turn] to other gods, and love flagons of wine² [raisin-cakes]. So I bought her³ to me for a homer of barley and a half-homer of barley. And I said unto her, Thou shalt abide [remain quiet] for me many days; thou shalt not play the harlot, and thou shalt not be for another man: so will I also be for thee. For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim. Afterward shall the children of Israel return and seek the Lord [Jehovah] their God, and David their king, and shall fear⁴ the Lord and his goodness in the latter days [shall tremble towards Jehovah and towards his goodness at the end of the days].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL

1 Ver. 1. — וָיֵצֵא might, especially to gain a relation to $\text{וַיִּתְּנֵם$ (1. 2), be connected with $\text{וַיִּתְּנֵם$. But there is no sufficient ground for a change in the accentuation. The reference to chap. 1. 2 is clear by the connection with וַיִּתְּנֵם .

2 Ver. 1. — The translation of the last two words of ver. 1, in M. V.: "flagons of wine," which is that of Junius, Tremellius, and others, and the various other renderings, have not been due to different readings, but to misconceptions of the meaning of וַיִּתְּנֵם . The only variation of reading seems to have been that held by Aquila, who translates: valued, having read וַיִּתְּנֵם . — M.]

3 Ver. 2. — וַיִּתְּנֵם has here daghesh-forte separative. See Green, Gr., § 24 b; Ewald, § 90 c (b); Böttcher, § 229, 3; 269 b (1). Note the repetition of וַיִּתְּנֵם as characteristic of the Hebrew. It might be better to avoid the like construction in English, as many have done, by rendering: a homer-and-a-half of barley. See the exposition. — M.]

4 Ver. 5. — וַיִּתְּנֵם is a pregnant construction: tremble (and come) toward Jehovah and toward his goodness.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Chapter iii. narrates a second symbolical action, in which the prophet has again to represent by his relations to a woman the relation of God to Israel.

But as regards this relation, that which is to be presented to the senses is essentially different from that which the symbolical action of chap. i. was to present. There the sin of Israel was to be symbolized, with the judgment which Jehovah would inflict upon Israel for their idolatry. Here there is no distinct reference to these. It might be assumed of itself that a simple repetition of the comparison would be inadmissible. We must rather expect an advance. This is found when we consider that we are no longer at the beginning as in chap. i., but that the whole exposition, from chap. ii. 1 onwards, lies between, and especially the section ii. 4 ff., where it is clearly stated that Israel will be deservedly punished, but only because of God's love in order that they may by chastisement be led to return and secure his favor. This announcement is presupposed in our chapter, which naturally stands in close relation to chap. i. But as the latter chapter forms a beginning, so also does it form a conclusion. For here we have not to do with the judgment, as such, which Israel has to suffer, the judgment of rejection, but with the symbolical declaration, that God loves Israel, must chasten them, but does so only out of love, only because He will not cast them off. The symbolizing of this love of God is shown expressly in ver. 1, to be the main object of this purely symbolical transaction, and the emphasis is therefore placed upon the command, to "love," laid upon the prophet, which is inserted designedly. The sequel shows of what kind this love is, and what is its aim. Vers. 1-3 describe the symbolical action. Vers. 4, 5 afford its explanation and inform us of its object.

Ver. 1. And Jehovah said to me: go once more, etc. The reference to chap. i. 2 is clear even by the collocation of לך and לך. לך is essential, as already hinted, and therefore cannot be modified into a mere לך (i. 2) [= take], on account of the לך, which expresses the repetition of the former action. It is only the לך that needs to be repeated, in relation to the woman. But what the prophet is to do this time in respect to the woman is לך. This must express not merely a disposition to love (for a command, and especially the command לך, would not agree with this, expressing as it does an outward act), but an attestation or effectuation of love. Yet this presupposes an inclination to love; in so far it is demanded of the prophet. For he is to represent the conduct of God, and in that his displays of love spring from a loving mind. The prophet is to love a woman who is not in the least worthy of love—to love whom one feels and can feel no desire.

לך אהבה רע ומנאפה. Looking to the second epithet the sense is clear: committing adultery. Thus the prophet must marry an adulterous woman. This can scarcely be a woman who has been unfaithful to her marriage with another. It might be supposed, indeed, that she had been separated from her husband, and it would be difficult to love such a woman, as she gives no guarantee of her fidelity. But nothing is said of any such separation from another, and the tertium comparationis is just the fact that the prophet acts after the analogy of God, and therefore must love a woman who is unfaithful to her marriage with himself. But the difficulty lies in the indefiniteness of the time indicated by the part. מנאפה. Keil takes it to be future—who will become adulterous: naturally, if the woman is one who is first married to the prophet. But the difficulties which attend the explanation as future are less patent with Keil, for he regards לך = לך, which, however, is arbitrary. If we take לך as לך, it is felt immediately that it cannot be simply a future adultery that is here meant. It is meant that love co-exists with adultery at present existing, by which love is not destroyed, but rather is displayed to the adulteress as that which she had trifled with by her infidelity. Hence love is here rather something that is to follow. Only so is it the representative of the attitude of God which is here depicted. For God has indeed loved Israel, though He knew they would afterwards be unfaithful to Him. But it is not that which happened once that is to be exhibited by the prophet, but that which is now transpiring, the present conduct of God towards Israel (as in chap. i. the present conduct of Israel towards God, as Keil there correctly remarks; see above). It is this, that God does not withdraw his love from a spouse who has been and still is unfaithful. Besides, the supposition of a future adultery on the part of a wife whom the prophet is to take, is not admissible according to what follows. For the prophet in fulfilling the command makes this impossible for her (ver. 3). And to suppose that she commits adultery in spite of this prohibition in ver. 3 is against ver. 4; for there a condition of Israel is described in which there is no longer adultery (idolatry). Finally, we may ask more generally, how we can call a woman who is to commit adultery at some future time, מנאפה? Therefore מנאפה is to be taken as a preterite or as a present—a woman who has been or is unfaithful to thee. And the conclusion is a necessary one, that a woman is supposed with whom the Prophet was already united. It would then be surprising, if it were quite forgotten in chap. iii. that a marriage of the prophet had already been described, and a new one were introduced. Such a broken, atomizing method of representation can hardly be imputed to a prophetic writer, especially as there is absolute necessity for understanding a reference to chap. i. in the very matter in question. No, as our chapter presupposes the preceding in a general way, it presupposes chap. i. specially; yet it naturally is not a repetition of the image, but an extension of it. There the prophet was commanded to marry a lewd woman (and to beget children by her). When such a woman is married she is no longer a whore, but an adulteress. For a woman, once characterized as זנונית, naturally retains that character, and when married will be מנאפה. It is thus that she appears in chap. iii. And as first the prophet was to marry a whorish woman, so now he is to love the whorish woman as married, i. e., an adulterous wife. Compared with the other this is something higher, something new. The former was to exhibit a disturbed actual condition of things,—the existing inversion of the normal relations between God and Israel (and in the children the deserved punishment); the latter a comforting truth, the desired restitution of those relations. (We might add: As the unpropitious names of the children have been changed into their opposites, the same thing happens in a certain sense in the unpropitious marriage. There it was said: Thou must take a wife just because she is a whore, and so testify against Israel's sin and of their rejection, and now: Thou must love her although she is an adulteress, and so testify of Israel's hope). And as something essentially different is to be symbolized by this relation of the prophet to his wife, it is not to be wondered at—which cannot be denied,—that the form of the discourse is such that something altogether new appears to begin, or that it appears as though the prophet were now for the first time being brought into relations with this woman. We have here again an indication that we have not to do with real, actual events. A narrative of an actual marriage of the prophet is not given; he is only conceived of as standing in that relation, and since it is only a feigned condition of things, it can very well be viewed first from one side, and then, without any preparation, from another. The woman is naturally called אִשְׁתִּי, not אִשְׁתִּיךָ. For the emphasis lies upon the predicates; his wife appears here as an adulterous woman = love (in thy wife) an adulterous woman. The absence of the article can therefore not be urged against the identity of this woman with the former. This identity is, in fact, only presupposed in the command of our chapter. The main point is that the Prophet may be thought of (1) as being already married, (2) as experiencing his wife's adultery. No importance is attached to the person of the woman, for no actual event is described. If this were the case, a woman, living in wedlock with the Prophet, could not be spoken of as this one is here described. From this it is evident that we have here only the symbolizing of religious truth; as soon as this is accomplished the person of the woman possesses no further interest.

The suffix in אִשְׁתִּי (ver. 2), also appears to allude to a well known woman, and this cannot be disposed of by Keil's remark that the suffix refers simply to the woman mentioned in ver. 1. For according to Keil's view a woman is only described in ver. 1; it is only said what kind of woman she is. This mere predicate of a woman whose person is as yet undefined cannot afterwards be supplied by a personal pronoun but only by: such a woman, or, since that expression is unknown to the Hebrew, by repeating the whole predicate: a woman beloved, etc., if her name were not to be given. The pers. pron. would presuppose that the person named in ver. 1 was already well defined, and not simply a person of the kind described. But this woman is further described as אִשְׁתִּי, and that before the other predicate. The sense has been taken differently: (1) = beloved by a paramour, and therefore parallel with בִּטְחָתָהּ, or the latter would express its consequence: beloved by a paramour, and so committing adultery. (2) "Since אִשְׁתִּי in Jer. iii. 20 denotes a husband but never an adulterous paramour," the phrase is supposed = beloved by a husband and yet practicing adultery. But it is certainly incorrect to say that אִשְׁתִּי can be understood only of a husband and not of a paramour. It means paramour in Jer. iii. 1, at all events. It means simply: one with whom one has intercourse, a companion, and specially in the relations of love: one beloved (see the lexicons). The word does not determine whether the intercourse be lawful or not. Therefore the notion of the marriage relation must not be imported into the word, and we must remain by the sense: beloved one (friend, companion). If the marriage relation is indicated, אִשְׁתִּי is abstracted from this relation as such, and only its inner side, so to speak, the love that is felt in the married state, is brought into view. Now it is just this disposition of love that is to be emphasized in this connection, and therefore אִשְׁתִּי is chosen designedly. The word would thus be just as suitable used of illicit as of conjugal love. But it is especially in favor of the latter that, so far as the conduct of the woman is brought before us, she appears as the (guilty) subject of a love directed towards another, and is therefore to be represented actively, not passively, as the object of a love displayed by another; hence the passive expression: אִשְׁתִּי, would give an unsuitable sense if it should mean: beloved by a paramour. Israel is essentially one who turns to paramours, runs after them unremittently, while, on the other hand, Israel is the object of the Husband's love from the beginning, and is here represented as receiving it. Therefore in the figurative presentation also the love is regarded as coming from, and being bestowed by the husband upon the wife. (It would be otherwise if we had a different punctuation: אִשְׁתִּי). Hence the sense is: Love a woman, who, although beloved by her friend, has yet become an adulteress. Her sin is thus sharply stigmatized, that the love enjoined may appear in greater contrast to it and as something unmerited. This view of אִשְׁתִּי shows all the more the untenableness of any reference to a woman whom the Prophet must now marry. For that phrase would then allude to some person who now appears for the first time. But what meaning would there be in the command: love a woman who will or is to be beloved by her husband, i. e., by thee? The notion would be more tolerable only if אִשְׁתִּי be (with Keil) modified into אִשְׁתִּיךָ which is, however, certainly inadmissible. The words: as Jehovah loves the children of Israel, etc., indicate expressly that what the prophet is to do has a symbolical meaning, and declares also what that meaning is. For they are plainly not merely to be connected (Keil) with אִשְׁתִּי רַע וּמִנְאָפָה = (love) a woman who, although beloved by her husband, commits adultery, and who acts as does Israel, who was loved by God and yet, etc. It is more natural to refer them to the command which the prophet received. This command of God, in itself so surprising and exacting, receives by them its symbolical explanation. It is laid upon him only that he may thus exhibit the love of God, who loves his people and manifests that love, in spite of their unfaithfulness, and by the love enjoined upon him he is to represent and assure to the people this love of God.

אִשְׁתִּי does not merely indicate the reason why the prophet is to love this woman, but it declares also how he is to do so: he must not merely "love" in the general, but must love after that definite manner in which Jehovah loves the children of Israel (which is shown immediately thereafter). And love raisin-cakes. These must have been connected in some way with idolatrous worship: they probably belonged to the offerings presented to the idols, and eaten at the idol-festivals. Hence we are to understand first an image of idol-worship, whose enticing dainties are contrasted with the hard and healthy fare of the serious religion of Jehovah. But this special feature of the worship is chosen in order to show the service to be something agreeing with the flesh, satisfying the sensual nature; which explains the more easily Israel's apostasy, and at the same time includes a bitter reproach: "They forget their God for the sake of dainties."

Vers. 2, 3. Then I purchased her for myself for fifteen silverlings, etc. In ver. 2 we necessarily find the fulfillment of the command of ver. 1, the בְּרִית there enjoined. This is a guide to the exposition. With $\text{חֲמִשָּׁה$ we must supply שֶׁקֶל , fifteen shekels of silver. Homer is the name of a dry measure = a cor, or ten baths or ten ephahs (see Ezek. xlv. 11), חֲמִשָּׁה = a half homer. Together = a homer and a half or fifteen ephahs. The money value of this quantity of barley cannot be determined; for it is arbitrary to suppose, because fifteen ephahs are mentioned along with fifteen shekels of silver, that therefore they are of equal value, and that an ephah of barley was worth an ephah of silver. An agreement of the numbers would then have been avoided; nothing would have been said of the fifteen ephahs, and an altogether different measure would have been given. Nothing is to be concluded from 2 Kings vii. 1-18, nor from Ex. xxi. 32, if, indeed, the latter can be at all connected with this verse. It is supposed that the passage in Exodus affords the key to the understanding of our passage, and the thirty pieces of silver are sought here the more earnestly. Thirty pieces of silver are there stated to be the price of a slave, and it is supposed that the Prophet paid the same sum for the woman in order to symbolize the state of bondage from which God redeemed Israel. But Kurtz rightly rejects this explanation of the passage and its application to our verse, on the ground that there it is not the price of a slave that is alluded to, but the compensation allowed for a slave killed on account of the carelessness of another. In the latter case it was just as allowable and fitting to fix one and the same price without respect to age, sex, and constitution, as it would have been wrong and foolish to fix the market price under the same conditions. For in the former case (of killing) the responsibility was just the same no matter who the slave might be, a strong man, or a woman, or a decrepit or aged person. Zech. xi. 12 might better be compared. But this passage does not speak of the price of a slave, and besides, it is an arbitrary assumption that our passage speaks of thirty shekels' worth. So we are shut up to an explanation of our passage from itself alone, and we have no sure ground for believing that a redemption from bondage is alluded to. On the other hand, we are not justified in assuming a purchase of the woman from her parents with the pieces of silver, etc., for "it cannot be shown that it was a custom with the Israelites to purchase the bride from her parents" (Keil). Keil therefore holds that the fifteen silverlings, etc., are something given to the woman. Of course it cannot be meant that the pieces of silver, etc., were given to the present paramour of the woman. Such an offering would be itself surprising: but we must also remember that the woman is not conceived of as being adulterously connected with a paramour.

What now does בְּרִית mean? It is clear that the meaning "dig" is unsuitable here, for the explanation of Hengstenberg, from Ex. xxi. 6; Deut. xv. 17, is strange and awkward. In Gen. i. 5; Deut. ii. 6; Job i. 27; xl. 30, it has the meaning: purchase, make a bargain; in the last two passages with עַל of the person or thing for or about which the bargain was made: in the first two with an accusative = to purchase, buy; in the first with בְּ , of the person who is bought: in the second with בְּ , of the price paid. So also here: I purchased her to me for, etc. This certainly appears not to agree with our explanation of chap. iii., which we hold is concerned with a woman with whom the prophet is already married; but this contradiction is only apparent. For, though the woman is married to the prophet, she is yet an adulterous wife, and has therefore renounced her husband (compare Israel's attitude towards God). If he "loves" her still, and would prove to her his enduring love, he must act towards her as one who weds a wife, he must purchase her, like a stranger, with a bridal gift. If this points to the guilt, the extreme estrangement of the woman, it shows also directly the endurance of the husband's love that he should act thus, that he should treat as a bride a degraded, adulterous wife, from whom it would be most natural to cut himself entirely loose, that he should even give her a bridal present in opposition to all natural inclinations! Yet this is not a blind love, but it corresponds to the circumstances of the case (compare God's attitude towards Israel), a love which involves a beneficial chastening. This is indicated in our verse. It is assuredly not without design that a production of nature forms part of the gift. It shows that it was intended for the support of life. It is probably indicated that the woman is not yet taken into the husband's house; for such a gift would then have no meaning. Further, the bridal gift is such a one as the wife had the least right to claim or expect: a token that her husband loves her still and will not cut himself off wholly from her. And if this cannot be maintained with certainty, it is still probable (barley was among the ancients a food but little esteemed) that this whole present was not at all a rich one, but only barely sufficient, especially if we can assume that it was to last "many days." Ver. 3 gives additional information as to the action of the prophet described in ver. 2, יָסִים רַבִּים , an indefinite period of long duration: the end will depend upon the conduct of the wife. לִי יֵשֶׁב = to sit, i. e., "to keep quiet. The לִי shows that such conduct was to be observed with reference to the husband, that he so disposes of her from love to her, in order to improve her and educate her to become his faithful wife." יֵשֶׁב לִי therefore does not mean: dwell with me. What was remarked in ver. 2 proves this already, and the meaning of ver. 4, especially, would not suit such a sense, for a relation of communion with God is here denied. The difficult words אֵלַי אֵלַי אֵלַי , are probably to be explained in a corresponding manner with the recent expositors: and I will be so towards thee, namely, observe the same conduct towards thee, i. e., have no conjugal intercourse with thee. Another explanation is: and I also will hold myself ready for thee, wait for thee, i. e., not take any other wife. This is possible in itself, but not suitable to ver. 4, which contains the explanation of ver. 3. For this verse contains only a negative thought (see on ver. 4). Therefore the sense of the whole is: The Prophet displays unmerited love towards his adulterous wife, according to the command $\text{אֲהַב$ for, like a bridegroom he again acquires her with a bridal gift. But this love has also for its object the improvement of the wife, and he therefore manifests his love in such a manner as to secure that end. He cares for her support, but limits her allowance that she may learn salutary humility. He naturally interdicts her adulterous habits, but does not at once resume his conjugal intercourse with her. This is therefore a manifestation of love of a disciplinary character, but still essentially of love, — just as is that of God toward Israel.

Ver. 4. For many days will the children of Israel sit, etc. Ver. 4 is the explanation (וְיָסֵד = for) of ver. 3. Three pairs of objects are named of which the children of Israel shall be deprived. King and prince — holders of the civil government, which will therefore cease in Israel. Also the worship will cease with it. This is represented by the two following, וְזָבַח, sacrifice, and וְהָיָה, statutes, defining the sense more closely. Besides these, two objects used as oracles are mentioned: the ephod, which was strictly the High-priest's shoulder-garment, with the Urim and Thummim, which was put on or brought out when oracles were given. It is brought into view here evidently not in relation to the High-priest, but on account of its connection with oracles in general, as its use was imitated even by idolaters in worship (Judges xvii.

5; xviii. 14, 17, 18, 20). The וְהָיָה were also used for the same purpose. They are equivalent to Penates (comp. Zech. xix. 2; Ezek. xxi. 26), and in the passage cited from Judges are mentioned along with the ephod. Whether the sense is that Israel will have neither the worship of Jehovah nor idolatry, remains doubtful. For, according to what has been said, the ephod does not directly imply the worship of Jehovah; still less does וְזָבַח. Probably the distinction between the two is not implied, but worship simply indicated. The condition of things is described as one of the deprivation of that which had been Israel's support (king and prince) and joy and consolation (sacrifice, etc.); and the important fact is that idolatry should cease. This should be effected against Israel's desire, would be a punishment like the cessation of their own government, civil independence; but the punishment is a chastening in love, a token that God had not forgotten Israel. It is true that this positive truth, of a manifestation of love, lies in the background in our verse, which wears a negative aspect. But this love was declared in ver. 1 to be the main thought, and in ver. 5 (whose purport, moreover, transcends the symbol) it appears quite clearly by the issue to be the object in view.

Ver. 5. Afterwards will the children of Israel return: a post hoc which includes, however, clearly a propter hoc, i. e., the situation described in ver. 4 is an essential coöperating factor. Will seek Jehovah their God and David their king. "Seeking Jehovah their God is connected with seeking David their king. For as the apostasy of the ten tribes from the kingdom of David was only the consequence and result of its inner apostasy from Jehovah, so the true return to God could not take place without a return to their king David, since God had promised the kingdom to David forever in his seed (2 Sam. vii. 13, 16); thus David is the only true king of Israel — their king" (Keil). The family of David is probably primarily meant, and more strictly, a king of that family. The conclusion, "at the end of the days," alludes to the Messianic period, according to prophetic usage elsewhere; hence we are justified in assuming the Messiah to be also meant here. Will tremble towards Jehovah. וְרָדַף, to tremble; with וְיָסֵד it forms a pregnant expression: tremble hastening towards.

It is a stronger expression for the preceding וְיָסֵד = seek with anxiety, since the needed help is found in the One sought; therefore sought with solicitude, although He assuredly will be found, because He is the seeker's only dependence. This is thus the direct contrast to the former abandonment of Jehovah and seeking help in idols. What is sought in God is his goodness, especially in his gifts, of which they had been deprived (comp. Jer. xxxi. 12; Zech. ix. 17). On the end of the days see the preceding remarks. This is therefore the end of the "many days," or the fuller explanation of וְיָסֵד.

[The discussion given above of this chapter is so full and able, both as to its general purport and as to its special features, that no additions are necessary from any writer holding the identity of the woman here described with that of chap. i. The force of some of the arguments employed is overestimated, and others, as is readily perceived, are too largely based on mere speculation, yet the general results go to show the strong probability of the correctness of this hypothesis and of its consequences, where they affect the interpretation of individual passages. The recent English commentators agree with the majority of the moderns in holding this view. Newcome adopts the old opinion that the Prophet's former wife (Gomer) had died in the interval. Noyes thinks that it is immaterial whether the women are identical or not. The fullness of the discussion of the several minor features of this short chapter precludes the necessity of additions from the remarks of Anglo-American expositors, which are, moreover, usually of a comparatively general nature. On some points, as, for example, the object of the "purchase" of the woman, and its symbolical meaning, the difficulties cannot be said to be yet satisfactorily solved. — M.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On the love of Jehovah to Israel, which endures in spite of all unfaithfulness, but does not forget to chasten, see the Introduction, and especially No. 1 in the Doctrinal and Ethical section attached to chap. ii.

2. A condition of things, such as that threatened in ver. 4, characterized the kingdom of the ten tribes when they were led away into exile by Assyria; and in this we can see a fulfillment, although nothing is said of any captivity, and in fact nothing of the manner in which the kingdom and worship should cease. It is very doubtful, to say the least, whether we can claim for the threatening a wider range, and make it apply also to the kingdom of Judah. Nothing can be adduced from the resemblance to the threatening which the Prophet Azariah uttered against Judah in the days of Asa (2 Chron. xv. 2, 4). For ver. 5 of our chapter points too clearly to the kingdom of the ten tribes, and no judgments are pronounced against Judah until the later chapters, which belong to a later period. The threatening goes hand in hand with the promise. The latter holds out, first of all, a return, which, according to the words: shall seek Jehovah their God, is to be taken as a contrast to the resort made to other gods (ver. 1). According to the promise they will also seek David their king. [See the passage quoted from Keil in the exegetical section.] The house of David is naturally the primary object of the reference. For in returning thither they acknowledge the divine right of David to the kingdom. This promise is shown here indubitably to be Messianic by the expression: "at the end of the days," which "does not denote the future in general, but always the coming consummation of the kingdom of God, which begins with the advent of the Messiah," (Keil.) We cannot, therefore, find the fulfillment in that which happened in the return from the Babylonian exile, apart from the consideration that that event affected mainly the kingdom of Judah, while here the kingdom of Israel is the subject of discourse; thus the promise was not then fulfilled. Hence the question is suggested here also: Since this promise was not fulfilled to Israel even with the coming of the Messiah, has it fallen to the ground, or is the fulfillment yet to be expected? According to what has been remarked under chap. i., both questions are to be answered in the negative, and the answer rather is: The fulfillment has already begun in Him, in whom all the promises of God are Yea and Amen, but in another and far higher sense than the Prophet imagined, who saw the people of God in Israel alone. Separating the kernel from the husk, we must, upon the ground of the New Covenant, see the fulfillment in the gathering of a people of God around a descendant of David who was greater than David's son, — around Christ. And so, though this is not the literal meaning of the promise, "King David" that one of David's family who was to be sought after, is the Messiah. In this Son of David it is fulfilled, though not yet completely. The promise is still in course of fulfillment, and to its perfect fulfillment is specially necessary the universal conversion of Israel to Christ, but, as is natural, not merely the people of the ten tribes, here literally indicated.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. LUTHER: Let us cease to fear the wrath and judgment of God on account of our sins, and believe what the Prophet says, that God is like a husband who, although he has been deserted by an adulterous wife and is angry thereat, is yet more impelled by mercy, than urged by the sin of the adulteress, and wins her back to his love. And truly has the Prophet in two respects set forth great things. For, in the first place, he could not describe sin as being more dreadful than he here pictures it in the sin of the adulteress. And, again, he extols highly the love of God by this image, when he says that He is animated by love towards the adulteress.

[PUSEY: His love was to outlive hers, that He might win her at last to Himself. Such, God says, is the love of the Lord for Israel. — M.]

[Ver. 2. MATTHEW HENRY: Those whom God designs honor and comfort for He first makes sensible of their own worthlessness, and brings them to acknowledge with the prodigal: "I am no more worthy to be called thy son." Poverty and disgrace sometimes prove a happy means of making great sinners penitent. Comp. the Exegetical remarks. — M.]

Ver. 4. Although it is a great punishment of God, that a government should be cast down, it is yet a much greater punishment that liberty should be taken away to serve God and teach his Word.

LUTHER: Ver. 5. These are glorious words of the Prophet who thus combines God and Christ in worship, so that, when we call upon God, we should do so through Christ; when we hope in the mercy of God we hope through Christ that God would have mercy on us.

[PUSEY: So God's goodness overflows with beneficence and condescension, and graciousness and mercy and forgiving love, and joy in imparting Himself, and complacency in the creatures which He has reformed, and reformed, redeemed, and sanctified for his glory. Well may his creatures tremble towards it with admiring wonder that all this can be made theirs! — M.]

A. Against the People as a Whole on Account of their Idolatry and the Corruption of their Morals (promoted by the Priests).

CHAPTER IV. 1-19.

- 1 Hear the word of Jehovah, ye children of Israel !
For Jehovah has a difference with the inhabitants of the land,
Because there is no fidelity and no goodness
And no knowledge of God in the land ;
- 2 (Only) cursing and lying,
And murdering and stealing and adultery ;
They break in, and murder follows upon murder.
- 3 Therefore will the land mourn,
And all who dwell therein shall languish,
With the beast¹ of the field and the bird of heaven ;
And the fish of the sea also shall be swept away.
- 4 Only let none contend,
And let none reprove (another) ;
And thy people² is like those that strive with the priest.
- 5 And thou shalt fall in the day-time.
And the Prophet also shall fall with thee in the night,
And I will destroy thy mother.
- 6 My people are destroyed for want of knowledge !³
Because thou despisest knowledge,
So do I despise thee³ to be my Priest ;
Because thou dost forget the law of thy God,
I also will forget thy children.
- 7 The more they increased the more they sinned against me ;
Their glory will I turn into shame.
- 8 They eat [make profit of] the sin of my people,
And direct their desires after their transgressions.
- 9 And so it is : as the people, so the priest,
And I will visit their ways upon them,
And reward to them their deeds.
- 10 Then they shall eat and not be satisfied,
Will practice whoredom and not spread abroad,
Because they forgot⁴ Jehovah, to regard Him.

- 11 Whoredom and wine and new wine
Will take (possession of) a heart.
- 12 My people¹ inquires of its wood [idols],
And their staff shall declare to it;
For the spirit of whoredom has deceived them,
And they commit whoredom (departing) from under their God.
- 13 They sacrifice on the summits of the mountains,
And burn incense on the hills;
Under the oak and poplar and terebinth,
Because their shadow is pleasant.
Therefore your daughters commit whoredom
And your daughters-in-law commit adultery.
- 14 Yet I will not visit upon [punish] your daughters because they commit whoredom,
Nor your daughters-in-law because they commit adultery;
For they [you] themselves go aside with prostitutes,
And sacrifice with temple-girls,
And the people without understanding shall be cast down.
- 15 If thou commit whoredom, O Israel!
Let not Judah become guilty,
Go not to Gilgal,
And ascend not to Beth-aven,
And swear not: by the life of Jehovah.
- 16 For Israel is as intractable as an unbroken heifer;
Now Jehovah will pasture them
Like a lamb in a wide field.
- 17 Ephraim is joined to idols — let him be.
- 18 Their drinking-feast is spoiled;
They keep on whoring.
Their shields [rulers] keep on loving shame.⁶
- 19 The tempest seizes them with its wings:
And they shall be ashamed of their sacrifices.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 2. — וְיָדָעוּ יָדָעוּ. יָדָע is used here as in Gen. vii. 21; ix. 10, to specify or enumerate objects indicated before in the general. In usage, though not in grammatical function, it is equivalent to our namely. — M.]

[2 Ver. 4. — וְיָדָעוּ יָדָעוּ. Newcome gives a variety of emendations and transpositions, partly from other sources, in order to obtain a more natural sense than the one he draws from the text. He seems to have been misled by the difficulty suggested by Houbigant, who remarks that it could not be a crime to contend with idolatrous priests. These of course, are not meant. See the exposition. Among the ancient translators, the LXX., Aquila, and Arab. read יָדָעוּ: my people, which seems more natural but is not necessary. — M.] Meier would point differently, and reads וְיָדָעוּ יָדָעוּ: with thee, against thee, namely, God, and makes the negation continue: (let no one be) against thee. This is forced. The וְיָדָעוּ would be necessary, and יָדָעוּ would not be the proper preposition.

[3 Ver. 6. — We must not read וְיָדָעוּ יָדָעוּ unexpectedly (Meier). The article is essential — וְיָדָעוּ יָדָעוּ. According to the Masora the third יָדָע is superfluous, and therefore probably a orthographical error. According to Ewald it is an Aramaic pausal form. (Henderson: The third יָדָע is not found in a great number of Kennicott's and De Rossi's manuscripts, nor in some of the earlier printed editions; in others it is marked as redundant, and a few have וְיָדָעוּ יָדָעוּ. — M.]

4 Ver. 10. — וְיָדָעוּ יָדָעוּ. Meier attaches this word to the following verse: to practice lewdness, etc. But this is forced. (Henderson cites the similar view of Seadins, Arnold, and Horsley, but thinks "there is something so repugnant to Hebrew usage in the combination: to observe fornication, wine and new wine, that it is altogether inadmissible." But his choice of the term "observe" is arbitrary. In thus opposing Horsley, he overlooks the fact that the latter renders: to give attention to, a sense of the word which is not at all repugnant to Hebrew usage. It must be remembered that they "neglected" Jehovah or dropped Him from their thoughts; the antithesis would naturally be: to keep in mind lewdness, etc. This is the exact usage of the word in Gen. xxxvii. 11; Ps. cxxx. 3. Horsley's arguments are mainly based upon the double anomaly of the construction as formerly assumed, in which וְיָדָעוּ was supposed to govern its object indirectly (and irregularly) by means of יָדָע with the infinitive, and וְיָדָעוּ was regarded as governing (against usage) וְיָדָעוּ as its direct object: they forgot to regard Jehovah. וְיָדָעוּ is now admitted by some to govern וְיָדָעוּ directly, and the pers. pron.: him, is supplied after regard, as is done by Schmoller. But, even with this construction, the omission of the object in the original after וְיָדָעוּ יָדָעוּ would be unaccountable and very abrupt. To these considerations this other may be added, that under the present division of the verses, ver. 11 is made unusually brief. These difficulties in the way of the ordinary constructions should lead us to regard the subversion of the mark of division between the verses with more favor than should ordinarily be shown to attempts at amending the text. The proposed change would give the translation: because they have neglected Jehovah to set their minds on whoredom and wine and new wine, (which) will take possession of the heart. — M.]

[5 Ver. 12. — Henderson: "The LXX. and most versions which follow them connect עָמִי with לֵב at the end of the preceding verse; a mode of construction adopted by Michaelis and Dathe, but otherwise disapproved by modern translators. — M.]

6 Ver. 18. — $\text{הִנֵּה הַיָּהוָה הִנֵּה}$ perhaps belong together, a pialal form from הִנֵּה , except that the doubling has been separated in an extraordinary manner. It is therefore really instead of $\text{הִנֵּה הַיָּהוָה הִנֵּה}$. Wünsche would read $\text{הִנֵּה הַיָּהוָה הִנֵּה}$ resembling the preceding $\text{הִנֵּה הַיָּהוָה הִנֵּה}$. [On this combination see Green, Gr., §§ 92 a, 128, 1; Ewald, § 120 a; Böttcher, § 1065 b. These grammarians, as well as the best critics generally, regard it as one word. The form with which it is usually compared is $\text{שִׁמְחֹתָי$, Ps. lxxxviii. 17. The last named author calls our form a Qitalal, corresponding to the form adopted by Schmoller. The notion conveyed by such forms is that of intensity, or repetition. So Ewald: es lieben lieben Schmach seine Schilde. Comp the rendering of Delitzsch in the passage just cited: vernicht-nichtigt. If the alternative of separate words be adopted, it would be almost necessary to adopt some such expedient as that of Wünsche given above; for the rendering of K. V.: her rulers with shame do love; give ye, is almost unintelligible. — M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Four strophes may be supposed with Keil (vers. 1-5; 6-10; 11-14; 16-19), although it can hardly be maintained in general, that our Prophet observes a strict strophical division.

Ver. 1. Hear the word of Jehovah, etc. Jehovah appears against Israel as a Judge (that is, Israel of the Ten Tribes, comp. ver. 15), who raises the accusation, and pronounces the sentence and punishment. In a certain sense this first strophe contains the sense of the whole. Jehovah has a contest = legal action, comp. Micah vi. 2, and with relation to the heathen, Joel iii. 2. — אֱמִתּוֹת is faithfulness, trueness to one's word. חֶסֶד is affection, kindness, love. These qualities are frequently mentioned together; usually as divine attributes, but sometimes also as human virtues. חֶסֶד is here probably special kindness towards the feeble and distressed (Keil). The opposites are primarily moral defects. But they have their root in that which is Israel's grand defect, in the want of the knowledge of God, i. e., they do not know the living God or know Him any longer — naturally through their own fault — since they do not care to serve Him.

Ver. 2. Along with the negative description of the corruption we have the positive. The sins are not described by substantives, but are expressed in a lively manner as actions by verbs, and that with special emphasis by the inf. absol. Five sins are thus mentioned, corresponding to five of the Ten Commandments, and at the same time these sins form a definite contrast to fidelity and goodness. Swearing along with lying naturally = false swearing, or, at all events, wanton swearing. וְשָׁבַע forms the transition to the finite verb; the last three sins, especially murder, are represented in the concrete, and at the same time as something fearfully prevalent. [The literal translation of the last three words is: and bloody deed touches bloody deed. דָּמָאֵם meant originally: drops of blood, then transferred to deeds of blood in general, and it is altogether probable that this word was chosen here to present to the imagination the picture of a swift succession of murderous assaults, following so closely that drops of the blood of one victim might be conceived as meeting and mingling with those of another. If so, this is a striking illustration of Hosea's wonderful power of graphic poetical delineation. Henderson: "What the Prophet means is that murder was so common that no space was left between its acts. LXX.: ἀφάρτα ἐφ ἀφάρτα μύρονον. Coverdale: one bloudgiltyness foloweth another. And Ritterhusius powerfully in his poetical metaphor: —

— 'Sic sanguini sanguis
Traditur, et scelus natus finire modus est.'"

See 2 Kings xv.; Micah vii. 2. — M.]

Ver. 3. Therefore will the land mourn, etc. The punishment of that moral deprivation; a great and universal drought, such, e. g., as prevailed under Ahab, was a judgment of God. This is described in its effects: The mourning of the land is a lively figurative expression for the scorching away of all vegetable productions, and the languishing of animal life, and the beasts are named, because the drought was, so to speak, to be described from its natural side (comp. Joel i. 10 ff.). It is just in this condition of nature generally that God executes judgment upon man. The drought is not to be conceived of as existing at present, but is threatened, as the whole chapter generally is occupied with threatening. קִרְיָשָׁב

קִרְיָשָׁב probably does not refer to the men themselves but is specified by the following וְ , and therefore refers to the beasts, etc. [Keil: וְ is used in the enumeration of the individuals as in Gen. vii. 21; ix. 10. The fishes are mentioned last, and introduced by the emphatic וְ to show that the drought would prevail to such an extent that even lakes and other bodies of waters would be dried up. וְקִרְיָשָׁב : to be collected, to be taken away, to disappear or perish. — M.]

Ver. 4. Only let none contend, and let none reprove, etc. These words appear quite unexpectedly and are not quite clear. There seems to be a verbal reference to ver. 1; and it may be that there is a contrast to that contending there announced on the part of God. The sense would then be: The Lord will contend, but it is presumptuous for men to strive against Him; none are to contend or reprove. Or we might forego the reference to ver. 1, and explain generally: let none contend or reprove! The hardened hearts of the people would then be referred to, who would listen to no rebuke. So Luther after the Vulgate:

yet let none rebuke, etc. But וְלֹא is thus falsely rendered. It is not = yet. Therefore others hold that there is a demand "only" to neglect pleading with and rebuking the corrupt people. There would indeed be much to rebuke, but it would be to no purpose (Keil). But this thought is not suitable to the context. It is just on the part of God that the וְלֹא does take place, and is not the whole prophetic discourse a rebuke? Others suppose a demand to the people not to resist God and his judgment. But וְלֹא will not suit here; it must be taken in the sense of censuring: let none censure God and his deeds. The explanation of Wünsche is therefore better: let none quarrel with another and attribute to him the blame of the calamity. And thy people as those who contend with the priest, that is, are like those, etc. With the first explanation of the preceding words, the ones now considered would surround them with still greater difficulties: let none contend — uttered with respect to the spirit of contradiction among the people — and they act as, etc. With the second explanation the words serve to support the preceding, to show the uselessness of contending and rebuking: yet thy people are like, etc. The explanation of Wünsche shows the best connection: the reason is given why none should reproach the others: the whole people are alike. In form however the sentence is not a confirmatory one, being simply coördinated by } [This objection is not conclusive. } very often introduces a reason. See Green, Gr., § 287, 1. The opinion assigned to Wünsche is that not only adopted in E. V. but approved by most of the recent English commentators. Noyes prefers the view assigned above to Keil. On attempts to amend the text for other renderings, see the Textual note. — M.] Contend with the priest — an unexpected expression, perhaps to be explained by Deut. xvii. 12 f. The people are like those who in the Law are described as rebels against the authority of the priest. They are therefore those who would not allow themselves to be directed aright by those whose prerogative it was to direct them (Hengstenberg, Keil).

Ver. 5. וְלֹא naturally refers to the punishment [as the cause of the fall (destruction) of the people, whom the Prophet now directly addresses. — M.] Prophet, naturally = false prophets (comp. 1 Kings xxii. 6 ff.), "who followed prophesying as a source of gain." In the day, — by night: a figurative representation distributed according to the members of the sentence. The meaning is: the people and prophets shall fall all the time. And I will destroy thy mother = the whole nation conceived of as the mother of the children of Israel.

Ver. 5. My people is destroyed. וְלֹא not: unawares (Meier), but: from want of knowledge [see Gram. note], i. e., chiefly, knowledge of God. Yet the expression is to be taken primarily in its general reference; compare the beginning and end of the next strophe [vers. 11-14]. This want of knowledge is blameworthy, a despising of knowledge. This shows the nearer reference to be to the knowledge of God. Israel could have gained this from the law, but had forgotten that law. And I will despise thee from being a priest to me. This does not refer to the priest simply. All Israel, according to Ex. xix. 6, was to be a priestly people, and to be thus distinguished from the heathen, the profane. But they were to forfeit this high prerogative. The notion therefore = "shall be not-my-people," chaps. i.-ii.

Ver. 7. The more they increased, not merely in numbers, but in prosperity, power, etc., — the more they sinned; comp. ii. 7. They ascribed this prosperity to their idols, and were thus confirmed in idolatry. Accordingly Israel's glory, consisting in their richness and greatness, shall be turned into shame, i. e., they shall lose their glory and stand dishonored.

Ver. 8. A transition to the Priests, according to the purport of the words, and the beginning of ver. 9. They eat the sin of my people. They live upon, derive their support from, the sin of the people. That is their right to do so, the more the people sin, i. e., serve idols. For the very existence of the idol priesthood depended upon the idolatry of the people. Keil, still more specially, makes וְלֹא = sin-offering of the people (so also Luther). In the Law the priest was enjoined to eat the flesh of the sin-offering to blot out the sin of the people (Lev. vi. 19). But that became sin to the priests, because (second member of the verse) they directed their desires towards the transgression of the people, that is, wished their transgressions to multiply, so as to acquire a large supply of food from their offerings. The peculiar expression: eat the sin, may still bear allusion to the sacrificial ritual. But the notion is probably more general: they live upon the sin = the idolatry of the people, as they eat the flesh of the sacrifice offered to idols. He lifts up his soul towards = directs his desires towards. The singular suffix is anomalous; it is perhaps distributive: each one lifts up his soul. The meaning of the whole would be: Since they live upon the sin of my people, they wish for nothing more earnestly than that the people should keep on sinning more and more, namely, in idolatry. [So the expositors generally. — M.]

Ver. 9. Since the priests go hand in hand with the people, the people serving idols and the priests desiring their idolatry, a like punishment will overtake them all. [Henderson: "The rank and wealth of the priests will not exempt them from sharing the same fate with the rest of the nation." — M.]

Ver. 10. They will eat, etc. "Eat" refers back to ver. 8, and therefore the primary reference is to the priests — וְלֹא. The usual force of the hiphil = edifice to whoredom, would hardly suit here, although it is the priests who are spoken of.

The addition וְלֹא is unsuitable to this sense, for an extension by the procreation of children, which is here denied of them, could be predicated of those who commit whoredom, but not of those who only seduce others into that sin. Therefore it probably = a strengthened kal, as in ver. 18; 2 Chron. xxi. 13. The literal signification cannot here be excluded, if we take into account the conclusion of the verse, and especially the parallelism with "eat." Ver. 11, also, necessitates the conjunction of whoredom with "wine and must" = debauchery, and thus supports the literal interpretation, as also in vers. 13, 14, the daughters are said to be actual whores. But yet all this is only the consequence of spiritual whoredom = idolatry, and in closest connection with it. It is that which is to be rebuked, and the figurative sense therefore predominates in ver. 12, where idolatrous practices are specially denounced, in the expression: spirit of whoredom. Whoredom as a consequence of idolatry, and as connected with it, and idolatry itself, are to the prophet perfectly identical, because inseparably united. The reason why they will not be satisfied or be extended, which are negative expressions affirming strongly their opposite, is that they forsook to regard. The expression refers to Jehovah: they forsook Jehovah, to keep Him, to regard, to honor Him (comp. Ps. xxxi. 7; Prov. xxvii. 18) = they forsook Him and ceased to regard, honor Him. [See Gram. nota. — M.]

Ver. 11. Whoredom and wine and new wine takes possession of the heart, בְּלִי, "the centre of the whole spiritual and moral life, the understanding, the will, and the sensibilities" (Wünsche). Hence the capture of the heart = the obscuring and perversion of the understanding and the will, expressing generally the intellectually and morally polluting influence of a life given up to sensual enjoyment. Then in the first member of ver. 12 a proof of this is adduced, — a special instance of apostasy from the living God.

Ver. 12. שָׂאֵל עֵצִים, inquire of idols framed of wood, especially teraphim, in order to gain a divine revelation; in direct contrast to שָׂאֵל יְיָ. The reproach is made keener by the contrasted words: my people, their wood: the people who are Jehovah's seek to wood, which is made their god instead of Jehovah. Their staff shall instruct them. This was the so-called rhabdomancy: two staves placed upright were allowed to fall while incantations were being repeated, and an oracular response was supposed to be given by the direction of its fall, backwards or forwards, to the right or to the left. [So described by Cyril of Alexandria. Compare the use of divining-rods or wishing-rods. — M.] This course of action is expressly attributed to the influence of a spirit of whoredom: idolatry (in connection with its consequences, whoredom and debauchery) is a seductive, demoniacal power, which they could no longer resist. מִתַּחַת אֲנָשֵׁי, literally, from under their

God, like בְּיָמֵינוּ (i. 2), the normal relation to God is here regarded as one of subjection. It is from this that they withdraw themselves.

Ver. 13. Upon the summits of the mountains, etc. (comp. Deut. xii. 2; Jer. ii. 20; iii. 6; Ezek. vi. 13). Mountains and hills, as is well known, were favorite places for idolatrous worship. So also were green and shady trees in pleasant places (here specified instead of the usual general expression, "under every green tree"). "Therefore" = because the places of idol-worship everywhere arranged gave abundant opportunity, therefore your daughters commit lewdness (Keil). "Lewdness" is here, at all events, used in its literal sense, see especially ver. 14, second part. The prostitution of young maidens and of wives formed an essential portion of the nature-worship of Babylon and Canaan. It would seem from the mention of temple-girls in ver. 14 that the worship of Astarte, or something similar, is implied. But, even apart from this, the sensuous character of idolatry commonly induced unchaste practices.

Ver. 14. Those who are young cannot be blamed, for those who are older are worse still. הֵם: they = husbands and fathers. בָּרֵךְ, here intransitive:

to go aside in order to be alone with the לְוָיִת. לְוָיִת is one who is consecrated to the service of Astarte, or some similar Canaanitish divinity; women who prostituted themselves for gain. Offer with the temple-girls: appear with them at the altar. To such an extent did they carry their impudence and shamelessness. At the end of the strophe want of understanding is again emphasized; it is this that brings them to their fall.

Vers. 15-19 contain a warning to Judah not to participate in Israel's idolatry and shameless conduct, in order to escape the dreadful ruin of the former.

Ver. 15. If thou, Israel, dost commit whoredom. Whoredom is here predominantly employed in its metaphorical, but includes also the literal sense. A participation in Israel's idolatry would have been induced by pilgrimages to the shrines of the ten tribes, which still, presumably, were made. Such places were: Gilgal, southwest from Shiloh, now Djidjilia, formerly the seat of a School of the Prophets (2 Kings ii. 1; iv. 38); later a seat of idolatrous worship, and mentioned as such besides in our Prophet, ix. 15; xii. 12, and Amos iv. 4; v. 5; and Bethel, south of Gilgal, near the borders of Israel and Judah; now Betin. This is probably meant here by Beth-Aven, the name being intentionally changed; comp. Amos v. 5; mentioned also in Amos iv. 4 along with Gilgal. Swear not: by the life of Jehovah. This cannot be forbidden in itself, for in Deut. vi. 13; xx. 20 it is directly enjoined. Swearing applied to the service of idolatry must be meant, and that in the two places above-mentioned. It appears evident that certain formulas of swearing characteristic of Jehovah's worship were employed in idolatrous service, and that for the purpose of giving to the latter a seeming justification.

Ver. 16. The punishment of Israel is pointed out in order to strengthen the warning to Judah.

סָבָר, intractable, stubborn, will not be subject to God. God then gives them a free course — bitter irony, — like a sheep on a wide plain: that is, they shall be dispersed far and wide. [Henderson: "The latter hemistich contains the language of irony. As lambs are fond of ranging at large, but are in danger of being lost or devoured, so God threatens to remove the Israelites into a distant and large country, where they would be separated from those with whom they associated in idolatrous worship, and thus be left solitary and exposed as in a wilderness. The phrase, to feed in a large place, is elsewhere used in a good sense. Is. xxx. 23." — M.]

Ver. 17. Joined to idols, i. e., joined to them so fast that they cannot give them up; therefore probably לְוָיִת לְוָיִת = let them, that is, keep on, let them serve idols forever, the punishment will not delay. Ephraim was the most powerful of the ten tribes, and therefore often stands for the ten tribes generally. [The other interpretation, not so much favored, but numbering amongst its supporters Jerome, Grotius, Rosenmüller, and Maurer, is that the inhabitants of Judah are commanded to have nothing to do with the idolatry of Israel. This view has also the support of Cowles, but the other is approved by the majority of the English expositors. — M.]

Ver. 18. A difficult one. כֶּבֶד liquor, then: a drinking-bout. פֶּרֶס assumes besides כֶּבֶד to turn aside, another AD to become worthless or corrupt, here = to be spoiled. So also Keil (so also Ewald, Horsley, Pusey, and others, with E. V. — M.). Meier takes it in the usual sense, to be removed, disappear: their carousing has disappeared. He then takes the following as in sense a dependent sentence: the carousing of those who commit whoredom, whose shields, etc. But this is rather artificial. To be sure, the mention of the punishment might be expected here, but it is just as suitable that ver. 18 should describe only their wicked conduct, and ver. 19 pictures them as being seized by a storm-wind in the midst of it. [Henderson translates the first clause: when their carousals are over they indulge in lewdness. Here DN is supposed to be omitted. Cowles suggests the impossible explanation: He (Ephraim) becomes more apostate from God through strong drink. — M.] Along with their debauchery they commit whoredom, — again in the double sense. [For the construction of the next clause, see Gram. note. — M.] The shame which they love is not expressed, but is clearly enough contained in the two preceding hemistichs, therefore = shameful conduct in a moral sense; not = what brings disgrace upon them in its punishment. Her shields = her princes, as defenders of the people. "Her" refers to Ephraim, regarded as the wife. The princes are named specially: the whole nation is corrupt from the highest to the lowest.

Ver. 19. In the midst of their sins destruction carries them away like a tempest with irresistible force. צָרַר = bind together; seize upon. It is the prophetic preterite. The tempest is regarded as already present. יִבְשֻׁעַ מִן־בְּחֻלָּהֶם. This means either that they shall be ashamed away from their sacrifices, because they were proved not to be able to help them, or that they shall be ashamed of their sacrifices. The sense is that both they and their sacrifices would be put to shame.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. With bold freedom and with holy earnestness the Prophet here displays a picture of the religious and moral corruption of the nation, before which we tremble. He has an eye open for both, and expresses most clearly the inseparable connection between religion and morality. Not only is immorality censured, but the religious depravation also (vers. 1-6, 10-12, 13), so that it may be clearly perceived that this religious decline is the source of the moral corruption, and therefore the (true) religion, that belief in Jehovah is the root of all morality. Observe here how the knowledge of God is exhibited as the essence of religion, and the want of this knowledge as the great error in connection with religion. Apostasy from God therefore consists or is rooted in the loss of the knowledge of Him, which includes not merely a theoretical cognition, but also belief in Him, as the self-revealed God, and the acquaintance and intimacy with Him thence drawn by experience. It is thus that Hosea elsewhere also insists upon the "knowledge of Jehovah" (v. 4; vi. 3, and especially 6). In contrast hereto the idolater is described as one who is "joined to idols" (ver. 17), enters into conjugal intercourse with them. The Prophet, however, does not, in a one-sided fashion, pay exclusive attention to the conduct of the people with respect to religion, but lays just as much stress upon the moral consequences of their religious decline. In his several pictures he brands and rebukes the depravation of morals; want of fidelity and goodness, swearing, lying, stealing, murder, and adultery. Murdering and stealing, probably includes also deeds of violence committed against the poor, defenseless, etc. Special prominence is given to sins against the Sixth [Seventh] Commandment, which, on the basis of idolatry raged so violently in consequence of the terrible increase of unchaste practices during the prevalence of heathen religion and rites. The morally destructive influence of devotion to sensual and fleshly lusts is aptly described in the rebuke of ver. 11: it takes possession of the heart, and the extent of that influence is shown in vers. 13, 14, where the complete destruction of all morality in domestic life is described. A large element of the moral corruption is the influence exerted by the corruption of the priests who make gain of the people's sins (vers. 8, 9), partly also of the prophets. It is also here to be observed how, on the other hand, the moral corruption hastens the religious ruin of the people, drawn as they are ever further from God, and led deeper into idolatry, superstition, and unbelief. Comp. ver. 12 in relation to ver. 11. In ver. 12 b, it is clearly indicated that men, through their estrangement from God and their immoral conduct, lose the power of voluntary self-determination, and become subject to a power, and evil "spirit," which they must follow, and, in the end, against their bitter feelings. Where such universal corruption obtains a spirit will prevail by which the individual is easily borne along with it (comp. also chap. v. 4).

2. Jehovah has a contest with Israel (ver. 1). The expression evidently rests upon the covenant-relation in which two parties assume obligations conditioned on both sides. Israel with God and God with Israel. The relation is therefore a legal one. The one party is bound only so long as the other fulfills his obligations; if one party does not fulfill them, the other may accuse him of an infringement of the compact and institute legal proceedings against him. Thus Jehovah has a "suit-at-law" with Israel, because the latter did not fulfill its obligations. In Joel iv. 2 the expression has a more general application to the judgment which God is to inflict upon the heathen; for they are also related to Jehovah as the Lord of the world. He will not be unjust with them, will not subject them to disadvantages, and will not do them injustice through his people; but they are not to infringe upon his rights, among which is his special relation to Israel. Attacking this, they attack Him also: hence this controversy with them. But alas! there is a dispute between Jehovah and his own people: instead of being united they are divided into two opposing parties. Because the land, shorn of fidelity, goodness, etc., is brought to shame through sin and infamous deeds (vers. 1, 2), it shall mourn and languish (ver. 3) — be visited by drought — as the punishment decreed by God. If this "languishing" is extended even to the unintelligent creation, such a dispensation would express not merely the extent and degree of the visitation, but would show the lower animals to be also included in the punishment. Man, as lord of creation, has by his sin brought punishment upon the rest of the animal world: though these have not sinned, they must suffer with their master on account of his guilt. The punishment is elsewhere also set closely parallel to the guilt: in ver. 9 and especially in ver. 6; because Israel has despised and forgotten God, He shall also despise and forget them. In particular, they show themselves unworthy of the high prerogative of being Jehovah's priest, to which they were really called as being the chosen people.

3. Between Israel and Judah there was always an important distinction morally and religiously. Hence the kingdom of Israel could be held before to the kingdom of Judah as a warning example. And this must be done: for it may easily be understood how the example of Israel was most dangerous to Judah. We feel clearly, when the Prophet utters the warning: "If thou dost commit whoredom, O Israel, let not Judah become guilty," how warmly his heart beats for Judah. He regards Judah not merely as a kingdom of kindred origin, but as the one which, after Israel's apostasy, represented alone the people of God, and thus he must all the more desire to have Judah preserved from Israel's ways. The position of a Prophet like Hosea, who was a citizen of the northern kingdom, was peculiar. In the discord that existed between Israel and Judah, such warm sympathy with the one would hardly be expected from a citizen of the other. But with a Prophet of Jehovah theocratic feelings, higher than natural ones, must prevail. In Judah was Jerusalem with the temple; in Judah the House of David ruled; Judah was always comparatively more faithful to God, and that was decisive. His heart must therefore turn towards Judah. He could regard the separation of Israel from Judah, partly in itself and partly on account of its disastrous consequences especially to Israel, which were so clearly manifested, only as something utterly false and unrighteous, as an act of injustice, and would behold the nation only in both kingdoms, so that the theocratic conception was in the deeper sense also the natural one. Yet in this he displayed his patriotism even in respect to his nearer home, just in his earnest testimony against the prevailing corruption, whose consequence he foresaw would be certain ruin. Hosea certainly does not expect this ruin to be averted, but only expects a religious and moral renovation through its influence, with which he could not but see the restoration of the national unity necessarily united. See further No. 4 in the Doctrinal and Ethical section on chaps. v. and vi.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

LUTHER: Ver. 1. Who will stand in the judgment in which he is accused by God? For then it will be no argument of words as before an earthly judge, but we ourselves bring against ourselves the testimony of our consciences as our indictment. What is the source of this evil in the world, that nothing true is found, but everything is done from a false heart, and that nowhere can any evidence of honest kindness be seen? The reason is, because there is no knowledge of God in the land, i. e., because men despise God's Word.

[MATTHEW HENRY: Sin is the great mischief-maker: it sows discord between God and Israel: God's controversies will be pleaded; pleaded by the judgments of his mouth before they are pleaded by the judgments of his hand, that He may be justified in all He doth, and may make it appear that He does not desire the death of sinners. And God's pleadings ought to be attended to, for sooner or later they shall have a hearing. — M.]

Ver. 2. WÜRT. SUMM: Faithfulness and sincerity among a people are like great and precious jewels in a land. So also are paternal confidence and love and pure and faithful preachers of the Word of God. So there is no greater need than when these things are absent; and especially when God's Word and pure teachers and preachers are wanting. This is the fountain of all evil. For God's Word keeps sin at a distance. Where it is not, or where it is not preached in its simplicity and purity, or men will not be reproved by it, nor follow it, nor amend their ways, there one blood-guiltiness and deadly sin follow after another, and all kinds of evil break in like a flood.

[PUSEY: Speculative and practical knowledge are bound up together, through the oneness of the relation of the soul to God, whether in its thoughts of Him or acts towards Him. Wrong practice corrupts belief, and misbelief corrupts practice. — M.]

Ver. 4. LUTHER: It is not so great an offense for men to sin as for them not to be willing to suffer the reproof of sin. For when they live in such a way as that their hearts have a horror of the cure of their malady, punishment can no longer delay. This sin is the most common of our time. Just look at Christian churches, and you will see everywhere that the teachers are hated for rebuking sin so freely. But this only excites God's wrath more fiercely against us. For not man but God rebukes and challenges the sinner.

Ver. 6. God will not be mocked. Men may reject God, but He is still beside them, and shows that He is there in his judgments. The self-deception of sin: in rejecting God (forgetting his commands) thou doest so as one who is rejected by Him.

[MATTHEW HENRY: Ignorance is so far from being the mother of devotion that it is the mother of destruction.

PUSEY: In an advanced stage of sin, men may come to forget what they once despised. — M.]

Ver. 8. There is nothing more shameful than to draw profit from the sin of our neighbor, and thus to strengthen him in his sin, or become the occasion of his sinning; doubly shameful if we abuse our office and more exalted position to do so.

[PUSEY: What else is to extenuate or flatter sin than to dissemble it, not to see it, not openly to denounce it, lest we lose our popularity, or alienate those who commit it? — M.]

[Ver. 9. MATTHEW HENRY: Sharers in sin must expect to be sharers in ruin. — M.]

[Ver. 10. PUSEY: Single marriage, according to God's law: "they twain shall be one flesh," yields in a nation a larger increase than polygamy. Illicit intercourse God turns to decay. His curse is upon it. — M.]

Ver. 11. LUTHER: These two vices, whoredom and debauchery, so take possession of a man that he does not know what he thinks, speaks, or does. The boy Cyrus in Xenophon admirably says, that wine is mixed with poison. And the saying of Archilochus, with reference to impure love, is well known: —

"Πολλὴν κατ' ἑστέ ἀλλὰν ὁμμάτων ἔχοντες, Κλέψας ἐκ σπυρίων ἀπαλὰς φρένας."

Comp. Luke xxi. 34; Eph. v. 18.

Ver. 12. LUTHER: The spirit of whoredom is that evil spirit which takes away from men's hearts true thoughts of God, and either perverts their hearts, or entirely subdues them by filling them with trust in the creature, which is true and sheer idolatry. For idolatry does not consist merely in calling upon idols, but also in trust in our own righteousness, works, and service, in riches and human influence and power. And this, as it is the most common, is also the most harmful idolatry.

[PUSEY: The sins of the fathers descend very often to the children, both in the way of nature, that the children inherit strong temptations to their parents' sin, and by way of example, that they greedily imitate, often exaggerate them. Wouldst thou not have children which thou wouldst wish unborn, reform thyself. — M.]

Ver. 13. WÜRT. SUMM.: Corporeal and spiritual whoredom are commonly united, and mutually dependent. For how should he who does not abhor a departure from God through idolatry, abhor a life abandoned to fleshly lusts? For idolatry is a much greater sin than corporeal indulgence: the one offends against the first table of the law and against God Himself, but the other against the second table and our neighbor.

STARKE: When worship is performed in any other way than God has appointed, God is honored no longer, and idolatry is committed.

Ver. 14. Experience teaches that children are prone to imitate the shameful and unchaste lives of their parents. When such is the case the parents are most responsible; they deserve the chief punishment.

LUTHER: If God gives his Word to men, and they will not receive his instructions, what else should He do with them, than give them up to a reprobate mind, i. e., let them live on according to their own counsel and pleasure, until they finally perish?

[CLARKE: While there is hope, there is correction.]

PUSEY: To be chastened severely for lesser sins is a token of the great love of God toward us. To sin on without punishment is a token of God's extremest displeasure and a sign of reprobation. "Great is the offense, if, when thou hast sinned, thou art undeserving of the wrath of God." — M.]

Ver. 15. PFAFF. BIBELWERK: Ye pious and true believers, let not the ungodly seduce you to follow their steps, but beware of them lest ye also have part in their punishment. But ye sinners, if ye will go on sinning, do not seduce the innocent, and thus heap up the measure of your iniquities. Comp. Gal. v. 9.

[MATTHEW HENRY: The nearer we are to the infection of sin, the more need have we to stand upon our guard. Those that would be steady in their adherence to God must possess themselves with an awe and reverence of God, and always speak of Him with solemnity and seriousness; for those who can make a jest of the true God will make a god of anything. — M.]

Ver. 16. The Prophet employs this simile of a lamb in the desert, because nothing is more pitiable than a little lamb which has lost its shepherd. For the same reason Christ employs this figure of the lost sheep, when He would show the piteous condition of the sinner, and his great compassion towards him.

SCHMIEDER: He who will not submit to the restraints imposed by God, shall obtain a freedom which will at last become most irksome. This applies both to nations and to individuals.

[SCOTT: While sinners obstinately reject the easy yoke of Christ, they are bringing down the heavy load of his vengeance upon themselves.]

PUSEY: Woe is it to that man, whom, when he withdraws from Christ's easy yoke, God permits to take the broad road which leadeth to destruction. — M.]

Ver. 19. STARKE: God does indeed bear with sinners in great patience and long-sufferings, and calls them to repentance; but when they do not amend, his punishment is swift. 1 Thess. v. 3.

[PUSEY: So does God, by healthful disappointment, make us ashamed of seeking out of Him those good things which He alone hath, and hath in store for them that love Him. — M.]

B. An Accusation especially against the Priests and the Royal House. The untheocratic Policy of the Kingdom of Israel in seeking for Help to Assyria and Egypt is denounced.

CHAPTERS V.-VII.

I. Mainly against the Priests.

CHAPTER V. 1-15.

- 1 Hear this ye Priests,
And give ear, thou House of Israel,
And listen, thou House of the King,
Because the judgment is for you,
And you have been a snare for Mizpah,
And a net spread upon Tabor.
- 2 And the apostates make slaughter¹ deep [are deeply sunk in slaughter],
And I am a chastening for them all.

- 3 I know Ephraim,
And Israel is not hidden from me ;
For even now hast thou committed whoredom, Ephraim,
Israel is defiled.
- 4 Their deeds will not suffer³ (them)
To return to their God.
Because the spirit of whoredom is in their inward parts [their inmost heart]
And they do not know Jehovah.
- 5 And the pride of Israel testifies to its face,
And Israel and Ephraim will totter, through their guilt,
And Judah will totter with them.
- 6 With their sheep and cattle
They will go to seek Jehovah,
But will not find Him ;
He hath withdrawn Himself from them.
- 7 They have been faithless to Jehovah,
For they begot strange children ;
Now the new moon will consume them
Together with their portions.
- 8 Blow the horn in Gibeah,
The trumpet in Ramah !
Cry out in Beth-Aven³
" Behind thee, O Benjamin ! "
- 9 Ephraim will become a waste
In the day of chastisement,
Among the tribes of Israel
Have I made known what is sure.
- 10 The princes of Judah have become
Like the removers of land-marks :
I will pour out upon them
My wrath like water.
- 11 Ephraim is oppressed,
Shattered by judgment,⁴
For it thought good
To follow idol-images.⁴
- 12 And I (am) like the moth to Ephraim
And like rottenness to the house of Judah.
- 13 And Ephraim saw its disease,
And Judah its wound,
And Ephraim went to Assyria,
And sent to the warlike monarch ;
But he will not be able to heal for you,
And will not remove your wound.
- 14 For I am like the lion to Ephraim,
And like the young lion to the house of Judah,
I, I will rend and go on (rending)
Will carry away and there will be no deliverer.
- 15 I will go again to my place,
Until they make expiation (by suffering),
And seek my face ;
In their distress they will seek me.

CHAPTER VI. 1-11.

- 1 " Come let us return⁵ to Jehovah !
For He hath torn, and will heal us,
He hath smitten and will bind us up.
- 2 He will revive us after two days,
On the third day He will raise us up,
That we may live before Him.

- 3 Let us know, follow on to know, Jehovah :
Like the dawn his coming is sure,
And He shall come like the rain for us,
Like the latter rain (which) waters the earth."
- 4 What shall I do to thee, Ephraim ?
What shall I do to thee, Judah ?
For your love is like the morning cloud,
And like the dew, vanishing soon away.
- 5 Therefore I have smitten⁴(them) through the Prophets,
And slain them with the words of my mouth,
And my judgment goes forth like light.⁵
- 6 For I delight in love and not sacrifice,
And in the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings.
- 7 Yet they, like Adam, have broken the covenant,
They were faithless to me then.
- 8 Gilead is (like) a city of evil-doers,
Besmeared with blood.
- 9 And as the robber lurks,⁷
So (does) a band of priests.
Upon the highway they murder (those going) to Schechem, Yea they commit wickedness.
- 10 In the house of Israel
I beheld an abomination, a horror :
Ephraim committed whoredom,
Israel (is) defiled.
- 11 For thee, also, Judah, a harvest is prepared,⁸
When I turn the captivity of my people.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 2. — וַיַּעֲשׂוּ is probably the Inf. Piel from עָשָׂה . [It is the Inf. absol. with וַי paragogic. The regular form would be וַיַּעֲשׂוּ , but the Kamets-Hhatuph is changed to Patach. See Green, Gr., § 119, 8. Its construction with the finite verb follows a peculiar idiom, common in Hebrew. The literal translation is: they have made deep to slaughter. Comp. Is. xxxi. 6. Ewald, comparing with ix. 9, holds that our word is a false reading for וַיַּעֲשׂוּ , but there is no reason why the Prophet should not have used both expressions. — M.]

[2 Ver. 4. — E. V. and most Anglo-American expositors adopt another construction in the first hemistich, rendering: they will not frame their doings. Horsley, with the best Continental critics, prefers the rendering which is given in the margin of E. V. and adopted by Schmoller. Pusey is undecided, and indeed it is difficult to determine which is the true view; for no importance is to be attached to the objection of Henderson, that וַיַּעֲשׂוּ would require an object expressed if the construction last referred to were the correct one. — M.]

3 Ver. 8. — Before וַיִּירָא supply בְּ .

4 Ver. 11. — וַיִּשְׁפֹּט is in the construct. state before וַיִּשְׁפֹּט . It is not = broken, harassed in law, which is unsuitable here, but we have a genitivus efficientis, and וַיִּשְׁפֹּט = judgment, as in ver. 1: crushed by judgment. On the combination $\text{וַיִּשְׁפֹּט וַיִּשְׁפֹּט}$, see Ewald, § 285, 6. The words are coördinate. [See Green, § 289. This construction is frequent in Hosea; comp. i. 6; vi. 4. — M.] Fürst takes וַיִּשְׁפֹּט in our passage = וַיִּשְׁפֹּט , a pillar, especially a finger-post. He, however, has the conjecture that it = וַיִּשְׁפֹּט , filth, dirt, and this = וַיִּשְׁפֹּט , idols, and would then take וַיִּשְׁפֹּט from וַיִּשְׁפֹּט , to be foolish (of which the Niphal occurs) = he was foolish, and followed after filth (filthy idol-worship). A further conjecture is that it may be an Ephraimitish mode of writing וַיִּשְׁפֹּט (Job xv. 31) = nothing, vanity. LXX.: brevis rōr paraisōs.

[5 Chap. vi. ver. 1-3. — The true construction of the various sentences in these verses is probably as follows: The first line of ver. 1 contains an exhortation, the remainder of that and the following verse consisting of arguments in support of it; and the first line of ver. 3 contains a parallel exhortation, followed in the remainder of the verse, by parallel arguments. A glance at the verses in their connection will show the appropriateness of this general view. That the opposite is true of the construction adopted in E. V. and by the English expositors generally, according to which the opening of ver. 3 is regarded as a continuation of the reasons for returning, is evident both from the unfitness of that line as an argument, and from the consideration that all the pleas adduced in all three verses are drawn from expectations of favor from God Himself. The form of the Heb. pret. (with וַי paragogic) here employed, also confirms this view. But there is no need of holding, according to the view preferred by Schmoller, that any of the intermediate verbs introduce an exhortation. This both weakens the force of the array of pleas successively adduced and mars the regular and beautiful structure of the section. וַיִּשְׁפֹּט (ver. 1), וַיִּשְׁפֹּט (ver. 3), therefore, being paragogic futures (Green, §§ 97, 1, 284), are cohortatives, and the only cohortatives in the section. — M.]

6 Ver. 5. — The object of הַמִּצְפָּה is to be supplied by anticipation from הַמִּצְפָּה. Instead of הַמִּצְפָּה, the punctuation and division of the words is probably to be changed according to the ancient versions, and הַמִּצְפָּה to be read. The Masoretic reading is encumbered with too many difficulties.

7 Ver. 9. — הַמִּצְפָּה is for הַמִּצְפָּה [constr. inf. Piel, equivalent to a participial noun. It is an imitation of the Chaldees. Henderson conjectures that the form is for הַמִּצְפָּה, Piel. Part. — הַמִּצְפָּה. The translation of E. V.: by consent, has arisen from the Targum rendering, הַמִּצְפָּה: one shoulder. This view is now almost altogether abandoned. — M.]

8 Ver. 11. — הַמִּצְפָּה is used impersonally, being equivalent to a passive sense [one sets, prepares a harvest = a harvest is prepared. — M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL

The beginning in ver. 1 (corresponding to the opening of chap. iv.) shows that the discourse here commences anew. Though connected with chap. iv., this chapter contains an accusation and threatening more definitely directed against the priests along with the king and his counsellors and princes, yet without being confined to this, for the discourse again becomes general, applying to the whole people. Along with idolatry which here again becomes prominent as the sin of Israel (especially in chap. v.) and gross sins among the people (deceit, robbery, murder, chap. vi.), the conduct of the court is afterwards specially reproved, but particularly the false policy of seeking help in Assyria and Egypt (which itself presupposes the beginning of the kingdom's decay). Chap. vi. is inseparably connected with chap. v. But chap. vii. is also related to both of them, for a new section begins only with chap. viii. (See Introduction.) A single central and controlling idea, however, can hardly be indicated in these two chapters, or in the second part of the book generally. The discourse is too excited, moving suddenly from one thought to another, especially from accusation to threatening, and vice versa.

Ver. 1. Hear this, ye priests. It is doubtful whether הַמִּצְפָּה refers to the foregoing, but it is not improbable that it does. The solemn discourse just ended would now be applied to the hearts of those specially addressed here, and the continuation of the discourse would then be attached to it. House of the king = the royal family, or possibly those who surrounded him ordinarily. The king referred to cannot be with certainty determined. Keil conjectures Zachariah or Menahem, or both. According to 2 Kings xv. 19 f. the resort to Assyria would suit Menahem better than Zachariah. For the judgment is for you. This refers specially, according to the sequel, to the Priests and the Court. ["The judgment" is that announced in the preceding chapter; the special application is made here. — M.] The rulers of the people are compared to a snare and net. The birds whom they have taken or allured to destruction, are the people. Mizpah cannot be the Mizpah strictly so called in the tribe of Benjamin, but must be = הַמִּצְפָּה and that = הַמִּצְפָּה an elevated place in Gilead, perhaps identical with הַמִּצְפָּה in the tribe of Dan. Tabor, on this side the Jordan, would correspond to the elevated point on the other side. These two places are probably selected as prominent points to represent the whole country; for it is not known that they were places of sacrifice. Keil conjectures that they are chosen in this image because they were places suitable for bird-catching.

Ver. 2. הַמִּצְפָּה, to make deep. Literally: they have made slaughter deep = they have sunk deep in it. Slaughter might of itself be understood as murder, but the thought is carried further. הַמִּצְפָּה is usually employed of the slaughter of beasts for sacrifice, and thus is most suitable here according to the foregoing, where the evil influence of the rulers upon the nation is spoken of, and this consisted in the idolatry which they saw them practice. But this sacrificing is intentionally called only slaying, and suggested by it. הַמִּצְפָּה a ἀπ. λεγ. is uncertain. The most probable explanation makes it = הַמִּצְפָּה, apostates. This is then the subject of the sentence, which would be rendered: the apostates are deeply sunk in murder. Keil, with others, takes it quite differently: transgressions, more literally: deviations. He explains הַמִּצְפָּה after הַמִּצְפָּה, 1 Kings x. 16 f.: to stretch, stretch along; therefore: deviations; they have made deep to stretch out = they have carried their transgressions very far. But what a tortuous mode of expression: to stretch out deviations! [The Anglo-American Commentators generally adopt the former view, rendering: revolters, or: apostates. — M.]

Ver. 3. The second half of this verse tells what God discerns in Ephraim and Israel. הַמִּצְפָּה: now, at this very moment, pointing out, as an actual fact, that which at present lies open to the eye of God. [Henderson: "To express an assertion more strongly, the Hebrews put it first in the form of an affirmative, and afterwards in the form of a negative." — M.]

Ver. 4. Their deeds will not allow, etc. Their works stand in the way of their returning to God; for they are not isolated things, but are the expression of their inner nature, and that is held securely by the spirit of whoredom (iv. 12), as by a demoniacal power which has stifled the knowledge of God. They are therefore not free — not lords over themselves, but slaves. [The rendering adopted here is that given in the margin of the English Bible, and approved by the majority of the Expositors of Continental Europe, ancient and modern, and by Horsley among the English ones. But there he stands alone, all other Anglo-American translators adopting the rendering: they will not frame their doings to return to the Lord. They have been led to this view by the mistaken notion that the other translation involved a grammatical impossibility. See Gram. Note. — M.]

Ver. 5. The pride of Israel according to some, denotes God, as One in whom Israel might have pride. The sense would then be that God, by his judgments testifies in the very face of Israel. But such an explanation is forced. The natural impression, on reading the words, is rather that Israel and its conduct is spoken of. Therefore the words are to be taken as they stand; the pride of Israel testifies to its face, namely, when the punishment of such pride is being suffered. It will be then felt what it is to reject Jehovah in presumptuous self-reliance (Wünsche). Judah also totters with them. In iv. 15 Judah is warned not to be partaker in Israel's guilt; but this must have been done because such participation was already begun, or foreseen as about to be assumed. On the other hand in i. 7 Judah's destiny is distinguished definitely from that of Israel. [Henderson and others account for this seeming discrepancy by assuming that this chapter was written at a period considerably subsequent to that of the utterance of the last. But the evidence of the connection between them is too strong to admit of this supposition. The solution given above is therefore probably the correct one. — M.]

Ver. 6. They shall go with their flocks and with their herds. The fruitlessness of Israel's sacrifices without a mind answering to the offering, is here shown (comp. vi. 6; Is. i. 11 ff.; Jer. vii. 21 ff.; Ps. xl. 7; 1. 8 ff.).

Ver. 7. to act faithlessly, especially of the infidelity of a wife to her husband. The proof (פ) of such unfaithfulness of Israel to Jehovah, the Husband, is then given. Instead of bearing children to God in covenant with Him, they had rather, by their illicit intercourse with idols, begotten strange, illegitimate children, children not belonging to the household, i. e., children whom the Lord cannot acknowledge as his own. The punishment is then announced: The new moon will devour them. "The new moon is the festal season on which sacrifices were offered, and is here employed for the sacrifices themselves. The meaning is: your festal sacrifices are so far from bringing deliverance as rather to induce your ruin" (Keil). The sentence must, at the same time, be understood in a temporal sense = the time will soon come when they will perish, as also appears clearly from ver. 8. Their portions are their possessions, part of which they brought as offerings.

Ver. 8. The judgment is seen in the Spirit as being already inflicted. The invasion of the enemy is to be announced by the horn and the trumpet. Gibeah and Ramah were most suitable for giving signals on account of their lofty situation. Both were on the northern boundary of Benjamin. Thus Judah is already menaced (see ver. 5), and Israel actually occupied. to raise a shout = to sound the alarm in danger. Beth-aven again = Bethel; פ is to be supplied. Behind thee, Benjamin. The danger which is signaled, the enemy, is coming. He is already close behind thee.

Ver. 9. Israel shall assuredly be destroyed, and permanently also: enduring, that is, lasting misfortune (comp. Deut. xxviii. 59). Others make it = true, what will surely be fulfilled. [The latter view is preferable, and is approved by most expositors. — M.]

Ver. 10. Like the removers of landmarks. Is this to be taken literally? It is certain that we are not to think of hostile seizures of the territory of Israel, but the tertium comp. is the curse which, according to Deut. xxvii. 17, is laid upon the removal of a neighbor's landmark = they have done something worthy of cursing. The curse attending the removal of the landmarks must therefore be regarded here as something well known. The question then arises: what is it that they have done incurring a curse. Keil and Hengstenberg think that a spiritual removal of boundaries is indicated, a subversion of the bounds of justice, namely, by participating in the guilt of Ephraim which they did by breaking down the barriers between Jehovah and the idols. And it is true that the princes of Judah are to be regarded as in a special sense divided off as against Israel and its idolatry, by virtue of the true faith which still prevailed in Judah as contrasted with Israel. The sense would then be: The princes of Judah, by their favoring idolatry, by this transgressing of spiritual limits, have become like those who remove the land-marks of fields, and thus become subject to the curse. God's anger will seize upon them like a full stream of water. Comp. Ps. lxxix. 25; lxxix. 6; Jer. x. 25.

Vers. 11–15 declare that even Assyria cannot help, and that the vanity of all help outside of God, drives Israel to Him.

Ver. 11. עַשְׂרֵן וְיָרֵךְ are "united also in Deut. xxviii. 33 to denote the complete subjugation of Israel under enemies in the event of apostasy from God" (Keil). עַשְׂרֵן occurs only here and in Is. xxviii. 10. In the latter case, at all events, it = עַשְׂרֵן, command. So many here also: a human statute ["in contrast to the ordinances of God"] alluding to the worship of calves (Keil). [See Textual note.]

Ver. 12. A moth and rottenness are symbols of destroying influences. The moth is alluded to in the same way in Is. i. 9; li. 8; Ps. xxxix. 12; both united in Job xlii. 28. Such influences also destroy slowly but surely: Certus Dei judicium (Calvin).

Ver. 13. פָּלַי וּמָוֶר, injury and wound, hardly denote religious and moral depravation (Keil); for it would scarcely have been said that Ephraim perceived this, but the judgment of God mentioned in ver. 12, which according to the image there employed is not one which brings sudden ruin, but a more secret corruption, of which, indeed, moral depravation forms a part, but only as a judgment of God. That a divine judgment is intended, is clear from what is said of the vanity of help that is sought, especially in the sequel, and from the ground assigned for its insufficiency in ver. 14. Assyria is here named for the first time. In the subsequent chapters the Prophet frequently recurs to the false policy of seeking help from Assyria. Only Ephraim is named because Israel is the main subject. Judah is referred to only incidentally. יָרֵךְ, a contender, an epithet devised by the Prophet to denote the Assyrian king.

Ver. 14. They can as little defend themselves from God's judgments as they can from the attack of lions. (Comp. xiii. 7; Is. v. 29; Deut. xxxii. 39).

Ver. 15. The figure of the lion is continued. As the lion, without fear of being attacked, withdraws into his lair, so the Lord withdraws into heaven; none can or dare call Him to account. Until they make expiation = suffer. The suffering shall drive them to God. שׁוּבָה = seek earnestly. Comp. ii. 9 and Deut. iv. 29, 30, where comp. also the expression בָּצֵר לְךָ.

Chap. vi. ver. 1. Come let us return to Jehovah. The words are plainly connected with the last words of chap. v. where a seeking of God on the part of the people is mentioned as the aim and consequence of the divine judgment. The opinion is, therefore, the most natural (so already the LXX.) that they are just the expression of that seeking, that in them Israel announces its resolve, and immediately thereafter the hope of favor on the ground of the return. The view of Keil is less suitable, that we have here an exhortation addressed by the Prophet in the name of God to the people whom God has smitten. The words are only and naturally put in the mouths of those who, punished for their sins, would return to God. [The Anglo-American Commentators, generally, adopt the view here advocated. Henderson gives the additional plea that the bearing of ver. 5 favors the hypothesis. — M.] For He hath torn, etc. (comp. v. 14). Strong faith. The Lord who had spoken with such threatenings, and such implacable severity, would yet give salvation (and not Assyria, ver. 13). This would also be true if the words יִרְפְּאוּנוּ, יִרְבְּשׁוּנוּ are taken as expressing a wish, which is readily suggested by a frequent usage of י with the future: and may He heal us, etc. (so also in the following sentences). — כִּי. The resolve to return would then be strengthened by the calamity which God sends. If יִרְבְּשׁוּנוּ be taken not as expressing a wish but simply a hope the determination to return would rather be strengthened by this hope, as the healing, etc., would be the fruit of the return. [On the grammatical and logical connection of the different clauses of the first three verses, see Gram. note. — M.] An allusion to Deut. xxxii. 39 can hardly be mistaken, especially if we look to ver. 2.

Ver. 2. He will revive us again, etc. The definite limits: two days, and: on the third day, hold out the prospect of the speedy and sure revival of Israel. "Two and three days are very short periods of time; and the linking of two numbers following the one upon the other, expresses the certainty of what is to take place within the period named, just as in the so-called number-sayings in Amos i. 3; Job v. 19; Prov. vi. 16; xxx. 15, 18, in which the last and greatest number expresses the highest or utmost extent of the matter dealt with" (Keil). Both the Rabbinical interpretations of these numbers (e. g., that they relate to the three captivities, the Egyptian, the Babylonish, and the Roman) and the Christian, according to which Christ's resurrection on the third day is indicated, are naturally inadmissible. The latter is excluded even by the words themselves. Israel is the subject of discourse: "it is torn, smitten, slain"; nothing is said of the exile itself, but in general there is set forth the termination of its existence as a people through the divine judgment (which to be sure was brought to pass by means of the exile). Israel expects, in the event of conversion, to be delivered from this situation and to be restored, and that speedily. It is naturally not the awakening of the physically dead that is announced; but it is a significant fact, that such an awakening is employed to illustrate the restoration of Israel, for it may lead us to infer that such a belief lay not far from the Prophet's mind. Comp.

for our verse, Is. xxxvi. 19 ff. (and for the whole section, vers. 16-21), and especially the well-known vision in Ez. xxxvii. 1-14. (See further No. 4 in the Doctrinal section.) [Comp. the remarks of Delitzsch on Job xix. 25 ff. in his Commentary on that book, which contain the true principle of interpretation in such cases, and substantially agree with the method approved by Schmoller here. Henderson and Cowles agree in excluding any but an historic allusion, while Horsley and Pusey maintain the allegorical interpretation, the former seeing a "no very obscure, though but an oblique, allusion to our Lord's resurrection on the third day," the latter repudiating any other application, and carrying out the analogy to the extreme possibilities of fanciful conjecture. The explanation of the two and three days given above is probably the true one. With it Newcome and Henderson agree. Cowles suggests an allusion to the duration of the pestilence in Israel after David's census of the people, and thinks that besides there "may be a tacit allusion to the fact that three days is about the extent of human endurance under extreme privations and hardships." — M.] That we may live before Him: "under his protecting shelter and favor, comp. Gen. xvii. 18" (Keil).

Ver. 3. Let us know, pursue the knowledge of, Jehovah. Keil rightly makes the verse parallel with ver. 1, as a further appeal. The expression יִדְּבָקָה especially indicates an appeal, or, according to our view, a self-exhortation. The zeal and earnestness of the return is thus presented. "Know" must be taken in the sense of iv. 1, 6. Jehovah had become an unknown, a strange God to the (idolatrous) people. Such knowledge has thus a practical aim, to acknowledge, to serve Him. The following words declare what is hoped for as the fruit of that knowledge: His coming forth is sure like the dawn, etc. Jehovah will appear bringing salvation. This is set forth under the figures of the daybreak and a fertilizing rain. The appearing of Jehovah is denoted as a rising by the image of the dawn (אֶרְבֹּא, usually employed of the sun). The transition from night to day is set forth. Comp. Is. lviii. 8. And He will come as the rain for us, etc., i. e., reviving and refreshing. "In Deut. xi. 14 (comp. xxviii. 12 and Lev. xxvi. 4, 5), the rain, or the early and latter rain, is mentioned among the blessings which the Lord will bestow upon his people if they shall serve Him with the whole heart. This promise the Lord will so fulfill in the case of his newly-revived people, that He himself will refresh them like a fertilizing rain" (Keil).

Ver. 4. What shall I do to thee, Ephraim? It is common to break off the discourse here, wrongly, with ver. 3. It is supposed that there is here a first section containing a promise, to which the promise in chaps. xi. and xiv. correspond, and that a new section begins in ver. 4 with a new ob-jurgatory discourse (Keil). But, in the first place, vers. 1-3 do not really contain a promise of the Prophet, or of God through the Prophet, but only a hope of the people themselves. And, in the second place, ver. 4 is too closely connected with the preceding (not as a promise of God attached to the foregoing), according to Luther's translation: how will I do thee good, etc.? For עֲשֶׂה does not mean: to do good, and יִרְחֶמְךָ is not = the mercy which I will show you, and, especially, the comparison of God's favor to the morning cloud and on the way to Shechem. Shechem was a City of Refuge. Perhaps those are meant who sought refuge there. The priests are by many thought to be residents of Shechem. But Shechem was a Levitical, not a sacerdotal, city. The expression would then refer not to those dwelling within the city, but to those without, who fall upon persons going to Shechem. Bethel was rather the seat of the priests. Keil therefore supposes: "The way to Shechem is mentioned as a place of murders and bloody deeds, because the road to Bethel, the principal seat of worship belonging to the ten tribes, from Samaria the capital, and in fact from the northern part of the Kingdom generally, lay through this city. Pilgrims to the feasts for the most part took this road; and the priests, who were taken from the dregs of the people, appear to have lain in wait for them, to rob, or, in case of resistance, to murder." More strictly speaking, it must have been done on the return from Bethel to Shechem. The allusion is evidently to a definite event unknown to us. The same remark applies to the following words. וְשָׁמַר is climactic. וְשָׁמַר = shame, perhaps, unchastity. [This word does not mean shame or dishonor. It is primarily a device or plan either evil or good (comp. Job xvii. 11), though usually the former. The next meaning is wickedness; then specially a crime resulting from unchastity. For the connection between the two meanings see Lev. xviii. 11. — M.]

Ver. 10. The consequences of the preceding. Probably both corporeal and spiritual whoredom are included.

Ver. 11. A threatening is appended against Judah also. "Judah also" is guilty. The harvest is as elsewhere an image of judgment, a cutting down (comp. also Is. xxviii. 24 ff.) When I shall turn the captivity of my people. This appears, on the contrary, to refer to a deliverance, and therefore to be a promise. But it must be remembered that the judgment has for its aim the deliverance of God's people (עַמִּי) as a whole. But such deliverance is effected only through the judgment that falls upon the several parts, first upon Israel and then upon Judah. The meaning therefore is, when Israel, the Ten Tribes, shall have received its punishment and been restored, Judah also will be punished. [This paraphrase of the passage does not agree with historical fact, and must therefore be rejected. The true view seems to be that of Keil: "שָׁמַר never means: to bring back the captives, but in every passage where it occurs simply: to turn the captivity and that in the figurative sense of restitutio in integrum. 'My people,' i. e., the people of Jehovah is not Israel of the Ten Tribes but the covenant nation as a whole. Consequently 'the captivity of my people' is the misery into which Israel (of the twelve tribes) had been brought through its apostasy from God, not the Assyrian or Babylonian Exile, but the misery brought about by the sins of the people. God could avert this only by judgments, through which the ungodly were destroyed and the penitent converted. Consequently the following is the thought which we obtain from the verse: When God shall come to punish that He may root out ungodliness, and restore his people to their true destiny, Judah will also be visited with the judgment." — M.] The whole is not to be regarded as a promise, or the harvest as a harvest of joy. Nor is it necessary to attract the second hemistich of ver. 11 to the first verse of chap. vii. (e. g., Meier).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Prophetic rebuke does not merely not spare rulers and kings: it is specially directed against them. This follows from the conviction of the high vocation the monarchy had to fulfill. It is the bearer of the magisterial office, and as such must administer and guard the divine law, and must therefore care both for the purity of God's worship and the administration of justice. And if it neglects or directly violates its obligation, despises the divine law, and even introduces idolatry, perverts justice, exercises injustice or leaves it unpunished, it becomes recreant to God, from whom it receives its authority, and incurs his punishment. This, the Prophet, as God's messenger, announces, and his voice is therefore at first a voice of warning in order to bring it back to the true path. But the Prophet arraigns not merely neglect or violation of the obligations entailed by the office as such, but also the personal conduct of the bearers of the office, with a due appreciation of the influence which they exercise by word and still more by deed, in virtue of their high position.

2. "In all inroads of sin and corruption we are to look not merely at the outward work, but at the power of darkness, the spirit, that lies behind as their most dexterous and astute controlling influence, which will maintain most craftily its right and cause; comp. ver. 4" (Rieger).

3. RIEGER: "So long as man under divine chastisement, supposes that he can find help and mitigate his misfortunes by trust in the creatures, he wanders off as though in a trackless wilderness, from the living fountain, and might preclude himself from the most essential self-humbling, the knowledge of his guilt. But when God presses upon him with his hand and he has no deliverer, then is quickened in his heart a little seed implanted there before by God's good hand; and thus the love of God is like a man who has sown seed in his land; he goes away to his place, and depends on that which the seed will produce in time, and after the rough winter." Most beautiful is the believing assurance with which the Prophet makes the chastened express their hope of favor if they should return to God. (This same hope is expressed in Deut. xxxii. 39.) Thus restoration after past destruction is hoped for, and the blessedness of this restoration is further and happily described by comparing the returning favor of God to the rising dawn and the descending rain of harvest, as beneficent and refreshing as the one, as fertilizing and fraught with as rich blessings as the other, it spreads its influence. Such a visitation of mercy was most fully vouchsafed through the Messiah; He was the Day-star from on high; in Him came to us the Son of God in the flesh to diffuse upon us the Holy Spirit like fertilizing rain. He brings, therefore, the true healing for the bruised, the true binding up of the wounds for the smitten, the true reviving for the slain — all under the condition (presupposed by the Prophet) of a penitent returning to God. That the Prophet himself, in putting these words into the mouths of the penitent, thought of the Messiah, can not be maintained. We must apply here also canon laid down at chaps. i.-ii. that the fulfillment took place under the Messiah, but in another and higher sense than the Prophet fancied, that the words inspired by the Spirit of God had a further range than the Prophet knew. The "revival" and the "upraising" imply primarily a restoration of Israel, and we have in Ez. xxxvii. 1-14 the completed picture of which our short sentence affords the outlines. But if the true restoration of God's people has been and is now being accomplished only through Christ, we can go a step further, and show that the revival, proceeding from Him, which is essentially a partaking in a new spiritual life, finds its completion only in the awakening even from corporeal death to the enjoyment of eternal life, of those who have been spiritually quickened by Him. If we, therefore, from the stand-point of the New Testament, find in the words of our Prophet here an allusion to this, we are not really so far wrong as might seem. Nay, as the Prophet certainly speaks of a reviving in a spiritual sense, so he must take that image from an actual revival of the dead, as he took the preceding ones in ver. 1 from the binding and healing of a wound, and this idea cannot be so remote from his language, even if we can say no more (Isaiah in xxvi. 19 evidently goes further). As regards the specification of time: on the third day, which so naturally suggests Christ's resurrection, — the coincidence is certainly not accidental so far as the resurrection on the third day is to be regarded as a rising in "a very brief space of time." He was, indeed, to die, but not to remain in the state of the dead any longer than was necessary, so to speak, in order to make his death an indubitable fact; rather, as the "First Fruits," He should be soonest brought out of death by the mighty working of the Father, and it would thus be shown how completely God's wrath, borne by Him, was quenched, and God's favor restored. On the third day the sun of mercy thus rose even here. And upon this revival of the Messiah on the third day, is conditioned the revival of sinners, proceeding from Him, in time and eternity. We must, therefore, regard this passage of prophecy as at least significant from a New Testament stand-point, nor do we err if we say, that there is here contained more than the Prophet could conceive; it is a divine word resembling a seed of corn which does not simply represent what it actually is (even the most precious stone does no more than this), but conceals in itself something else far higher, the germ which it enfolds.

4. Chap. vi. 5. There is expressed here a clear consciousness of the aim and lofty position of prophecy. It is above all not something incidental, but is embraced organically in the divine economy. Its special mission is fulfilled when the people of God forget their calling, and disregarding the voice of their own conscience, no longer seize the true path, and, having already inwardly apostatized, attain only to weak resolves, which are never fulfilled (ver. 4). Then God appears before his people, and sends them the prophets, who are, so to speak, a conscience standing outside of them. Through them He speaks the "words of his mouth," and rebukes his people. He announces through them his judgment; their words of rebuke themselves are a punishment to the people, at all events, a punishment by words before the punishment by deeds is sent, but yet essentially identical with it, inasmuch as it was intended to produce deep sorrow, to touch the inner man, and to bring painfully to the consciousness criminal apostasy from God, and has thus the same aim as actual punishment has. Thus the sending of the prophets appears in one passage as a punishment; therefore also the expression which speaks of God's hewing and slaying through them is employed, and there is conjoined with it in one line the "rising of judgment like the sun," which may be understood of the efficiency of the prophets themselves. It is declared in such passages as xii. 11 that prophecy had in itself a more general significance, as it effected God's revelation to the people, and brought Him into close relations with them, and was, in so far, an element of his dispensation of mercy. And, apart from this, as Hosea directly shows, it had not only a legal but also an evangelical aspect by its vocation as proclaiming God's faithfulness, in virtue of which He had not rejected his people but had destined for them a great deliverance. Here, however, it is occupied with the race for which it was specially designed, and for them it preached punishment by holding up before them the law they had so contemptuously violated; it became a chastening rod through the Word, and it was to hold out to the people the prospect of the future salvation only through the medium of punishment, and must as its main duty "cut to pieces" and "slay." The preaching of the New Covenant has, on the other hand, as its main duty, an evangelical mission, which must never be ignored. But still it cannot dispense with the preaching of the Law. It must, even there, recur to that as its next duty; for the Law is the true παύσην ἐς Χριστόν.

The worthlessness of sacrifice as a mere opus operatum is most distinctly emphasized by prophecy in opposition to the false esteem in which it was held, which was a token of religious and moral ruin, going hand in hand with an empty service of forms and outward works. Sacrifice, in general, was, as it seems, regarded as a good because a religious work, even when it was not performed in the strict legal manner, but was associated with calf and idol-worship, and therefore with a transgression of the Law (as in our context it is not legal sacrifice that is spoken of, the address being to the kingdom of the ten tribes). In this they wished to honor Jehovah, or pretended to do so. Comp. ver. 6. In that passage the worthlessness of the outward sacrifice, which was only in form a seeking of Jehovah, and could not be a seeking from the heart (ver. 15), is strongly expressed. Comp. Mic. vi. 8; Is. i. 11-17; Ps. xl. 7, 9; 1. 8 ff.; li. 18 ff.; 1 Sam. xv. 22.

To infer, however, from this polemic of prophecy against the opus operatum of sacrifice (sacrifice to an idol is to the Prophet only slaughter), that it values sacrifice in itself but little, and stands as to the Law, etc., upon a freer standpoint, is assuredly wrong. If the prophets were the stern guardians of the Law, and especially of the worship of Jehovah, and directed their rebukes against every depreciation of the law and every apostasy from Jehovah, and if they also placed the ceremonial element in worship in contrast to the ethical and internal, they did so because the latter was absent, and because it alone gave to sacrifice its real worth. And in our passage it is not to be overlooked that Hosea turns first to the sacrifices of the ten tribes, to the places of unlawful sacrifice, and denounces them as worthless, not merely on account of the absence of the inner qualities, but because he saw the people engaged in a course of conduct illegal and therefore displeasing to God; rejects their sacrifices and therefore so much the more opposes to these the inner qualities, and amongst these, the knowledge of God, which would lead back to God and thereby also to the legal worship of Jehovah with its sacrifices. On the relation of the sacrificial service to the future time of salvation, see on chap. xiv.

5. Chap. vi. 7. "They have, like Adam, broken the covenant." The passage is important as being the only, but a clear, reference to the Fall in the Old Testament. This is presented as a transgression of the Covenant, and God is therefore conceived of as standing to the first man in a covenant-relation. Adam's sin appears, therefore, to the Prophet, not as something trifling, but as a great transgression, just as Paul speaks of it in the Epistle to the Romans, though there is nothing said of the consequences of this sin upon mankind. And while this transgression is thought of as a (the first) violation of the covenant, there is also ascribed to it a significance as influencing the destiny of the world.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. WÜRT. SUMM.: Preachers should rebuke the sins of rulers as well as those of subjects, so that they bear not the guilt of the souls that are lost, whose blood God will require at their hands.

Ver. 2. Great zeal, even though it be in the cause of religion, is not the chief thing. It is of itself mere bigotry and has no merit, but is rather to be rejected if it is against the truth.

[MATTHEW HENRY: Those that have apostatized from the truths of God are often the most subtle and barbarous persecutors of those that still adhere to them. — M.]

Ver. 4. The longer thou continuest in sin the more difficult is the return. He who commits sin is the servant of sin. At first he will not return, at last he cannot. The heart is hardened. The spirit of whoredom: not single sins that are committed, but an evil spirit rising up and taking possession of the soul. The more men sin against God, the more they lose the knowledge of Him, and the more difficult it is for them to return; and so the chastisement of God must be more severe to bring them back to Him.

Ver. 5. God spares not even his own, when they sin.

STARKE: He who mingles with the ungodly will be punished with them.

[PUSEY: In the presence of God there is needed no other witness against the sinner than his own conscience. — M.]

Ver. 6. STARKE: God will not be slighted with the outward appearance of godliness. In distress men should indeed seek God, though not in hypocrisy, but in sincerity. Our most acceptable sacrifice to God, is the surrender of ourselves, body and soul, to Him.

Ver. 7. WÜRT. SUMM.: Godless parents usually bring up godless children, whom God regards not as his, but as strange children, children of whoredom. They shall suffer a like punishment with their parents. But God will require their blood at the hands of their parents, from whom a heavy reckoning will be demanded. Therefore bring up your children in the chastening and admonition of the Lord, and they will not be strange children, but God's, and heirs of eternal life.

Ver. 9. STARKE: In time of war men should not be troubled so much about the cruelty and tyranny of their enemies, as they should lament and bewail their sins.

Ver. 10. PFAFF BIBELWERK: God has set firm bounds even to the great ones of this earth, and prescribed to them laws which they must observe. But when they remove these limits God pours out his wrath upon them like water.

HENGSTENBERG: If those are cursed who remove a neighbor's landmarks, how much more they who remove those of God!

[SCOTT: When princes break down the fence of the divine law by their edicts, decisions, or examples, they open the flood-gates of God's wrath: and when subjects willingly obey ungodly and persecuting statutes, they may expect to be given up to grievous exactions and oppressions; for God will disregard the interests, liberty, and security of those who disregard his honor and renounce his service. — M.]

Ver. 12. LUTHER: There is nothing more delicate than a moth. One can scarcely touch it without killing it, and yet it eats through cloth, and so destroys our clothing. And the wood-worm eats little by little through the hardest wood. So the wrath of God is despised by the ungodly, as though it were without power; yet whatever contends with it must come to destruction, and cannot be restored to its former condition by any might or influence. We are thus warned not to live on in such security, but to fear the Lord and walk in all his ways. All strength and force without this, will not defend us from his wrath.

[PUSEY: So God visits the soul with different distresses, bodily or spiritual. He impairs, little by little, health of body or fineness of understanding; or He withdraws grace or spiritual strength, or allows lukewarmness or distaste for the things of God to creep over the soul. These are the gnawings of the moth, overlooked by the sinner, if he persevere in carelessness as to his conscience, yet bringing in the end entire decay of health, of understanding, of heart, of mind, unless God interfere by the mightier mercy of some heavy chastisement, to awaken him. — M.]

Ver. 13. Seek not thy consolation in the world, when the consequences of sin make themselves felt. It helps thee indeed, but only to drag thee completely into its power, and to certain ruin. If men would have the wounds of sin healed, they must hasten to the true Physician, and not to false ones, whose help is of no avail.

[MATTHEW HENRY: Those who neglect God and seek to creatures for help shall certainly be disappointed; that depend upon them for support, will find them not foundations but broken reeds; that depend upon them for supply will find them not fountains but broken cisterns; that depend upon them for comfort and a cure will find them miserable comforters and physicians of no value. — M.]

Ver. 14. STARKE: Those who have an angry God, concern themselves to no purpose about resisting their enemies or other misfortunes.

Ver. 15. [MATTHEW HENRY: When men begin to complain more of their sins than of their afflictions, there begin to be some hopes of them. And this is that which God requires of us when we are under his correcting hand, that we own ourselves to be in fault, and to be justly corrected. — M.]

Chap. vi. ver. 1. The language of the repenting sinner. How often does it come so late as this! But O that it would always come! How much must intervene before it comes (much use of the Lord's chastening rod)! but how great also is the gain! Alas that it is so hard for men to decide so! but what a blessed decision it is! — M.]

Ver. 2. God revives us not only that we may live before Him, i. e., to his glory and service, but also live in the enjoyment of his presence and blessing.

Ver. 3. Delay is more disastrous in nothing than in turning to God. [PUSEY: We know in order to follow: we follow in order to know. Light prepares the way for love. Love opens the mind for new love. The gifts of God are interwoven. They multiply and reproduce each other, until we come to the perfect state of eternity. — M.]

Ver. 4. Transient heats in religion do not accomplish the work which steadfastness must crown.

[MATTHEW HENRY: God never destroys sinners till He sees there is no other way with them. — M.]

Ver. 5. CRAMER: The Law is the ministry which, through the letter, kills. He, therefore, who is not slain and does not die to sin, cannot be made alive through the voice of the Gospel.

[PUSEY: God's past loving-kindness, his pains (so to speak), his solicitations, the drawings of his grace, the tender mercies of his austere chastisements, will, in the day of judgment, stand out as clear as the light, and leave the sinner confounded, without excuse. In this life also God's judgments are as a light which goeth forth, enlightening not the sinner who perishes, but others, in the darkness of ignorance, on whom they burst with a sudden blaze of light.]

Ver. 6. WÜRT. SUMM.: The means by which we become partakers of the mercy of God, are not our works and desert, but the true knowledge of God and faith in Christ which works by love, in which God has more delight and satisfaction than in all outward works. And this is the sum of the whole Christian religion, that we believe in the name of the Son of God and have love toward one another.

Ver. 7. PFAFF. BIBELWERK. Beware of transgressing, by presumptuous sin, the covenant which thou hast made with thy God. He is a great God and not a man, with whom thou hast entered into obligations.

[PUSEY: There, He does not say, where. But Israel and every sinner in Israel know full well, where. God points out to the conscience of sinners the place and the time, the very spot, where they offended Him. . . . The sinner's conscience and memory fills up the word there. It sees the whole landscape of its sins around. — M.]

Ver. 10. PFAFF. BIBELWERK: Woe to the land, the city, or the church, where God sees nothing but abominations and sins!

Ver. 11. Each one reaps what he has sown. If thou dost become partaker in other men's sins, thou wilt meet with their punishment. If the captivity of God's people is certain, so is also deliverance. But, on the other hand also, the promise presupposes the threatening: no deliverance without judgment upon sin; salvation comes, but only after a long and dark night.

2. Chiefly against the Court.

CHAP. VII. 1-16.

- 1 When I would heal Israel,
Then the iniquity of Ephraim is made manifest,
And the evil deeds of Samaria.
For they have worked deceit, and the thief enters (the houses).
A band of robbers plunders in the street.
- 2 And they will not say to their heart,
(That) I have remembered all their wickedness;
Now their deeds have beset them round;
They are before my face.
- 3 By their wickedness they have pleased the king,
And by their falsehood the princes.
- 4 All of them (are) adulterers,
(They are) like an oven heated¹ by the baker,
Who rests, stirring up (the fire),
From the kneading of the dough, until it is raised.¹
- 5 On the (feast-) day of our king,
The princes begin in the heat² of wine
He draws out his hand [goes hand in hand] with scorners.²
- 6 For they draw close together; like the oven is Their heart in its craftiness;
Their anger³ sleeps the whole night,
In the morning it burns like a flame of fire.
- 7 All of them are heated like the oven,
And devour their judges,
All their kings have fallen,
And there is none among them that cries to me.
- 8 Ephraim mingles with the heathen,
Ephraim has become a cake not turned.

- 9 Strangers devour his strength,
Yet he does not know it.
Gray hairs are also sprinkled over him,
And he does not know it.
- 10 And the pride of Israel testifies to his face;
Yet they do not return to Jehovah their God,
And do not seek Him with [in spite of] all this.
- 11 And Ephraim became a silly dove, without understanding.
To Egypt they called:
To Assyria they went.
- 12 As they are going
I will spread over them my net;
As a bird of heaven I will bring them down.
I will chastise them,⁴ according to the announcement to their congregation.
- 13 Woe to them that they have wandered from me!
Destruction upon them, that they have sinned against me!
For I would have redeemed them⁵
But they spoke lies against me.
- 14 They did not cry to me with their heart,
For they shrieked upon their beds;
For corn and new wine they distress themselves;⁶
They apostatized from me.
- 15 And I instructed (them),
I strengthened their arm;
But they devised evil against me.
- 16 They will not return upwards⁷ [to God],
They have become like a deceitful bow.
Their princes will fall by the sword,
On account of the rage of their tongues:
This⁷ (will be) their scorn in the land of Egypt.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL

1 Ver. 4. — בְּעֶרְוָה is accentuated as Milel, probably because the Masorites took objection to the fem. form, בְּעֶרְוָה which is elsewhere masculine. But the names for fire and anything connected therewith are in the Semitic languages usually fem. Hence בְּעֶרְוָה is to be regarded as actually fem., and to be pointed בְּעֶרְוָה [See Green, Heb. Gr., § 196 c. — חֶמֶץ חֶמֶץ takes in the construct inf. the fem. ending, like חֶמֶל (Ezek. xvi. 5). — M.]

[2 Ver. 5. — חֶמֶל is an example of a construct before a noun having a preposition. This may denote the direct and powerful influence of the wine upon the revellers, or it may merely be an example of a poetical usage, Green, § 255, l. — לִצְעִים dr. ley. Some assume a verb לִצֵּץ, but Gesenius, Fürst and most regard the form as Piel Part. of לִצֵּץ with ה dropped. Houbigant would change the reading into לִצְעִים, but needlessly. — M.]

[3 Ver. 6. — Henderson objects, to the change of reading to אִפְיָהֶם, that this never occurs in the sense, ira, furor, coram. But as anger is a frequent sense of the dual form, and as the exigencies of the case seem to demand another reading, it seems reasonable to adopt the emendation. The conjecture has also the support of antiquity, as the Targum renders רִיבְנֵיהֶם and the Syr. وَمِنْ أَسَدٍ. Only it is not necessary to retain the ו; the form given in the Exposition is probably the correct reading. — M.]

4 Ver. 12. — אִיקִירֶם. This form is from the Hiphil אִיקִיר for אִיקִיר.

5 Ver. 13. — אִקְדֶם is a voluntative or optative: I would or would like to redeem them.

6 Ver. 14. — The LXX. have read יִתְנַחֲדוּ: they wound themselves. [But authority vastly preponderates in favor of the received reading. — M.]

[7 Ver. 16. — לֹא עֹל. It is agreed that the Kamets is due to the pause and that the normal form is עֹל. Critics are divided as to whether this should be regarded as a noun used collectively (they return to no-gods = idols) or as an adverb: upwards = to heaven, where God is. The word means properly an elevation, summit; hence the notion that it might be used concretely = most High. In xi. 7 this certainly seems the true meaning. Again it might be used adverbially, as in 2 Sam. xxiii. 1. The best lexicographers (Gesenius, Fürst) approve the former sense here; some of the best Expositors (Manger, Ewald, Kell, and others) prefer the latter. The Anglo-American expositors, generally, agree with the first named class. Newcome prefers to read לֹא יוֹעִיל: that which cannot profit. — M.] — זֶה, dr. ley.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1, 2. When I would heal Israel, etc. It was just when God attempted to heal them that their corruption was displayed in its full extent. If it had not been so great the attempt would not have been vain. The latter consisted in the chastisements themselves, but also in the discourses of the Prophet calling them to repentance. Now follows a description of their dreadful condition: lying, theft, and robbery. In the midst of it all, the greatest security, not a single thought of divine punishment. Their deeds have beset them round. This expresses evidently the boldness of their sinning = their sins have so increased as to become mountains hedging them round.

Ver. 3. The situation is the more desperate as the corruption extends to the highest ranks.

Ver. 4. They are all adulterers. The whole people are such, not merely the king and princes, though these are necessarily included. The adultery in this connection (comp. ver. 2: lying, thieving, and robbery, and ver. 5: debauchery) is to be taken in its literal sense. The comparison of the adulterer to a burning oven is here decisive; which does not suit adultery in the figurative application = idolatry, but expresses well the burning of lust.

בִּעֲרָהּ בְּאֵתֶּנָּה, literally: burning from the baker = heated by the baker. This burning of the oven is further described still more closely and figuratively, and that with relation to the increase of the heat, in the following words: 'שָׁפַת רֹג'.

Wünsche: Who rests, stirring up, from the kneading of the dough until it is leavened, i. e., when he has kneaded the dough, he rests, namely from kneading, which is the most fatiguing part of the whole process of bread-baking, but then does something else, which compared with the other is resting, namely, heats the stove and stirs it up from the time the dough is kneaded until it is raised. During this time while the process of fermentation is going on, the stove is being heated so as to become quite hot, i. e., hot enough for baking. The Part. therefore is not used for the Inf. depending on יָשַׁפַּת = who ceases to stir up. It would be strange if emphasis were to be laid upon ceasing, leaving off, when the object is to show that the heat increases. And Wünsche remarks rightly that it would be out of place to heat the oven before the dough was kneaded, and then to cease heating it, but that the contrary process is the one followed. [Henderson takes בָּעִיר in the sense of heating, as also does Gesenius. His application is as follows: "To place the violent and incontinent character of their lust in the strongest light, the Prophet compares it to a baker's oven which he raises to such a degree of heat that he only requires to omit feeding it during the short period of the fermentation of the bread. Such was the libidinous character of the Israelites that their impure indulgences were subject to but slight interruptions." But it is evident that the Prophet did not intend to call attention to any interruption of indulgence (and if he had the mode of conveying that notion would not have been very natural), but to emphasize its constant commission. Horsley takes בָּעִיר in the sense of stoker, one who attends to the fire, and makes it the subject of יָשַׁפַּת: "the stoker desists after the kneading of the dough until the fermentation be complete." He then gives a most fanciful application to the act of indulgence. For a sufficient explanation of the images see the Doctrinal and Ethical section, No. 1. — M.]

Ver. 5. But they are not only adulterers; they are also drunkards. They are heated with wine as well as with lust. The rulers here lead the way by their example. In the day of our king = festival day, probably birth-day. A banquet is referred to, given by the king to his nobles. By the phrase, our king, Hosea indicates his citizenship in the kingdom of Israel.

הִחֲלִי: the LXX, Syr., Chald., and Jerome: they began. Others: they are diseased. But the Hiphil does not mean: to be sick — 'רָגַשְׁתָּ רֹג'.

The king is the subject; literally: draws out [stretches out] his hand with. This means: he holds out his hand constantly to them = keeps company, goes hand in hand with them. Scorners, men who throw ridicule upon what is sacred, and is regarded as sacred. Such derision is especially natural in a state of intoxication. Hence the connection in which it stands here with the drinking-bout, a connection which is certainly not fortuitous.

Ver. 6. The figure of the heated oven is again taken up. But it becomes here an image of the heat of anger which burns in their hearts, which, being craftily concealed, does not at first make itself manifest, but which grows only the more surely, and at last breaks out in deeds of violence. (Just so is it in ver. 4 with the heat of the bake-oven.) The notion is evidently this, that the cordiality of the princes towards the king in the banquet is only apparent, only the result of cunning. It ends with an insurrection, with the murder of the king, who has certainly richly deserved such a lot. — קִרְבָּנִי רֹג. This is a difficult expression. Some: they have made their heart approach (resemble) an oven. But this is languid. Would any one say, in giving an illustration, that the object was only "approximately" like the image?

Besides, קִרְבָּנִי with תִּפְסָר would be superfluous. Keil: they have brought their heart into their craftiness as into an oven. The cunning is compared with the oven; the heart with the fuel. This clearly gives a plain sense. It would be perhaps more correct to detach קִרְבָּנִי from what follows as forming a clause by itself. Simson: they (the conspirators) approach. Wünsche, perhaps better: they draw close together, namely, in the banquet, at all events, as conspirators. The following words then mean simply: like an oven is their heart in their malice. Thus the malicious heart is like an oven which only waits for the kindling of a fire. — קָלִי-לַיְלָה רֹג; according to the Masoretic punctuation: the whole night sleeps their baker. Baker would then = he who heats the oven, i. e., their heart inflames them. By the baker might be understood passion (Ewald, Keil). This would rather be compared to the fire. "The baker sleeps" would then be explained as meaning that the baker after kindling the fire, cared no more about it. But it would not be exactly suitable to conceive of "passion" as sleeping, that is, not stirring up the fire. Simson refers "baker" to a person, the leader of the conspiracy. But the following member of the verse creates most difficulty.

וְהָאֵשׁ introduces another subject, the oven. It is therefore naturally suggested (Wünsche) to change the pointing into אֵשָׁהֶם, = their anger. This is represented as fire, and this sleeps in the night, i. e., it burns on, unperceived, during the whole night, until in the morning it becomes a clearly burning flame. So with their anger. "Night" and "morning" allude primarily to the figure of the fire, but probably also to the thing represented itself, especially if it be supposed that at the end of the feast, which has lasted the whole night, the anger breaks forth in the morning in violent acts, which are more particularly described in

Ver. 7. All of them, probably not merely the princes, but the whole people, together with the princes, who gave the impulse to the rest. They devour their judges, i. e., the kings. The following clause: all their kings fall, does not add anything new, but only expresses what is meant by the judges. This applies to the period succeeding that of Jeroboam II., when in swift succession Zachariah was overthrown by Shallum, Shallum by Menahem, and Menahem's son Pekahiah by Pekah, and between Zachariah and Shallum eleven years' anarchy prevailed. The Prophet alludes here to such events, certainly to a number of such events (perhaps also to earlier revolutions in the succession), as the plural, judges, kings, plainly shows. Yet the particular description in vers. 5, 6, suggest the conjecture that the Prophet had in mind a special case, and then in ver. 7 gives a general view. And there is none amongst them who calls upon me. The reference probably is to the kings. The sentence thus indicates briefly but strikingly the complete estrangement from God, the deplorable situation of these kings. Keil supposes the whole nation to be referred to: no one is brought to reflection in the midst of these mournful circumstances, that he should return to the Lord.

Ver. 8. Ephraim mingles itself up with the nations. This refers certainly not to the invasion of the Israelitish possessions by the heathen, nor merely to alliances with them (ver. 11), but in addition to something more profound, it supposes that through idolatry heathen practices were followed. Comp. Ps. cv. 35, 36, 39, "which passage furnishes a commentary upon ours" (Wünsche). A cake not turned, and therefore burnt on one side (while it is not baked at all on the other). The idea is plain. [On the preceding sentence, Henderson: "In Ps. cv. 35 a similar expression is used of promiscuous intercourse with idolaters. That such intercourse generally, and not specifically the entering into leagues with them, is meant, appears from the following clause, in which, to express the worthlessness of the Ephraimitish character, the people are compared to a cake, which, from not having been turned, is burnt and good for nothing. . . . Such was the state of the apostate Israelites; they had corrupted themselves and were fit only for rejection." — M.]

Ver. 9. Their being burnt declared figuratively that strangers devoured their strength. This is not merely an outward devastation by war, but an inner consumption by the inroads of heathen practices. Indications of old age also are apparent in Israel as tokens of speedy decay.

Ver. 10. See chap. v. 5.

Ver. 11. A consequence of impenitence. Israel is like a simple dove, which, not observing the snare set for her, is caught in it (ver. 12). They called out to Egypt; they went to Assyria. As Syria threatened Israel. The latter then turned immediately to Egypt, to obtain help against Assyria, and partly sought to gain the favor of Assyria (chap. viii. 9). And after all they fell into the net of Assyria.

Ver. 12. It is the Lord who inveigles them into destruction. According to the announcement to their congregation = according to the oft-repeated threatening against the people (comp. in the Law, Lev. xxvi. 14 ff.; Deut. xxviii. 15 ff.).

Ver. 13. They spoke lies concerning me, namely, that I would not help them. And they, in effect, lie when they do not call out for help.

Ver. 14. And they did not cry out to me with their heart, even if they did cry with the mouth. Their cry was one of unbelieving despair.

יִרְדּוּ, according to Fürst, to distress themselves, parallel to יִלְלִי. Others: assemble themselves in crowds, i. e., with eager desire for corn and wine. [See Grammatical Note.]

Ver. 15. They devise evil against me, namely, in their apostasy.

Ver. 16. עַל, probably adverb = upwards. [See Grammatical Note.]

A deceitful bow: a bow upon which the archer cannot depend, which, when he is in the act of shooting, he fears may cause him to miss his aim. So God cannot depend upon Israel, is deceived in them every moment, cannot reach the aim with them which He desires. Others claim for מִיָּד the meaning: slackness, therefore, a slack bow, which cannot carry the arrow to the mark. Each meaning affords essentially the same result. The princes are emphasized, because they were the seducers of the people. 'This (will become) a scorning in the land of Egypt; that is: the scorn of Egypt will fall upon them for this reason, namely, on account of the falling of the princes just mentioned. Not = because they placed their trust in Egypt and fell notwithstanding (Keil), for this would rather earn them the scorn of Assyria. They would be ridiculed by Egypt because of the weakness revealed in their fall, while they had magnified their strength before Egypt.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The Prophet assails the practices of the court without ceremony, and brands them with some powerful strokes, as a course of life, in which the nobles are as ready to carouse together as to conspire against one another. All discipline, as well as all fidelity, is wanting. "Even when they hold a feast in honor of their king, there is no end to their gorging, lewdness, carousing, etc. The more vilely they behave, the better they suppose they shall celebrate the day of the king. On the other hand, when they are dissatisfied with their king they are as eager and anxious to murder him, as they formerly were to drink his health until they became intoxicated." The spirit which governs these circles is aptly compared to a fire, for it is a powerful passion by which they are driven about, revealed in various forms, partly in the form of sensual and fleshly lust, and partly in the form of craft, rage, and party-intrigue. With the loss of morality, frivolity goes hand in hand, partly as consequence and partly as cause. The courtiers together with the king are "scorners," or make common cause with them. "The scorner, שֹׁנֵא, is the presumptuous, haughty, puffed-up (enlightened) man, who sets himself above what is and is regarded as sacred, and so practices his scornful amusement." Comp. also vers. 16: the insolence of the tongue.

2. The decay of the kingdom is already patent. Ver. 9: Gray hairs show themselves. But where the mistake lies, namely, in apostasy from Jehovah, those of the upper circles will not regard it (for it is these that the Prophet has specially in mind, comp. also ver. 16). Therefore, instead of returning to Him and seeking Him (ver. 10), the opposite means are seized upon, which have a result just the opposite of what they desire: help is sought in the world-powers (ver. 11). Not merely the vanity but the disastrous nature of such dealing is now clearly expressed; for Israel is just preparing the way for its own ruin. It is like a silly dove, which does not see the net, and so straightway falls into it, i. e., the world-powers are preparing its destruction. In truth, however, it is God who employs them to punish his faithless people (ver. 12). And thus will be fulfilled the previous announcement of punishment by the prophets (according to the declaration to their congregation, ver. 12). It is not yet particularly indicated how the world-powers are to accomplish their destruction, nothing being as yet said of a captivity.

3. We may collect the other scattered strokes delineating Israel's conduct towards God (for in such brief touches are the moral and religious views of our book exhibited). — Ver. 2 describes the insensibility of the conscience, which in the commission of evil deeds ignores God's omniscience, while nothing is more certain than that God knows them — they are before his face.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

PFÄFF. Bibelwerk: Ver. 1. When God lays his hand upon the conscience and his Spirit chastens it, then is first truly felt the greatness of sin. O, that we would subject ourselves to such chastening of the Spirit, and we would be saved!

CRAMER: When a sinner is about to receive help, it is with him as with many patients. They often do not feel their disease and danger, until the physician comes and reveals them.

PFÄFF. Bibelwerk: Ver. 2. It is great simplicity on the part of the ungodly to suppose that God does not know their wickedness. Mark, soul, the eyes of the Lord are like flames of fire, and know even the most secret things of thy heart, and accompany thee in all thy evil ways.

[MATT. HENRY: This is the sinner's atheism. As good say there is no God, as say He is either ignorant or forgetful; none that judgeth in the earth, as say He remembers not the things He is to give judgment upon. — M.]

PFÄFF. Bibelwerk: Ver. 4. Ye lustful men who burn so in your lascivious desires, know that a fire is prepared for you in the other world where you will burn forever.

PFÄFF. Bibelwerk: Ver. 7. What a deplorable situation men are in, when they have no longer confidence to cry out to God for help in their distress, because conscience tells them that they have made Him their enemy. But it is a great consolation to the pious that, when there is none to take their part, they have free access to God and his help.

Ver. 8. Beware of heathenish desires and practices. As soon as thou dost admit them — and they may obtain entrance in all kinds of seemingly harmless shapes, even in a refined form — they injure thy religious nature. The result is a stupefying of the spiritual sense, the loss of spiritual taste, then only remains an “turned, insipid, and disgusting cake.”

[PUSEY: Ver. 9. “Thy gray hairs are thy passing-bell,” says the proverb. — M.]

PFÄFF. Bibelwerk: Ver. 10. Man, thy sins condemn thyself. What! wouldst thou exculpate thyself? Turn only to thy conscience and ask it; it will soon utter thy condemnation.

[PUSEY: Ver. 13. To be separated from God is the source of all evils. Whoever seeks anything out of God or against his will, whoever seeks from man or from idols, from fortune or from his own powers, what God alone bestows; whoever acts as if God were not a good God ready to receive the penitent, or a just God who will avenge the holiness of his laws and not clear the guilty, does in fact speak lies against God. — M.]

Ver. 14. Is it the worst with thee when prosperity is past? To be vexed at the loss of temporal blessings, is a mourning of this world, and does not lead to life.

MATT. HENRY: To pray is to lift up the soul unto God; this is the essence of prayer. If that be not done, words, though never so well worded, are but wind; but if there be that, it is an acceptable prayer though the groanings cannot be uttered. — M.]

[PUSEY: Ver. 15. The creature can neither hurt nor profit the Creator. But since God vouchsafed to be their King, He designed to look upon their rebellions as so many efforts to injure Him. — M.]

Ver. 16. Whither dost thou turn? Upwards or downwards?

[PUSEY: Like a deceitful bow. In like way doth every sinner act, using against God in the service of Satan, God's gifts of nature or of outward means, talents or wealth, or strength, or beauty, or power of speech, — God gave all for his own glory; and man turns all aside to do honor and service to Satan. — M.]

II. THE JUDGMENT.

A. "Sowing the Wind brings forth the Whirlwind as a Harvest." Gall'ing Dependence upon Assyria.

CHAPTER VIII. 1-14.

- 1 To thy mouth (set) the trumpet :
" Like the eagle (it is coming) upon the house of Jehovah,"
Because they broke my Covenant,
And sinned against my Law.
- 2 To me they will cry :
" My God,¹ we know Thee, (we) Israel.
- 3 Yet Israel has rejected the good ;
Let the enemy pursue him !²
- 4 They set up kings, but not by me,
Made princes, but I knew (them) not.
Their silver and their gold
They made into idols for themselves,
That it [silver and gold] might be destroyed.
- 5 He has rejected thy calf, Samaria,
My anger is inflamed against them,
How long shall ye be incapable of purity ?
- 6 For that also [the calf] is from Israel,
The maker has formed it,
And it is no God,
For the calf of Samaria will become fragments.³
- 7 For they sowed wind and will reap a whirlwind,
It has no stalk,
(But) a sprout which will yield no meal ;
If it should yield (any),
Strangers would devour it.
- 8 Israel is swallowed up,
Even now have they become among the nations,
Like a vessel, in which no pleasure is taken.
- 9 For they have gone up to Assyria ;
(As) a wild-ass going alone by herself,
Ephraim gave presents⁴ (for) love.
- 10 Even if they give presents⁴ among the nations,
I will now gather [carry] them together (thither),
And in a little they will have sorrow for the tribute of the king of the princes.⁵
- 11 For Israel has increased altars for sinning,
They became to him altars for sinning.
- 12 I presented to him a myriad⁶ (precepts) of my Law,
(Yet) they are regarded as something strange.
- 13 My sacrificial offerings they sacrifice as flesh and eat (them) :
Jehovah has no pleasure in them,
He will now remember their guilt,
And will punish their princes ;
They will return to Egypt !
- 14 For Israel forgot his Creator
And built (idol-) temples,
And Judah increased the fortified cities :⁷
But I will send fire into his cities,
And it shall devour her palaces.⁷

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 2. — אֱלֹהֵי: my God. A distributive use of the singular pronoun. Each of the Israelites is represented as uttering the exclamation, and then all combined as making the protestation in common. Israel is in apposition to the subject of יִרְעַנְתִּי. — M.]

[2 Ver. 3. — The rendering of Schmoller follows the reading יִרְעַנְתִּי which has nearly as much authority ("forty-seven of De Roon's MSS., and two more by correction, eight of the most ancient and sixty-two other editions, the Syr., Vulg., and Targ.") as יִרְעַנְתִּי in the Textus Receptus, and is probably correct. — M.]

[3 Ver. 6. — שִׁבְרֵיהֶם, šwr. lry. Its root does not exist in Heb. It is usually compared with Chald. שִׁבַּב to break in pieces. Henderson prefers to consider it = שִׁבְרֵיהֶם flames. Arab. شَبَّبَ, to kindle a fire. — M.]

4 Vers. 9, 10. — הִתְּנֵה — הִתְּנֵה. The Hiphil and the Kal have here the same meaning: to give presents.

5 Ver. 10. — Simson and others translate: king and princes, namely, those of Israel, referring to the tribute which they pay. Here an asyndeton is assumed, or וְשָׂרֵיהֶם is read, after the ancient versions and several codices.

6 Ver. 12. — רַבּוֹ. According to the Kethibh = רַבִּין with ר rejected = 10000, a myriad. The Masorites, probably because they thought the expression too strong, would make the reading רַבִּי, multitudes, from רַב, which however does not elsewhere occur in the plural.

7 Ver. 14. — בְּעֶרְיֹו, בְּמִנְתֵּיהֶם. Both of these refer merely to Judah. In the former the people are thought of and therefore the masc. suffix is employed; in the latter the country, and therefore the fem. [It is possible, also, that the latter refers to each of the cities regarded individually. — M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. (Set) the trumpet to thy mouth. Jehovah commands the Prophet, as the herald of God, to proclaim with the trumpet of Israel the impending judgment: "Like an eagle (it is coming) upon the house of Jehovah." The judgment will fall as swiftly as an eagle (comp. Deut. xxviii. 49). The house of Jehovah not = the Temple, but Israel, as the people among whom God dwells (should and would dwell), comp. ix. 8-15; Num. xii. 7; Jer. xii. 7; Zech. ix. 8.

Ver. 2. Every one will cry: "My God!" Israel is in apposition to the subject contained in the verb [we know thee, we, Israel]. They rely upon the knowledge of God, which, as his people, they assuredly have. But it is a dead knowledge which can bring no deliverance. — Vers. 3 and 4 show the position of Israel.

Ver. 4. They have set up kings, but not by me. This refers to the self-authorized schism from the royal house of David. All the kings of Israel were not from God (that the government of the Ten Tribes was announced beforehand to Jeroboam by Ahijah the Prophet, 1 Kings xi. 30 ff., and that Jehu was anointed king and commissioned by Elisha, do not contradict this, for God makes use even of human sins to execute his decrees); and besides, according to chap. vii. 7, the Prophet probably has in view the frequent violent dethronements and usurpations individually. —

לְכַסֵּן יִקְרָה: in order that it, namely, the silver and gold, may be destroyed (comp. ver. 6). לְכַסֵּן expresses the certainty of the result as if it had been designed. [Most have regarded Israel (collectively) as the subject of this verb, but, as Keil says, the same thing is more fully stated in ver. 6, and the connection of the clause is clear. — M.]

Ver. 5. He has rejected thy calf, Samaria. Samaria is mentioned as the capital instead of the whole kingdom. The Calf in Bethel is meant. [Henderson, with many Continental Translators, renders: thy calf is an abomination, the verb being taken intransitively. This is better than the translation of E. V., which is retained by Pusey in its natural sense, and by Horsley with a most astonishing application of the expression: "Here God himself turns short upon Samaria or the Ten Tribes, and upbraids their corrupt worship by taking to Himself the title of Samaria's calf. I whom you have so dishonored by setting up that contemptible idol as the symbol of my glory — now expressly disown you." The parallelism, as well as the whole drift of the passage seems to confirm the view adopted above. — M.] How long will they be incapable of purity? incapable of walking purely before the Lord instead of polluting themselves with idols.

Ver. 6. רִמָּה is the predicate; this also = the Calf. It originated from men — from Israel through the maker — and is therefore no God.

Ver. 7. This result is the natural harvest of the evil sowing. The same image occurs in xii. 2.

רִמָּה is an image of vain human efforts, from which ruin is developed, as naturally as the wind becomes a tempest. Chap. x. 13; Job iv. 8; Prov. xxii. 8 are analogous, where זָרַח, עָמַל, וְעָלָה are the seed. The sowing of the wind is first regarded as one which brings a harvest of disaster and ruin, but afterwards, as one which, like the wind (image of nothingness, from which nothing can come), deceives the sower, brings him in no harvest אֶמְחֶה אֶמְחֶה: a word-play. The latter is literally meal, flour: perhaps = ears, as bearing the grains from which the flour is made. The following sentence declares that all their prospects were blasted. Israel's efforts in every direction are fruitless. The judgment through Assyria stands in the background already.

Ver. 8 is connected with ver. 7, but advances through the pret. נִכְלַע. Israel is now — already — actually swallowed up. The sequel shows how far and by what means. Like a vessel, etc.: comp. Jer. xxii. 28; xlviii. 38.

Ver. 9. פָּרָה בִּידֵי לוֹ. Keil gives the meaning thus: While a wild ass, a silly animal, remains alone by itself, in order to maintain its independence, Ephraim seeks to make alliances with the nations of the world, that are unnatural and incompatible with its position. Yet such a comparison by antithesis is somewhat forced. It is much more natural to consider as the tertium comp. the burning lust of the wild ass, and to attach the sentence to the following, in which Ephraim is described as a paramour. Wünsche finds the tert. comp. in the stubborn and intractable nature of the wild ass: that Israel made a like exhibition in going to Assyria in spite of all prophetic admonition. [So Henderson and, to a certain extent, Pococke, Horsley, Newcome, and Pusey. There is no reason why the two ideas should not be united. — M.] The meaning of the following member is clearly the same as in our phrase: courting one's friendship or love, and with this object giving him presents, flattering him, etc. So did Ephraim court the friendship of Assyria; but the expression is peculiarly pregnant. They presented love = they gave presents in order thereby to obtain love = they gave gifts for love.

Ver. 10. But this is all in vain. וְהָיָה כִּי יָבִיאוּ: I will bring them together, namely, among the nations, i. e., will carry them together thither. — The following words again are very difficult. According to the Masoretic punctuation: וְהָיָה כִּי יָבִיאוּ, they began. Therefore R. Tanchum, and, among the moderns, Eichhorn, Rosenmüller, Hitzig, Keil: They began to become small from the burden of the king of the princes. Others, after the LXX. (Symm., Theodot., Syr., Vulg.), deduce the word from וָיָלַד, and take it = to cease from, rest: they will rest a little from the burden of the king and princes: to be understood ironically = they will in captivity be deprived of their kings, and will have therefore to pay tribute to them no longer. Ewald and Meier read וְהָיָה כִּי יָבִיאוּ, also from וָיָלַד: to wait, abstain from anything = that they may cease a little from paying this shameful tribute, i. e., that they should wait a little before paying it. But was it Jehovah's purpose only to relieve Israel a short time from this tribute? Simson would therefore explain: In a little sorrow will seize them from the tribute of the king and the princes = in a little they will reap in sorrow the fruits of the tribute which they intend to pay as their security, and which makes them a prey to Assyria. So also Wünsche. [It will be noticed that E. V. takes the same view of the verb, but translates: they shall sorrow a little for the burden. Henderson agrees exactly: they shall suffer in a little (so the marginal reading in E. V.) by reason of the tribute. So also Cowles. Pusey thinks the meaning to be, that they shall sorrow but a little now on account of their burdens, in comparison with the greater trials of the captivity. — M.] The various views taken of וְהָיָה כִּי יָבִיאוּ are already apparent. It is usually and probably correctly understood of the Assyrian king, in the sense: king of kings. [The native Assyrian word for prince, as lately made out from the inscriptions, is sarru, answering to the Hebrew sar, and Professor Green (Pres. Quarterly, July, 1872, p. 128) is inclined to suspect that it explains this expression: king of princes, "which would seem not to be an arbitrary or merely poetic variation of the lordly title, 'king of kings,' but to contain a designed allusion to the native Assyrian word. And a like allusion may be found in the words attributed to Sennacherib (Is. x. 8):

'Are not my princes altogether kings?' — M.] Therefore (regarding וְהָיָה כִּי יָבִיאוּ as = tribute) tribute to the king, or tribute which he imposes. [See Textual note.]

Ver. 11. Increased the altars, while Israel should have only one altar.

Ver. 12. Myriads of my Law, hyperbole, to express the almost innumerable individual commands of the Law. [See Textual note.]

Ver. 13. וְהָיָה כִּי יָבִיאוּ, according to Fürst from a root וָיָלַד, to roast, formed by reduplication: a sacrifice burnt upon the altar, a holocaust. It is incomplete unless joined with וְהָיָה כִּי יָבִיאוּ, literally, a sacrifice of what is burnt, a burnt-offering. My burnt-offerings, i. e., those which should be burnt for Me, they slaughter for meat and devour. Therefore a complete profanation of the sacrifices. They were concerned only about the flesh. [The usual derivation from וָיָלַד, to give, with the meaning: offerings, gives substantially the same sense: sacrificial offerings, and is, at least, as probable as the other. — M.] They return to Egypt. Egypt is a type of the land of bondage (comp. Deut. xxviii. 68). Actual captivity in Egypt is scarcely meant.

Ver. 14. Israel forgot his Creator. Comp. Deut. xxxii. 15. Temples, perhaps idol-temples. Keil: palaces. The assertion would then be similar to that concerning Judah. But the notion is that Israel builds idol-temples, while Judah does not do that, but by increasing its fortified cities upon which it relied, it showed no less that it was forgetting God. Cities, Palaces, therefore refer to Judah alone.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. In spite of all departure from God, the sinner will often not quite abandon religion, worship, and prayer. In his hypocrisy he often misuses the most beautiful words (ver. 2): "Thou art my God," is otherwise the sum of all precious prayer. Hypocrites compile from the Scriptures a little book of compliments when they find some formulas which are extolled there. They place themselves behind these, while they are far from feeling their power (Rieger).

2. To practice idolatry, in the grosser or in the more refined sense, is to sow the wind, and the whirlwind follows sooner or later, as the harvest. When men forsake the living God, they build upon themselves, upon their own power and wisdom, and the more self-inflated they become, the more certain is their violent fall. All the more so that the foundations of a moral life have been undermined by forgetting the living God; more place is gradually given to vanity, thirst for pleasure, and evil desires, even against their own inclination. They are given up by the God to whom they would not give the glory. There must come a dreadful harvest of whirlwinds, though it may tarry long, though the results of the sowing may deceive and corrupt him long with their glitter and eclat. How often has this been proved in the history of individuals and nations! Compare the fate of the Second French Empire.

3. "God prescribed to Israel myriads of commands." How strongly this expresses the care of God of his people, and the comprehensiveness of his revelation! Truly nothing is wanting to them; in no way can they complain that they have been meagrely supplied. All the greater is their guilt, in regarding these commands as something "strange," as though they did not concern them at all, while they were issued solely for that people, and designed for their good. On the other side, the expression, "myriads of my Law," is certainly most significant as regards the Old Testament stand-point. All these myriads were then received, but the Gospel was not yet given. The one gospel, the one message: the Word became Flesh, outweighs them all. The mercy of God in Christ assured by that message has a force quite different from all law. This mercy of the Gospel is also regarded as something strange, though men should regard it as most truly their own, i. e., as answering their most intimate and their inmost needs, which can be said of no law.

4. "They shall return to Egypt." See on ch. ix.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 2, 3. How ready men are in time of affliction to depend upon their acquaintance with God and their service of Him, and upon their religious life, and to found on these a claim for help, and yet at other times they inquire after God so little! In affliction we hear nothing else than: my God.

WÜRT. SUMM.: The cause of war and all its resulting evils, is, that men reject "the good." And the good is God and his Word, with faith and obedience.

[POCOCKE: God is simply, supremely, wholly, universally good, and good to all, the Author and Fountain of all good, so that there is nothing simply good but God; nothing worthy of that title except in respect of its relation to Him who is good and doing good. Ps. cxix. 68. — M.]

Vers. 5, 6. Idolatry is man's foulest pollution. [MATTHEW HENRY: Deifying any creature makes way for the destruction of it. — M.]

Ver. 8. PFAFF. Bibelwerk: Sin has this bitter fruit also, that those who serve it come to be despised even by the world.

Vers. 9, 10. Trust in men or in earthly things more than in God is by Him counted idolatry. Trust in men must be most sorely repented of: for not only is the desired help most frequently not found, but those who trust in them are outwardly or inwardly still dependent upon them, and will be heavily oppressed.

Ver. 11. It does not help to increase altars. It depends on the one to whom the sacrifice is made.

Ver. 12. How richly has God remembered us with direction! What a rich treasure of the most varied instruction we have in his Word! But what will it profit us if we regard it as something "strange," when God in it addresses Himself directly to us? — The one Gospel is assuredly a greater gift of God than the myriads of the Law.

Ver. 13. God is as strict a creditor toward impenitent sinners as He is a kind and indulgent one towards the penitent.

[MATT. HENRY: A petition for leave to sin amounts to an imprecation of the curse for sin, and so it shall be answered.

PUSBY: God seems to man to forget his sins, when He forbears to punish them; to remember them when He punishes. — M.]

Ver. 14. Incomprehensible that man should forget his Maker! but it is only too frequent. To have been created by God, and yet to build temples to idols; what a plain contradiction!

B. The carrying away into Assyria. Decrease of the People.

CHAPTER IX. 1-17.

- 1 Rejoice not,¹ Israel,
Unto exultation, like the heathen,
For thou hast committed whoredom, departing from thy God,
Thou hast loved the reward of whoredom,
On all corn-floors.
- 2 The threshing-floor and the (oil-) press will not nourish them,²
And the new wine will deceive them.
- 3 They will not remain in the land of Jehovah,
But Ephraim will return to Egypt,
And in Assyria he will eat (things) unclean.
- 4 They will not pour out wine for Jehovah,
For their offerings will not please Him;
Like bread of mourning (their food will be) to them,
All who eat it will defile themselves:
For their bread is only for themselves,
It does not come into the house of Jehovah.
- 5 What will ye do on the day of the assembly,
And on the day of the feast of Jehovah?

- 6 For, behold, they have gone away because of the desolation :
 Egypt will gather them,
 Memphis will bury them.
 Their precious ³ things of silver,
 Thistles will inherit them ;
 Thorns (will be) in their tents.
- 7 The days of punishment have come,
 The days of retribution,
 Israel will discover :
 The prophet is foolish,
 The man of the spirit is crazed —
 Because of the greatness of thy guilt,
 And because the enmity is so great.⁴
- 8 Ephraim is a searcher (after revelations) with my God :
 (As to) the Prophet, the snare of the fowler
 Is upon all his paths :
 There is enmity in the house of his God.
- 9 They have wrought deep corruption ⁵ as in the days of Gibeah,
 He will remember their guilt,
 He will visit (upon them) their sins.
- 10 I found Israel as grapes in the desert,
 Like the early fruit on the fig tree in its first (bearing) I found your fathers,
 Yet they went after Baal-Peor,
 And consecrated themselves to shame,
 And became an abomination, like their paramour.
- 11 Ephraim — his glory will fly away as a bird ;
 No bearing, no pregnancy, no conception.
- 12 Even if they rear up their sons,
 I will bereave them of men,
 For, indeed, woe is to them,
 When I depart from them !
- 13 Ephraim, like as I saw Tyre,
 (Is) planted by the sea,
 Yet must Ephraim lead out his sons to the murderer.
- 14 Give to them, O Lord : — what wilt Thou give ?
 Give a barren womb and dry breasts.
- 15 All their evil is in Gilgal —
 For there have I hated them ;
 For the evil of their deeds
 Will I drive them out of my house,
 Will not love them any more ;
 All their princes are apostates.
- 16 Ephraim is smitten,
 Their root is withered,
 They will not bear fruit ;
 And even if they should bear,
 I will slay the darlings of their womb.
- 17 My God will abhor them,
 Because they did not hear Him,
 And they will be fugitives among the nations.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL

¹ Ver. 1. — The ancient Translators appear to have read לִי יִלְכָּד. [This is false grammatically, as לִי is always followed by the future. — M.]

² Ver. 2. — לִי יִלְכָּד. The people are here regarded as a woman. [Tanchum gives the rule that "in continued discourse when a nation or people is spoken of either the fem. suffix agreeing with לִי יִלְכָּד : congregation, or the masc. agreeing with לִי יִלְכָּד : people, may be used, as also that the singular may be used of them viewed as a body, and the plural when they are regarded as consisting of distinct individuals." So Ewald as to the gender, making the suffix relate to "die treulose Gemeine."—M.]

3 Ver. 6. — מְקַדֵּשׁ is in the construct state with לְ.

4 Ver. 7. — וְרָקָה. The sentence continues as though a conjunction [because] preceded. The conjunction is implied in יֵלֵךְ.

[5 Ver. 9. — For the asyndeton here, see note on chap. v. 2. It is best to take מְרַקֵּהוּ intransitively, and not understand an object, e. g. מְרַקֵּהוּ, which some supply.—M.]

6 Ver. 13. — וְאֶפְרַיִם forms the apodosis which introduces a contrast to the protasis. לְהוֹצִיאוֹ — must lead forth. See Ewald, 287, c. [The literal rendering is: But Ephraim (is) to lead forth, etc.—M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1, 2. אֶל-זֵיל intensifies the notion of rejoicing = unto exultation (comp. Job iii. 22). According to what follows it is rejoicing over a bountiful harvest. It was this that Israel expected and for which they would rejoice. But such joy was to be taken from them. פְּעֻמִּים. Keil: "Israel, after the heathen fashion, attributed the blessing of harvest to the gods, and rejoices in it as in a gift of the gods, after the manner of the heathen." That this is the meaning is evident from what follows, in which I discover not so much the ground why Israel should not rejoice, as an explanation of the פְּעֻמִּים, especially in the second member: thou hast loved. The lover's reward is the reward which the paramour gives to his mistress, or here the idol to its servant, the people. The addition: upon all corn-floors, shows what is regarded as that reward: it is that which is laid upon these floors, the fruits of harvest, which Israel considers to be the gift of the idols, as their reward for serving them (comp. ii. 7-14). Press: probably = oil-press, as new wine is specified afterwards; comp. also ii. 10-24; corn, wine, and oil are therefore mentioned together.

Ver. 3 shows how this will be brought about; it is not owing to the failure of the harvest, but to a captivity: thus they will lose their harvest which had grown. Return to Egypt, etc.: Keil is here undoubtedly correct when he says: "The expulsion is described as a return to Egypt, as in ch. viii. 13; but Assyria is mentioned immediately afterwards as the real land of banishment. That this threat is not to be understood as implying that they will be carried away to Egypt as well as to Assyria, but that Egypt is referred to here and in ver. 6, just as in viii. 13 simply as a type of the land of captivity, so that Assyria is represented as a new Egypt, may be clearly seen from the very words of our verse, in which the eating of unclean bread in Assyria is mentioned as the immediate consequence of a return to Egypt, whereas neither here nor in ver. 6 is there any allusion to a carrying away to Assyria at all; but, on the contrary, in ver. 6, Egypt only is introduced as the place where they are to find their grave. This becomes still more evident from the fact that Hosea speaks throughout of Assyria as the rod of God's wrath for his apostate people (comp. v. 13; x. 6, 14). Finally, it is clearly stated in xi. 5 that Israel will not return to Egypt, but that Assyria will be their king. By the allusions to Egypt, therefore, the carrying away into Assyria is simply represented as a state of bondage and oppression similar to Israel's residence in Egypt, or merely the threatening of Deut. xxviii. 68, transferred to Ephraim." They will eat (what is) defiled: partly because the legal prohibitions with relation to particular kinds of food could be observed only with difficulty in a foreign country, and especially because with the cessation of the sacrificial rites in general, the offering of the first-fruits must cease also, and all food not sanctified by the offering of the first fruits was unclean to Israel. This is completed in ver. 4.

Ver. 4. לֹא יִעֲרְבוּ לוֹ: will not be well pleasing to Him; therefore their sacrifices must be taken as the subject in spite of the accents. The meaning is: the sacrifices would not please Him, and therefore none are brought. Israel could not sacrifice to God in exile when He had withdrawn from them his gracious presence. Like bread of mourning to them (will be their food). Bread that was partaken of where a dead body lay was considered unclean, because the dead defiled for seven days the house, and all that came in contact with them; therefore: all who eat it will defile themselves. Their bread will be לֶחֶם מָוֶת = for the support of life, and therefore it must be eaten by them, but it does not come into the house of God to be consecrated.

Ver. 5. Festal days are no longer possible. To attempt to distinguish between מוֹעֵד and חַג (the former = the three annual pilgrim feasts, the latter = the other feasts, or, specially, the great harvest-feast, that of Tabernacles), is arbitrary. The expressions are probably synonymous. The notion is only emphasized by the second expression. מוֹעֵד regards the feasts outwardly, as gatherings; חַג rather denoting the rejoicing, or festal character of those occasions.

Ver. 6. They have gone away: the prophet sees them in the Spirit as already in banishment. מְשֻׁדָּד, literally: out of desolation. On Egypt see at ver. 3. [Keil: "Egypt is mentioned as the place of banishment, in the same sense as in ver. 3. There they will all find their graves. בָּהָר or בָּהָר, as in Is. xix. 13; Jer. ii. 16; xlv. 1; Ezek. xxx. 13-16, probably contracted from מִנְהָר, answers rather to the Coptic Membe, Memphe, than to the old Egyptian, Men-nefr, i. e., mansio bona, the profane name of the city of Memphis, the ancient capital of Lower Egypt, the ruins of which are to be seen on the west bank of the Nile, to the south of Old Cairo." Memphis was a celebrated burying-place of the Egyptians. The Anglo-American Commentators generally assume a literal allusion to Egypt.—M.] מְקַדֵּשׁ לֶחֶם כֶּסֶם = the costliness of their silver [see Gram. note], probably = their houses filled and decked with silver, comp. the parallel אֶתְלִיפִים. The growth of thorns and thistles is an image of utter desolation (comp. Is. xxxiv. 13).

Vers. 7, 8. The Prophet is foolish. This is in sense dependent upon נָדָע. False prophets are meant, who flattered the people, promising them only good. These will be shown to be fools. Even the false prophet is a man of the spirit, but it is an evil spirit that possesses him (רִיבֵן לְקָרָה, 1 Kings xxii. 22). On account of the greatness of thy guilt, this will happen, namely, that mentioned at the beginning of the verse. מִשְׁמָחָה, ambush, enmity, namely, against God and his prophets, as is explained in ver. 8. Keil: a searcher is Ephraim with my God. צֵר is used of the "looking out" of the prophet while waiting for a divine revelation. The meaning is: Israel searches out divine revelations along with "my God," i. e., the God of the prophet. He trusts in his own prophets, not in those inspired by Jehovah. Others find in צֵר the notion of lying in wait. God would then be the object of the lying in wait of an enemy. He would be so in the person of the prophets, for whom, according to the following hemistich, snares were set (Ewald, Umbreit, Meier). But the prep. עִם would not suit. The notion: lying in wait for God, is also strange. In the second hemistich נִכְרִי could be the false prophet. The snare of the fowler is upon all his paths would = he brings the people to ruin by all his actions. A snare is in the house of his God, would then be = in the house of the god of the false prophet. But it is better to understand the verse of the enmity which the true prophet must everywhere meet = As to the prophet, the snare, etc. "In the house of his God = in the temple.

Ver. 9. הִעֲמִיקוּ שְׁחָרָתָם, literally, they have made deep, they have wrought corruption = they have wrought deep corruption as in the days of Gibeah, when the shameful deed was done (recorded in Judges xix. ff.) to the Levite's concubine, which resulted in the almost complete extermination of the Tribe of Benjamin. Such conduct must be visited with punishment. Comp. viii. 13.

Ver. 10. Israel sinned grievously not only in Gibeah but earlier also, when God yet took such delight in him. His disposition now is shown to be that which he ever had. So much the more deserved is the punishment. Like grapes, etc. = As men prize grapes, etc., so did I prize thee. In the desert applies both to the grapes and to the finding, since grapes can be found in the desert, only when one is in the desert. An allusion to Dent. xxxii. 10. In its beginning, that is, when it begins to bear. Baal-Peor is here local, according to Keil, since נָחַשׁ is wanting; therefore: to the place of Baal-Peor; elsewhere: to the house of Baal-Peor. יִנְקָרָה, the same word, used designedly, as that employed to express consecration to Jehovah. They became Nazarites to Baal-Peor, to shame. The worship of Baal-Peor is alluded to. [See Num. xxv. 1-5.] The worship of Baal was then Israel's crowning offense, and the old Baal-Peor worship is now renewed.

Vers. 11, 12. They shall increase no longer. The unchaste worship of Baal may be referred to, whose natural punishment is the decrease of the population.

Ver. 13. Difficult. Keil: Ephraim is the object of הִנֵּנִי, and precedes on account of the emphasis laid upon it = I have selected Ephraim for a Tyre = I would make it as glorious as Tyre.

[Comp. Gen. xxii. 8 for a similar use of הִנֵּנִי. — M.] To describe its glory more particularly, we have the addition: planted in a meadow, a place favorable to growth. Wünsche: Ephraim is the subject to be connected with "planted" = Ephraim is planted in a meadow. The intervening clause he translates: like as I look upon Tyre; and the meaning is: Ephraim blooms like the lordly Tyre, wherever men may look. But this is clearly unnatural. The meaning would rather be: Ephraim is as when I look upon Tyre, i. e., when I look on Ephraim, it is as when I look on Tyre. Others (Ewald) by changing the reading to לְצִנּוֹרָה: in shape, as to form, outward appearance. Others take צִנּוֹר in the sense of the Arabic: a palm = Ephraim, as I beheld (it), is a palm. [The opinion approved above is apparently that entertained by the translators in E. V. It is that approved by most expositors, and is the most obvious sense suggested by the words. — M.]

Ver. 14. According to many expositors, this is an intercession of the prophet: May the Lord not let the mothers bring forth, rather than that the sons should be destined to death. But an intercession would scarcely suit in such a severe announcement of judgment. Therefore others consider it a prayer that other punishment may be inflicted. An important element in the punishment is the unfruitfulness of marriages. The thought of ver. 11 would then be essentially resumed.

Ver. 15. It cannot now be shown how all their evil was in Gilgal. Comp. for the rest, ch. iv. 15. [Henderson: "Gilgal, being one of the chief places of idolatrous worship, the wickedness of the nation might be said to be concentrated in it." This is the usual explanation. — M.] From my house = out of my congregation (viii. 1).

Ver. 16. The prophet beholds the future as already present (comp. ver. 11); only that here the image of a tree which can no longer put forth its shoots, is first employed. In the last member, however: and even if they should bear, no figure is employed.

Ver. 17 completes the whole, by giving the ground of the punishment, and stating that punishment clearly to be banishment among the nations, when the people should be fugitives.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The judgment stands here altogether in the foreground, and the punishment which the people are to expect is that they will be carried away into Assyria. That event is here indicated as "a return to Egypt," not literally, but rather symbolically (ver. 3). The captivity is regarded not so much as an outward fact, but according to its internal aspect, as the direct negation of that which God had done to Israel in leading them out of Egypt. Several features in the Exodus made it of special significance to Israel. One was the great and undeniable mercy of God. Viewing it more closely, it was a merciful liberation of Israel from bondage, from complete subjection to a foreign power. It was thus the condition and the beginning of Israel's existence as an independent nation. But not only so: God thus brought this people under special obligations to Him. As He had owned them to be his so expressly and emphatically in Egypt, and separated them from Egypt, they became by his leading them forth justly and legitimately his inheritance. And although this specific relation of Israel towards God did not assume its normal form until the giving of the Law, yet the leading of Israel out of Egypt lay at the foundation of their exaltation to become his people. Finally, it was the condition of, and the first step towards, their introduction into that country which God had promised to give to Israel as his people, and had therefore a fundamental significance in their history. Now the Assyrian Captivity is the direct contrast to this, and is therefore represented as a "return to Egypt." It is as signal a display of God's displeasure and wrath as the former was of his mercy. It is the loss of freedom, a reduction to a state of bondage, and a surrender to the power of a foreign enemy. Israel is only free through his God, and remains so only so long as he serves Him; by apostasy from Him, he therefore forfeited that freedom, and therefore at last must lose it, and forego an independent existence. This surrender to the power of the heathen stands further in the strongest contrast to Israel's relation to God as his people. They are thus really dismissed from this position by God, and abandoned by Him as his people (comp. vers. 15, 17). They are in fact made a "Not-My-People." Israel ignored the Law given at Sinai, and Jehovah ignores the deliverance from Egypt; and, lastly, the Assyrian Captivity is the loss of that country in which Israel's position as God's people had its material basis, as the deliverance from Egypt looked towards the possession of that country. Comp. ver. 3. And as the Promised Land was essentially one of divine blessing, the loss of this blessing is naturally referred to with special emphasis. If Israel has, like the heathen, ascribed such a blessing to false gods, it cannot enjoy the land presented to it as God's people, but as it became like the heathen, it shall return again into their countries. With the loss of the "Land of Jehovah," however, is united, as a peculiarly distressing consequence, the loss of the sacrificial service, and of the sanctification in life thereby conditioned. Israel is sent away into the land of impurity. In this the Captivity is like a return to Egypt. Already in this we hear the sigh of the banished after the Holy Land. Those against whom the oburgatory discourse is primarily directed will, it is true, feel least the impossibility of serving God. And yet even they cannot deny their Israelitish character, and least of all in a strange land. That which they now do not wish to do, or to be able to do, will hereafter be the occasion of their bitter sorrow — and thus it ever is.

2. "All nations rejoice over and enjoy a rich harvest (comp. Is. ix. 2), because they see in the bountiful harvest a sign and pledge of the divine favor, demanding gratitude to the Giver. If now the heathen ascribe these gifts to their gods and thank them after their manner, they do this in the ignorance of their hearts, without being specially guilty in so doing, because they live without the light of divine revelation. If, on the contrary, Israel rejoiced in the blessings of harvest like the heathen, and ascribed them to Baal (ii. 7), God could not leave unpunished this denial of his gracious benefits" (Keil). It amounts to the same thing when one generation ascribes such blessings partly to their own labor and partly to "nature," and accordingly its joy is purely "natural," altogether devoid of gratitude to the great Giver, and manifests itself necessarily in all kinds of self-indulgence.

3. When the judgment comes, the falseness of the false prophets becomes manifest. By these are, without doubt, to be understood those who, aping the position of Prophets of Jehovah, came forward as the pretended announcers of the divine will, and as the advisers of the people, especially of the rulers, but in their flattery of the people would pronounce good and justify everything, and therefore predicted prosperity and deliverance (Ezek. xiii. 10), and never uttered a word of earnest rebuke. They were trusted only too well. On the contrary, the true Prophets had to meet everywhere snares and enmity. Men know too late who are their true friends, and who their false.

4. The true prophet must, it is true, enter into God's designs, not merely of mercy, but also of righteous judgment; must announce them, so far as they have been revealed; and he may even desire their fulfillment, in order that a limit may be set to sin, and God's glory be spread. Yet it must be observed that when the prophets invoke judgment, they do not implore the destruction and death of the individual sinner, but only the "political" death, the destruction of a godless kingdom, because it had filled up the measure of its sins and thus became amenable to judgment, concerning which there could be no doubt in the prophet's mind.

5. With respect to Israel's conduct towards God, we are to observe the retrospect of former times (vers. 9, 10, comp. x. 7; xii. 1, 2). The sins of the present are thus shorn of their individuality and shown to form part of a whole complexity of sin. These are only a mode of manifestation, a new phase, of the same spirit, which was before, and had been always, displayed. As with the displays of God's love to Israel, so with the sins of Israel against God. Instead of an atomizing and mechanical view of this subject, we have a dynamic one, which alone is justifiable in the ethical sphere. From this conception of the evil, according to which its several manifestations of a constant fundamental tendency in the minds of a single nation, no great step is needed to reach the assumption of a constant disposition to evil in mankind generally, of hereditary sin, in which the individual with his special offenses only confirms and realizes the sinful disposition of the race.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

WURT. SUMM.: Vers. 1, 2. Sincere Christians should, in the blessings of God, so rejoice in the Lord, as to acknowledge that all good is from Him alone, to whom they must therefore give thanks, and so use them as not abusing them, but employ them to God's glory. Then will God the Lord not cease to do them good.

Ver. 3. STARK: That is the Lord's land where God is truly worshipped and honored.

Vers. 4, 5. PFAFF. Bibelwerk: When the measure of iniquity is full, God at last takes away the lamp of his Word from its place. Beware, then, you who have the truth, lest darkness fall upon you.

[PUSEY: It is in human nature to neglect to serve God when He wills it, and then to neglect to serve Him when He forbids it. The more solemn the day and the more total man's exclusion, the more manifest God's withdrawal. — M.]

[Ver. 6. MATT. HENRY: Those that think presumptuously to outrun God's judgments are likely enough to meet their deaths when they had hoped to save their lives. — M.]

Ver. 7. We usually discover too late who are our true friends and who our false.

FALSE. Bibelwerk : False prophets are a token of God's wrath burning over a church or nation.

[PUNISH : The man of the world and the Christian judge of the same things by clear contrary rules, use them for quite contrary ends. The slave of pleasure counts him mad who foregoes it; the wealthy trader counts him mad who gives away profusely. In these days profusion for the love of Christ has been counted a ground for depriving a man of his property. One or the other is mad, and worldlings must count the Christian mad, or they must own themselves to be so most fearfully (Wisdom v. 3-6). The sinner first neglects God; then, as the will of God is brought before him, he willfully disobeys Him; then, when he finds God's will irreconcilably at variance with his own, or when God chastens him, he hates Him, and hates Him greatly. — M.]

Ver. 8. Let it not offend you, if, for the sake of the truth, you must suffer persecution. "Even so persecuted they the prophets who were before you."

Ver. 12. When God is graciously disposed towards us, He is our Light, our Way, our Life, our Love, our Comfort, our Joy, our Shepherd, our Physician, our Bridegroom, our Father, and our Redeemer. If He departs from us, all this is gone, like as when the sun sets and darkness covers all.

SPUR : When the divine wrath has begun to burn, it rises, so to speak, by degrees. And God commonly proceeds by beginning at what is most external to us, whose loss we would not deeply feel, but ever advances further towards that which is dearer and of more moment, until at last He strikes at our very selves. If God is not gracious towards us, He is angry; He can sustain no intermediate relation.

Ver. 15. God refuses at last to grant to unfaithful children even the privileges of his house. He at the same time disinherits them. When God ceases to love us we are lost. Hence nothing is more necessary than the prayer: Withdraw not thy love from us. Nothing is more precious than the power to say: I am persuaded that nothing can separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

Ver. 16. Whole families, even whole nations die out through God's judgments!

C. Devastation of the Seats of Worship. Destruction of the Kingdom.

CHAPTER X. 1-15.

- 1 Israel is a thriving vine ¹
Which sends forth its fruit;
As its fruit abounded,
It multiplied altars;
According to the prosperity of the land,
The better they made their images.
- 2 Their heart is smooth: now will they make expiation:
He will cut down their altars, he will destroy their images
- 3 For now they will say:
We have no king,
Because we did not fear God,
And the king — what will he do for us.
- 4 They speak falsely,
Swearing ² falsely and contracting alliances:
And justice grows like the poison-plant
In the furrows of the field.
- 5 For the calves ³ of Samaria,
The inhabitants of Samaria will tremble,
For its people mourn for it,
And its idol-priests will tremble for it,
For its glory, that it has departed from it.
- 6 Itself ⁴ will be carried to Assyria,
As a present to the warlike king:
Shame will take hold upon Ephraim,
And Israel will be ashamed of its counsel.
- 7 Samaria ⁵ is destroyed,
Its king is like a chip on the surface of the water.

- 8 The high places of Aven are devastated,
The sin of Israel,
Thorns and thistles will grow upon its altars,
Then they will say to the mountains: Cover us!
And to the hills: Fall upon us!
- 9 Since the days of Gibeah, thou hast sinned, Israel!
There they stood:
The war against the sons of iniquity⁶ did not reach them in Gibeah,
- 10 As I please, I will fetter them,⁷
And the nations will gather themselves against them,
When I bind them for their two offenses.
- 11 For Ephraim is a well-trained heifer,
Which loves⁸ to thresh:
But I will pass over her fair neck:
I will yoke Ephraim,
Judah shall plough,
Jacob [Ephraim] shall harrow.
- 12 Sow for yourselves according to righteousness,
And reap for yourselves in the (like) measure of mercy!
Break for yourselves (new) soil!
For it is time to seek Jehovah,
Until he come and rain righteousness upon you.
- 13 (Yet) ye have ploughed wickedness,
Ye have reaped iniquity,
Ye have eaten the fruit of lying:
Because thou didst trust in thy way,
In the multitude of thy heroes.
- 14 And the noise of war⁹ has risen among your tribes,¹⁰
And all thy fortresses are destroyed,
As Shalman destroyed Beth-arbel in the day of battle,
The mother is dashed upon her children.
- 15 Thus has Bethel¹¹ done to you,
For the evil of your evil [your great evil],
In the early morning [soon] the king of Israel shall be utterly destroyed.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 1. — לִי is always fem. except here and in 2 Kings iv. 39. It is masc. here as relating to Israel. לִי is not strictly pleonastic here, it having the force of the poss. pronoun: its fruit. — M.]

2 Ver. 4. — אֱלֹהִים , though an inf. absol., is here conformed to קִרְתָּ instead of אֱלֹהֵי .

3 Ver. 5. — Wünsche: " עֲגֵלֹת . The fem. is surprising, since the calves which were worshipped, really three-year-old steers, appear elsewhere always masc. It cannot be deemed far-fetched to suggest that the fem. is employed somewhat contemptuously and sarcastically."

4 Ver. 6. — אִירֹו with the passive. According to Ewald, § 299 d, the active sense pervades the passive throughout in such a case as this; thus יִבְלֵל here = one leads it. Fürst is of a different opinion. According to him the primary notion of אִירֹו is being, essence, and it therefore serves to emphasise the subject. [The former is the prevailing and preferable view. Comp. Green, Gr., § 271, 4 a. The opinion of Fürst seems to have been based upon his theory that there is an affinity between אִירֹו (אִירֹו) and שֵׁן , and some other words of similar radicals and significations. — M.]

5 Ver. 7. — בְּלִמְדָּה , with a fem. suffix, because לְמִדָּה , as being a city, is fem. On the other hand בְּלִמְדָּה has a masc. form because it stands at the beginning of the sentence. The construction here, according to the Masoretic punctuation is either an asyndeton: Samaria and her king, or the latter is explanatory of the former: Samaria, namely, her king (= the whole kingdom). Wünsche adopts the probably preferable view that בְּלִמְדָּה begins a new sentence.

[6 Ver. 9. — עֲלֵהְךָ transposed from עֲלֵךְ . One edition (the Brixian) and many MSS. have the common form. This would be the only case of the occurrence of the transposition. — M.]

7 Ver. 10. — וְאִסְרֶם . ו marks the apodosis. The verb is from אִסַּר [with daghesh compensative. — M.]

[8 Ver. 11. — אֶחָדָהּ. The ם is paragogic, with the fem. part. אֶחָדָהּ. — M.]

[9 Ver. 14. — אֶחָדָהּ. The ם is either epenthetic, or it is merely a mater lectionis, which is most probable; see Green, Gr., § 11, 1. — M.]

[10 Ver. 14. — A number of MSS. and early editions read אֶחָדָהּ instead of אֶחָדָהּ. The ancient Versions are claimed as having followed this reading also; but it is more probable that they rendered the plural as sing., the noun being a collective one. — M.]

10 Ver. 15. — Some suppose the אֶחָדָהּ to have been omitted before אֶחָדָהּ, and the latter to be local.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Comp. Ps. lxxx. 9-12. There is also an allusion to ch. ix. 10, and yet the image is quite differently applied. Israel is represented here not so much as being pleasant in itself and of worth in the sight of Jehovah (and is therefore not compared to fruit), but from the stand-point of its fruitfulness, which, however, was of the wrong kind. Hence even its fruitfulness will be taken away from it (ch. ix. 16). בִּרְגֵל, according to Fürst = blooming (LXX., Syr., Aquila), and thereafter according to Keil: climbing, thriving, after the primary idea of בִּרְגֵל: to pour out, to run itself out, here = climb upwards. [Fürst compares the Arab. bakka: to bloom. If this sense is the correct one, this is the only case of the occurrence of this verb. — M.] The meaning: empty, is unsuitable. אֶחָדָהּ: to place, set = prepares, furnishes fruit for itself.

Ver. 2. Their heart is smooth. The expression is elsewhere employed of the tongue, lips, words = deceitful, false, not sincere (devoted to God). The explanation: divided, is false, for the Kal means: to divide, transitive. אֶחָדָהּ is properly: to cut off the head by striking the neck. [Henderson: "It is properly a sacrificial term. It is here, with much force, used metonymically, in application to the destruction of the altars on which the animals themselves were offered." For the force of אֶחָדָהּ, see on ver. 15. — M.]

Ver. 3. They will then see that they have no king any longer, because they forsake Jehovah, i. e., none appointed by God, and none, therefore, who can help them. אֶחָדָהּ: to do = to profit.

Ver. 4 explains especially the smoothness of the heart of ver. 2. They speak words, mere words, without sincerity. The following infinitives avouch the statement. The covenants are such as want truth; they were concluded (with foreign nations) only for the sake of an expected advantage, not from real friendship. אֶחָדָהּ, poison, here = poison-plant. אֶחָדָהּ. Most take this = judgment. A force far-reaching and seizing upon everything, is supposed to be described. But the divine judgment cannot be compared to a vile plant outgrowing everything else. Hence we must remain by the meaning: justice. The thought is manifest: If justice prevailed, the land would be like a well-appointed field, but it is now like one that is neglected, and in which therefore poison plants spring up, because justice was prostrated. By a somewhat bold figure justice, when falsely administered, when perverted and abused, is compared to a poisonous plant. It has been changed into it, as it were. Comp. Amos vi. 12. [Henderson adheres to the former explanation; Pusey approves the latter. It is also preferred by Cowles, who illustrates it from Amos v. 7; vi. 12, and supposes that Hosea adapted the image from its use by his predecessor. — M.]

Ver. 5. The punishment can therefore not linger. Already the inhabitants of Samaria tremble for the golden calves. Keil: The plural אֶחָדָהּ stands here as indefinite and general, without our being obliged to infer that several golden calves had been set up in Bethel. A sing. at all events immediately follows. Wünsche: "The Prophet is thinking of all the calves in the northern kingdom which were imitations of the chief golden idol erected at Bethel. By these imitations all Israel had, in a certain manner, become a Beth Aven." Beth-Aven. See ch. iv. 15. Its people, — its priests. The suffixes refer to the idol-god. What a strong accusation! The people are named the people of the calf-god. אֶחָדָהּ usually = to rejoice, but here (employed for the sake of the assurance with אֶחָדָהּ) = אֶחָדָהּ, to writhe in anguish, to mourn, parallel to אֶחָדָהּ. On its account, also refers to the calf, and is more nearly explained by the words, for its glory, i. e., the glory and the divine nimbus which were associated with the calf-worship. This glory will depart from the calf, where it cannot give protection from the enemy, and will itself be carried away.

Ver. 6. Itself also, namely, the golden calf. [See Gram. note]. Its counsel, namely, that which itself gave to itself, namely, to apply to Assyria. [On the phrase: warlike king, see ch. v. 13. — M.]

Vers. 7, 8. The kingdom of Samaria falls along with its gods. [See Gram. note.] The image of a chip on the surface of the water denotes the untraceable disappearance, and probably also the violent destruction = as a chip upon the water is driven on by the stream and so disappears. אֶחָדָהּ are literally: the heights of evil. But Aven, in allusion to Beth-Aven = Bethel; for its high places were heights of evil, since the image-worship which rose in Bethel = Beth-Aven, was practiced there. The sin of Israel is in apposition to the high-places, etc. Those high places were the sin of Israel, because it was by means of them that Israel sinned. Then they say to the mountains, etc. This expresses the hopelessness of despair. They would rather be buried by the mountains, than undergo the afflictions of such a time. Applied in Luke xlii. 30 and Rev. vi. 16.

Ver. 9. From the days of Gibeah. These days, referred to already in ch. iv. 9 (see that passage), are regarded as the beginning of Israel's sinning. Others take the words comparatively: more than in the days of Gibeah. [So Cowles: This opinion is not common. — M.] The following words are difficult. Ewald: There they (the Israelites) stood. Should not war against the sons of impiety reach them in Gibeah? Keil: There, that is, in the same sin, they stood, i. e., remained; the war against the sons of iniquity did not reach them in Gibeah, that is, the war once waged by the other tribes of Israel against the tribe of Benjamin, on account of the infamous deed of the men of Gibeah, did not reach the Ten Tribes, i. e., they were destroyed by no such war like others of the Israelites, though they did not less deserve such a fate, therefore God will punish them now. But the translation is forced. Wünsche perhaps explains better, though much might be said against his translation also: They stood there—that war might not reach them in Gibeah—beside the sons of iniquity. The passage accordingly says in what the sin of Israel in the days of Gibeah had consisted, namely in this, that they, the Benjamites, had stood by the Levites in Gibeah—the sons of iniquity against the rest of the Israelites. Esth. ix. 16; viii. 11 are cited in proof that עֲזָרָה with עַל has the sense of standing by [assisting]. [The translation assigned above to Keil, which is also that of E. V., is approved by Cowles. Instead of being “forced” it is evidently the most simple and natural. Henderson translates: shall not the war against the unjust overtake them in Gibeah? See Textual note. — M.]

Ver. 10. כְּחֵלְיִי: in my desire = when or as I will. [Keil: “An anthropomorphic description of the severity of the chastisement.”] To take part in the infliction of chastisement, nations will be gathered against Israel. The reference is to the war against the sons of iniquity (ver. 9). [This reference is not clear unless the construction of Ewald and Henderson given above be adopted. — M.] The last hemistich is difficult. The Kethibh is עֲזָרָה. According to Fürst from עַל in the sense of nothingness = אֵין, therefore in the concrete: idol-image. כְּחֵלְיִי = sins. According to the first explanation, idol-images = calves. The latter is probably correct as referred by Keil to the double sin of apostasy from Jehovah and from the royal house of David. The whole clause would therefore be: When I bind them to their two transgressions (namely, by punishing them) so that they must drag them, so to speak, as an oppressive burden. The sense may, however, be simply: on account of their two transgressions. The image of the heifer in the next verse is anticipated here. [The explanation last given is now usually followed and is the most probable. Raschi and Ewald translate: before their two eyes, i. e., openly. The rendering: furrows, in E. V. follows the Targum and the majority of the Rabbins. — M.]

Ver. 11. כְּחֵלְיִי, taught, trained for work. Which loves to thresh: According to many expositors this refers to the circumstance that threshing is the lighter work, in which, besides, the heifer may eat at her pleasure, and hence is an image of the pleasant and prosperous condition of Israel. According to others the tert. comp. is the treading, and hence the victorious power and dominion of Israel, as under Jeroboam II. would be represented with the accessory notion of a violent treatment of those who had been subdued. But now the situation of Israel would be different. [This is the more common and certainly the preferable explanation. So Henderson, Cowles, and other English Expositors. — M.] I will pass over her fair neck—in a hostile sense = I will place a yoke upon her. כָּבוֹד: beauty, alluding to her fatness. אֶעֱבֹדָהּ: I will cause to be driven = I will yoke, namely, for ploughing and harrowing. The compulsory endurance of severe toil appears here in complete contrast to the preceding situation. Judah shall share the same fate. This is mentioned only incidentally and in comparison with Ephraim; but the similar lot of the former is constantly alluded to. Jacob, here mentioned along with Judah, probably = Ephraim. וְאֶעֱבֹדָהּ shall harrow for himself, forcibly expressing strongly that this toil is not spared him. (So also Keil; but this explanation seems unnatural. Others, as Fausset, translate: break the clods before him; but the preposition must be unduly forced to make it convey such a sense. The best way is to regard it as a pleonasm. Comp. Gen. xii. 1; Job xv. 28; Sol. Song ii. 17, and many other passages. — M.]

Vers. 12, 13. The image of ploughing and harrowing leads to that of sowing and reaping. But the discourse turns from the threatening, which holds out the prospect of punishment, to an exhortation to return (in order to escape punishment), which is then (ver. 13) supported by an allusion to the present conduct of the people (under the same figure). According to righteousness. The divine righteousness, by its being sown, i. e., by its operation, should be their determining principle, be their norm and standard. וְאֶעֱבֹדָהּ is then to be understood of the mercy of God. The harvest will, if they sow thus, be determined by the mercy of God (not merely by desert), shall be bountiful and of good quality; this mercy itself shall be the harvest. Keil understands וְאֶעֱבֹדָהּ to mean justice towards their fellow-men, וְאֶעֱבֹדָהּ of (condescending) love (towards the despised), and explains the clause thus: sow righteousness as the seed; the fruit will be love. But וְאֶעֱבֹדָהּ has too clearly the signification “the divine reward of Israel’s religious and moral sowing” (Wünsche). וְאֶעֱבֹדָהּ, to plough new soil. The words go back now beyond the sowing. Israel does not merely need to scatter the true seed; it needs a new soil and must therefore begin anew. The explanation of וְאֶעֱבֹדָהּ is again difficult. It could be taken in the sense of salvation, blessing, so that the bestowal of salvation and blessings would be the consequence of seeking the Lord. In not a few passages this signification is most appropriate, and the usual meaning will not suit here. We expect the mention not of a moral quality, but of its consequences. Keil explains: “God rains righteousness not merely in giving the power to gain it, as He gives rain for the growth of the seed (comp. Is. xlv. 3), but also because He himself must create it and inform the soul with it by his Spirit” (Ps. li. 12). This in itself is quite true, but is it proper to speak of raining or pouring out righteousness? This differs altogether from the expression: to pour out the Spirit. [This figurative expression would be quite characteristic of the style of Hosea. It would be only another instance of the boldness and freedom of his imagery. The figure is double, including also a metonymy, in which righteousness, the effect of the outpouring of the Spirit, is put for the cause itself. Many, following the Syr., Targ., and Vulg., take וְאֶעֱבֹדָהּ = He will teach. — M.]

Ver. 13, as it now stands, says that iniquity has been ploughed; iniquity is the soil which they cultivated, and the seed and the harvest corresponded to it. From wickedness there resulted wickedness. One step further still than the harvest is taken in the following words: Ye have eaten the fruit of lying—the fruit which deceives. The result of this conduct is nothing, no profit but disaster and ruin. The cause is still more specially indicated; in other words, the false conduct of Israel is characterized: since thou didst trust, etc., namely, instead of in Jehovah.

Ver. 14. Among thy peoples. People either = military host, or as in the Pentateuch = tribe. As Shalman destroyed Beth-arbel. This fact is not known from history, and the explanation is therefore uncertain. According to the usual opinion Shalman is a contraction for Shalmaneser, the name of the Assyrian king who destroyed the kingdom of the Ten Tribes¹ (2 Kings xvii. 6). Fürst understands an older Assyrian king before Pul, since the name Shalmaneser never appears shortened to Shalman, and the Assyrians never engaged in a destructive battle with Israel, and Shalmaneser destroyed Samaria forty years later (after Hosea). Beth-arbel, according to him, is Beth-arbel near Gargamela, made famous later by the victory of Alexander the Great. Keil supposes that the Prophet, since the conquest of such a distant city would scarcely have been known to the Israelites, could not have held up the destruction of this city before them as an example, and would therefore understand the Arbela in Upper Galilee, between Saphoris and Tiberias, mentioned in 1 Macc. ix. 2, and later by Josephus.

Ver. 15. The subject of מִצֶּיֶךְ is either Shalman (if = Shalmaneser) or Jehovah, of whom the Assyrian king is the instrument, or (as the Targum and also Keil) Bethel, because that city prepared the way for the ruin which befell Israel. Evil of your evil = the most extreme evil (comp.

Ewald, § 313 c.). מִצֶּיֶךְ : in the early morning, probably = early, not: at the time when prosperity shall seem to be dawning or near (Keil). There is not the remotest hint of this in the context. The king of Israel, naturally collective = the kingdom of Israel.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. "In the midst of the calf-worship established by Jeroboam, the Israelites still would keep before them the God of Israel; but this resulted in a divided heart, a halting between two opinions (ver. 2). And when their prosperity became undermined by God's judgments, the smiting of a guilty conscience told them of their sin; but that was not a repentance unto life. The improvement of circumstances which the Israelites sought in the schism of Jeroboam cost them dear. For, since he led them away from the fear of God, the help which was to have been expected from his government was already undermined. The sinner awakened by chastisement discovers this deception of sin much more readily than he discovers his obligation to return to God with a contrite heart" (Rieger).

2. One chief element in God's judgment upon Israel was the destruction of the seats of worship (comp. ch. viii.), and here, more particularly, the carrying away of the idol-gods by the enemy (vers. 5, 6). Both the nothingness of idolatry and the great guilt of Israel are here unmistakably exhibited. With this are connected the destruction of the kingdom (vers. 7, 15) and the conquest of the country. Freedom is lost; instead of it comes slavery (ver. 11). The anguish of the judgment is most forcibly depicted (ver. 8) in expressions which, in Luke xxiii. 30, are employed to set forth the distress occasioned by the destruction of Jerusalem, but, in Rev. vi. 16, to describe the terror of "the great day of the Lord." Thus the description of the judgment announced by Hosea is of such a character as to be a type of the final judgment, even though Hosea himself does not designate it "the day of the Lord." The distress of a late repentance is expressed in ver. 3. It is a part of the judgment, since it consists in vain self-reproaches, all too late. In our chapter again the necessary connection between the judgment and sin is emphasized by the image of the sowing and the reaping: from an evil sowing nothing can come but an evil harvest. The expected reward must only be a manifest deception: "the fruit of lying."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. This was the result of God's mercy. God makes the vine and also gives the growth and the precious fruit. And as long as God's favor lasts, so long are men like such a plant. A beautiful image of a life blessed by God, and as true of nations as of individuals. But it is a deplorable thing that man usually cannot bear his prosperity, and that, instead of being led by God's goodness to repentance and nearer to God, he rather forgets Him (see at ch. ii. 9). The fruits are not given back to God. Thus is God often defrauded of the fruits which men owe to Him; and "idols," the world, and the flesh, enjoy what are his.

[MATTHEW HENRY: What we do not rightly employ we may justly expect to be emptied of. It is a great affront to God and a great abuse of his goodness, when, the more mercies we receive from Him, the more sins we commit against Him. — M.]

Ver. 2. The state of the heart is the source of the evil. As long as this does not belong to Him, so long will men rob Him of his own. God will have the heart as his alone, and suffers none to share that possession.

Vers. 5, 6. [PUSEY: Without the grace of God men mourn, not their sins, but their idols.

FAUSSET: Separated from God all human power is weakness, and all apparent stability fluctuating and perishing as the foam. The fear of God is the only true basis of solidity and permanence. — M.]

Ver. 8. A fearful expression of the despair with which impiety shall at last end: a type of the anguish of the lost at the last judgment.

[FAUSSET: Surely it is infinitely better to pray to Jesus now to "cover" our transgressions with the blood of his atonement, than through neglect of this to have to cry to the mountains at last, "Fall on us and cover us." Our prayer to Jesus, if offered in faith now, shall surely be heard; but prayer to the mountains then shall be in vain. — M.]

Ver. 11. BERLENBURGER BIBLE: The pride which exalts itself and does not fear before Him

¹ [The Assyrian monuments show that it was Sargon, the son of Shalmaneser, who destroyed Samaria. The pas-

who is the God of the whole earth, must be abased. O, that Ephraim would submit himself and his neck to the yoke of the gentle and humble Lamb!

Ver. 12. BERLEMBURGER BIBLE: When a man redeems uncultivated soil he restores it to the one to whom it rightly belongs. For he is the only one who can redeem it. We have received from God his soil, and as we have no strength to make it profitable, it remains untilled. But as soon as God sees that we would break up this uncultivated ground, and we, feeling our inability, seek help in Him, He ploughs it Himself with the ploughshare of the cross. Then He sows righteousness in it, and makes it fruitful in itself, that it may bear much fruit in Christ.

[MATTHEW HENRY: Let them break up the fallow ground; let them cleanse their hearts from all corrupt affections and lusts which are as weeds and thorns, and let them be humbled for their sins, and be of a broken and contrite spirit in the sense of them; let them be full of sorrow and shame at the remembrance of them, and prepare to receive the divine precepts, as the ground that is ploughed is to receive the seed that it may take root. See Jer. iv. 3.

FAUSSET: Grace used well is rewarded gratuitously with more grace. — M.]

Ver. 13. The fruit of sin is ever the "fruit of lies." For sin always deceives those who serve it. Going in our own ways and trusting to human power is shown especially to be deceptive.

[FAUSSET: Only when we mistrust ourselves, and trust in the Lord and his righteousness alone, are we safe, justified, and blessed. — M.]

III. MERCY.

CHAPTER XI.

God cannot utterly destroy Israel, whom He has always loved, though they have so basely requited Him, but will again show Mercy unto them.

CHAPTER XI. 1-11.

- 1 WHEN Israel was a youth, then I loved Him,
And out of Egypt I called my son.
- 2 They [the Prophets] called them; so (often) they turned away from them;
They sacrificed to the Baals,
They burnt incense to the idol-gods.
- 3 And I led Ephraim along,¹—
He took them² upon his arm; —
Yet they knew not that I healed them.
- 4 With the bands of a man I drew them,
With cords of love;
And I was towards them,
As those that would raise the yoke-strap over their jaws,
And I reached out to them to eat.³
- 5 They will not return to the land of Egypt,
But Assyria,⁴ it is their king,
For they refused to return.
- 6 And the sword goes its rounds in their cities,
And destroys their bars [defenses],
And devours them for their devices.
- 7 And my people incline to fall away from me;⁵
They [the Prophets] call them (to look) upwards,
All together they refuse to raise themselves.
- 8 How should I give thee up, Ephraim?
How should I surrender thee, Israel?
How should I make thee like Admah,
Set thee like Zeboim?
My heart is turned within me;
My repentings are kindled together.
- 9 I will not execute the fierceness of my anger,
I will not again destroy Ephraim:
For I am God and not man;

In the midst of thee is a Holy One,
And I will not come in wrath.

- 10 They will follow the Lord :
Like a lion He will roar ;
Yea He will roar, and children from the sea will come trembling [hasten] ;
11 Will hasten like a bird from Egypt,
And like a dove from Assyria :
Then will I make them dwell in their houses, saith Jehovah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 3. — הִרְבִּילָהֶם, from הִרְבִּיל = הִרְבִּיל, Hiphil from רָבַל : to make to walk, to lead, construed with ל, [Comp. Jer. xii. 5 ; xiii. 15, and see Hwald, § 123 a, Green, § 94 a. The corresponding Syriac (shargel) means : to mislead. — M.]

2 Ver. 3. — קָחָם instead of לָקָחָם.

3 Ver. 4. — נָחַט, usually regarded as first fut. Hiphil, from נָחַט, instead of נָחַט = and I inclined myself. Others take it to be an adverb : softly, gently. אֶלֶי would then be best connected with it : and gently towards them, I gave them food. וְאֶכְלֵם for אֶכְלֵם.

4 Ver. 5. — מִן־אֲשׁוּר is adverbative. מִן־אֲשׁוּר emphasizes Assyria in contrast to Egypt.

5 Ver. 7. — מִן־שׁוֹקְרֵי. The suffix is here used in a subjective sense = apostasy from me.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Jehovah calls to mind the love which He had displayed to Israel ages before. But it was rewarded with unfaithfulness, and they must be the more severely punished. See Ex. iv. 22 f. Israel was Jehovah's first-born son, because they were chosen as the people of his inheritance. Hence the love of God, which redeemed them from Egypt, in order to give to their fathers the Land of Promise. On the citation of this passage in Matt. ii. 15 f., see the Doctrinal Section.

Ver. 2. They called, namely, the prophets.

As the prophets called, so (וְהֵם) they refused to listen — turned away from their (the prophets') faces. וְהֵם, see ch. ii. 15. [Henderson : "The use of the verb : to call, in the preceding verse, suggested the idea of the subsequent messages which had been delivered to the Israelites by the prophets, to which Hosea now appeals, in order to contrast with the means which had been employed for their reformation, the obstinate character of their rebellion." — M.]

Ver. 3. A further description of the love of God displayed towards Israel, chiefly in the march through the wilderness. He took them upon his arms. The sudden transition to the third person is to be explained from the fact that it is the prophet that is speaking in the name of Jehovah, and that this can therefore easily pass over into a discourse by Jehovah. Comp. Deut. i. 31 ; Ex. xv. 26, for the same thoughts.

Ver. 4. With bands of a man = such as those with which men, especially children, would be led, opposed to ropes, with which beasts are tied, = cords of love in the next hemistich. "This image leads on to the similar one of the yoke laid upon cattle to yoke them in for work." In this image gentle treatment is implied ; for comparison is made with one who takes the yoke, or rather the strap with which it is secured, and which passes through the mouth, and draws it back over the jaws so that the animal may eat conveniently. Jehovah in his conduct towards Israel is like such a gentle master. Literally : I was to them as those who raise the yoke over their jaws. But the opinion of Keil is far-fetched, who thinks that there is a definite allusion to the commands laid upon the people, which God had made light for them, partly by many displays of his mercy, and partly by the means of grace in their religion. The tert. comp. is simply the gentleness, the kind consideration shown to them in his dealings towards them. [Though, of course, this general reference includes, with other manifestations of kindness, the special application made by Keil. For the construction and rendering of the last clause, see the Grammatical Note. — M.]

Ver. 5. They shall not return to the land of Egypt. An apparent contradiction of ch. viii. 13 ; ix. 3. But, as may be seen there, Egypt is in those passages only a type of the land of bondage. But here Egypt is employed in the literal sense, just as in ver. 1, to which our verse alludes. "The people of Jehovah shall not return to the land from which He called them, in order that it may not seem as though the design of the exodus and the march through the desert were frustrated through their impotence. But they shall enter into another bondage." To return, namely, to Jehovah.

Ver. 6. וְהִרְבִּילָהֶם, from הִרְבִּיל, to describe a circle, to move in a circle, as it were, to make the rounds ; spoken of a sword = to rage. Their bars, the bars of the strong cities = their gates. These will be destroyed, and the cities be captured, and laid waste. [Others, as Gesenius and Cowles, take the word in a metaphorical sense, which is frequent : rulers, defenders. But the former is preferable, as being more directly connected with the strong cities. E. V. adopts the first derived sense of the word : branches. Calvin, following the same view, interpreted branches as = villages, the branches of the cities. In this he is followed by Fausset. — M.]

Ver. 7 returns again to the sin of the people. וְהִרְבִּילָהֶם is here used intransitively : hang over, to incline. וְהִרְבִּילָהֶם : above (comp. vii. 16). They (the prophets) call them. וְהִרְבִּילָהֶם, here probably intransitive (the strengthened Kal) = raise themselves, strive to rise. [The passage may be thus idolatry before the very eyes of the God who had displayed such love to them; ver. 7: failure to recognize God's purposes of salvation; see also vers. 7, 9. A special proof of Jehovah's love was the sending of the prophets; they call the people upwards — that they should return to God, but they will not raise themselves; they remain below, averse from God.

3. No wonder, therefore, if a people, who reward so basely and mistake the love of God, are visited by Him with the severest judgments (comp. vers. 6, 8). But retributive and punitive justice finds in our Prophet, as we may satisfy ourselves in every chapter, where accusation and threatening are pealed forth incessantly, such appalling expression, that we can no longer decline the question: "Are not these things spoken revengefully? is it not a spirit of vindictiveness that has inspired such words?" It cannot be claimed that human revenge bears any part here, for it is not the offering of personal injuries of which the prophet announces the punishment, but he is indignant in God's behalf, over Israel's sins against God, and announces their punishment. In this, moreover, it is to be borne in mind that the prophet was never a mere passive organ (as the mechanical inspiration theory would have it) of the prophetic utterances, that his own faculties certainly were not at the time overborne, but were elevated, and that these announcements of judgment in the midst of a ruined generation are to be regarded as energetic expressions of the life of faith, faith in the Holy One of Israel. On the other hand, the subjectivity of the prophet is not to be unduly emphasized, as though his purely human feelings and emotions were really the source of these threatenings. We must hold to the truth that the prophets were heralds of that which was revealed to them by the Spirit of God (comp. ch. vi. 5), and that their separate efficiency was exerted only by completely entering by faith into this divine revelation, in their affirmation of it through faith. But the question then assumes this form: Though the Prophet himself does not merit the reproach of a selfish spirit, should not this reproach so much the rather fall upon God Himself, whose (conscious) organ the prophet was? But it is evident that the retribution announced is to be sent in a spirit of strict justice; it is to be a punishment of sin justly deserved. The punishment is closely related to the sins rebuked, and in close connection with them; it is punishment and not vengeance, which usually exceeds the measure of desert. But certainly we are not merely to trace back these threatenings to a dead law of just recompense; the punishment is not merely in accordance with the moral order of the world, according to which sin is followed by its own punishment. It is a personal action, as certainly as the infliction and the threatenings proceed from a personal God. And thus the course of action is not and cannot be unaccompanied by personal "ῥόδος" or feeling. But this feeling is the emotion of love, love grieved, vilely disowned and rejected. It is true that it must be angry, that it cannot be content without being reciprocated, but must be most intimately stirred up, and the greater, the more deeply seated it is, the more it seeks the good of its object, the more conscious it is that it has neglected nothing, and has been to blame in nothing. For this very reason the punishment assumes the appearance of revenge, and even wears its garments, while in truth it is only sin that is meeting with its deserved punishment according to an inner necessity, and not as the consequence of arbitrary passion. And as this love of God is unselfish and pure and seeks only the good of its object, so this "revenge" of God bears, so to speak, its corrective, that is, its aim in itself. The threatening has, then, a fearfully wide range, and is uttered with a violence which has something painful in it, since the Holy God, free, on his part, from all blame and neglect, appears against the sinner, upon whom alone the responsibility lies. But He does not simply display his anger; He does not cease to love. His wrath does not find its satisfaction in itself by the punishment or destruction of the unfaithful loved one. Actual destruction, which vengeance would demand, is never undertaken. In the background of the threatenings stands the full and flowing stream of love in assurances of mercy and compassion, which, though made in expectation that the people will return, are yet made before such return takes place, and for the purpose of promoting that end. How little the Law, though proceeding from God's well-intentioned love towards Israel, realized its aim, is manifest; Israel had completely broken the covenant founded upon it, and instead of showing themselves to be worthy of the promises attached to it, only rendered themselves amenable to the curse, which they must bear unto the uttermost. Thus love appears in the form of free grace, compassionating the unworthy and coming forth to meet them, so leading to the stand-point of the New Covenant. Hence all these promises, rising up behind the severe threatenings of judgment, are rightly to be regarded as Messianic, even though they are not outwardly marked as such. That an actual annihilation of Israel is not intended, but that the prediction of punishment — thus revealing its origin in pure love which thinks of its object alone, and thus being distinguished from all self-avenging — halts before the last step is reached, has notably been clearly expressed already by the Prophet in his reference to the "remnant" that is still left. It finds in our chapter also its clear expression in ver. 8. Jehovah could and should give up Israel like Admah and Zeboim (not merely destroy the kingdom, deliver it over to Assyria), but He will not do so; and just when the threatening reaches its height, the assurance of fullest mercy breaks forth, and is expressed beautifully in vers. 8-11. If God's love in the beginning of his interest in Israel was something great and exalted (vers. 1-4), it is something greater now, as being in the form of compassion (vers. 9, 10), in which He refuses to give up his people, all unworthy as they had become of the love He had shown them (comp. ver. 11). A return to Jehovah is then announced as the fruit of this compassion, and the removal of the state of subjection to punishment by a restoration to the inheritance they had trifled away is promised as its manifestation. No further description of the future deliverance is as yet given.

4. As to the fulfillment of this promise, see the remarks on chs. i. and ii. It may suffice to repeat here that we are not to hold to any fulfillment which would contradict the actual course of God's revelation. Hence we must not think of a future return of the external Israel into their own land from Assyria, if it were only from the consideration that Assyria exists no longer, and Israel is no longer in bondage to such a nation, and we cannot take the one (Israel, the Holy Land, the return) as literal, and the other (Assyria, captivity) as figurative. We must rather say, from the stand-point of the fulfillment of the Old Testament, i. e., from the stand-point of the New Testament, and in accordance with the actual course of events: the compassionate mercy of God towards his faithless people, which the Prophet sees win the victory over wrath, has been revealed in Christ — but still as being far greater than he sees it; what is clear to him is only the σκη of that which in Christ has actually occurred, and what is still going on, in the forgiveness of sin and deliverance from its curse through free grace. The Prophet hopes for this in behalf of his people Israel, but only because they are God's people. But it will be true of all who shall become God's people too, even though they be not of Israel; they will experience this compassionate favor of God, which is essentially identical with the love, in which God has chosen to Himself a people (from the nations), and completes it so that it realizes its purpose in spite of the breach of the covenant on the part of men, manifested in opposition to the Law and apostasy from God. The voice of mercy, which shall resound so powerfully, and towards which those hasten who stand under God's judgment, has reached far and wide through the Gospel, and will again be sounded forth, when Christ shall gather his own from all ends of the earth, and portion out to them the everlasting inheritance which they had forfeited by sin.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. Thou also hast experienced such love of God from thy childhood's years, in temporal and yet more in spiritual things. This love of God is an incontestable truth. It is as important as it is necessary to be reminded of it continually.

RIEGER: God delights to trace back in his Word and in man's conscience everything to its first beginning.

[FAUSSET: God, by sending the Spirit of his Son into the hearts of his people (Gal. iv. 6) as the spirit of adoption, calls them his, while they are still in the Egypt of this world. Indeed He separates them to Himself from the womb, and calls them by his grace, as He did Paul (Gal. i. 15. — M.)]

Ver. 2. RIEGER: God is ever calling men back to their first love: but one goes to his farm, another to his merchandise, and most to their worldly idols.

Ver. 3. God's condescension to all our needs. He knows our weakness and treats us accordingly. We must be led along and taken by the arm; else we do not advance, but stumble and fall every moment.

Ver. 4. STARKE: God throws over us the cords of love even to-day, when He calls us through the preaching of his Word, gives us his sacraments, promises and supplies us with every good thing, and visits us with precious afflictions: so we would pray that God would draw us further still after Himself.

RIEGER: God directs us according to our weakness and the riches of his love. And when He must press us with a yoke, He gives us something with it that helps us to bear it, and leaves us at least food and clothing. And He would warn us against falling back in our pride upon our own help, and neglecting to wait for his counsel. But as Israel was always inclined to turn again to Egypt, and would seek help there against God's judgments, so does self-sufficient man always act, resorting to everything rather than submit to the counsel of God.

[FAUSSET: The Son of God becomes man, in order to draw men as such by the cords of sympathy, as partaking of a common nature with us. His bands of love sit so lightly on those who wear them that they are no hindrance to us in enjoying all that is really good for us, and which God has so richly laid before us. — M.]

Ver. 7. We are called upwards continually: and yet we will not go! All calling upward is then in vain! Our flesh draws us downwards like a weight of lead, and neutralizes the drawings of the Spirit upwards.

Ver. 8, 9. STARKE: God is disposed, when angry, quite differently from men. Men are intent upon vengeance, but God upon reconciliation.

RIEGER: The thought that we have to do with God and not with man, makes it often difficult to our terrified conscience, to seek and believe in the forgiveness of sins. But this is merely a motive to the divine magnanimity to bestow richer favors upon us.

[MATTHEW HENRY: Those who submit to the influence may take the comfort of God's holiness.]

CHAPTER XII.

- 1 Ephraim has surrounded me with lies,
And the house of Israel with deceit:
And Judah still vacillates with God,
With the faithful holy One.¹
- 2 Ephraim feeds upon the wind and pursues the east wind;
Every day it increases violence and lying,
And they make a covenant with Assyria,
And oil [as a gift] is carried to Egypt.

- 3 Jehovah has a contest with Judah
And (He has) to punish Jacob according to his ways,
According to his works he will reward him.
- 4 In the womb he seized his brother by the heel,
And in his (manly) vigor he strove with God.
- 5 He wrestled against the angel and prevailed,
He wept and made supplication unto Him:
He found him in Bethel and then He spoke with us.¹
- 6 And Jehovah, God of Hosts,
Jehovah is his memorial (name).
- 7 And thou, turn thou unto thy God,
Observe mercy and justice,
And wait upon thy God continually!
- 8 Canaan — in his hand (are) the balances of deceit:
He loveth to oppress.
- 9 And Ephraim says: surely I have become rich,
I have found wealth for myself,
All my gains shall not discover transgression² in me,
Which (would be) sin.
- 10 Yet I, Jehovah, am thy God,
From the land of Egypt,
Still I make thee dwell in tents,
As in the day of the Feast (of Tabernacles).
- 11 And I spoke to the prophets,
And multiplied visions,
And through the prophets gave similitudes.
- 12 Is not Gilead iniquity?
Surely they have become wickedness.
In Gilgal they sacrifice bulls,
Their sacrifices also are like heaps³
On the furrows of the field.
- 13 And Jacob fled to the fields of Aram,
And Israel served for a wife, and for a wife kept (sheep).
- 14 And Jehovah led Israel from Egypt by a prophet,
And by a prophet was it guarded.
- 15 Ephraim has provoked bitter anger;⁴
He [God] will⁵ leave his blood upon him,
And will return to him his disgrace.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 1. — יְהוָה יִקְרָא: is an intensive plural [plural of majesty], like יְהוָה יִקְרָא, and therefore coupled with a sing. adjective [comp. Ps. vii. 10].

² Ver. 5. — עָמַרְתִּי. Aquila, Theodotion, Symmachus, Syr. et al. render: with him, as if they had read עָמַרְתִּי. But there is no variety of reading in the MSS. For the propriety of the reading in the Text., comp. the Exegetical Remarks. — M.]

³ Ver. 9. — עֵינִי is perhaps employed as a word-play upon the preceding עֵינִי.

⁴ Ver. 12. — בָּלִים, a word-play with בָּלִים.

⁵ Ver. 15. — מִתְקַדֵּשׁ is here used as an adverb. [Comp. Green, § 274, 2 c.

⁶ Ver. 15. — יִשְׁכַּח is the subject of יִשְׁכַּח as well as of יִשְׁכַּח. — M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Ephraim has surrounded me with lying. Israel's conduct towards Jehovah was lying and deceit. He reckoned upon attachment and fidelity, and might well do so, as being their rightful Lord. But instead of this they turn away from Him and to idols, and seek help in the heathen, and not in God. They surrounded Him: it was no isolated act; it was the general practice; He was treated so by all Israel. יָד. The meaning is uncertain. The word occurs only besides in Gen. xxvii. 40; Ps. lv. 3; Jer. ii. 31. Probably = rove about, vacillate, therefore: and Judah vacillates still with God = does not remain faithful to Him. Others see here rather a commendation of Judah, and take $\text{רָדָה} = \text{רָדָה}$, to tread down, subdue: prevails still with God. Löwe accordingly explains the last hemistich differently from the usual method. He joins אֱלֹהֵינוּ also to אֱלֹהֵינוּ , and translates: faithful towards the Holy One. The connection of the clauses might justify such a view. But such a contrast between Judah and Ephraim, in which Judah is as strongly commended as Ephraim is accused of unfaithfulness, is hardly suitable here. Jehovah has a controversy with Judah (ver. 3), comp. iv. 1; not to speak of the character and course of conduct ascribed to Judah in x. 11; v. 5, 10, 12, 13, 14. Judah is indeed differently characterized from Israel, but the difference lies in the term: vacillate. It could not be said that the former was firm and faithful. The two words are therefore to be taken together = the faithful holy One. God is called holy in strong contrast to the conduct of Judah.

Ver. 2. אֵלֶּיךָ an image of nothingness, vanity, מִצָּפוֹן : east wind, a hot wind coming from the Arabian desert, which dries up everything in its course. [Comp. Job xxvii. 21. See the appendix to Delitzsch on Job.—M.] As in the case of אֵלֶּיךָ , the destructive, and not merely the unprofitable, is here the tert. comp. The second member thus probably contains an inference from the first = because Ephraim loves what is vain, it pursues — certainly without meaning it — that which entails destruction. Lying and violence, probably towards their neighbors, especially if we compare ver. 7, where they are admonished to preserve mercy and justice. Bear oil to Egypt, namely, as a gift, in order to win the alliance of Egypt; comp. 2 Kings xvii. 4. At one time help is sought in Egypt against Assyria, and at another in Assyria against Egypt.

Ver. 3. Jehovah has a contest = has sins to reprove; comp. iv. 1. This time the controversy is with Judah. In distinction from Judah, Jacob denotes, as in x. 11, the kingdom of the Ten Tribes, Israel. The name Jacob forms a transition to the allusion to the patriarch Jacob (vers. 4, 5).

Vers. 4, 5. In the womb, etc. Jacob was to be a type of his descendants by his struggling for the birth-right, and his wrestling with God in which he prevailed through prayer and supplication. That Jacob's conduct is not held up here to the people as a warning example of cunning and deceit, but as one of earnest striving after the birth-right and its blessings, is apparent from the wrestling with God mentioned in the second member of the verse (comp. Gen. xxxii. 23–29). The two members of the verse form a close parallel and at the same time a climax — 4 a: in the womb; 4 b: in manhood; 4 a: but seizes the heel, a secret, indeed, not an open struggle as was only possible in the womb, but 4 b: he wrestled, in the full sense; 4 a: with his brother; 4 b: with God. There is something also in the two names chosen, which also indicate a climax: Jacob from seizing the heel, and the more honored name Israel from wrestling with God. The struggle with God is more particularly described in ver. 5. God appeared to him in the form of an angel. אֱלֹהֵינוּ is taken from Gen. xxxii. 39. He wept and prayed to him. These words indicate the nature of the conflict, the weapons with which he conquered. At Bethel he found him. At the very place where idolatry and moral corruption prevail, Jacob found God. This shows the issue of the conflict, and alludes to Gen. xxxv. 9 ff., where God bestowed upon Jacob his name Israel and renewed the promise of blessing. And then He spoke with us, namely, with Jacob; what God then promised to Jacob applies to us, his children. The mention of the conflict with God and especially its issue, in ver. 5, show clearly that Jacob is not here referred to as a warning example of deceit, but that something typical is discovered in his action. See the Doctrinal remarks.

Ver. 6 then more specially marks the God who spoke, as Jehovah, God of Hosts, — scarcely without the design of placing Him, the only true God, in contrast to the gods now worshipped in Bethel. While God is specially designated Jehovah, in view of his revelation of Himself to Israel, He is called "God of Hosts" to show his supreme exaltation. And Israel could prefer idols to such a God as this! [The second member of the verse: Jehovah (is) his memorial, means that Jehovah is the name by which Israel was to remember Him. Comp. Ex. iii. 15; Ps. cxxxv. 13. — M.]

Ver. 7. For this reason Ephraim is exhorted to return to this God, an admonition further explained in the words which follow: observe mercy and justice, and wait upon God continually. Israel is now far from doing this.

Vers. 8, 9. This passage again begins with a description of the sinful conduct of Israel, which is made incisively by calling Israel Canaan, with an allusion also to the appellative signification of the word: merchant. They are like a dishonest merchant, who aims to become rich by deceit, from which results the oppression of the poor. This deceit is not to be taken out of its literal sense, as in ver. 1 (of idolatry as deceit practiced towards God), but is according to the context to be understood literally. The very opposite is practiced of that which is required in ver. 7, mercy and justice.

אֵין here = means. אֲשֶׁר = the results of labor. No injustice which would be sin = would entail punishment. In all his labor they would not be able to discover anything worthy of punishment.

Ver. 10. God reminds the deluded and presumptuous Ephraim (in order to bring home to it the folly and injustice of its insolent speeches), how He had been its benefactor since leaving Egypt, and had led it hitherto as a Father, as once He had done in the wilderness. "Not merely during the forty years wandering through the desert had the people enjoyed the wondrous protection of their God; even now — עַד הַיּוֹם — they still experienced his mercy. The expression 'dwelling in tents' accordingly alludes not merely to the privations and toils of the temporary wanderings in the wilderness, but also specially to the abundant blessings of God in the present (comp. 2 Kings xiii. 5)." מִסֻּכֹּת = the Feast of Tabernacles.

As in the days of the feast = as the yearly dwelling in tents in a literal sense at the Feast calls to mind that protection afforded them in the desert. Others take the dwelling in tents to be a threat. But this does not suit the beginning of the verse, which is an allusion to a deed of divine mercy (comp. xiii. 4).

Ver. 11 continues to call to mind what God had done to Israel. וְלֵאמֹר: "because the divine revelation, descending from heaven, reached to the prophets" (Keil). I spoke: probably a general reference, specified in the following clauses. —

וְלֵאמֹר: to compare, to use figurative language. [Henderson: "In such language, including metaphor, allegory, comparison, prosopopoeia, apostrophe, hyperbole, etc., the prophets abound. They accommodated themselves to the capacity and understanding of their hearers by couching the high and important subjects of which they treated under the imagery of sensible objects, and invested them with a degree of life and energy which could only be resisted by an obstinate determination not to listen to religious instruction. — M.]

Ver. 12. The intermediate thought is probably: all was vain; Israel apostatized from his God. Therefore the punishment must come. "Gilead and Gilgal represented the two parts of the northern kingdom. Gilead the eastern, Gilgal the western." וְכֵן is difficult here. "When" is unsuitable. Hence it is probably to be taken as an interrogative particle: Is not Gilead, etc. Gilead is here called וְכֵן directly (vi. 8, a city of those who work iniquity); worthlessness, iniquity. וְכֵן

וְכֵן, surely = altogether. וְכֵן parallel with וְכֵן. The moral ruin has its counterpart in the physical = become a nothing, be annihilated. [It is better to take both words as relating to moral corruption: iniquity, evil. The expressions are virtually synonymous, and the combination is intensive. — M.] וְכֵן, accusative, not: to the bulls. This sacrifice was no sin in itself, but it was so as being done in Gilgal in honor of the idols. See iv. 15; ix. 15.

Vers. 13, 14. The great deeds of God for Israel are once more referred to, the ancient times being again recalled. There is again an allusion to Jacob, and as vers. 4, 5 referred to his actions, so here we have his misfortunes, his humiliation; how he had to take to flight, serve for a wife, and that by keeping sheep. We are then to supply: And yet I have guarded and blessed him. To this then would follow in ver. 14, a further example of God's care. But more probably ver. 14 is to be taken together with ver. 13, and then is seen in that servitude of the progenitor the beginning of the bondage of his immediate descendants in Egypt. The sense would then be: and how has God concerned Himself for Israel (in the name Israel the person of Jacob and the nation would be united), and defended them! Comp. Deut. xxvi. 5 ff., where the bondage in Egypt is connected immediately with Jacob and even with his flight to Mesopotamia. By a prophet: The greatness of God's deeds is still more clearly shown: God raised up and employed a prophet specially for this object. If vers. 13 and 14 are taken together, וְכֵן perhaps alludes to וְכֵן, ver. 14; from protecting he came to be protected. It is also possible that the second וְכֵן forms a contrast to the second וְכֵן, one being a mark of humiliation, the other of exaltation.

Ver. 15. Instead of acknowledging what God had done to the nation, and thanking Him therefor humbly (which according to Deut. xxvi. 5 ff., was to be done by the yearly offering of the first-fruits), Ephraim bitterly excited God's anger.

Therefore the Lord would punish them. וְכֵן = his blood-guiltiness. וְכֵן, to leave alone, opposite to taking away or forgiving. His disgrace, probably that which Israel casts upon God.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

The way in which Jacob is mentioned in this chapter is peculiar. In vers. 4, 5 mention is made of two events recorded in Genesis: that which, according to Gen. xxv. 26, he did in seizing his brother's heel in the womb, and that which, according to Gen. xxxii. 24, he did as a man. These two are placed in mutual relation: and the expressions which describe them are clearly parallel. Moreover they form a climax. They were analogous; but the second was an essential advance upon the first (as really as manhood is an advance upon pre-natal existence). Hence the first is only briefly indicated; forms only the starting-point. The stress is laid upon the second, upon which the discourse dwells longer (ver. 5). If it should excite surprise that just these two events should be made prominent and compared as they are here, it must be remembered that in Genesis the two names of the patriarch are said to have been connected with them, and in such a way as that the second is an advance upon the first. Accordingly we can briefly indicate the meaning of this reference to Jacob thus: He who was a Jacob (holder of the heel) even in his mother's womb, became afterwards in his manhood an Israel, a wrestler with God. The former was, so to speak, the beginning of the latter; the latter the completion of the former. The Prophet sees in the record of that seizing of the heel, something significant, namely, an allusion to the precedence which Jacob, although the second-born κατὰ φύσιν, should have, by the free elective favor of God, over the first-born who by nature had the preëminence; that he received the divine promises, and even that the action was regarded as an (unconscious) striving of the embryo itself after the possession of that which the divine favor had in store for it. Then what the embryo did unconsciously by struggling, as it were, for the possession of the divine promise, the man did consciously with higher powers by wrestling with God Himself. The Prophet evidently regards the possession of the divine promises as the end and object of the conflicts. Having striven after it in his mother's womb, he gained it from God as a man. Ver. 5 shows how the Prophet understood this struggle with God, or what he regarded as its essence: it was humble but persistent supplication, showing how nearly the matter lay to his heart. This wrestling in prayer had the desired result: he prevailed. The Prophet finds the proof of this in Gen. xxxv. 9 ff. For there in Bethel, Jacob not only had his name Israel confirmed, but the promise was given, which declared him to be the chosen of God: "He spoke with Him." But the Prophet says: "with us." This shows that Jacob, in vers. 4, 5, does not mean the individual, but that the Jacob who afterwards proved himself an Israel, becomes an ideal personality, i. e., a type of the true Israel, the true people of God. This picture of the true Jacob-Israel, struggling for the possession of God's gracious promises, and therefore of the divine blessing, is held up to the shame of the present degenerate Israel, who tread under foot God's election of grace, and defy his judgments. What a contrast does the victorious conflict with God present to the course of Israel seeking to Assyria and Egypt for help! Hence the warning of ver. 7: to return to God and to confide steadfastly in Him. Jacob is mentioned in ver. 13 in another way. It is not his conduct towards God that is there alluded to, but God's dealings with Him—in raising him from his humiliation. And yet not him really; for more clearly still than in vers. 4, 5, the person of Jacob and the people of Israel flow into one another, or rather the former is a type of the latter. What is said in ver. 13 of humiliation by flight and servitude, refers primarily to the person of Jacob, but it is to be understood as that by the person the people proceeding from him are thought of. So in ver. 14, the deliverance of Israel from Egypt, and their preservation in the desert, are marked as the exaltation following, by divine grace, that humiliation. Thus what is here said falls under the point of view elsewhere held by our Prophet of the love which God had shown to Israel in ancient times (comp. also ver. 10), with which Israel's present conduct is then sharply contrasted (comp. ver. 15). But it is mentioned, as something special, that this gracious deed of God was brought about by a prophet. This manifestly serves to make it appear greater. God ordained a prophet for the special task of helping Israel. In ver. 11, also, Prophecy appears as an element of God's gracious dealings with Israel. In vi. 5 prophets were distinguished as the preachers of repentance and judgment sent by God. In our chapter they appear more generally, as the organs of God's revelation to Israel, as the tokens that God stood constantly towards his people in a living relation (as already in Amos ii. 11). The sending of Moses falls under this point of view: in him as a Prophet God entered into a living and gracious relation with Israel and showed Himself to be their God.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. How sad it is that God must so complain of his people! and yet how often is it necessary! He is faithful and true, so well disposed, and we are so insincere towards Him! pretending to serve Him, and yet only serving Him with the lips while the heart is far from Him!

Vers. 4, 5. STARKE: God's blessing is to be obtained not by desert, but by weeping and entreaty. Tears and prayers are the true method of struggling with God.

PFAFF. Bibelwerk: Great victory and blessing are to be found in prayer; for prayer can ever overcome God. Only struggle on, my soul, and persist until thou dost reach to the very heart of God, and thou wilt certainly receive an answer from Him, if not always outwardly, yet always in the Spirit.

[FAUSSET: Tears were the indication of one whose words of prayer were no feigned words, but whose heart was deeply moved by the sense of his great needs, and whose feelings were excited by vehement and longing desires. Therefore at Bethel "he found God," because God first "found him," and moved him so to weep and supplicate. And there God spake not only with him but "with us," whosoever of us follow the unconquerable faith of his tearful prayers.

PUSEY: There He spake with us, how, in our needs, we should seek and find Him. In loneliness, apart from distractions, in faith rising in proportion to our fears, in persevering prayer, in earnestness, God is sought and found. — M.]

Ver. 6. In the name Jehovah, Israel had the security that God was their God, and they his people. "Our Father" is the same for us; for God is our Father as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that Name is the security of our blessedness.

Ver. 7. How easy is conversion, when we are not converted to a strange God, but to our own God, who helps us towards Him! But it is just as certain that all who have departed from God need to return. Turn unto God! is the most natural, but also the most pressing cry. True conversion must be attested by its fruits. Men are converted truly to God, when they trust in Him constantly.

LANGE: Faith, love, and hope must abide together.

[MATT. HENRY: Let our eyes be ever towards the Lord, and let us preserve a holy security and serenity of mind under the protection of the divine favor, looking without anxiety for a dubious event, and by faith keeping our spirits sedate and even; and that is waiting on God as our God, in covenant, and this we must do continually. — M.]

Ver. 8. The chief distinction of the Canaanitish character is the earthly mind, which leads of necessity to unrighteous deeds. Avarice is a root of all evil, and a mother of unrighteousness.

[FAUSSET: How much deceit is practiced by so-called Christians of the trading world, who are "Christians" only in name! — M.]

Ver. 9. STARKE: Those who infer the possession of divine favor from outward prosperity make a great mistake. Much deceit and injustice is done in trade and intercourse with men, and when God does not punish at once, every one supposes that he who practices them is not guilty.

[FAUSSET: None are more blind to their spiritual danger than those eager in pursuing gain. The conventional tricks of trade and the alleged difficulty of competing with others save by practicing the usual frauds, are made the excuses for usages, which, whatever else they gain, end in the eternal loss of the soul! In regard to spiritual riches the soul is never so poor as when satisfied with its own imaginary riches. — M.]

Ver. 10. STARKE: We should diligently call to mind and never forget the benefits which God bestowed upon our forefathers.

[PUSEY: The penitent sees in one glance how God has been his God from his birth until that hour, and how he had all along offended God. The Feast of Tabernacles typifies this our pilgrim state, the life of simple faith in God, for which God provides; poor in this world's goods, but rich in God. The Church militant dwells, as it were, in tabernacles; hereafter we hope to be received into everlasting habitations in the Church triumphant. — M.]

Ver. 13. A man may be chosen by God's grace, and an heir of God's promises, and yet may suffer distress and humiliation. In the fullest measure was this realized in the Son of God Himself. What else then can we expect?

II. The Judgment of God's Anger.

CHAPTER XIII.

- 1 When Ephraim spoke, there was trembling ;¹
 He exalted himself in Israel,
 Then he transgressed through Baal and died.
- 2 And now they continue to sin,
 They made for themselves idols of their silver,
 Images according to their understanding [as they pleased],
 All of them the work of artificers ;
 To them men who sacrifice² are speaking (in prayer),
 They kiss the calves.
- 3 Therefore will they be like the morning cloud,
 And like the dew, which soon passes away,
 Like chaff which is whirled³ out of the threshing-floor,
 And like smoke from a window.
- 4 And (yet) I am Jehovah, thy God,
 From the land of Egypt,
 And thou dost not know a God besides me,
 And there is no Saviour except me.
- 5 I knew thee in the desert,
 In the land of droughts.
- 6 According to their pasture [as they fed] they were satisfied,
 They were satisfied, and their heart was uplifted,
 Therefore they forgot me.
- 7 And (so) I became⁴ as a lion to them,
 And as a leopard I lurked in the path.
- 8 I will attack them like a bear⁵ robbed of her whelps,
 And rend the inclosure of their heart,
 I will devour them then like a lioness ;
 The wild beast of the field shall rend them.
- 9 It has destroyed thee,⁶ Israel,
 That thou (hast been) against me, against thy Help.
- 10 Where⁷ then is thy king,
 And he (who) will help thee in all thy cities ?
 And thy judges⁸ of whom thou saidst :
 " Give me a king and princes ? "
- 11 I give thee a king in my anger,
 And will take him away in my wrath.
- 12 Ephraim's guilt is bound up,
 His sin is treasured away.
- 13 The pains of a travailing woman shall come upon him :
 (But) he is an unwise son ;
 Because at the (right) time⁹ he would not enter the opening of the womb.
- 14 Should I redeem them from the hand of hell ?
 Should I free them from death ?
 Where are thy plagues, O death ?
 Where is thy destruction, O hell ?
 Repentance shall be hidden from my eyes.
- 15 For (though) among (his) brethren he may be fruitful,¹⁰
 An east wind will come,
 A breath of Jehovah rising from the desert,
 And his spring shall dry up and his fountain be parched ;
 He [Assyria] shall plunder the treasure of all the costly vessels.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- 1 Ver. 1. — וְהָיָה, ḥ. ḥ. ḥ. = וְהָיָה [Jer. xlix. 24. Targ. וְהָיָה. — M.]
- [3 Ver. 2. — וְהָיָה. This construction is to be explained on the principle laid down by Ewald, § 287 g, that the subordinate word in the construct may sometimes denote the individual or individuals of the class denoted by the principal word. For an example of the same construction in addition to the one given in the exposition, see Micah v. 4. וְהָיָה, those of men that are anointed. — M.]
- [3 Ver. 8. — וְהָיָה. See Green, § 92 b. — M.]
- [4 Ver. 7. — וְהָיָה. וְ is inferential, Green, § 287, 1. — M.]
- [5 Ver. 8. — וְהָיָה here means the female bear, and yet, being of the common gender, it may be joined with a part masculine. Comp. cxliv. 14 for a parallel case. — M.]
- [6 Ver. 9. — וְהָיָה. We have here the third sing. Piel. There is no ground for assuming a substantive: destruction, as Henderson does. — M.]
- 7 Ver. 10. — וְהָיָה. A particle of interrogation. It is dialectical, and occurs only here and in ver. 14. It is = וְהָיָה: where, and is strengthened by וְהָיָה = tandem, word: when then?
- [8 Ver. 10. — Supply וְהָיָה before וְהָיָה.
- [9 Ver. 13. — וְהָיָה must be taken here adverbially: at the (right) time. — M.]
- [10 Ver. 15. — וְהָיָה. A ḥ. ḥ. ḥ. The form וְהָיָה is supposed, with probable correctness, to have been chosen instead of the usual וְהָיָה, in order to conform to וְהָיָה, of which it is the root. — M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. When Ephraim spoke, etc. An allusion to the high respect paid to Israel. וְהָיָה is here intransitive [comp. Ps. lxxxix. 10; Nah. i. 5]. The reference is to the unrighteous desire for predominance cherished by Ephraim, which led at last to the schism from the House of David. But internal declension was immediately connected with this. The worship of Baal evidently began really with the calf-worship according to the view of the Prophet. He cannot allow it to be maintained that the latter was the worship of Jehovah. And died: They died spiritually, and then outward ruin comes also. [This view of the whole verse is approved by Henderson, Pusey, and most recent Expositors. — M.]

Ver. 2. All their former transgressions were continued. וְהָיָה וְהָיָה. This is difficult. וְהָיָה is not = who sacrifice men, for human sacrifices were not offered in the calf-worship, but = those among men who sacrifice, according to the analogy of וְהָיָה (Is. xxix. 19). Keil renders: of them they say (those of the men that sacrifice); they kiss the calves. But this is linguistically harsh, for "they kiss calves" would be oratio obliqua, and וְהָיָה would mean: of them, namely, of the images. It is besides unnatural. To whom should the offerers "say" that they kiss the calves? They certainly perform such actions, and it is that is the conduct here rebuked, but their saying that they do so is a very remote idea. We are therefore obliged to take וְהָיָה here absolutely as it is nowhere else employed = speak in prayer. This is just the thought that is suitable here. It had been previously said that these images are purely the work of men themselves, and yet — how cutting is the reproof! — they speak with these very words of their hands, they kiss them, as though they were flesh and blood.

Ver. 3. The punishment of this is swift destruction. As to the figures of the morning cloud and the early dew, see on ch. vi. 4. Here there are added other comparisons; the usual one of chaff, and, besides, that of smoke, which escaped by the windows since there were no chimneys.

Vers. 4, 5. As contrasted with Israel's idolatry Jehovah points again to what he had done for Israel long ago, at first with the same words as those employed in xii. 10, but afterwards more fully. I knew thee, with the accessory notions of love and compassion.

Ver. 6. The goodness of God is abused. According to their pasture, i. e., in the land given them by God. The complaint rests upon Deut. viii. 11 ff. (comp. also xxxi. 20; xxxii. 15 ff.). That against which they were there warned, has been done.

Vers. 7, 8 therefore describe the punishment, in accordance with the figure of the pasture, in which Israel is the flock. The flock will be rent as by wild beasts (comp. also, v. 14). וְהָיָה, and I became to them: the punishment had already begun and would be continued. The inclosure of their heart = their breast.

Ver. 9. It has destroyed thee, O Israel, that thou wert against me, thy Help. The second clause gives the cause of the first. וְהָיָה is then to be taken in the sense of "against;" that thou against me, against thy help. According to the sequel the special reference is to the falling away from the House of David. [So Ewald, Keil, and most of the recent Continental Expositors agree in adopting the above explanation. Pusey and Noyes among the Anglo-Americans also prefer it. The others generally hold to the rendering of the E. V. The two chief objections against the latter view are that it demands a very roundabout rendering of וְהָיָה, and that the second וְהָיָה is most naturally to be taken in the same sense as the first, and therefore cannot be a Beth essentialis. — M.]

Ver. 10. Israel had indeed a king, but not one who could help them, or defend their cities (against Assyria). And thy judges, probably = the princes who surround the king, "the ministers and counsellors appointed by the king, who along with him exercise the highest judicial and executive authority." Give me a king and princes; not without allusion to the request of the people in the time of Samuel. On the case of Jeroboam, they repeated this ancient demand, at that time reproved by the Lord, in a still more sinful way.

Ver. 11. I give thee a king in my anger, not: I gave thee, because the expression is not to be limited to the elevation of Jeroboam, but refers generally to the kings of Israel. When they separated from the House of David and set up their own kings, God punished them, because in doing so "they forsook his worship, and gave themselves over to the power of their ungodly kings." And will take him away. This refers not merely to the dethronement of one king by another, but to the kingdom generally, which God would overthrow in his anger. The anger of God stands therefore at the beginning and at the end; giving kings and taking them away, are both an evidence of his displeasure.

Ver. 12 shows that the taking away of the king is inevitable: "servata sunt ad vindictam omnia peccata eorum" [Henderson: "The metaphors are here borrowed from the custom of tying up money in bags and depositing it in some secret place in order that it might be preserved. The certainty of punishment is the idea conveyed by them. Comp., for the former, Job xiv. 17; for the latter, Deut. xxxii. 34; Job xxi. 19."—M.]

Ver. 13 describes the punishment under the image of birth-pangs, in which, however, the pains of the mother are not so much thought of as the pressure which the child must suffer. And yet, though there is distress in child-birth, it does not tend to destruction, but to birth, to a new life. So also here. But death does follow if the child is not pressed out into the vagina in consequence of the labor, so as to come into the world alive: So is it with Israel. Under God's judgment they put off a return to Him, and will not be born again; that judgment must therefore be their destruction.

Ver. 14, according to the common view, introduces a promise without any preparation. Yet, though we cannot be surprised at the occurrence of sudden transition in our Prophet, a promise is evidently quite unsuitable. We would from the foregoing words rather expect a mention of the punishment reserved for their guilt, or a description of their pains. It would then be surprising if a promise were introduced; and the fact is that threatening is here unmistakably becoming stronger, until ch. xiv. 1. To be sure, if ver. 14 be regarded as a promise, ver. 15 must bear the same character, as they are connected by "for." But the change would be only the more violent, taking place in one and the same verse, and Keil only imports his notion into the passage, when he, for this reason, makes a distinction, and refers the beginning of the verse to those who walk in the footsteps of the faith, etc., of their progenitor, and the rest to Ephraim who had become changed into Canaan [a merchant]. But, besides, the second part of ver. 15 manifestly presupposes the beginning of the same verse, the image of the blasting wind presupposing that of the fruit-bearing, or the former is chosen with direct reference to the latter; the judgment is regarded as a devastation by scorching wind, because Israel is conceived of as a fruitful field. Under any other view members of a verse, which are connected in meaning, would be sundered. If therefore ver. 15 throughout is nothing but threatening, its beginning with "for" argues the same character for ver. 14. The beginning of ver. 14 is then to be explained as a question, though without the particle of interrogation: From the hand of hell should I deliver them? The second member contains an energetic negative response. Nay, even death and hell are summoned and charged to inflict and execute the judgment upon them. וְהָיָה as in ver. 10 = where (see farther in the Doctrinal Section, No. 4).

וְהָיָה : either repentance or compassion. The former is most suitable: it is not to be supposed that I repent of this threatening, that I recall it.

Ver. 15. וְהָיָה עִירָא alludes, with a play upon the name Ephraim (עִירָא and עִירָא), to their fruitfulness, in order to represent the judgment as a scorching wind destroying that fertility. He will spoil. "He," i. e., the enemy presented under the image of the parching wind, Assyria. The treasure of all precious vessels, is to be sought especially in the chief city, Samaria, which is named immediately hereafter.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Apostasy from Jehovah, which appears here also as Israel's chief sin, brought death upon them: they died (ver. 1). This conception sounds the depths of the subject. Outwardly regarded, they lived long, even after they gave themselves up to the worship of Baal (just like a fruitful tree, ver. 15), but in truth inwardly they were dead. For true life consists in union with Jehovah: idols can give no life. Israel owed its life to Jehovah alone (ver. 4). Therefore, ver. 9: "It has destroyed thee that thou hast been against me, thy help." What God had done for Israel from the beginning is here again (vers. 4, 5) made prominent, and the deliverance from Egypt with the leading through the Desert appear again as the fundamental act of mercy, for through them Israel became "living." Their present conduct towards God was a base and ungrateful ignoring of those deeds in the presumption of a prosperity which they owed to their God (ver. 6). A people who are inwardly dead cannot long outwardly survive. That God whom they had forgotten and from whom they had turned away, would and must at last show them that He had not forgotten them (ver. 12) by destroying them without sparing. This is indeed the only means of bringing them to life. For that and that alone is designed by God in their case; see ch. xiv. This must ever be kept in view if we are to understand the threatenings aright, which are reproduced here in a peculiarly intensified form: vers. 7, 8, vers. 12 to ch. xiv. 1. But how true and striking is such a description seen to be, when we remember that this divine judgment is executed by the invasion of a foreign conqueror! With what can his attack be better compared than with the attack of devouring beasts, or, after another image, with a scorching wind that destroys everything in its course? How often has that been repeated in the history of the nations!

2. The whole (temporal) kingdom was a divine system of punishment and chastening. At the request of the people, He granted them a king, but with the expression of his displeasure at their desire because it proceeded from unbelief and vanity, and with the declaration that they would lose their freedom by its realization. But, at the same time, this kingdom of Israel might become a blessing if it with its king would obey God. Nay, God, by establishing the throne of David in Zion, even connected the most precious promises with this kingdom, if the king were entirely one with God and should gather about him a nation obedient to God. But the people with their king followed more and more decidedly a course opposed to God by separating (in the kingdom of the Ten Tribes) from the house with which God had connected his promises, and so forsaking the king which God had given them, they must therefore be punished by having this self-erected kingdom taken away, and the punishment is all the greater that they shall never return to a state of freedom, but must lie under the much viler bondage of foreign rulers until they return to the king whom God had promised to raise up from the House of David.

3. The passage in ver. 14 is and remains difficult, and, although in the light of the context we cannot regard it as containing a promise, yet the view which regards it as such is in so far to be respected as the beginning of the verse especially, taken by itself, makes it appear natural. For this reason, probably, the LXX. translate in this sense, and the Apostle Paul, freely following them, cites these words (in connection with Is. xxv. 8; 1 Cor. xv. 55), in the sense of a challenge indeed, but in the same with the implication that death and hell should reveal their impotence, and therefore in the sense of a promise. But this will not compel us to explain the words otherwise than as the context requires, and we find this in accord with but the simply mechanical theory of inspiration. But it is still to be kept in mind that in one passage the possibility of a redemption from death and hell is presupposed even if its accomplishment is refused by the threatening. But it corresponds with the character of the New Testament that it has changed the threatening into a promise. While the Old Testament summons death and the underworld to execute judgment upon their servants, the New Testament rather shows them conquered and powerless, so much so that they must even yield up the prey which they already have, and so far Paul had internal justification to convert the Old Testament threatening into a promise, or rather into a psalm of triumph, and thus in the Spirit chose the true course. For the view of ver. 14 as containing a promise, we may cite further the beautiful remarks of Rieger: "Outward ruin becomes to many a path upon which they rush suddenly down to death and hell, and with their hardened hearts they prefer to be lost beyond redemption in death and hell rather than turn to God with contrite hearts, and yield themselves up to trust in Him. Therefore God's promise comprehends the whole ruin, the whole abyss of destruction into which the sinner rushes, so as to subdue proud unbelief by the promised redemption from death and hell, and make men driven to extremity well disposed towards God. O, that all to whom sin has become their destruction would allow themselves to be rescued by this hand offered them at the brink of death and hell, especially as we can behold more fully in the New Testament the victory which God has given us through Christ Jesus, and thus more easily gain its consolation."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. GERLACH: Pride comes before a fall. See how the sins of pride and false worship lead to spiritual and eternal death! With sin there came not only guilt but also the seeds of death, and so the heart and life-blood are consumed. On the other hand, with the new righteousness comes new life into dead souls.

[FAUSSET: Sin separates from God, the true life of the soul. Let all professors of religion ever remember this, that sin, habitual or unatoned for, and spiritual life cannot coexist in the same individual (Rom. viii. 6). — M.]

Ver. 4. PFAFF. Bibelwerk: Since God has showered down upon us so many blessings from our youth up, and since all that we have we owe to his goodness, it is vile ingratitude to rely, not upon Him, but upon human power, false worship, and the like. We have only one God and Redeemer. Besides Him we must know no other.

[MATTHEW HENRY: It is a happy ignorance not to know that which we are not to meddle with. Whatever we take for our God we expect to have for our Saviour, that is, to make us happy here and hereafter. As where we have protection we owe allegiance, so where we have salvation, and hope for it, we owe adoration." — M.]

Ver. 6. PFAFF. Bibelwerk: So is it with the ungodly. They misuse God's blessings and become secure, forgetting the gracious Giver, when they should rather erect an imperishable monument to Him in their souls. See thou, too, O my soul! whether thou art thankful to thy Saviour, whether thou dost bring home to thyself rightly and constantly the blessings which God has given thee, both temporal and spiritual, whether thou dost praise and live for the gracious Giver with mouth and heart and a holy walk.

[PUSKY: They who follow God for Himself, things of this sort are not called their pasture, but the Word of God is their pasture, according to Deut. viii. 3. In like way, let all think themselves blamed, who attend the altar of Christ not for the love of the sacraments [ordinances] which they celebrate, but only to live of the altar. — M.]

Ver. 9. It is the conduct of men towards God which determines their woe or weal. God alone is our true Help; therefore everything that resists Him must be lost; and there is no greater folly than to rise up against Him.

PFAFF. Bibelwerk: God is guilty of no man's destruction, but only man himself.

Ver. 11. PFAFF. Bibelwerk: It is a great calamity to a country when the Lord gives it a prince in his anger that he may be the instrument of his vengeance.

[FAUSSET: God often punishes men by giving them their wish. — M.]

Ver. 12. God can and would remit our sins; but He can also retain them, and must do so as long as we remain impenitent; and as long as God retains them all hope of being freed from them is vain.

Ver. 14. So far can the love of God be changed into wrath that He, to whom it were easy to save, does not do so, but delivers over to death and destruction, nay, even, as it were, invokes the powers of destruction to execute his wrath, without his repenting or recalling his purpose. Even in this God has assuredly purposes of salvation. He punishes so severely only to open the eyes, when and since all other means have failed. [See the Exegetical and Doctrinal Remarks. — M.]

Ver. 15. When God withdraws his hand all prosperity disappears, and that often suddenly, before men are aware.

[MATTHEW HENRY: See the folly of those that lay up their treasures on earth, that lay it up in pleasant vessels, vessels of desire, so the word is, on which they set their affections, and in which they place their comfort and satisfaction.

PUSHEY: Such are ungodly greatness and prosperity. While they are fairest in show their life-fountains are drying up — M.]

III. Exhortation to Return: Promise of Complete Redemption.

CHAPTER XIV.

- 1 Samaria will suffer punishment,¹
Because she rebelled against her God;
They shall fall by the sword,
Their sucklings shall be dashed to pieces,
Their pregnant women² shall be cut open.
- 2 Return, O Israel, to Jehovah, thy God,
For thou hast fallen through thy transgression.
- 3 Take with you words
And return to the Lord and say unto Him:
"Forgive all (our) iniquity³ and receive (what is) good [acceptable],
And we shall render unto thee our lips (as) oxen [as our sacrifices]."
- 4 Assyria shall not help us,
We will not ride upon horses,
We will no more say: our God, to the work of our hands,
(O Thou) in whom the orphan finds pity:"
- 5 I will heal their backsliding;
I will love them readily,⁴
For my anger is turned away from them.
- 6 I will be as the dew to Israel:
He shall bloom as the lily,
And shall strike his roots like Lebanon!⁵
- 7 His shoots shall go forth,
And his glory shall be like the olive,
And his fragrance like Lebanon!
- 8 Those that dwell under his shade shall revive [produce] corn once more.
And shall bloom as the vine,
His renown (shall be) like the wine of Lebanon.
- 9 O Ephraim, what have I to do any longer with idols?
I answer and regard [watch over] him.
I am like a green cypress;
With me is thy fruit found.
- 10 Who is wise, that he may understand these things?
Discerning, that he may know them?
For the ways of the Lord are direct,
And the righteous walk in them;
But transgressors stumble thereon.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 1. — שָׁמָרָה. From the notion of suffering punishment is derived the signification: to be desolated, waste — שָׁמָרָה. [The reverse would be the order if any connection between the verbs existed. But there is none whatever. The latter meaning in all likelihood arose from the similarity in form between the two words, the one form naturally suggesting the other. But it is not to be inferred from this that the words are cognate. The roots are not at all related, but belong to families essentially distinct. First, however, holds to the affinity. But see the forms in Arabic and Ethiopic related to שָׁמָרָה, and compare the radically different notions which lie at the basis of their prevailing significations respectively. — M.]

2 Ver. 1. — הָרָחֵק = הָרָחֵק. The masc. verb. with a fem. substantive is anomalous. According to Ewald it is to be explained from the fact that the fem. terminations of the plur. imperf. are but seldom employed. [The suggestion of Henderson is worthy of consideration, that the anomaly was occasioned by the form of הָרָחֵק immediately preceding. — M.]

3 Ver. 3. — פְּלִיהֶמָּה עֵץ. פֶּל precedes for the sake of emphasis, and becomes an adverbial notion [= take away our iniquity altogether.]

4 Ver. 5. — בְּרָצָה is an adverbial accusative [spontaneously, voluntarily, readily].

5 Ver. 6. — Newcome prefers to read לְבָרָה, as more consistent with the context. But this cannot be admitted though it was the one followed by the Targum. See the exposition for the propriety of the image. — M.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Samaria shall make expiation, etc. מִנְחָה, from מָנַח, to make atonement, to suffer punishment. [Rendered in E. V.: shall be desolate, comp. the remarks in the Text. and Gram. Section. — M.] It is unnecessary to join this verse to ch. xiii., although it is naturally connected with it. The foregoing threatenings converge here first into the prophecy "concerning the destruction of Samaria because of its apostasy from its God," and then upon this groundwork is based the exhortation to return, and the promise of renewed mercy conditioned upon repentance. [Henderson: "For the concluding portion of the verse, comp. 2 Kings viii. 12; xv. 16; Amos i. 13. That such cruelties were not unknown among other nations, see Iliad, vi. 58, and Horace, Carm. iv. Od. 6." — M.]

Ver. 2. עַד, יְהוָה, even unto Jehovah [literally: until, as far as, unto Jehovah. — M.]

Ver. 3. Take with you words: They are not to come to Jehovah empty, but at the same time need take nothing more than words, no outward gifts. The words they are to use are now named, לִבָּרָה: and accept good, namely, what now follows: the sacrifices of the lips. [The true idea of the phrase seems to be: receive what is good, pleasing, acceptable. For this sense of לִבָּרָה, comp. Num. xxiv. 1; Deut. vi. 18. I find the meaning of the passage admirably expressed by Ewald: "The people must first return to God's love. The Prophet does not merely exhort them to this course; he shows them also in what manner it should be made; how and in what spirit the penitent are again to draw near to God's favor; namely, not with outward, even though imposing sacrifices, with bulls, e. g., but with words, with the lips, i. e., with the living promises of the spirit that struggles after mercy and offers what is good." The English expositors have, for the most part, followed the rendering of E. V.: and receive us graciously. Horsley (who is strangely opposed by Henderson "on the ground of philology") and Pusey recognize and adopt the natural and true construction. — M.] Literally: and we will render as bullocks our lips, i. e., we will offer to thee for our sins the confession of our guilt and the promise of our return instead of sacrificial oxen (comp. Ps. li. 17-19; lxi. 31 f.; cxvi. 17; cxli. 2).

Ver. 4 follows immediately with such a vow, no longer to rely upon Assyria, no longer upon warlike power (horses) generally, no longer to serve idols. הָאֵשֶׁר: Thou, through whom, etc. Reliance upon God's compassion is that upon which the whole prayer of penitence is based.

Ver. 5. The promise of mercy follows as an answer to such a prayer of penitence. Heal their apostasy = the calamities which it has entailed.

בְּרָצָה [spontaneously] expresses God's perfect readiness to bestow such love.

Vers. 6 ff. The effects of this love of the Lord are rich blessings upon Israel: Jehovah Himself will become to Israel like a refreshing dew, and the consequences of this would be that they should bloom and strike root and send forth branches, or that they should flourish and develop a vigorous life. Like Lebanon, not simply like the cedars, but like the mountain itself, rooted as deeply and firmly. Like the olive [ver. 7] with its evergreen leaves and rich fruitage. His fragrance like Lebanon with its cedars and aromatic shrubs.

Ver. 8. Here from Israel as a whole, compared to a tree, are distinguished the members of the people, as those who flourish vigorously beneath the shadow of the tree. וְשֹׁרֵר is to be joined with יִי in an adverbial sense = again. The latter word = live again, become fruitful. They themselves shall even become like a vine, producing wine as precious as that of Lebanon. O Ephraim! what have I still to do with idols? = I will have nothing more to do with idols, i. e., "I have now no longer to plead with thee on account of idols, as during the whole course of this prophecy Jehovah's claims to honor as against idols have formed the predominant theme. This is all done away upon the ground on which this promise rests, that Israel has returned to the Lord" (Schmiedeknecht). I have answered, and will regard him (Ephraim) = will concern myself, care for him. God lastly compares Himself to a green cypress. In Him the people are to find their fruit, i. e., the fruit which shall nourish them. [The English expositors, generally, adopt the rendering of the E. V., chiefly because the words of the first line do not seem to them suitable as uttered by God. But if they are held to assert that God would not have anything more to do with idols, would not come any longer into competition with idols for the affections of the people and so be brought into connection with them, they are seen to be suitable, and just what would be expected at the close of this book. And it would be altogether unnatural to introduce Ephraim as uttering this single exclamation in the midst of an extended passage in which God is the speaker. Finally, it is a most arbitrary principle which would require the insertion of the supplied words, or of any other, in a sentence in which the sense would be complete without an ellipsis. Manger carries such an unwarranted license to an extreme when he supposes that the whole verse forms a sort of dialogue, thus: —

EPHRAIM: What have I more to do with idols?

GOD: I have answered him and will regard him.

EPHRAIM: I am like a green cypress.

GOD: From me is thy fruit found.

Upon this it is obvious to remark, that if the verse is a dialogue, and it were necessary to indicate who the speaker is in his first utterance, it would be just as necessary to give a similar intimation at the beginning of his next response. — M.]

Ver. 10. Who is wise, etc. An epilogue to the whole Prophetic Book. וְכֵן refers to all that precedes, to the chidings and threatenings concerning sin and idolatry. For right are the ways of the Lord. This the crowning declaration, comp. Deut. xxxii. 4. The ways which God is said to follow are straight, i. e., direct, leading to the object. The righteous walk upon them, and are thereby righteous. But transgressors stumble thereon, i. e., they deviate from them, and are thereby transgressors, and at the same time the consequences of such deviation are recorded: they fall into ruin.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. It is clearly manifest here that the severe judgments announced as impending upon the kingdom of Israel have not their object in themselves, but are only means to an end. The kingdom in its present form must assuredly be destroyed, for it is utterly corrupt. But this is not to be done because God has turned Himself away from his people or desired to do so, or because his love for them is extinguished, but only because it is the only means of making room for something new, for the regeneration of his people.

2. Repentance, a return to God who had been forsaken, is to be the fruit of these judgments (comp. ch. ii. 18, 19), because it was their only design to lead to repentance, to make its necessity clear to the hearts of the people, and to prepare them for it through the severity of the wrath of God which they experienced, through their condition as "orphans" (ver. 4). The essential element of such a return was the prayer for forgiveness of guilt, involving both confession of and sorrow for sin, and in connection therewith the vow of a change of life. Rieger: "When the sinner resolves to return unto the Lord, the Spirit of Grace makes his soul willing. I said, I will confess my transgression to the Lord. O how good it is if only the sullen silence is broken and he begins to speak with God from a heart freed from deceit. The highest instance of the honor which he can give to God in sincerely returning to Him, is to reject all help in men which he had sought before, and all creaturely consolation, to sanctify God the Lord in his heart, and to seek mercy like a helpless orphan, as our Lord Jesus has shown us that we are all orphans, teaching us to seek our Father in Heaven, like orphans who have no father on earth."

3. It is significant how "words" are emphasized as an expression of such repentance, and as explained by the contrast to "sacrifices," literal offerings of animals, every external legal service. Such sacrifices are not needed; "words" are sufficient; these are the true sacrifices well pleasing to God; and yet they must be words that express a right state of mind within. (On the other hand it must be remembered that words are no guarantee of a freedom from outward lip-service.) It cannot be said with certainty from this brief remark, whether the Prophet contemplates the sacrifices as entirely done away, as in the expected time of the coming redemption. The main object is to speak of the return to God, and it is clear that he regards this as a going forth of the heart, which does not need the intervention of any sacrifice, and therefore as a prayerful and penitent approach to Him without the medium of an offering. The idea is certainly at once suggested that if mercy can be found without sacrifices, there is no need of them afterwards in the state of grace.

4. Such a return presupposes the restoration of God's favor, which is manifested by the promise of a condition of rich blessing. On this promise a restoration into their own country is not indicated as a special element, although it is evidently assumed, as exile from their country is to be regarded as the punishment that was decreed, according to the threatenings of chaps. ix.-xi. The promise in our chapter presents, so to speak, the positive side, after the negative has been shown. Punishment shall not merely be taken away; blessing shall be restored to them, through which alone a return to their country is to be gained. From the fact, however, that here at the close of the Book such a return is not promised, it is to be inferred that in the picture of the future redemption which the Prophet sketches, such return is not of itself the most important element, i. e., the Prophecy looks beyond it and towards something greater connected with it, a complete manifestation of God's favor to his people, which finds its expression in a state of rich and wondrous blessedness. This we designate the Messianic character of the prophetic promise. It is therefore clear that we are not to seek the fulfillment of this promise in pre-messianic time; apart from the consideration that it did not then appear. The Messiah Himself, according to the statement of the promise, did not accomplish it as consisting in the glorious bloom and vigor of the people; nor will He do so, simply because He has already brought a still higher disclosure of God's mercy, and will yet introduce a more glorious display, in which the whole believing people of God will enjoy (outward and inward) blessedness, as the nation of Israel will no longer be the object of special favor.

5. The promise here made to the people of Israel, that of full bloom and prosperity, and vigor, through the influence of God's grace — still chiefly in a temporal sense, — shall be fulfilled for all believers as God's true people in a higher sense: they shall be perpetually bedewed with power from God. The favor of God is ever fresh and blooming for them, and they enjoy its fruits without intermission, as they themselves become like a living, firmly-rooted, wide-spreading, never-fading, sweet-smelling tree. All this has its beginning even now, as surely as the divine favor brought to us through Christ is a reality, but shall only find its complete perfection when the kingdom of God shall have attained its complete realization.

6. "It is the object of the Prophet Hosea and of all Prophecy, in the spirit of ver. 10, to alarm and to warn the apostate, to confirm and to comfort the converted, and to glorify the Lord" (Schmieder). Only the ways of the Lord are right. Then inevitable destruction must befall him who departs from them. True wisdom is to regard them, and all the prophetic Scriptures are like an uplifted finger, which warns against any departure from them, and at the same time like an outstretched finger which points to the way upon which the righteous must walk.

HOMILITICAL AND PRACTICAL.

VERS. 2-9. FRANK: He who would read what is sweet and agreeable, should read the close of all the Prophets. They are like a choir of singers, one singing one part, another another; but at last they all dwell upon one note. The glory of Christ's Church at last is the finale.

VER. 2. This is the key-note of all Prophecy; it always comes back to this. This warning is the most needed and the weightiest of all. All God's judgments have this as their aim. They cry out earnestly: Return. O that we might hear! It is well to hear when God calls through his deeds; but it is better to hear his Words. "To thy God," not to a strange God, but to One from whom so much good has been experienced, and who remains, the God of mercy and our God, even when He must punish us. Return! (1) the object: to the Lord, thy God; (2) the reason: because thou hast fallen through thy iniquity.

[MATT. HENRY: Sin is a fall, and it concerns those who have fallen by sin to get up again by repentance.

FAUSSET: God assures us that He is the God of his people, and invites us not merely to return towards, but never to rest until we have reached even UP TO Himself — to be satisfied with nothing short of Himself. — M.]

VER. 3. Words are nothing unless they come from the depths of the heart. But when they come from thence, as did the Publican's prayer, and David's psalm of confession, then, though seemingly slight and less than "sacrifices," they are in truth as great and naturally more than all merely outward offerings, since they are measured according to the disposition of the heart. All grief over sin avails nothing without the prayer for forgiveness addressed to God. Not repentance but forgiveness, gives rest and peace.

[PUSEY: What other good can we offer than detestation of our past sins with burning desire of holiness?

FAUSSET: What so cheap as words? And yet words such as God requires are not natural to fallen man. The Spirit of God alone can teach such words. In Gospel times we have no longer burdensome literal sacrifices to offer, but we have an offering continually to render which is more acceptable to Him (Ps. lxi. 30, 31), the thanksgivings of unfeigned "lips," sanctified through the offering of Christ once for all. — M.]

VER. 4. God is gracious to orphans. O that all orphaned ones might turn to God's mercy!

[PUSEY: He is indeed fatherless who hath not God for his Father.

VER. 5. PUSEY: Steadfastness to the end is the special gift of the Gospel. In healing that disease of unsteadfastness God heals all besides. — M.]

VER. 6. STARK: God alone can truly revive the heart. Let him who needs comfort and refreshing seek them in God.

PAFF. Bibelwerk: See how believers bloom in their holiness, strike root, bring forth fruit, and diffuse fragrance all around! Art thou also such a fruitful tree displaying such vigor of spiritual life?

[FAUSSET: All that is beautiful, solid, harmonious, and enduring shall be found in harmonious unison in the "trees of righteousness," etc. (Is. lxi. 3).

PUSEY: Such reunion of qualities, being beyond nature, suggests the more, that that wherein they are all combined, the future Israel, the Church, shall flourish with graces that are beyond nature, in their manifoldness, completeness, unfadingness. — M.]

VER. 9. O that God could speak thus of us, finding in us no idolatry, nor needing to plead with us any longer because of our idols! What better thing could we wish than that God would regard us in mercy? In Christ this is realized. In Him he is also as an evergreen tree of life to believers; his mercy never ceases, and from its fullness they may all receive grace for grace. He is for them an evergreen tree of life, but also one whose fruit never falls, and ever nourishes.

[MATT. HENRY: God will be to all true converts both a delight and a defense; under his protection and influence they shall both dwell in safety and dwell at ease. He will be either a sun and a shield, or a shade and a shield, as their case requires.

PUSEY: Created beauty must at best be but a faint image of the beauty of the soul in grace; for this is from the indwelling of God the Holy Ghost. — M.]

VER. 10. God's ways are direct; we must therefore not follow roundabout or crooked courses, but go straight forward in faith and labor; a straight course makes the best runner. Righteousness brings a blessing; unfaithfulness a curse, remains the simple and infallible rule of living, attested by God's word, and confirmed by experience.

LUTHER: Let us thank the merciful Father of Jesus Christ, for these greatest gifts, that He has revealed to us these direct ways, and pray that He would guide by his Holy Spirit those that walk therein, and preserve us to eternity.

[MATT. HENRY: God's discovery of Himself, both in the judgments of his mouth, and the judgments of his hand, is to us according as we are affected by it. The same sun softens wax and hardens clay. But of all transgressors, those certainly have the most dangerous fatal falls that fall in the way of God, that split on the Rock of Ages, that suck poison out of the balm in Gilead. Let sinners in Zion be afraid of this.

PUSEY: God reveals his ways to us not that we may know them only, but that we may do them. The life of grace is a life of progress. Every attribute or gift or revelation of God, which is full of comfort to the believer, becomes in turn an occasion of stumbling to the rebellious. With this the Prophet sums up all the teaching of the seventy years of his ministry. This is to us the end of all; this is thy choice, O Christian soul, to walk in God's ways, or to stumble at them. — M.]

JOEL.

INTRODUCTION.

I. The Person and Time of the Prophet.

THE name Joel, יוֹאֵל, i. e., Jehovah is God, is one of frequent occurrence in the Old Testament, having been borne by many persons mentioned in sacred history. For this reason our Prophet, whose name is found only in the title of this book, is distinguished as "The son of Pethuel." This is the only direct notice of him, and all the other incidents of his personal history must be inferred from the book that bears his name. He certainly lived in the kingdom of Judah, for in the call to the people to meet in the temple for the purpose of humiliation and repentance, Zion, and Jerusalem, and Judah alone are mentioned, ii. 15, 23, 32; iii. 1, 6, 16, 18. Of these localities he speaks not in the tone of a stranger, but as one who was personally identified with them. He makes no allusion whatever to the state of things in the kingdom of Israel. It is, therefore, highly probable that he resided and prophesied not simply within the limits of the kingdom of Judah, but specially at Jerusalem. Again, the way in which he speaks of the temple, the sacrifices, and the priesthood, raises the presumption that he was himself a priest.

The Time in which he lived is nowhere expressly stated, and cannot be fixed with absolute certainty. But we may determine it approximately from the relation between him and Amos. The latter begins his prophecy (i. 2) by a quotation from Joel iii. 16, and there is also a close resemblance between Amos ix. 13 and Joel iii. 18. Hence it may be inferred that Amos had the prophecy of Joel before him when he wrote his own. Now the time when Amos flourished may be easily fixed by the inscription and by the contents of his book, namely, in the days of the Judaic King Uzziah, and of the Israelitic King Jeroboam II. Joel, therefore, cannot belong to a later period. The design of his prophecy, and the condition of things which it implies, warrant the inference that he lived at an earlier day. Ewald justly says, "A later prophet would not have been so deeply moved as Joel was, by the terrible visitation of locusts and drought, as to call for a solemn act of national repentance on this ground alone. He would rather have seized the opportunity to point out and impress upon the people their spiritual defects, and while exhorting them to repentance, he would have told them specially of the sins from which they should break off, and return to the Lord." In Joel's days there is no evidence of the general corruption of manners that obtained in the times of Amos and Hosea. He makes no marked reference to particular sins. He does not speak of idolatry; on the contrary, the worship of Jehovah seems to have been maintained in the temple, at least in comparative purity. Israel, indeed, is exhorted to repent, but is at the same time encouraged by precious promises. He does not exhibit the heathen nations as the instruments of God's judgments on his own people; on the contrary, he ever sides with the latter, and he predicts the evils that shall overtake the heathen for what they have done to Israel. He makes no allusion to Assyria. The captivity of Israel by that power was an event beyond the horizon of the prophet. This much then is certain: that as the worship of Jehovah was still kept up in his day, Joel could not have belonged to the times of Joram, nor Ahaziah, nor Athaliah. He must have lived before or after their day. We cannot, however, place him very long before these kings, as this would not consist with the reference to the invasion of Judah by the adjacent nations (iii. 3-6), which implied a weakened condition of the kingdom, nor with his probable allusion to the pillaging of Jerusalem by the Philistines and the Arabians in the reign of Joram. Again, the revolt of Edom, which did not occur earlier than the time of Joram, must be taken into account. Nor must Joel be separated too far from the days of Amos. For as Amos speaks of drought and locusts as judgments which God was about to inflict, we may infer that he had in view the same calamities as those described by Joel. It is natural to suppose that they came upon the kingdom of Judah to which Joel belonged, and that of Israel, which was the special field of Amos. Again, Amos speaks of the Philistines, the Tyrians, and Edom (ch. i.), and of their hostility to Israel, in a strain very similar to that employed by Joel (ch. iii.). Both prophets charge them with the same sin, and denounce against them the same punishment. Their sin was that of capturing Israelites and selling them as slaves; and although Joel names the Grecians as guilty of this crime, and Amos the Edomites, yet it is plain that they both had in view the same events. On this ground, Bleek holds that Joel, though older than Amos, was his contemporary, and places him in the time of Uzziah. Others think that as he nowhere alludes to Syria, whose capital Damascus is named by Amos (i. 3), nor to the invasion of Israel by that power under Hazael, in the days of Joash, he must have flourished in the early part of that reign, between B. C. 870-850. Certainly if he lived in the time of Joash it must have been in the early part of his reign, while he was still under the healthful influence of Jotham the high priest, for at a later day he introduced the worship of Baal. To this view Bleek objects that while Joel might have been expected to refer to the Syrian invasion if his book had been written very soon after that event, there would be no reason for naming it if he wrote it in the days of Uzziah, fifty years after it happened, since Syria was remote from Judah, and separated from it by the then existing kingdom of Israel. But to this it may be replied that Tyre and Sidon were also separated from Judah in the same way. Hence as both prophets refer to the same heathen nations, while Damascus is mentioned by Amos alone, this difference becomes all the more remarkable, and seems to warrant the inference that Joel could not have lived during the Syrian invasion. Though the events detailed by Joel, on account of which the nations concerned in them would be punished, must have been in the view of Amos, yet there must also have been other occurrences, such as the war with Syria, nearer to his time, and more immediately affecting the kingdom of Israel to which he belonged. Hence if Amos prophesied about B. C. 810, Joel must have done so about B. C. 850. But while Joel was older than Amos, it does not follow that he is the oldest of the prophets whose writings we possess. He has many points of contact with Obadiah (comp. Ob. 10, Joel iii. 19; Ob. 11, Joel iii. 3; Ob. 15, Joel i. 15, ii. 1, iii. 12, 17; Ob. 18, Joel iii. 8). It is a question which of these two prophets is the elder. It is not improbable, though by no means certain, that Joel had before him the book of Obadiah, when he wrote his prophecy. But we shall not pursue the discussion.

[Wünsche, the most recent expositor of this book,¹ fixes the time of Joel as somewhere between B. C. 860-850, and the grounds on which he bases his opinion are these:—

1. Joel charges the Philistines with having invaded Judah, captured the inhabitants, and sold them as slaves. Now according to 2 Chron. xxi. 10, this happened under Joram, B. C. 889-883. And they suffered the punishment predicted for their crime, under Uzziah, 2 Chron. xxvi. 6. Hence Joel could not have written this book before B. C. 889, nor later than 732.

2. The Phœnicians, i. e., those of Tyre and Sidon, who in the days of David and Solomon were the allies, had in later times become the enemies of Judah. They too had been guilty of selling Jewish prisoners to the Grecians. Joel predicts that they also shall be punished for this crime, — a prediction fulfilled in the time of Uzziah, B. C. 811-759. This proves that Joel must have prophesied before the days of Uzziah.

3. The Edomites (iii. 19), are ranked among the enemies of Judah. They came from the same stock as the Jews, and on account of their sin against their brethren, their country was to become a perpetual desolation. From 2 Kings viii. 20, comp. with 2 Chron. xxi. 8, we learn that they became independent of Judah in the time of Joram, B. C. 889-883. They were again subdued, and their capital city Petra captured, B. C. 838-811, though the southern and eastern parts of their territory were not conquered until the reign of Uzziah, about B. C. 830. The prophet must have exercised his ministry, therefore, prior to the latter date.

4. The fact that no mention is made of the invasion by the Syrians of Damascus, proves that Joel was one of the early prophets. This occurred in the latter part of the reign of Joash, B. C. 850-840.

5. The high antiquity of Joel is proved by the fact that he makes no reference to the Assyrian invasion of the two Jewish kingdoms in B. C. 790. On the other hand, Amos clearly alludes to it (vi. 14).

6. Another proof is derived from the relation between Joel and Amos. The latter was certainly well acquainted with and used the writings of the former.

7. The mention of the Valley of Jehoshaphat is a circumstance leading to the same conclusion. It took this name from the memorable victory there gained over Moab and Ammon. The way in which Joel refers to it shows that this event must have been a comparatively recent one, and that the memory of it was still fresh.

On these grounds we conclude that in fixing the time of this prophet, we cannot take for our terminus a quo an earlier date than B. C. 890, nor for our terminus ad quem a later one than 840. It most probably falls between B. C. 860-850. Joel therefore is the oldest of the Minor Prophets. — F.]

Of the Ministry of our Prophet, i. e., as to the way in which he exercised it, we know nothing beyond what may be gathered from this book. Whether he first appeared simply as a preacher, or worked at the same time in other ways, cannot be determined. From what we know respecting the other prophets, it is more than probable that his prophetic teachings were originally oral, but if so, they must have been soon reduced to writing in the form in which we now have them. That he exerted a commanding influence on the popular mind is clear from ch. ii. 18, especially if this verse be taken in a historical sense. But in any view of it the passage shows that the prophet was conscious of his power; for he not only exhorts the nation to repentance, but imperatively demands it, and he does so with the evident assurance that he will be obeyed. For this reason we are inclined to think that he belonged to the order of the priesthood, and that his exhortations were, in the first instance, addressed to his brethren in that office.

II. Of the Book.

There can be no question that the book bearing the name of Joel was written by himself. Not only is there no ground for doubt on this head, but all the positive evidence in the case is strongly on the same side; as, for example, the perfect unity that marks the book, one chapter fitting into another with the most complete exactness. Even if we admit, what some assert, that ch. ii. 10, etc., belongs to a later date than the other parts of the book, our remark holds good, for it is most closely connected with what precedes and follows it. Whether we have the discourses of the prophet precisely as they were delivered (supposing it to have been orally), or only the substance of them, is a point which cannot be determined, and is really one of no practical importance. Most probably we have them in the latter form, as the high finish and poetical diction of the book, specially in the first two chapters, suggest the idea of literary elaboration, rather than that of a simple reporting of oral discourses.

[Of the Style of the Prophet, the chief characteristic, says Dr. Pusey, is perhaps its simple vividness. Everything is set before us, as though we ourselves saw it: This is alike the character of the description of the desolation in the first chapter, the advance of the locusts in the second, or that more awful gathering in the valley of Jehoshaphat described in the third. The prophet adds detail to detail; each clear, brief, distinct, a picture in itself, yet adding to the effect of the whole. We can without an effort bring the whole of each picture before our eyes. Sometimes he uses the very briefest form of words, two words, in his own language, sufficing for each feature in his picture. One verse consists of five such pairs of words, i. 10. Then again the discourse flows on in a soft and gentle cadence, like one of those longer sweeps of an Æolian harp. This blending of energy and softness is perhaps one secret why the diction also of this prophet has been at all times so winning and so touching. Deep and full, he pours out the tide of his words with an unbroken smoothness, carries all along with him, yea, like those rivers of the new world, bears back the bitter restless billows which oppose him, a pure strong stream amid the endless heavings and tossings of the world. Poetic as Joel's language is, he does not much use distinct imagery. For his whole picture is one image. They are God's chastenings through inanimate nature, picturing the worse chastenings through man. Full of sorrow himself, he summons all with him to repentance, priests and people, old and young, bride and bridegroom. The tenderness of his soul is evinced by his lingering over the desolation which he foresees. It is like one counting over, one by one, the losses he endures in the privations of others. Nature to him seemed to mourn; he had a fellow feeling of sympathy with the brute cattle which, in his ears, mourn so grievously; and if none else would mourn for their own sins, he would himself mourn to Him who is full of compassion and mercy. Amid a wonderful beauty of language he employs words not found elsewhere in the Holy Scripture. In one verse (i. 16), he has three such words. The extent to which the prophecies of Joel reappear in the later prophets has been exaggerated. The subjects of the prophecy recur; not, for the most part, in the form in which they were delivered. The great imagery of Joel is much more adopted and enforced in the New Testament than the Old, — of the locust, the outpouring of the Spirit, the harvest, the wine-treading, the wine-press. To this unknown Prophet, whom in his writings we cannot but love, but of whose history, condition, rank, parentage, birthplace, nothing is known, nothing beyond his name, save the name of an unknown father, of whom, moreover, God has allowed nothing to remain save these few chapters, — to him God reserved the prerogative, first to declare the outpouring of the Holy Ghost upon all flesh, the perpetual abiding of the Church, the final struggle of good and evil, the last rebellion against God, and the Day of Judgment.

The tone of Joel's writings, says Wünsche, indicates deep religious feelings, heartfelt experience, and warm sympathy. His moral ideas are lofty and pure, and testify to the religious knowledge and the holy life of the prophet. His poetry is distinguished by the soaring flight of his imagination, the originality, beauty, and variety of his images and similes. The conceptions are simple enough, but they are at the same time bold and grand. The perfect order in which they are arranged, the even flow and well compacted structure of the discourse, are quite remarkable. In his energy, power, and dignity, Joel reminds us of Micah; in his vivacity and lifelike freshness he resembles Nahum; in his originality and directness, in the bold range, and sublime strain of his ideas, he falls but a little below Isaiah: in his enthusiastic zeal for true religion, and his clear, earnest, penetrating insight into the moral disorders of his times, he resembles Amos. Joel threatens and warns; he descends into the innermost recesses of human nature, and he drags into the light of day, corruption, falsehood, and lukewarmness in the worship of Jehovah. Of our Prophet, Umbreit finely says: The Prophetic mantle which enrobed his lofty form, was worthy of his majestic spirit; its color is indeed dark and solemn, like the day of the Lord which he predicts, yet we see sparkling upon it the stars of the eternal lights of love and grace. — F.]

The Occasion of this book was a terrible visitation of Judah by locusts and drought. The prophet describes the devastation produced, and viewing it as the beginning of a great judgment day of the Lord, he calls upon the priests to appoint a day for national humiliation and prayer. This must have been done, since he, by divine authority, promises the people the richest blessings for the present and the future, as well as complete deliverance from all their enemies.

The book consists of two Parts, which must be carefully distinguished. They are as follows: —

Part I. includes chaps. i.–ii. 17; Part II. extends from ii. 19 to the end of ch. iii. They are connected together by the historical statement (ii. 18, 19).

Part I. The plagues already named, are described as a divine judgment. The call to repentance.

Ch. i. The unprecedented plague of locusts and drought is described, and those on whom it fell are called upon to lament over the desolation of the land caused by it; one of the worst results of it being the necessity for suspending the daily sacrifices. For this reason the priests are required to mourn themselves, and to summon all the inhabitants of the land to join with them in their lamentation.

Ch. ii. This visitation is simply a token that a great judgment day of the Lord is coming. The army of locusts, of which a graphic picture is given, is the host of the Lord, sent to do his will (vers. 1–11). Still the threatened judgment may be averted by timely repentance (vers. 12–14). Hence the priests should appoint a day of humiliation and prayer, and should beseech the Lord to have mercy upon the nation as being his own people (vers. 14–17).

Part II. contains promises: (1) For the present (ii. 18–27). God will deliver his people from the plague and amply repair the evil done by it, by new blessings, and so prove that Israel is his people. (2.) For the future still greater things are promised. The day of the Lord is surely coming, but to Israel it shall be a day of salvation, and a day of terror only to Israel's foes. This day shall be introduced by the outpouring of God's Spirit upon the whole people. There shall be at the same time terrible signs in the heavens and the earth, from which there is safety only in Zion. But there, all will be perfectly secure (ch. iii. 1-8). The day itself is described as one of deliverance for Israel, and of destruction for their enemies, i. e., "the nations." These nations are reproached for their crimes against Israel, and shall be punished on account of them (vers. 9-16). Infliction of the punishment. The Lord assembles Israel and the nations, in the valley of Jehoshaphat. At first it seems as if the nations were on the point of storming the holy city, but then and there, amid terrible signs, they are annihilated by the Lord at one blow. The dawning of Israel's salvation described (vers. 17-20). Uninjured by their enemies, protected by their God, who dwells forever in the midst of them, his people enjoy the richest blessings.

What Joel says of the locusts is not to be taken simply as an allegory, nor as a merely figurative description of the hosts of war. Nor is the first chapter a prediction; on the contrary it describes his own experience.

Importance of this Book. We find that it was held in high consideration by the later prophets. We have already mentioned the use made of it by Amos. It is also quite plain that Isaiah used it (comp. Is. xiii. 3, 6, 8, 10, 13, and Joel, ii. 1-11; iii. 15, 16). That other later prophets had the book before them will be obvious to any one who examines a Bible with parallel references. Delitzsch, therefore, justly says, "Among the prophets who flourished from the time of Uzziah to that of Jeroboam, Joel unquestionably holds the position of a type or model, and after Amos, there is not one whose writings do not remind us of him." We may even claim for Joel (and Obadiah also if we regard him as one of the earlier prophets), a sort of fundamental significance for the whole series of later prophets, not only on account of his clear and precise prediction of the coming of the day of the Lord, but also because of the way in which he connects Israel with it. Even God's covenant people must look well to see how they stand, for in that day, repentance alone can help them. If this is wanting, if Israel departs from God, escape from the coming judgment will be impossible, — a truth which the later prophets exhibit with an ever-growing emphasis and distinctness. The prophecies of Joel are, it seems to me, fundamental in another sense, namely, in the promises they give respecting Israel's future. Though Israel must first suffer on account of their sins, yet the prophet anticipates with confidence the time when they shall return in penitence to God, and predicts that they shall win a glorious triumph, while all their enemies, i. e., the world, shall be utterly destroyed. Thus Joel (uniting himself, as it were, with Obadiah in unfolding and confirming the prophetic promises on this head), fixes with an assured faith the position of Israel, as God's own people, and foretells their glorious victory over all their foes, though the latter may, for the present, bring upon them much shame and sorrow. What the eye sees cannot be an object of faith, which has to do with things for the time being invisible. Accordingly Joel has given a key-note (much more full than that of Obadiah's), which was repeated by the later prophets; he unfurled a standard, so to speak, which shall never cease to wave on high. The later prophets would witness the deep humiliation of God's people by the nations, i. e., the world power; they would have to announce the total overthrow of the commonwealth of Israel, the annihilation of its political existence, as a well-deserved punishment for their sins. But notwithstanding this, all that Joel had promised would be realized; the day of the Lord was surely coming for the heathen, — a day of fearful recompense to them, but to his own people a day of deliverance and eternal salvation. So we find that in spite of the denunciations against the chosen people on account of their apostasy, in spite of the judgments to be inflicted upon them through the agency of the heathen, the faith and hope of the prophets in regard to the future of Israel are never shaken. They perpetually recur to the promise that the Lord will not cast off his people. A remnant shall survive. In this remnant Jehovah will be glorified, and will show that his ultimate design was not to destroy his people, but to bestow upon them fresh favors, yea far higher ones than their fathers enjoyed. This promise becomes more and more closely allied to the hope of a Messiah, and gives to it a more and more positive shape. This hope of a Messiah is the solid basis of all other hopes of Israel's future and glorious destiny. Joel, indeed, does not in express terms describe this Messianic foundation, as it may be called, but he has a general conception of it, and for this reason we have said that his prophecy may properly be called a fundamental one, i. e., with reference to those on the same subject, in later times.

THE PROPHET JOEL.

PART FIRST.

THE JUDGMENT AND CALL TO REPENTANCE.

CHAPTERS I. 1-II. 17.

SECTION I.

Complaint of the Desolation of Judah by Locusts and Drought.

CHAPTER I.

- 1 The word of Jehovah which came to ¹ Joel, the son of Pethuel.
- 2 Hear this, ye ² old men,
And give ear ³ all ye inhabitants of the land!
Hath such ⁴ a thing been in your days,
Or even in the days of your fathers?
- 3 Tell it ⁵ to your children,
And your children to their children,
And their children to another generation.
- 4 What the palmer worm ⁶ hath left, the locust hath eaten,
And what the beetle hath left, the caterpillar hath eaten.
- 5 Awake ⁷ ye drunkards, ⁸ and weep,
And cry out ⁹ all ye drinkers of wine
On account of the new wine (or must), ¹⁰
For it is cut off (removed) from your mouth.
- 6 For ¹¹ a people ¹² hath invaded ¹³ my land, ¹⁴
Mighty and numberless;
Their teeth are the teeth of a lion,
And they have the jaw teeth of a lioness.
- 7 They have laid waste my vine, ¹⁵
And barked (or broken) my fig trees;
They have made it quite bare, ¹⁶ and cast it away;
Its branches are made white.
- 8 Lament ¹⁷ like a bride ¹⁸
Girded with sackcloth for the husband of her youth.
- 9 Cut off is the meat offering and the drink offering from the house of Jehovah;
The priests mourn
The ministers ¹⁹ of Jehovah.
- 10 The field is wasted, ²⁰
The land mourneth, ²¹
For the corn is destroyed,
The new wine is dried up,
The oil ²² fails.
- 11 Be ashamed ye husbandmen,
Howl ye vine-dressers,

For the wheat and for the barley²³ ;
Because the harvest of the field hath perished.

12 The vine is dried up,
And the fig tree faileth,
The pomegranate, also the palm, and the apple tree (quince),
All the trees of the field are withered,
So that joy is dried up²⁴ from the sons of men.

13 Gird yourselves and lament, ye priests,
Cry out ye ministers of the altar ;
Come, lie all night in sackcloth
Ye ministers of my God,
For the meat offering and the drink offering
Are withheld from the house of your God.

14 Sanctify a fast,
Appoint a solemn assembly,
Gather the elders,
And all the inhabitants of the land
In the house of Jehovah your God ;
And cry unto Jehovah.

15 Alas for the day !
Because the day of Jehovah is at hand ;
It will come like²⁵ a tempest from the Almighty (Shaddai).²⁶

16 Is not the food cut off before our eyes ?
Joy and gladness from the house of our God ?

17 The grains²⁷ (seeds) are rotten²⁷ under their clods,²⁷
The garners are destroyed,
The barns²⁷ are broken down,
Because the corn is withered.

18 How the beasts groan !
The herds of cattle are perplexed,
Because they have no pasture ;
Even the flocks of sheep perish.

19 Unto Thee, O Jehovah, will I cry,
For the fire hath devoured all the pastures of the plain,
And the flame hath burned all the trees of the field.

20 Even²⁸ the beasts of the field²⁹ cry unto Thee
For the streams of water are dried up,
And the fire hath devoured the pastures of the plain (wilderness).

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 1. — The preposition לָ (lamed) indicates direction, and like the Arab. إلى includes ordinarily the terminus ad quem. Sept. ὅς ἐγενήθη πρὸς Ἱερουσαλ.

2 Ver. 2. — יְהוָה יְהוָה. The Heb., unlike the Arab., has no proper vocative, and hence the simple noun with or without the article takes its place.

3 Ver. 2. — יִשְׁמַח, denom. verb from שָׂחַ: it is stronger than שָׂחַ, but is only used in poetry.

4 Ver. 2. — The dagesh in the second יִשְׁמַח is the dag. forte conj.

5 Ver. 3. — תִּפְּצֵן. The fem. suffix, which according to a peculiar Heb. idiom stands for the neut., has for its antecedent יִשְׁמַח. The prep. לְ denotes the object of the discourse ; it is used like the Lat. super, and Gr. ἐπί.

6 Ver. 4. — There is little difference of opinion in regard to the etymology of the names of the insects mentioned in this verse. — נָחַם from the same root = to cut off. אֲרָבָה, the most common name for locust, from רָבַה, to multiply. לִיָּה from the same root, to lick up. חָסִיל from חָסַל, to consume. Expositors are, however, very much divided as to whether these terms are names of the locust at different stages of its growth, or of different species of insect. Bp. Newcome renders them, the grasshopper; the locust, the devouring locust; the consuming locust. Hitzig, Keil, and others regard them as simply poetical epithets of one and the same species of locust. It is hardly possible to give their exact equivalents in English.

7 Ver. 5. — הִקְיִצָּה from הִקְיָץ, to cut off, to separate, then to arouse, or awaken; the opposite of the onomatopoeic word יָדַם to snore, to sleep heavily.

8 Ver. 5. — שְׂפֹרִיִּים, from שָׁפַר, a strong drink made of honey, raisins, dates, and other fruits. Hence the word = notorious drunkards.

9 Ver. 5. — וְהִילִילֹהּ, from the onomatopoeic הִילַל, to howl, complain.

10 Ver. 5. — עֲסִים is the fresh sweet juice of the grape, and other kinds of fruit, as the pomegranate, Song of Sol. viii. 8, and is to be distinguished from הַיִּירוֹשׁ, new wine, strictly so called. The former must have been a favorite drink of the old Hebrews.

11 Ver. 6. — כִּי makes the connection between this and the preceding verse.

12 Ver. 6. — גֹּוִי denotes a heathen, hostile people, and differs from עַם, though the distinction between the two words is not always observed. See Text. notes on Obadiah, ver. 1.

13 Ver. 6. — עָלָה עַל, lit. gone up, upon, perhaps with reference to the fact that Palestine is higher than the countries around it; but the word is often used in the more general sense: to approach, to enter, etc., where the region is a level one.

14 Ver. 6. — "My land," אֲרָצִי, i. e., not the land of Jehovah, nor simply the native land of Joel, but the land with which he was allied as the prophet of the Lord.

15 Ver. 7. — נִפְנִי, "my vine," — not the vine of the Lord, but of the Prophet speaking in his name.

16 Ver. 7. — חִשַּׁף lit., "peeling it have peeled it," i. e., completely.

17 Ver. 8. — אֱלִי, imper. fem. of אָלַה, and ἀλ. λεγ., like the Chald. and Syr. ܐܠܝ. The more usual form is הִילִיל. Many expositors, without reason, take it as a denom. from אָל, God.

18 Ver. 8. — The proper Heb. word for virgin is עַלְמָה. The word here used denotes a bride, i. e., a young woman espoused. See Is. vii. 14; Matt. i. 23.

19 Ver. 9. — מִשְׁרָתִי, Ministers, from שָׁרַת, to serve. It denotes free and honorable service, e. g., of the temple, in contrast with עֲבָד which denotes the enforced service of slaves.

20 Ver. 10. — שָׁדַד שָׁדַד. A paronomasia. The root שָׁדַד has in Kal first the intrans. sense to be strong, next the trans. sense, to use strength, i. e., to waste, to desolate. שָׁדֵד denotes specially wheat or barley fields, then woodland, &c., is where cattle fodder; אֲדָמָה, farmland generally.

21 Ver. 10. — אֲבֵלָה, the Sept. and Arab. versions take this as an imper., and render it "Mourn! O land."

22 Ver. 10. — יִצְהָר, from the root יָצַהר, to be clear, i. e., the oil newly pressed and clarified; as distinguished from שֶׁמֶן, fat.

23 Ver. 11. — עַל-חִפְזָה. The prep. עַל, as in vers. 5, 7, marks the cause. חִפְזָה and שְׁעוֹרָה are the two kinds of דָּבָן: the one kind of grain being used as food by men, the other chiefly by cattle, though the very poor used both.

24 Ver. 12. — כִּירָה־בֵּישׁ. We have here what is called constructio pregnans = שֶׁשֶׁן הַבֵּישׁ וְהָרָח, joy has withered and fled away.

25 Ver. 15 — כְּשֹׁד. The expression is regarded by some as a sort of proverbial one. כִּי is not pleonastic, nor the so-called כִּי veritatis, but indicates likeness in quality or degree.

26 Ver. 15. — "From Shaddai — the Almighty." The Rabbins, Raschi, Abarbanel, and Maimonides see in this name a profound mystery, because it is a noun compounded of the insp. pronoun, שֶׁ, with pattach notaf, and הָי, or הָיִי to hold. The rendering of the Sept., καὶ ὡς ταλασπείας ἡ ἑστῆς, is wholly inadmissible.

27 Ver. 17. — The three ἀναξ λεγομ. words in this verse, render it both as to etymology and grammar, one of the most difficult in the whole book. עֲבָשָׁן, according to Aben Ezra and Kimchi, means "rotted;" "perished." Newcome; "dried up," Pusey, Wünsche. Some light is cast on the sense of פָּרְדוֹת, by the Syr. ܡܕܢܐ, seed, corn and the Chald. ܦܪܕܐ, grain. In form the word is the Paül participle of פָּרַד. The third word, מִגְרָפוֹת, is probably from the root גָּרַף — found only in Judg. v. 21, — which in all the dialects has the sense of to bear or carry away.

The Arab. حَبَف, denotes the breaking up of the soil by the plough. מִגְרָפָה, therefore, may be a lump of soil, a clod, such as is thrown up by the plough. So the old Jewish expositors have understood it. In מִגְרָפוֹת we have another ἀναξ λεγ. — yet there can be little doubt as to its meaning. The מ local is prefixed. Newcome renders it "store-houses." Tregelles, "granaries, or cells for keeping grain."

28 Ver. 20. — בָּ here as in ver. 13, marks an increase of the general calamity.

29 Ver. 20. — The construction of the fem. sing. with the plur. noun is common in poetry, and is proper here because בְּהֵמוֹת is used in a collective sense. This term denotes domestic cattle. — F.]

EXEGETICAL.

Vers. 2-4. (Hear this ye old men,—) the caterpillar hath eaten. A call is made upon the inhabitants of Judah, and especially the old men, to testify that an unheard-of thing had happened,—an event to be told to their posterity, namely, the complete desolation of the land by successive swarms of locusts.

Ver. 2. (Old men.) They are named because their memory goes back the farthest. The calamity might well be deemed extraordinary if they could recall nothing like it. Inhabitants of the land, i. e., of Judah, as is evident from what follows ver. 14, ii. 1. זָקֵן refers to what is stated in ver. 4. In vers. 2, 3 there is an allusion to Exod. x. 2-6, where the plague of locusts in Egypt is spoken of.

Ver. 4. Swarms of locusts come, each one devouring what its predecessor had left. This, however, is not described in a dry, prosaic way. As the locusts appear four times, they bear four distinct names. Their proper name is אֲרָבָה, the others are poetic ones. These names are not used simply to denote the changes which the locusts undergo, nor their invasion of the land during successive years, as this would not consist with the statement that what one kind had left, another had eaten. The preterite אָכַל is to be taken in its proper sense. The whole chapter speaks of something that has actually happened. The desolation is described in detail, one feature of it after another being depicted in such a way as to arouse those affected by it to earnest prayer.

Verses 5-7. Awake ye drunkards.—Its branches are made white. The drunkards are called upon to mourn, to show poetically how complete is the desolation of the vineyards. At the same time, this is to be regarded as a punishment for the sins of the people, who are summoned to repent, though this last idea is not yet explicitly expressed.

Ver. 6. The locusts are represented under the figure of a hostile army. They are not to be regarded as a type of such an army, as if the passage was simply allegorical. Yet the idea of enmity to Israel implied in the word גֵּי—a heathen people,—must not be lost sight of, for these locusts actually ravage the land of Israel. Hence there is no ground for taking עָלָה otherwise than as a preterite, nearly in the sense of a future, as predicting something to come. אֲרָבָה is the land of the prophet as speaking in the name of the people. Jehovah himself does not speak directly, comp. v. 13. The arms of these invaders are their teeth, which grind like those of a lion. The jaw-teeth of the lioness protecting or avenging her young are added by way of climax.

Ver. 7. The vine and fig tree. These are added because they are among the most valuable of fruit trees, comp. Hos. ii. 14. לִהְיוֹתָ is properly that which is broken off, i. e., a fragment of wood, splinter, chip. חֲשָׁפָה, made bare, by barking or paring, so as to peel off. The bark is thrown away; and the whole vine is made white or blanché by the barking of it.

Vers. 8-10. (Lament like a bride,—the oil fails.) The lamentation of the drunkards is simply a prelude to what follows. It would be a mistake to suppose that sensual pleasures and enjoyments alone are meant. The thing at stake was so much greater than these, that the whole land had cause to mourn.

Ver. 8. Judah is here regarded as a wife, and hence the fitness of comparing this lamentation to that of a young bride mourning the husband of her youth. Certainly no judgment could be more severe than one that made it impossible to present "the meat and drink offerings." Hence the priests had reason to mourn; and Judah, in danger of losing the visible emblems of the presence of his God, is fitly compared to the young wife who had lost her husband. These offerings could not be presented because everything was destroyed. [The corn, wine, and oil were essential ingredients of these offerings, and every sacrifice would be imperfect without them. The locusts and the drought combined must also have caused a great dearth of the animals used in sacrifice. — F.]

Vers. 11-12. Be ashamed, ye husbandmen,—from the sons of men. The husbandmen and vine-dressers are next addressed. The worst feature of the desolation, already mentioned, is not again noticed until we come to ver. 13. In ver. 11, הָיִילוּ, הָבִישוּ are imperfects. הָבִישוּ, הָיִילוּ (perhaps to distinguish it from הָבִישוּ the Hiphil of יָבֵשׁ, here without the ו which precedes and follows it), to be ashamed, to grow pale. Going into their fields and finding nothing there, they are ashamed.

Ver. 12 adds the reason for their lamentation. Besides the vine and the fig, other noble trees are mentioned which may have been under the special care of the vine-dresser; as well as the trees of the field generally. הָבִישוּ שָׂשׂוֹן here also the Hiph. of יָבֵשׁ, to grow paler. Joy becomes, as it were, ashamed; she withdraws herself, and is no more seen.

Vers. 13-17. Gird yourselves and lament ye Priests,—the corn is withered. The discourse returns to what had been complained of in ver. 9, as the worst feature of the calamity, namely, the inability to offer sacrifices. Here (ver. 13) the priests are again called upon to lament the want of materials for the temple service. "Gird yourselves," i. e., with sackcloth or hair-cloth. "Pass the night," i. e., even in the night-time their lamentations on this account should continue. [They should weep between the court and the altar. See 1 Kings xxi. 27. There was nothing strange in this direction, for there was no intermission in the temple service by day or night. See Ps. cxxiv. 1. — F.] "Ministers of my God," the God whose prophet I am. [The suffix of the first person shows that the prophet, on the one hand, stood apart from the priests, and on the other, stood in a very near relation to God as his organ, and therefore elevated far above all other ranks and conditions of men. — Wünsche.¹ F.]

Vers. 13-17. Gird yourselves and lament ye Priests,—the corn is withered. The discourse returns to what had been complained of in ver. 9, as the worst feature of the calamity, namely, the inability to offer sacrifices. Here (ver. 13) the priests are again called upon to lament the want of materials for the temple service. "Gird yourselves," i. e., with sackcloth or hair-cloth. "Pass the night," i. e., even in the night-time their lamentations on this account should continue. [They should weep between the court and the altar. See 1 Kings xxi. 27. There was nothing strange in this direction, for there was no intermission in the temple service by day or night. See Ps. cxxiv. 1. — F.] "Ministers of my God," the God whose prophet I am. [The suffix of the first person shows that the prophet, on the one hand, stood apart from the priests, and on the other, stood in a very near relation to God as his organ, and therefore elevated far above all other ranks and conditions of men. — Wünsche.¹ F.]

¹ [Wünsche thinks that this circumstance shows that Joel could not have belonged to the priestly order. But this would be overstraining the sense of "my." — F.]

The phrase "your God," is immediately afterward used, and repeated in ver. 14, hence it must not be supposed that the prophet intended, or was obliged to separate himself wholly from the priests. There must be fasting as well as lamentation. This was to be observed not by the priests alone: on the contrary, the whole people must be assembled in the temple, and there in the midst of these masses the priests should cry unto the Lord. "Sanctify a fast," because fasting was held to be, in the popular estimation, a holy, religious service.

וְהָיָה צִדְקָה. The word צִדְקָה ordinarily denotes a religious assembly, one to observe a great festival. Fürst thinks that it comes from צָר, to fix, to settle, i. e., a fixed time,¹ hence to proclaim a fast day. The "old men," — not the elders in the official sense of the term, as one might perhaps infer from the E. V. — who had been called upon (ver. 2) to testify that no such calamity had ever before happened, must be present in this assembly, as well as those who are to hear their testimony. וְהָיָה צִדְקָה, to cry out as an expression of want, or distress. The substance of this "cry," or complaint, is presented in the verses that immediately follow. This complaint probably extends as far as ver. 17, in which the desolation of the land is set forth as the ground of the lamentation. Ver. 18 seems to begin a new section, in which the cries of the lower animals are represented as mingled with the complaints of men.

Ver. 15. Alas for the day, i. e., the present time of desolation. This cry of distress is caused by the nearness of the day of the Lord. The character of this day may be learned from its results. It is close at hand; it is coming as a desolating scourge from the Almighty, and its effect will be such as to show that it could come only from Him. That this terrible state of things had already begun is evident from ver. 16. The meat is cut off; the voice of joy and gladness is no longer heard in the temple. Why? Because it is not possible to present there the usual thank-offerings. Besides the invasion of the locusts which had eaten up every green thing, there was an unusual drought (ver. 18) which had greatly intensified the calamity that had befallen Judah. In consequence of these things the granaries were empty, the barns had gone to ruin, for the corn had failed. The question arises, how is the passage from ver. 13 and onwards to be viewed. It is commonly taken to be a new section, the subject of which is the call to repentance. Keil thus explains its connection with the preceding context: "Lamentation and mourning alone will not bring release from the calamity: with these must be conjoined repentance and prayer to Jehovah, who can avert every evil." But though this view seems to be favored by vers. 14, 15, it really mistakes the prophet's train of thought. The call to repentance does not come formally into view until ch. ii. 12, though the way had been prepared for it, ii. 1. Now the description of the day of the Lord in ii. 2 has a relation to what is said in i. 15, so that the call to repentance may be said to have its root and nothing more, in this earlier section. The special design of ch. i. is to lay a foundation for what is to follow, by exhibiting the magnitude of Judah's distress, and the special reason for repentance. The intensity of the mourning showed the magnitude of the judgment.

The priests (ver. 13) and the people at large (ver. 15) are alike called upon to recognize the judgment, and to return to God who had sent it. This passage and ch. ii. 15 seem to be exactly alike in purport, but there are differences between them which should not be overlooked. They differ in regard to the motive and the object of the proposed fasting and humiliation. In ch. ii. 15 the priests are charged to call a solemn assembly, because in this way they might hope for God's mercy. In ch. i. 14 the ground of lamentation is the suspension of sacrifices, which not only affected the public worship of God in the temple as conducted by the priesthood, but also the immediate interests of the people themselves. They also differ in the object proposed. In ch. ii. 15 the priests in the people's name and behalf beseech the mercy of the Lord. In vers. 14, 15 they cry to Him, "Alas." They bring their complaint before the Lord, because this great calamity bears upon their relation to Him as his ministers, depriving them of the means for carrying on divine service, and hence they cry out, "the day of the Lord is near." So thorough is the desolation that one may well say "the day of the Lord is at hand." Things have this look. But as yet there is no word about repentance, confession of sin, and return to God. The calamity, in its unequalled magnitude, and far-reaching effects, just now fills the prophet's mind. He naturally regards it as coming from God's hand, but he here says nothing about the cause of it. The reason for deeming it a divine infliction is only implied in the connection between the devastation and what the day of the Lord would bring.

Vers. 17, 18 show that the prophet is not yet exhorting the people, but is still describing the great calamity. It would be strange, therefore, for him to introduce in ver. 13 a topic so entirely new, as repentance. Nor do we find in these verses the proper motives for such an exercise. Logically, then, these two passages are quite distinct, the one being a call to lamentation, and the other a call to repentance. When the prophet, in i. 14 and ii. 15, exhorts the priests to appoint a fast and call a solemn assembly, he does not mean that this should be done twice, at two different times. The one call is simply a repetition of the other, but in a different sense. He wishes the people to fast, and to meet in the temple, to mourn there with the priests, and that they should also manifest their penitence by prayer for mercy offered by the priests as their representatives.

Vers. 18-20. How do the beasts groan, — the pastures of the wilderness. The beasts of the field must suffer equally with men. This fact is used to illustrate the magnitude of the calamity. But as these dumb animals cannot describe their sufferings, the prophet himself becomes their interpreter, and as if sharing their distress, exclaims, To Thee, O Jehovah, do I cry — for help. That this appeal is in the name of the beasts of the field is evident from ver. 19. The flame, the fire, vers. 19, 20 = the fierce heats that produced the drought. The beasts include domestic and wild animals.

THEOLOGICAL.

1. We may here discuss the question whether the visitation of the locusts is to be regarded as an allegorical prediction of an invasion of the land by a hostile people, as most of the older expositors, which it occurs. It has the same sense here as in Lev. xxiii. 3-6; Num. xxix. 35; Deut. xvi. 8; 2 Chron. vii. 9; Neh. viii. 18. — F.]

and more recently Hengstenberg and Havernick take it to be. They think that the prophecy of the desolation of the land begins in chap. i. If this be so, as there is no formal mention of the future, we must suppose that the prophet sees the approach of the calamity so vividly, that he pictures the future as a present reality. While this view may be admissible, it is not natural. On its face, the text describes not a future, but a present fact, and there is no exegetical necessity for assigning to it any other sense. We may also remark that the call to the old men to testify whether such a thing had happened in their day, and to the people generally to transmit the account of it to their children, would have no significance, if the event were a future one. Chap. i. certainly describes a devastation that had actually happened, and as no foreign foe had as yet invaded the land, it must have been caused by locusts and drought. It needs no proof that the word "people" (ver. 6) does not necessarily denote a real nation. Again, the devastation caused by locusts would be an inadequate type of an invasion of the land, since one of the essential features of the latter would be wanting, namely, the shedding of blood. The picture of the calamity in no way suggests the terrors caused by an inroad of foreign foes. The chapter simply treats of the damage done to the products of the earth, and the complaints of men in consequence of it. — But as regards chap. ii., the question whether the visitation of locusts is to be taken in an allegorical sense, is not so easily settled. Here the coming of "the day of the Lord" is for the first time distinctly announced, and in this connection there is a renewed mention of the destruction caused by locusts and drought. That this latter event should be made the theme of a prophetic discourse, is no way surprising, because Holy Scripture teaches us that all public calamities are divine dispensations designed to awaken men to a sense of their sins, and to bring them to repentance. What more natural, then, than that the prophets should, in God's name, threaten such calamities, and when they did come, interpret and apply them so as to arouse the people to penitence, so that they might escape still heavier judgments? A clear illustration of this is found in Amos vi. 6, and as he closely follows Joel, we may regard it as settled that the latter prophet had these calamities before his mind. But the prophet is a poet as well as a preacher of repentance; and so he presents a most vivid poetic picture of the great misfortune which had befallen Judah. In its surpassing magnitude, God's chastising hand was all the more manifestly displayed, and his voice was all the more distinctly heard calling his people to repent.

2. The memory of extraordinary events should be preserved in the popular mind. They thus become a tradition, or a history. Thus only can there be a continuous life in the case of individuals, of families, and of nations. This basis of history, namely, the remembrance of the experience of former generations, in the case of Israel is essentially a religious one. Here, events are manifestations of God, — of his mercy, or his judgment. As such they should never be forgotten, in order that the revelation of God to the consciousness of a nation may be maintained in an ever-living freshness.

3. Terrible as is the scourge which strikes at the means of subsistence in a land, in the prophet's eye this is not its worst result. In this case, for example, the greatest evil produced by it was the loss of the sacrifices in the house of God. The Temple was the visible sign and pledge of God's dwelling in the midst of Israel as his people. But it was such only while divine worship was kept up in it, according to the due order, by the priests as the representatives of the people. The daily morning and evening sacrifice formed an essential part of this service; and on its continuance depended the continuance of God's covenant relation to his people [i. e., not really, but visibly. — F.]. The suspension of the one suspended the other. Hence no greater misfortune could happen to Israel than the inability, caused by famine, to supply the Temple with the materials for these sacrifices. Joel, realizing fully the necessity of these offerings for the purpose before named, turns to the priests, here and in chap. ii., entreating them to call upon God themselves and to endeavor to bring the people to repentance. Such, in any case, was their present duty. How it might be in the future will be disclosed in chap. iii. Meanwhile it is manifest that no merely formal service would meet the exigency. Only true repentance would avail.

HOMILETICAL.

Vers. 1-2. [HENRY: The greatness of the judgment is expressed here in two things: (1.) It was such as could not be paralleled in the ages that were past; in history, or the memory of any living. Those that outdo their predecessors in sin, may justly expect to fall under greater and sorer judgments than any of their predecessors knew. (2.) It was such as would not be forgotten in the ages to come. We ought to transmit to posterity the memorial of God's judgments as well as of his mercies. — F.]

Ver. 3. How necessary it is that our children should be taught the will of God, and what his purpose is when He chastises us, so that the fear of his holy name may be deepened in our hearts.

Ver. 4. Here we learn the omnipotence of God, and how vainly human power is arrayed against Him, since He can employ the smallest and meanest insect to do his will.

Ver. 5. Ye drunkards who consume God's kindly gifts in intemperance and sin, know that your sin carries a curse with it, and that God can easily cut off the wine from your mouths, and punish you with years of famine.

[PUSKY: All sin stupefies the sinner. All intoxicate the mind, bribe and pervert the judgment, dull the conscience, blind the soul, and make it insensible to its own ills. God arouses those who will be aroused by withdrawing from them the pleasures wherein they offended Him. Weeping for things temporal may awaken the fear of losing things eternal. — F.]

Vers. 6-8. The Christian Church is God's vineyard. If at any time it yields not good fruit, but only wild grapes, it shall be laid waste.

[ROBINSON: Prevailing sins are often visited with corresponding judgments. The Lord in his righteous dealings withholds those gifts of his providence which have been abused. He takes from an ungodly people the means of gratifying their lusts, and leads them to repentance by afflictions which are not capriciously ordered, but with exactest wisdom are suited to their character. Be assured, the prosperity of the Church depends not on a grand ceremonial, or crowds of admiring devotees, or the countenance of the state, however desirable these things may be, but only on the favor of God, whose blessing, and whose Spirit will be withdrawn, if we defile his sanctuary with superstitious rites. — F.]

Ver. 9. No greater sorrow can befall the teachers and hearers of the Word, than the cessation of divine worship. Want of the means of livelihood must exert a very prejudicial influence on the public service of God. Under the old economy there would be, of necessity, a failure of tithes and offerings. So now, when people have a hard and constant struggle for the bare means of subsistence, they will be far behind others in knowledge of the truth, in the proper training of children, and in mutual love.

Ver. 10. How quickly the Lord can turn all human joy into sorrow! How comes it then, O sinner, that thou cleavest so closely to temporal things which may be taken away at any moment? What reason have we to praise the goodness of the Lord, who gives us fruitful seasons, and fills our hearts with gladness?

Ver. 11. Husbandmen are too apt to desire the blessings of the field through avarice, or for the sake of their own carnal enjoyment. Therefore God sometimes sends them a sad instead of a joyful harvest-time.

Vers. 9-12. [SCOTT: We are so dependent upon God in everything, that no human wisdom or power can provide plenty when He pleases to send scarcity; without his rain, the seed even must perish, the trees of the field must wither, and all our temporal joys must sicken and die, and such judgments are emblems of the great day of retribution. How stupid then are sinners who are insensible under such judgments, or only mourn with a rebellious and unhumiliated sorrow.

PUSEY: The vine is the richness of divine knowledge, the fig the sweetness of contemplation and the joyousness in things eternal. Well is the life of the righteous likened to a palm, in that the palm below is rough to the touch, and in a manner enveloped in a dry bark, but above it is adorned with fruit, fair even to the eye; below it is compressed by the enfoldings of its bark, above it is spread out in amplitude of beautiful greenness. For so is the life of the elect, — despised below, beautiful above. — F.]

Vers. 13-14. Who shall blame God's ministers when they complain of the declension of religion? Who would not weep when he thinks of the miserable condition of many churches.

Fasting is one of the ways of deepening and manifesting repentance, sanctioned by Holy Scripture. When properly observed, the result will be to stimulate us to cry more earnestly to God. Under great calamities, men should be taught to look to God, not only in a general way, but they should be told to seek Him in special and appropriate exercises of penitence and prayer.

[HENRY: They that are employed in holy things are therein God's ministers, and on Him they attend. A people may be filling up the measure of their iniquity apace, and yet may keep up a course of external performances in religion. As far as any public trouble is an obstruction to the course of religion, it is to be on that account more than any other, sadly lamented, especially by the Lord's ministers.

PUSEY: The fast which the Lord approveth is that which lifteth up to Him hands full of alms-deeds, which is passed with brotherly love, which is seasoned with piety. What thou substractest from thyself, bestow on another, that thy needy neighbor's flesh may be recruited. — F.]

Vers. 15-18. When God punishes, He seeks our improvement; but if this does not follow, He will utterly destroy. — The sufferings of the lower animals are caused by the sin of man.

[HENRY. Though it is common for the heart not to rue what the eye sees not, yet that heart is hard indeed which does not humble itself when God's judgments are before the eyes. If when God's hand is lifted up, men will not see, when his hand is laid on they shall see. — The house of our God is the proper place for joy and gladness; when David goes to the altar of God, it is to God my exceeding joy; but when joy and gladness are cut off from God's house, either by corruption of holy things, or the persecution of holy persons, when serious godliness decays, and love waxes cold, then it is time to cry to the Lord, time to cry Alas! — F.]

Vers. 19, 20. It is one of the special duties of a teacher of the Word to be constant in prayer to God. — God hears the cries even of dumb animals. Then, O my soul, trust Him in all thy troubles, and know that He will listen to thy cries as much more readily than to theirs, as thou art of more value than they. The prophet, in his appeal to God, is not ashamed to be found in fellowship with the beasts of the field. So the Divine Spirit, by way of arousing our faith, points us to the fact that God feeds the young ravens, and gives the cattle their food. Yet how readily can God turn all our joys into deepest griefs! How unexpectedly can He do this, and by what feeble means! How preposterous, then, for any to regard their earthly possessions as secure, and to boast of them! How plainly God shows us that we live only in and through his blessing, that everything we possess is his gift. How thankful we should be when He permits us to enjoy fully what He has bestowed upon us!

[HENRY: The prophet stirs them up to cry to God.

(1) By his own example. He would not put them upon doing that which he would not resolve to do himself; nay, whether they would do it or no, he would.

NOTE. — If God's ministers cannot prevail to affect others with the discoveries of divine wrath, yet they ought to be themselves affected with them; if they cannot bring others to cry to God, yet they must themselves be much in prayer. In times of trouble we must not only pray, but cry, must be fervent and importunate in prayer; and to God, from whom both the destruction is, and the salvation must be, ought our cry always to be directed.

(2) By the example of the inferior creatures. The beasts of the field do not only groan, but they cry unto Thee. They appeal to thy pity, according to their capacity, and as if, though they are not capable of a rational and revealed religion, yet they had some dependence upon God by natural instinct. Much more will He put a favorable construction on the groanings of his own children, though sometimes so feeble, that they cannot be uttered.

SCOTT: God will hear the united prayers of the remnant of his servants, and often for their sakes will rescue a guilty nation from impending destruction.

PUSEY: O Lord, to Thee will I cry. This is the only hope left, and contains all hopes. From the Lord was the infliction; in Him is the healing. The prophet appeals to God by his own Name, the faithful Fulfiller of his promises, Him who is, and who had promised to hear all who call upon Him. Let others call to their idols, if they would, or remain stupid, the prophet would call unto God, and that earnestly. — F.]

SECTION II.

The Day of the Lord cometh! Repentance alone can avail to meet it. Hence the Demand for a Day of Public Humiliation.

CHAPTER II. 1-17.

- 1 BLOW the trumpet¹ in Zion,
Sound² an alarm on my holy mountain.³
Let all the inhabitants of the land tremble,
Because the day of Jehovah cometh,⁴
It is nigh at hand.
- 2 A day of darkness and of gloom,⁵
A day of clouds, and of thick mists,⁶
Like the morning⁷ dawn spread upon the mountains;
So shall come a people numerous and mighty,
The like of which hath never been before,
And the like of which shall not come again,
In the years of many generations.
- 3 A fire devoureth before them,
And behind them a flame burneth;
Before them the land is as the garden of Eden,⁸
And behind them a desolate wilderness,
And nothing shall escape them.
- 4 Their appearance is like⁹ the appearance of horses,
And like horsemen shall they run.
- 5 Like the noise of chariots, on the tops of mountains¹⁰ they shall leap,
Like the sound of a flame of fire devouring stubble.
Like a strong people set in battle array.
- 6 Before them the people¹¹ are in pain,
All faces gather paleness.¹²
- 7 They shall run like mighty men,
They shall climb the wall like men of war;
And they shall march, each one in his way,
And they shall not turn aside¹³ from their paths.
- 8 And no one shall press upon another,
They shall march each one in his path;¹⁴
And though they rush¹⁵ upon the dart, they shall not be wounded.
- 9 They shall run to and fro in the city,
They shall run upon the wall;
They shall climb upon the houses,
They shall enter behind the windows like a thief.
- 10 Before them the earth trembleth,
The heavens quake,
The sun and the moon shall be darkened,
And the stars withdraw their brightness,
- 11 And Jehovah shall utter his voice before his host,
For his army is very great,
For he that executes his word is mighty;
For great is the day of Jehovah, and very terrible,
And who can endure it?

- 12 Yet even now,¹⁶ saith Jehovah,¹⁷
Turn unto me with all your heart,
With fasting, and with weeping, and with lamentation,
- 13 And rend your heart, and not your garments.
And return to Jehovah your God,
For He is gracious and merciful,
Slow to anger and of great kindness,
And repenteth Him of the evil.
- 14 Who knoweth? ¹⁸ He may return and repent
And leave a blessing behind,
A meat-offering and a drink-offering For Jehovah your God.
- 15 Blow the trumpet in Zion,
Sanctify a fast,
Call a solemn assembly;
- 16 Gather the people,
Sanctify a congregation,
Assemble the old men,
Gather the children,
And those that suck the breasts;
Let the bridegroom desert his chamber,
And the bride her closet;
- 17 Between the porch and the altar,
Let the priests weep,
The ministers of Jehovah,
And say,
Spare thy people, O Jehovah,
And give not thy heritage to reproach,
That the heathen should rule over¹⁹ (or use a bye-word against) them;
Wherefore should they say among the heathen (— the peoples)
Where is their God?

CRITICAL AND TEXTUAL.

1 Ver. 1. — The שֹׁפָר of the Hebrews, according to Jerome, was a metal instrument in the shape of a horn, and had a tone of extraordinary power. Its root, שָׁפַר, to be bright, refers either to the metallic glitter of the instrument, or its clear ringing sound.

2 Ver. 1. — "And sound." And is omitted in the Vulg., Sept., Arab., Chald., and five MSS. omit וְ. There is more energy in the passage without it.

3 Ver. 1. — "Holy mountain." שֵׁן הַר is a noun, lit., "mountain of my holiness." The adjct. קִדְוֶה is only applied to persons and never to things.

4 Ver. 1. — "The day — cometh." The perf. בָּא is used as the present to express the certainty of the event.

5 Ver. 2. — "Darkness and gloom." חֹשֶׁךְ is often connected with שָׁחַד, to express a kind of climax. Its root is not used in Heb., but we find it in the Arab. أَفْلَ.

6 Ver. 2. — "Clouds and thick mists." עָנָן, formed apparently from עָנַן, a cloud, and חָשַׁךְ, to be dark, corresponding to the Greek ὄφρυς. Here, too, a gradation is marked.

7 Ver. 2. — "Like the morning dawn," etc. The Vulg. renders it, "as the morning spread upon the mountains, a people much and mighty," but the accents will not admit of this. Newcome has it, "like the dusk," but this suggests evening rather than morning. It properly means the gray of the morning, while the sun is still far below the horizon. It is one of the names of the Nile, from the turbid color of its water.

8 Ver. 3. — "Eden." עֵדֶן, an old Semit. word, found also in various dialects in the sense of pleasure, like the Gr. ἡδονή. In the sing. with zero on the penult., it always means Paradise. With segol on the penult., it is the name of a part of Mesopotamia. In the plur. form it denotes pleasures. Ps. xxxvi. 9; 2 Sam. i. 24.

9 Ver. 4. — "Is like." כִּי is here used παραβολικῶς compar., and not, as Theodoret supposes, ἐντετατικῶς intens.

10 Ver. 5. — "On the tops of mountains," etc. עֲלֵי-רִגְוֶה must be connected with רָגְוֶה, they shall leap, and not with רָקוּל; the latter union is forbidden by the accents, and by the use of the word "chariots," whose "noise" is only heard on level ground.

11 Ver. 6. — "Peoples." The plural form עַמִּים is used, not as Oredner supposes, with reference to the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, but simply to denote people generally.

12 Ver. 6. — "Paleness." פָּאֵל is variously understood. The Sept. render the clause εἰς σπῆς καυμάτων, as the burning of a pot. The Chald., Syr., Vulg., Arab., "become like a pot or have the blackness of a pot." But there is nothing in the nature of the thing, or in the etymology of the word, to warrant the "blackness" of our E. V. Cramer explains rather than translates the words: "all faces contract their muscles." The root of the word is פָּאֵל, to be beautiful, to glow: and it literally means "ruddiness." This gathers, or withdraws itself, and the countenance becomes pale.

13 Ver. 7. — "They shall not turn aside." יִפְּזוּן is variously explained. Many expositors take it in the sense of pervertere, as if it were יִפְּזוּן, to bend. Others get its meaning from the Arab. صَلَطَ, to split, or divide. One MS., De Ross, has the reading, יִפְּזוּן, they strike not out behind, like horses. The sense is, they move in a compact mass, bending neither to the right nor the left, forwards nor backwards.

14 Ver. 8. — "Each one in his path," lit., the mighty one. בָּרַךְ, used here poetically for אֱלֹהִים.

15 Ver. 8. — "Though they rush," etc. The meaning of this line is plain enough, i. e., nothing can arrest their march; but the renderings of it are various, growing out of the senses given to בָּרַךְ. De Wette renders it: "Und zwischen Waffen stürzen sie hindurch, brechen den Zug nicht ab." — Wünsche: "Und hinter dem Wurfspiess fallen sie, nicht brechen sie ab." On the whole, I prefer the rendering of Tregelles: "Though they rush," etc.

16 Ver. 12. — "Yet even now." Oredner, without reason, supplies a שׁוֹבֵר after עַתָּה עֲתָה.

17 Ver. 12. — "Saith Jehovah." אָמַר is most frequently used as the part. pass. constr. = "the voice of Jehovah is."

18 Ver. 14. — "Who knoweth." The interrogative particle מִן is omitted here as in Jon. iii. 9. The question is expressed only by the tone. Holzh. takes the phrase מִי יָדָע to = every one knows, i. e., it is quite certain; but this sense is too absolute.

19 Ver. 17. — "Rule over." The primary meaning of קָשַׁל is to make like, and in its nominal form it has the sense of similitude, parable, proverb, song. Scholars have been a good deal puzzled how to reconcile the signification of making like and ruled, which last sense the word undoubtedly has in many places. When used in this last sense it is usually followed by כִּי, rarely (Wünsche says never) by עַל or אֵל. Tregelles renders it in this place, "to sing a song of derision," and De Wette, "spotter," which, I think, the context favors. Pusey and Wünsche insist on the sense of our E. V. "rule over." — F.]

EXEGETICAL.

This portion of the prophecy consists of two parts. The first is contained in vers. 1-11, in which the prophet explains more fully than he had before done, the misery that was coming on the land, a harbinger of the great and terrible day of the Lord. The second part includes vers. 12-17, and declares that timely repentance would secure God's gracious help, and therefore that the priests should earnestly deal with the people to this end.

Ver. 1. Blow the Trumpet in Zion. This is a call to the priests. They must give a signal of alarm from Zion, which is to be understood not in the local sense, but as including the whole of Jerusalem. Then comes the more precise locality, "the holy mountain." The design of this signal is to arouse the inhabitants of the land, and to apprise them that an event of terrible magnitude is close at hand. The Day is the judgment day of the Lord. There is a climax in the clauses announcing its approach, "it is coming," "it is near," i. e., its coming is not an event of the far distant future, but it will be very soon.

Ver. 2. The Day is one of darkness. Four terms are used to show how intense it will be. See Ex. x. 22; Deut. iv. 11. It will be darker than that of Egypt, and than that of Sinai. Here the "darkness" is to be understood in a literal sense, for by the vast swarms of locusts, the sun would be obscured (ver. 10, and Exod. xiv. 15). That the prophet had these swarms of locusts in view is evident from what follows. כְּשֶׁחַר belongs to the following עֹם רָב. As the early morning dawns upon the mountains, so this "people" comes. "This," says Keil, "is to be understood of the shining caused by the reflected rays of the sun from the wings of a swarm of locusts."

[Some, says Dr. Pusey, have thought that there is here an allusion to the appearance which, the inhabitants of Abyssinia well know, precedes the swarm of locusts. A sombre yellow light is cast upon the ground from the reflection, it is thought, of their yellow wings. But that appearance seems to be peculiar to that country. — F.] The image naturally exhibits the suddenness and universality of the darkness, when men looked for light. As to the meaning of מִן־חָרָה, expositors are greatly divided. Bauer thinks that the points of comparison are the quickness with which, and the wide extent over which the dawn spreads itself. Oredner's view is, that as the morning light overspreading the hills is a symbol and pledge of life and joy, so these clouds shall come overspreading the land with darkness and misery. [Wünsche takes it in the sense of the "morning gray," i. e., the time when the morning is wrapped in a sort of darkish or dusky gray; the meaning being, that the nature of this "day" will be made known, just as the gray dawn of morning proclaims the coming day. — F.] There hath not been ever the like. The phrase seems to have been borrowed from Exod. x. 14, — a passage on which the prophet, in a general way, seems to have had his eye, — where the same thing is said of the plague of locusts sent upon Egypt.

Ver. 3. A fire devoureth. This description is based on what had been already experienced, namely, that the desolation caused by locusts had been attended usually by drought and terrible heat. But now the heat grows into a fierce flame, analogous to the awful displays when God revealed Himself at Sinai. So here, the army of locusts is God's host. מִלִּיקָה. That which has "escaped," namely, the "fire," or the desolation caused by it, has not remained in the land. [This is a strained sense. The exposition of Newcome, Pusey, and Wünsche is more natural and sensible. "There is nothing that has escaped it, i. e., this army." Pusey adds, "the word being used elsewhere of the persons who escape, — captivity or captives, — suggests in itself that we should not linger by the type of the locusts only, but think of enemies more terrible, who destroy men. — F.]

Vers. 4, 5. Their appearance — in battle array. The entrance of this fearful host is described. The head of the locust has a certain resemblance to that of the horse. Their celerity of movement is compared to that of horsemen; and in ver. 5, the noise caused by their leaping is likened to that made by chariots on rough mountain roads, so that their appearance is somewhat similar to that of an army advancing in battle array. Their noise in devouring plants and herbs is also compared to the crackling of flames in a field of stubble. [Pusey: The amazing noise of the flight of locusts is likened by those who have heard them, to all sorts of deep sharp rushing sounds. The prophet combines purposely things incompatible, the terrible heavy bounding of the scythed chariot, and the light speed with which these countless hosts should in their flight bound over the tops of the mountains where God had made no paths for man. — F.]

Ver. 6. Before them the peoples, etc. עַמִּים here has the usual sense of "peoples," "nations," since the day of the Lord would not be confined to one country. All faces lose their glowing color, i. e., the blood retires from the cheeks, so that they grow pale. פָּחַד is here to be taken in the sense of אִיִּשׁ in ver. 10 and iii. 15.

Ver. 7. They shall run, etc. With resistless power they advance and march toward their goal. They run to attack. In like manner they climb the wall. שָׁפַע = to change or shift the way, i. e., to turn from one's way and go into that of another, so that the latter is hindered. [Pusey: They are on God's message and they linger not. Men can mount a wall few at a time; the locusts scale it much more steadily, compactly, irresistibly. The picture unites the countless multitude, condensed march, and entire security of the locusts with the might of warriors. — F.]

Vers. 8-10. And no one shall press, etc. Those behind shall not press upon those before. No weapons can stop the advance of this host; or arrest its march. They rush through, or between, or under the darts, or swords. They go forward as if no obstacles were in their way. Of course this does not mean that any attempt was actually made to oppose their progress, but simply that it would be vain to resist them, by the means ordinarily used to arrest an army (ver. 9), comp. Ex. x. 6. The picture in vers. 7-9 is perfectly true to nature. Jerome (in loc.) says, "We have ourselves lately seen this very thing in this province (Palestine). When the locusts come and fill the whole space between earth and sky, they fly in perfect order, as if obedient to a divine command, so that they look like the squares of a pavement. Each one holds its own place, not diverging from it even so much as by a finger's breadth. To these locusts nothing is impenetrable, fields, meadows, trees, cities, houses, even their most secret chambers." The accounts of more recent observers agree with this description. There is a design in this picture so elaborate in its details. The more terrible the visitation of locusts appears, the more certain would it be, that when the day of the Lord came, this host would become God's instrument in the infliction of his judgment. What follows in ver. 10 is fully consonant with the fact, though there is some rhetorical amplification, as the prophet, once for all, sees in the swarm of locusts not a mere natural phenomenon, but an evidence of the coming of the day of the Lord. The view we take of an event naturally gives a certain coloring to the picture of it, and a certain climactic amplification is proper, when the event is one that surpasses all previous experience. Before them, or it, i. e., this great and mighty people. The earth trembles. What more natural than that heaven and earth should be terrified by such a host, — one so dreadful in fact, so much more dreadful when viewed as the host of an avenging God? This most awful effect cannot, indeed, be seen or heard, like these marching hosts and the noise they produce; it can only be felt, and thus all the wider scope is given to the terrified imagination. The obscuration of the sun, moon, and stars is real, but this darkness becomes more fearfully impressive, since the locust swarms appear as a tempest cloud of divine wrath. (Comp. Jer. xiii. 10; Ezek. xii. 7; Mark xiii. 24.)

Ver. 11. And Jehovah shall utter his voice. Probably a real event is referred to, — a thunder-storm in connection with the coming of the locusts. The prophet hears the thunder not so much with his outward ear as mentally, recognizing it as a manifestation of God. Only such displays of power as those described in vers. 10, 11, would benefit the greatness of the host sent to do Jehovah's will, and the terribleness of the day of the Lord that was coming, — a day so terrible as to wring from the prophet the inquiry, "who can endure it?" See Jer. x. 10; Mal. iii. 1.

Vers. 12-17. Yet even now, etc. Though the anger of God is so clearly revealed that men may see his day coming, yet He says, Turn unto me, and thus points out the way in which his anger may be averted. If they repented, they would escape these judgments, and find God gracious. With all your heart. This is the most essential thing, and so is named first, yet this hearty repentance will also manifest itself outwardly. But the prophet warns the people that a merely external repentance will effect nothing (ver. 13), comp. Ps. li. 19; Ezek. xxxvi. 26. Such repentance, however, as that described in vers. 12, 13, will avail, because "He is gracious" (Ex. xxxiv. 6; 2 Sam. xxiv. 16). Therefore is there hope that He will avert his judgments. Who knoweth. That God is such as He is here described is beyond a doubt, but whether, under present circumstances, He will display his mercy, is not so certain. This depends on the conduct of the people, and hence the prophet would have them to bear in mind, that pardon would not come to them as a matter of course, and that their repentance must not be of an easy and formal kind. He will return. Jehovah is conceived of as on his way from heaven for the purpose of judgment; but He may stop, and return to heaven. Leave behind Him, i. e., when He returns to heaven (Hos. v. 5). A blessing, i. e., an abundant harvest, so that there may be no lack of those offerings, the materials of which had been destroyed by the locusts (i. 9-13). Instead of a day of judgment (involving a greater desolation than any as yet experienced), there was hope that God would give another crop to replace the one destroyed (ver. 5). Since repentance opened such prospects of blessing, the priests should summon the people to meet for the purpose of humiliation and prayer, and they should themselves, in the name of the people, implore God's mercy.

Ver. 16 repeats what was said before in i. 14, but more in detail. Sanctify a congregation, i. e., call a meeting of the congregation for sacred purposes. No age should be excepted, because the entire people deserved punishment and needed to repent. Even the joy of the bridegroom and the bride must give place to penitential mourning. What the priests should do, when the people were assembled, is defined in ver. 17. They shall stand between the porch and the altar, i. e., immediately before the entrance to the sanctuary and turning toward it, they should pray to God, appealing to Him in behalf of the people as his own covenant people.

[Pusey: The porch in this, Solomon's temple, was in fact a tower in front of the Holy of holies, of the same breadth with the temple. The brazen altar for burnt-offerings stood in front of it. The space between the porch and the altar, became an inner part of the court of the priests. It seems to have been a place of prayer for priests. It is spoken of as an aggravation of the sins of those twenty-five idolatrous priests, that here, where they ought to worship God, they turned their backs toward the temple of the Lord to worship the sun. Here Zechariah was standing, when the spirit of God came upon him, and he rebuked the people, and they stoned him. — F.]

THEOLOGICAL.

1. The day of the Lord (i. 15; ii. 1; iii. 4-14), is a phrase used only by the prophets. If, as some think, Obadiah is the oldest, the phrase occurs first in Ob. 15, and next in the above marked places in Joel. If this view of the relative ages of these prophets be correct, we may assume that the phrase was introduced into prophetic language by Obadiah. Certainly Joel uses it in a way to show that he regarded the idea expressed by it as one well known to those for whom he prophesied, though, as Ewald suggests, the expression may be here presented in its oldest and simplest form. "As the king of a vast empire, — Ewald adds, — may for a time so completely disappear from the view of his subjects, as to be the same as if he had ceased to exist, and then suddenly reappear among them, in the fullness of his power to hold a long delayed assize, so the Invisible One may put off, or seem to put off the day when He will appear as the Supreme Judge. The idea of the "day of the Lord" is closely connected with that of Jehovah as king, who as such has a "day" for men, — a day in the pregnant sense of the word, a day for judgment. Jehovah as king must and will, in due time, suddenly and miraculously judge and subdue all who are in rebellion against Him. He will subject all things to his own holy and righteous control, thus showing that his will is the only and absolute rule; and will rectify all that is now disorderly in the condition of things on the earth. As Israel was then the kingdom of Jehovah in a special sense, "the day" for Israel as God's people, would be the epoch of their perfect and glorious deliverance from all their enemies. This appears in ch. iii. The "day" is that one on which Jehovah sits in judgment on all his foes, and when Israel's prosperity begins. Yet it is even for Israel a day of judgment, — one that shall make it manifest whether they are faithful or not to their obligations as God's people. If not, even they shall be destroyed, unless timely repentance intervenes. This view is presented in chaps. i. — ii.

Thus while the ultimate result of the judgment will be the salvation and glory of Israel, the immediate design of the day of the Lord is the punishment of the heathen as the enemies of his people, and of the latter as well if untrue to their covenant relation. Hence all the predicates that describe the day, mark it as one of judgment. It is "great and very terrible" (ii. 11; iii. 4); "dark and gloomy" (ii. 2; Amos v. 18; Is. ii. 12). In the announcement of this "day," Israel is not so much consoled, as warned against self-conceit and security, — a warning all the more earnest on account of the uncertainty of its coming. Hence men should be always ready for it. Still, Joel does not as yet seem to know how far the kingdoms of Israel and of Judah may be faithless to their calling as God's people, nor what divine judgment shall overtake them. He sees them, on the one hand, menaced by judgments, but on the other hand, by their penitence averting them, so that actually these judgments in their destructive power fall upon the heathen alone, while Israel and Judah are redeemed and glorified. The יום ה' is the ἡμέρα τοῦ κυρίου of the New Testament. Joel, however, does not use the phrase "day of the Lord" with reference to the hope of Messiah's coming, since we find no such hope in any part of his prophecy.

2. The next question is this, — Considering the "day of the Lord" as one of menace to Israel, how was it regarded by the prophet himself? We begin by saying that the "day," as viewed by Joel, was not marked by a series of events, but by a single, sudden, and conclusive act. And therefore Keil applies modern speculative notions to the exposition of the phrase, when he says, "each particular judgment by which God chastises his own people for their sins, or destroys the enemies of his kingdom, may be regarded as a moment in the 'day of the Lord.'" If so, why should Joel connect the approach of that day with the visitation of locusts? As already mentioned in ch. i. the allegoric signification assigned by some to the locusts (i. e., hostile hosts), has arisen out of the union of two heterogeneous things. This allegoric sense may be found in those other prophets, one of whose chief themes was the judgment to be inflicted upon Israel by means of heathen nations — a judgment which then appears as "the day of the Lord" for Israel. But the verbal text will not admit of this principle of interpretation in ch. i. The objection, however, does not hold in ch. ii., where the prophet describes the entrance of swarms of locusts into the land as an actual event, and also designates it as the coming of the day of the Lord. Some interpreters take the locust visitation as a presage and a symbol of an invasion by hosts of a different kind, partly on the ground that it is denoted as the coming of the day of the Lord, and partly from the use of the term "northern" in ver. 20, which cannot be applied to the locusts. There is, however, not much force in the first of these considerations, for while there is, in a general way, an obvious analogy between the swarms of locusts and an invading army, much is here said about the one that will not apply to the other. The reference to Is. xiii. is more to the purpose, for he quotes the very words of Joel, and describes the judgment of Babel in terms that show that he understood the locust invasion in an allegoric sense. But though the language of the two prophets is so similar, it does not follow that they refer to the same events, nor that their words are to be understood in precisely the same sense.

But there are positive difficulties in the way of the allegoric interpretation of this chapter. For example, what can be meant by "driving the locusts into the sea" (ii. 20)? Again, the question arises, if Israel is threatened by an enemy, by what one? The word "northern" proves nothing. It is strange, on this theory, that while Joel describes the judgment on Israel by some foe, he gives us no hint even by which to identify him. There is no indication that the heathen nations were to be the chosen instruments for this purpose. On the contrary, what they do against Israel is exhibited as a crime which shall bring down God's judgments on their own head. This method of exposition also overlooks the differences in the times when the several prophets lived. In Joel's days, the great empires had not yet appeared as the special instruments of God's judgments on his covenant people. In this character they had not yet come within the range of the prophet's vision. He knew, indeed, that Israel's sins deserved, and would receive chastisement, but he had not yet been told that the heathen nations would be God's agents in inflicting it. Whenever they are named, it is as being themselves the objects of wrath, while Israel appears as a penitent and the recipient of God's mercy.

But it may be said that while the prophet describes a real locust visitation, he sees in it, at least to a certain extent, a type of the "day of the Lord — a day of judgment;" or in other words, what the land had already experienced might warn its inhabitants that they would have a still more bitter experience when that "day" arrived. But the difficulty is that if we suppose one event to be in any sense formally typical of the other, we find in the minutely detailed account of the type much that in no way corresponds with the antitype. The darkness, the terror, and the desolation produced by the locusts might be in themselves typical, but these are the features on which the least emphasis is laid by the prophet.

The view which we prefer is this. The land had been desolated by locusts to an unparalleled extent. The prophet had reason to fear that this was the harbinger of a worse calamity of the same sort. He sees in the visitation the beginning of the day of the Lord. The locust army is led by God himself, and hence the lively colors of that picture of it which he draws. The plague of locusts and the day of the Lord are not to be taken as two distinct things. They differ, not like the type and the antitype, but as the beginning and the end of the same thing. And so he says, "the day of the Lord cometh, it is near." He sees its approach, still he hopes that the repentance of the people in answer to his earnest appeals, will ward off its further effects, — that Israel, warned and taught by the earlier and merely relative judgment, may escape the final one, and that the enemies of God's people alone shall be overwhelmed by it. The day of the Lord in the highest sense of the words, did not, indeed, come with the calamity by which Israel was then chastised, but each preliminary judgment was really the precursor and pledge of the absolute and final one. All that we can affirm is that the prophet saw in this locust visitation not merely a natural phenomenon, but the finger of God. In these terrible scenes he hears the voice of the Living God calling his people to repentance. As God's messenger he echoes the earnest appeal, knowing that ere long He will come to judge his people, though the exact time of his coming none can tell.

3. The plague of locusts was a punishment of the nation's sins. The prophet, therefore, demands hearty repentance, and a return to God. He, however, does not name the sins which had brought down this chastisement. There seems to have been no one prevalent form of corruption at that time, and, in particular, there is no distinct trace of idolatry. But this shows how earnest God is in punishing sin, since not only do gross iniquities awaken his displeasure, but also sins of the heart, though there may be no outward display of them. His love to his people also appears, since He summons them to repentance, in circumstances, in which, without such a call, they might have sunk into a condition of dangerous security. The earnestness of the prophet is also shown by his recognizing these calamities as divine judgments for sin, and his evident belief that although the people might outwardly seem to be in the right way, they might really be at the same time ripe for punishment. The repentance he demands, should consist essentially of turning with the whole heart to God, and which would outwardly manifest itself by fasting, weeping, and rending the garments. These were expressive symbols, and on this very account there was danger of putting them in the place of the inward feelings which they implied and represented. Against this mistake he warns the people, "rend your hearts and not your garments." But even their sorrow for sin, however real, would be of no avail without an actual turning to God. The repentance which He demands, is such as both has its seat in the heart, and displays itself in the life. Prayer for pardon is a prominent feature of the public solemn humiliation described in ver. 17. As the whole land had been already chastised, and was still threatened with a severer infliction, the repentance suited to the occasion was not simply that of individuals, but of the whole nation as such. Of course, this national penitence has its root in that of individual men, but it does not rest there. As Israel had only one legal sanctuary — the Temple, — all public religious ceremonies must take place there, and through the ministry of the one priesthood. The public fast-day demanded by the Prophet is a Biblical precedent for the observance of similar days in Christian times and lands. They are as proper under the New Economy as they were under the Old. In this penitential prayer, there is not only an appeal to God's mercy, but a declaration that his honor is concerned in the continued existence of Israel as his people. To abandon Israel wholly would give occasion to the heathen to blaspheme, as if God had been unable to save his people, or had forgotten his promises to do so. This relation, and these promises were not designed, nor did they really tend to beget a sinful security, but to keep alive in the hearts of God's people an humble faith and hope. Israel bows under God's hand, but at the same time trusts Him as his God. This relation of ancient Israel is repeated, but in a far higher form and degree in the sonship of God's people under the New Covenant.

Repentance is necessary. It alone can help, yet the punitive justice of God has also its influence for good. For while it is certain that the righteous Lord will punish sin, his grace, and pity, and patience are no less certain. And so if there be no defect in the repentance of the sinner, forgiveness will not be wanting on the part of God. This truth is most emphatically expressed in ver. 18, where a rich promise immediately follows a severe menace. Yet the observation of Reiger is a very just one, namely, that the true penitent must and will leave wholly in God's hand the mitigation of the temporal punishment which he may have brought upon himself on account of his sins.

HOMILETICAL.

Ver. 1. Blow the trumpet. It is the office of a minister of God's Word, when great calamities are imminent, to sound an alarm, and call men to repentance. The day of the Lord, etc. All the remarkable judgments with which God visits individuals, or a land, are harbingers of the final judgment of the world, and whatever there is of the terrible in the former, will be found in the latter, in a far higher degree, by godless sinners. How stupid the security of those who, in the face of such events, with ruin impending over their heads, are not disturbed even for a moment. The day of the Lord cometh. (1) Nothing is more certain than the fact of its coming. (2) But nothing is more uncertain than the time of its coming. The call to prepare for it should be continually sounding. It does not come so quickly, perhaps, as we in our impatience often wish, but it will come more quickly than the secure imagine. Its delay is not designed to beget wantonness in men, but only shows—as we should gratefully own—the long suffering of the Lord, who desires not that any should perish; God warns men often, and for a long time, but at last the decision will come. We should not be hasty in predicting when the day of the Lord will come, but we should be reminded of it in all the visitations of his providence, and we should try to put ourselves in the light of that day. As the special divine judgments will find their completest accomplishment in that last great day of wrath, they are so described as to fill men's minds with a wholesome terror, and to convince them how utterly unable they shall be to endure it.

[PUSEY: Ver. 1. The trumpet was wont to sound in Zion only for religious uses: to call together the congregations for holy meetings, to usher in the beginnings of their months, and their solemn days with festival gladness. Now, in Zion itself, the stronghold of the kingdom, the holy city, the place which God chose to put his Name there, which He had promised to establish, the trumpet was to be used only for sounds of alarm and fear. Alarm could not penetrate there, without having pervaded the whole land. Good is the trouble which shaketh carnal peace, vain security, and the rest of bodily delight, when men, weighing their sins, are shaken with fear and trembling, and repent.—F.]

Ver. 2. A day of darkness. A day of judgment is a manifestation of God's wrath against sin, after the measure of his grace which seeks to save and bless them has been exhausted. Hence darkness is its proper symbol.

[HENRY: Extraordinary judgments are rare things and seldom happen, which is an instance of God's patience. Let none be proud of the beauty of their grounds any more than of their bodies, for God can soon change the face of both.—F.]

Ver. 6. The people tremble. An ever-growing dread will accompany and enhance the terrors of approaching judgment. Men in their wanton security are all the while preparing the material of such fear.

[HENRY: When God frowns upon men, the lights of heaven will be small joy to them. For, man by rebelling against his Creator, has forfeited the benefit of all his creatures. None can escape the arrests of God's wrath, can make head against the force of it, or bear up under the weight of it.

PUSEY: The judgments of God hold on their course, each going straight to that person for whom God, in the awful wisdom of his justice, ordains it. No one judgment or chastisement comes by chance. Each is directed and adapted, weighed and measured, by infinite wisdom, and reaches just that soul for which God appointed it, and no other, and strikes upon it with just that force which God ordains it.—F.]

Ver. 11. Very great is his army. God can use any creature as his instrument to do his work. How many and mighty the hosts which He can send against men! The smallest things can become his agents to produce the greatest results. The mightiness of God, and the weakness of men, are here most distinctly displayed. Who can endure? No one who does not turn in penitence to God. This is a most momentous question, which we should often and seriously ponder. O what a creature is man! How proud when trouble is at a distance! How powerless and despairing when it overtakes him!

Ver. 12. Yet also even now, etc. These words introduce the exhortation to repentance, to guard the people against the notion, that, when the prophet called on them to repent, and assured them that they would escape punishment if they did so, he was speaking in a sort of formal way, and in his own name. Both the exhortation and the promise come from God. When repentance enters, then comes help and hope. Repentance alone can ward off divine judgments. It is not enough that repentance be strong in its outward manifestations, as fasting and weeping, it must also be deep-seated, hearty, and not superficial.

Turn unto the Lord. A call that is both needful and salutary, though, alas, too often unheeded. Grief for sin is only the half of repentance, it must be accompanied by a real turning to God. Only thus, O man, shalt thou obtain pardon; only thus will there be an actual turning away from sin. Sinner! despair not on account of thy misdeeds. Is God's wrath against sin very great? His grace in pardoning it is greater still. So rich is the grace of God that the prophet is at a loss for words adequately to describe it. How ready God is to repent Him of the evil! Make a trial of his readiness and see. He who does not seek God's grace as a penitent will never know how great it is. How much more willing is God to leave behind Him a blessing rather than a curse. No one would ever truly repent unless grace planted in the heart the seeds of faith and hope. Though a gracious hope grows slowly, yet the wavering heart will often be, in a secret way, sustained by it, and such a soul will better apprehend it than one filled with overmuch confidence.

[JEREMY TAYLOR: Although all sorrow for sins hath not the same expression, nor the same degree of pungency and sensitive trouble, yet it is not a godly sorrow, unless it really produces these effects; i. e. (1), that it makes us really to hate, and (2) actually to decline sin; and (3) produces in us a fear of God's anger, a sense of the guilt of his displeasure; (4) and then such consequent trouble as can consist with such apprehension of the Divine displeasure; which, if it express not in tears and hearty complaints, must be expressed in watchings and strivings against sin; in patiently bearing the rod of God; in confession of our sins; in perpetual begging of pardon; and in all the natural productions of these according to our temper and constitution; it must be a sorrow of the reasonable faculty, the greatest of its kind.

PUSEY: Although the mercy of God is in itself one and simple, yet is called abundant, on account of its divers effects. For God knows how in a thousand ways to succor his own. — F.]

Ver. 14. A meat-offering, etc. God's glory and our salvation are so intimately conjoined, that the pardon of the guilty is facilitated thereby, since the salvation of the sinner redounds to the glory of God.

[HENRY: Now observe: (1) The manner of the expectation is very humble and modest. Who knows? Some think it is expressed thus doubtfully to check the presumption of the people, and to quicken them to a holy carefulness. Or, rather, it is expressed doubtfully, because it is the removal of a temporal judgment that they here promise themselves, of which we cannot be so confident, as that God is gracious. (2) The matter of the expectation is very pious, they hope God will return and leave a blessing behind Him, not as if He were about to go from them, and they could be content with any blessing in lieu of his presence, but behind Him, i. e., after He has ceased his controversy.

PUSEY: God has promised forgiveness of sins to those who turn to Him. But He has not promised, either to individuals or churches, that He will remit the temporal punishment which He had threatened. He forgave David his sin (against Uriah). But the temporal punishment of his sin pursued him even on the bed of death. God often visits the penitent soul, and by some sweetness with which the soul is bathed leaves a token of his renewed presence. — F.]

Ver. 15, 16. Sanctify a fast — Gather the people. Fasting is a refined external discipline, promotive of prayer and piety. Only we must take care not to make a merit of it. — The people. By penitence and prayer, an entire community may be saved from a great calamity. — Children. Parents should be aroused to a deeper sorrow for their sins by the thought of their young children, who are also members of God's Church, and included in his covenant. As little children share in the calamities caused by the sins of their parents, their common distress should be presented before the Lord, and deliverance from it asked. — The Bride. In seasons of general distress and danger, we should abstain from the most innocent enjoyment.

[HENRY: It is good to bring little children, as soon as they are capable of understanding anything, to religious assemblies, that they may be trained up betimes in the way they should go. — Private joys must always give way to public sorrows, both those for affliction, and those for sin.

ROBINSON: It is very consolatory to observe, even in the midst of this terrific visitation — the last harbinger of the Saviour's coming — an invitation of mercy. If men will then but seek the Lord with their whole heart, in deep humiliation, and turn away from their sins, He will be inquired of. At the eleventh hour, when the time for work is all but gone, they may find admission into his vineyard. Happy is it when outward afflictions of any kind lead us to true repentance. — F.]

Ver. 17. Let the Priests. The special duty of the priesthood was to exhort the people to repentance, to stand between them and the Lord and pray for them, and hence it is the duty of every Christian, as a spiritual priest, to stir up his fellow Christians to repentance, and to pray for them. — Spare Thy People, — a petition full of humility and confidence, i. e., "look upon our needs, but remember also thy glory, O Lord!" What we need is God's mercy. We can appeal to what his grace has made of us. There is the strongest antithesis between God's people and the heathen, just as there is between God and idols. — Where is their God. God will never abandon his people, — a truth full of comfort to them, though it affords no ground for carnal security. On the contrary, it is fitted to stimulate us to be faithful to Him, as He is faithful to us.

[HENRY: Ministers must themselves be affected with those things wherewith they desire to affect others. — The maintaining of the credit of the nation among its neighbors, is a blessing to be desired and prayed for, by all that wish well to it. But that reproach of the Church is especially to be dreaded and deprecated which reflects upon God. — F.]

PART SECOND.

THE PROMISE.

CHAPTERS II. 18-III. 21.

SECTION I.

Annihilation of the Locust Army. Reparation of the Damage done by it, by a Rich Blessing.

CHAPTER II. 18-27.

18 Then Jehovah will be jealous¹ for his land.
And will pity his people.

- 19 And Jehovah will answer and say unto his people, Behold I will send² you the corn,³
The new wine, and the oil;
And ye shall be satisfied⁴ therewith,
And I will no longer make you
A reproach among the heathen.
- 20 And I will remove far from you the northern⁵ host,
And will drive him into a dry and desolate land;
His face (or his van) toward the east sea,
His rear towards the west sea.
And his stench shall arise,
And his ill savor shall ascend,
For He has done great things.⁶
- 21 Fear not, O Land,
Be glad and rejoice,
For Jehovah hath done great things.
- 22 Fear not, ye beasts of the field!⁷
For the pastures of the wilderness have sprung up,
The tree beareth her fruit,
The fig tree and the vine yield their strength.⁸
- 23 O ye children of Zion rejoice and be glad
In Jehovah your God;
For He gives you the former rain⁹ in just measure,
And sends you, in showers, the early and the latter rain, as aforetime.¹⁰
- 24 And the threshing floors shall be full of corn,
And the vats shall overflow with wine and oil.
- 25 And I will restore¹¹ (or replace) the years¹²
Which the locust, the cankerworm, the caterpillar and the palmerworm have devoured,
My great army which I sent against you.
- 26 Then ye shall eat in plenty¹³ and be satisfied,
And shall praise the name of Jehovah your God,
Who hath dealt wondrously with you.
And my people shall never be ashamed.
- 27 And¹⁴ ye shall know that I am in the midst of Israel,
And I Jehovah am your God, and none else.
And my people shall never be ashamed.

CRITICAL AND TEXTUAL.

- 1 Ver. 18. — קָנָא with ל or ב = to be jealous for some one out of love.
- 2 Ver. 19. — שְׁלַח, more lit., "am sending."
- 3 Ver. 19. — הַדְּבָנִים: the article is used to give prominence to the products which the Lord promises to send.
- 4 Ver. 19. — שִׂבְעָתָם אֲרֵי. The sing. אֲרֵי is here used collectively.
- 5 Ver. 20. — "Northern." Schmoller insists that דִּמְצֹפֹנִי should be rendered "destroyer." See Exeg. note on this ver.
- 6 Ver. 20. — הִקְדִּיל לַעֲשׂוֹת, lit., "he has magnified to do." Schmoller renders it: "er hat grossgethan." The same phrase occurs in ver. 21, which shows that it cannot be taken in the sense of boasting. It is synonymous with מָהֵלָא לַעֲשׂוֹת (Judg. xiii. 19), and עָשָׂה לְהִפְלִיא, II. 26.
- 7 Ver. 22. — "Field." שָׂדֵי is not the plur. for שָׂדֵי but the sing. — שָׂדֵה, according to the analogy of שָׂדֵה, Ps. xvi. 12.

8 Ver. 22. — יָתֵן כֹּחַ, "give strength," like the Lat. edere fructum. The metaphor is one in which the cause is put for the effect. Only used here and in Ps. i. 4.

9 Ver. 23. — מִזְרֵהוּ, "the early rain," from יָרַד, fecit, perhaps because its season was post jactam sementem. Kell renders it "a teacher for righteousness." But the word when so used is followed by בְּ, more rarely by לְ, or בָּן. Ewald and Umbreit take מִזְרֵהוּ in the sense of "early rain," but render the phrase "rain for righteousness," i. e., as a sign of their being again received into the divine righteousness. But this is a strained sense; better, "according to right," i. e., in just measure, as the ground requires.

10 Ver. 23. — "Aforetime." יָרַד מִזְרֵהוּ. There seems to be an omission of בְּ. The Sept. render it καθὼς ἔμπροσθεν; the Syr., ut antea; the Vulg., sicut in principio. The Chald. and Arab. have the reading "as in the month Nisan."

11 Ver. 25. — The primary meaning of יִשְׁלַח is "to be whole," but it is here used in the sense of "replace, or make good."

12 Ver. 25. — "Years," שָׁנִים the plur. form used, perhaps, only in a poetic sense, as in Gen. xxi. 7; Ps. xiv. 9, 10; 1 Sam. xvii. 43.

13 Ver. 26. — "Eat in plenty," lit., "eat an eating, or eat to eat," etc. Wünsche renders it: "Und ihr werdet essen, eum und sat werden." The Heb. often has the infin. absol. as the object complement of the finite verb, which sometimes follows and sometimes precedes it.

14 Ver. 27. — The וְ here indicates the logical consequence from what precedes.

EXEGETICAL.

The second part of this chapter is wholly occupied with promises to Judah. The first part, which is so full of menaces, had also revealed God's mercy in case of repentance, but only in a general way, affording only a glimmering of hope. Now, however, the promises given by Jehovah Himself flow forth like a full, broad stream. This transition occurs suddenly in ver. 18. The promise, which takes the form of an answer of God, is grounded upon a seeming change in the Divine purpose. A declaration so positive as this, introduced by the imper. consec., as an actual fact, of course implies that the condition on which the change in the Divine purpose was based, had been fulfilled, i. e., that the day of fasting and prayer had been duly observed, and that the promise is God's answer to his people's penitential prayer. Our book, therefore, is in point of time divided into two parts, an earlier and a later one.

Ver. 18. Then will the Lord, etc. יְהוָה with לְ = to be jealous for some one, i. e., to be zealous for his welfare out of love for him.

Vers. 19, 20. Renewed fertility is promised by the removal of the cause of the desolation. Behold I send you. This carries us back to ch. i. 10, 11. וְשָׁלַח; because the growth of grain depends upon the fertilizing rain.

Ver. 20. יְהוָה צְבָאוֹת, not the northern of the E. V. and other versions, for the locusts never invade Palestine from the North, but the destroyer. The word comes from צָבָא, the name of the well-known Egyptian god Typhon, from whence also comes the δ τυφονιδης (Acts xxvii. 14). [This is a fanciful and groundless rendering. The word occurs in one hundred and fifty other places in O. T., and in all of them its sense is clearly that given to it here by our E. V. The term יְהוָה צְבָאוֹת, says Wünsche, according to the Masor. punctuation, can have no other sense than that of "northern," or "northerner." The allegorists use the word as a proof of their theory, that the Chaldeans, or Syrians are meant. But there is not, either in what precedes or in what follows, the slightest trace of a hostile invasion of Judah by either of these nations. The word, therefore, must refer to the locusts. Nor is the designation of them as "northern" an arbitrary one, since their movements were wholly dependent on the wind. — F.] Into a land dry and desolate, one in which this army will find nothing to destroy, but will itself perish. The land referred to is the desert of Arabia, on the southern border of Judæa. The two ways in which the locusts would be destroyed are mentioned: they would be driven into the desert, and into the sea. Two seas are named, in which this army should perish, namely, the vanguard in the east or Dead Sea, the rear in the west or Mediterranean. We need not, however, suppose that the destruction of these two divisions of the locust army occurred at the same time.

[His stench. Jerome says of the locusts of Palestine, when the shores of both seas were filled with heaps of dead locusts which the waters had cast up, their stench and putrefaction were so noxious as to corrupt the air, so that a pestilence was produced among men and beasts. The same fact is attested by many modern travellers. — F.]

Vers. 21-23. Fear not, O Land. As in ch. i. the land and its inhabitants were called upon to mourn in view of coming judgments, so now they are called upon to rejoice over the destruction of the hosts that had laid waste the country. Here, the address is that of the prophet; while in ver. 25 the Lord himself speaks. The subject and object of the joy are stated (ver. 21) in a general way. The latter is described in the words: יְהוָה הָעָשָׂה גְּדוֹלָה. The perfect tense is here used like the German present, to denote an action, which being absolutely certain is thought of and presented as one already accomplished. What is here said of God's doings is not to be limited to that special time or occasion, but expresses a universal truth.

Ver. 22. Even the beasts of the field should no longer be afraid of wanting their supplies of food. The picture of blessing which begins with verdant pastures, ends with trees laden with fruit.

Ver. 23. Men are called upon to rejoice. Children of Zion may be taken in a general sense for the inhabitants of Judah, since Zion represented Judah. The former or early rain. It fell after autumn, and seems to be so called from יָרַד, fecit, because its season was post jactam sementem. It was the chief need after the devastation and drought, and hence is named with special emphasis. The latter rain fell about harvest, towards the end of April. Hence its name from קָלַט, collegit, יָרַד קָלַט corresponds to the יָרַד מִזְרֵהוּ (iii. 1);

the material blessings first, then the spiritual. [Pusey: It may be, at the first, i. e., as soon as ever it is needed, or in contrast to the more extensive gifts afterwards; or, as at the first, i. e., all shall, upon their penitence, be restored as at the first. These lesser variations leave the sense of the whole the same, and all are supported by good authorities. It is still a reversal of the former sentence, that, whereas before the rivers of water were dried up, now the rains should come, each in his season. — F.] “The rain shall come down,” here specially opposed to the drought, but, perhaps also a symbol of blessing in general. [So far as this special act may be generalized, it may rather be said that it begets and keeps alive the consciousness that the Giver of all good is again in the midst of his people. — F.]

Vers. 24–27. And the threshing floors, — my people shall never be ashamed.

The effects of the rain are first briefly, and then more fully described. The years, i. e., the product of the years which the locusts had devoured. The plural form of the word does not imply that the visitations of the locusts described in ch. i. were in successive years; it only means that the results of a single visitation would be felt for several years, and that as long a time would be required to repair the mischief done by the locusts. The names of the four kinds of locusts given in ch. i. are repeated here, only that the generic name לִּפְתָּלִים holds a prominent place.

Vers. 26, 27. A beautiful conclusion; it treats of the redemption of Israel from the heathen, and thereby of the vindication of God himself. This is the fundamental idea that repeatedly recurs. This conclusion forms the point of transition to the new and higher promises in ch. iii., which fully display the truth that “Jehovah is in the midst of Israel, that He is their God and none else,” and therefore that his people can never be put to shame. While this promise is in a negative form, it really includes much more than the literal sense of the words; it means that God’s people shall not only not be ashamed, but that they shall be glorified forever, and that all the powers of this world that have opposed them shall be utterly confounded.

THEOLOGICAL.

The greatness of the promise shows the power and importance of repentance, and the magnitude of God’s grace. It is a confirmation of what is said (ii. 12). The punishment God inflicts is converted into a blessing; his zeal against us is changed into zeal for us. God’s dispensing blessing is the proof that He is in the midst of Israel; that Jehovah and none else is their God. Jehovah is in the midst of Israel, the centre and source of spiritual life. It is solely through Him, that Israel is what he is. The proof that God dwells with Israel is his blessing him; for the very object of his communion with Israel, and the choice of him to be his people, is to bless him. In dispensing blessings, God manifests his name, his power, his bounty, and distinguishes Himself from all false gods, who being dead cannot do that; while Israel being thus blessed is distinguished from the heathen, standing far above them who have no such God. Hence, too, the punishments inflicted upon Israel are in strong contrast with those which overtake the heathen. If Israel is unfaithful so that his God disowns him, it is quite natural that if he repents, he should regain the blessing; the honor of God and of his people require this. Upon this fact, repentant Israel grounds his prayer for pardon, and the promise given corresponds to the prayer. When God sends blessings to his people, whom his judgments have brought to repentance, the right way is, to rejoice in and enjoy them, with humble gratitude indeed, but at the same time with the confession that they come wholly from Him. Then, the humiliation endured will have produced its proper fruits.

HOMILETICAL.

Ver. 18. And Jehovah was jealous for his people. Penitential and believing prayer secures a gracious answer; sometimes in the way of warding off the temporal evils with which God visits men. Before we call, God will answer, and while we are speaking, He will hear.

[HAWK: God will have an eye (1.) To his own honor, and the reputation of his covenant with Israel, by which He had conveyed to them that good land; now He will not suffer it to be despised or disparaged, but will be jealous for the land and its inhabitants, who had been praised as a happy people, and therefore must not lie open to reproach as a miserable people. (2.) To their distresses. He will pity his people, and will restore them their former comforts.

PUSEY: Before, God seemed set upon their destruction. It was his great army which was ready to destroy them; He was at their head giving the word. Now, He is full of tender love for them, which resents injuries done to them, as done to Himself. — F.]

Ver. 19. I will send — corn. It is God who averts the failure of crops, and scarcity of food. These evils neither come nor cease by accident. God gives us our daily bread. He opens his hand, and we are satisfied with food.

Ver. 20. I will remove the northern. When God has alarmed his people and brought them to repentance, He often pours out his wrath upon those who were his instruments in the infliction of chastisement.

Ver. 21. Fear not. How kindly God can speak to the heart! How powerfully can He console! It is easy for Him to do great things.

[PUSEY: Before, they were bidden to tremble; now they are bidden fear not. The enemy had done great things; now, the cause of joy is, that God had done great things; the almightiness of God overwhelming and sweeping over the might put forth to destroy. — F.]

Ver. 23. Rejoice in the Lord. Joy in God is the right kind of joy. From Him comes every blessing. Yet how often do we receive joyfully enough the gift, without rejoicing in the Giver! Certainly he who does not know God, cannot rejoice in Him.

[SCOTT: The sons of Zion can never have so great a cause to fear, but they must still have a greater to “rejoice in the Lord.” He gives us all our comforts, and enables us to use them with thankful hearts. The wisdom, truth, and love of his dispensations toward us deserve our highest admiration; and He will never leave his people to be ashamed of their confidence in Him. — F.]

Ver. 25. I will restore. How great is the bounty of God! It seems as if He were anxious to repair some injury which his preceding judgments had caused.

Ver. 26. Ye shall be satisfied. What a blessed result of humiliation when our being satisfied and praising the Lord become and remain so united in us, that we can never again misuse God's gifts to feed vain conceit, luxury, tyranny, but shall maintain unmoved fear, love, and trust in God.

[PUSBY: It is of the punishment of God when men eat and are not satisfied; it is man's sin that they are satisfied and do not praise God, but the more forget Him. And so God's blessings become a curse to him. God promises to restore his gifts, and to give grace withal, that they should own and thank Him. — F.]

Ver. 27. I am in the midst of Israel. Blessed is the people in the midst of whom the Lord dwells.

Every fresh blessing should be a proof to us that God is in the midst of us. But we must be God's people, if we would hope to have Him dwelling in the midst of us. He is only in the midst of Israel. God's people can never be put to shame; therefore let us see that we belong to them.

[HENRY: We should labor to grow in our acquaintance with God by all providences, both merciful and afflictive. When God gives to his people plenty and peace, He thereby gives them to understand that He is pleased with their repentance, that He has pardoned their sins. — F.]

SECTION II.

Hereafter, on "the Day of the Lord," the Enemies of Israel shall be destroyed, while the Lord reigns in Zion guarding and blessing it.

CHAPTER II. 28-32.

[In the Hebrew text and in Schmoller, these verses form Chap. III., while Chap. III. of E. V. is numbered Chap. IV. We prefer to keep the order of the E. V. — F.]

The promise, which up to this point has reference to the present and the near future, now takes a higher and wider range. It brings into view the day of the Lord, the result of the coming of which shall be, on the one hand, the overthrow of the world-power, and on the other, the full blessedness of God's people, through his dwelling in the midst of them. Ch. ii. 28-32 may be regarded as the introduction to the closing chapter, which describes the fulfillment of the promise. The grand events, which are the harbingers of the coming of the day of the Lord, are described. Zion is pointed out as the only place of safety; but even amid the terrors of that day, God's people will have no reason to fear. The third chapter describes the judgments to be inflicted upon the enemies of God's people, while the latter shall receive the richest blessings from the Lord, who sits enthroned on Zion.

- 28 And it shall come to pass afterward,¹
That I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh,
And your sons and daughters shall prophesy;
Your old men shall dream dreams,
Your young men shall see visions;
- 29 Even ² upon the men servants and the maid servants,
In those days, will I pour out my spirit.
- 30 And I will give signs ³ in heaven and on earth,
Blood, and fire, and columns of smoke;
- 31 The sun shall be turned into darkness,
And the moon into blood,
Before the great and terrible day of the Lord come.
- 32 And it shall come to pass that whosoever calleth on the name of the Lord shall be saved.
For on Mount Zion and in Jerusalem shall be deliverance,
As Jehovah hath said;
Even among the remnant ⁴ whom Jehovah shall call.

CRITICAL AND TEXTUAL.

¹ Ver. 28. — "Afterward." אַחֲרָיוֹ is clearly identical with the formula used by the later prophets. אַחֲרָיוֹ, "the last days."

² Ver. 29. — "Even." The "also" of E. V. hardly expresses the emphasis of אֲפִילוֹ.

³ Ver. 30. — "Signs." מֹפְתִים denotes not "signs," but rather prodigies, miraculous signs of coming events.

⁴ Ver. 32. — "Remnant." פְּלִיטָה properly means "deliverance, escape." Here the abst. is used for the cons. Schmoller and Wütsche render "the escaped."

EXEGETICAL.

Ver. 28. And it shall come to pass, etc. What is here said of a general outpouring of the Spirit, while connected with the foregoing promise, holds out to Israel the prospect of a grander dispensation of divine grace and of richer blessings than those promised in the preceding chapter. God will manifest Himself in such a manner as He has never done before. But this outpouring of the Spirit is viewed by the prophet as connected with the great day of the Lord, and as a sign of its coming. But he thus views it only because he sees in that day, a day of judgment on Israel's enemies, and a day of salvation to Israel, through God's dwelling in Zion. If vers. 28, 29 be considered as containing a new promise, ver. 30 would begin a new subject, which would be contrary to the tenor of the prophet's discourse, as it is evident that these verses are closely connected.

Ver. 28. Afterward, i. e., after what had been before announced in ver. 23; it is more indefinite than the last days, although, in general, the meaning is the same. Joel apparently imagines that the events which he here describes, will happen in no very distant future. וַיִּשַׁק, to pour, primarily refers to rain, or a heavy shower of rain; it here denotes the communicating of something from above, and in great abundance. This last idea is illustrated in the extent of the gift, — to "all flesh," and the nature of the gift, — the spirit of prophecy in various forms. וְכָל בְּשָׂר׃. In contrast with God, to whom the וְכָל בְּשָׂר׃ belongs, car.

εξ., man appears as וְכָל בְּשָׂר׃ "flesh." This term designates man not simply as a being in want of this "Spirit," but also as one naturally fitted to receive it, just as the dry ground is fitted to receive the rain. — All flesh. How is this general expression to be understood? It is clear from what follows that there is no limitation of sex, age, or condition, and that not merely particular individuals, but that all are to share in this divine gift, — a fulfillment of the wish of Moses (Num. xi. 29). The connection and the train of thought require us to extend the "all" to mankind generally. — Shall prophesy. This is explained by "prophesying," "dreaming dreams," "seeing visions." In this enumeration the most important thing comes first, i. e., the proper prophetic function or power. נִבְּאִים means, not simply to predict future events, but generally to announce the revelations of God. The whole people will be the vehicle through which these highest spiritual utterances will be made, and as all barriers will be then broken down, woman is named by the side of man. To this prophesying are conjoined, in a sort of secondary way, other modes of divine manifestation, "dreams," "visions." As there is to be no difference of sex, so there is to be none of age, in regard to the sharing of this spirit. Even those who would seem to be unfitted for it shall receive it — "old men and children." Why, it may be asked, shall "old men dream dreams?" Because they are better fitted for "dreams," just as young men, or children are for "visions," though the reverse of this would seem to be more natural. But the condition of things predicted by the prophet would be every way extraordinary. — And the servants. This is added as something very singular, וְעַבְדֵּי "and even." Nay, something unheard of shall then happen, namely, that slaves as well as freemen shall partake of this Spirit. In other words, this social distinction shall then be abolished. The Jewish interpreters could scarcely comprehend how this could be, and hence the Sept. make the servants and hand-maidens, "God's," ἐνὶ τοῖς δούλοις καὶ τὰς δούλᾳς μου; so too Acts ii. 16.

Ver. 30. I will show wonders. What shall be the form of these phenomena of nature? It is idle to try to answer the question. They are evidently such as had never before been seen, though they may somewhat resemble the plagues of Egypt. There will be "blood" and "fire," and "pillars of smoke." The color of blood appears in the moon; both sun and moon are obscured; and there are signs of a hiding of the face of God who rules in heaven, and consequently of his anger. These signs will be of a nature to awaken terror, and all the more, as the day approaches, for it would seem from vers. 28, 29, 30, that there will be hardly an interval between the sign and the day. Its menacing aspect becomes so much the more prominent inasmuch as God will then manifest Himself, not merely in a general way, but as bringing on a special crisis. The obscuration of the stars is often mentioned in connection with the day of judgment (Ezek. xxxii. 7; Am. viii. 9; Matt. xxiv. 29; Mark xiii. 24; Luke xxi. 25). Before the day of the Lord come. Hence these appearances are signs of the coming of this day. Its actual coming and its importance are set forth in ch. iii.; here it is described only in a general way. Ver. 32 goes on to state that for Zion it will bring neither judgment nor destruction. Here its tempest will cease. But there is, at the same time, an implied exhortation to comply with the condition of safety.

Ver. 32. And it shall come to pass, — whom the Lord shall call. To call on the name of Jehovah is to confess Him, to worship Him who has revealed, and is revealing Himself to Israel. Whoever, וְכָל with a special emphasis, to teach that the day of the Lord will not bring destruction to all, though it may have that look. There will be complete deliverance to those who call on the name of the Lord, and to none else. The reason is given, because in Mt. Zion is "deliverance." As Jehovah had said. This seems to point to some positive prophetic promise. This divine promise of safety to all who call on the name of the Lord, based on the promise concerning Zion and Jerusalem, shows how closely related were these two places. They are set forth as the place where the Lord dwelt in his sanctuary with his people, and where his name is known. The calling on the Lord is wholly confined to Zion and Jerusalem, though it would be of no avail to any one to be in Zion unless he called on the Lord. Deliverance. Many take this term in a concrete and collective sense, i. e., "the delivered," but the other is the more natural interpretation. The remnant, or "the escaped;" there shall be among them those whom the Lord calls. וְיִשְׁלֹחַ is one who has escaped from the field of battle, or one who has been saved from the fate of most others, and so implying that the number is small. This "remnant" is evidently to be added as a new class to those before mentioned as delivered by calling on the name of the Lord, the idea being that they had been overtaken by the calamity, and though delivered, their escape had been a very narrow one, and hence noticed as the result of the Lord's special and merciful call. Who are they? Not those already in Zion and Jerusalem; but those who were called to come there, i. e., not to these localities merely, but to communion with the God who calls and who is enthroned in Zion. This manifestly means that some of those who would be properly liable to the judgment, would escape it and share in the salvation promised to Zion. Who are they? Not the inhabitants of Judah living outside the walls of Jerusalem; — a sense of the words entirely too limited and local. Besides, Zion and Jerusalem must be taken as including all the inhabitants of Judah wherever resident. It may, perhaps, be inferred from ch. iii. that they are the Israelites scattered among the nations, whom the Lord promises (iii. 16) to bring again. Yet they can scarcely be described as the "remnant," or the "escaped," since their deliverance is the very object of the judgment which falls upon the heathen world. Why not understand by the "remnant," the heathen? They are both far off, and liable to the judgment. It would still be true that while the heathen world in general will be the object of the judgment in the day of the Lord, some of them will escape through the mercy of Jehovah. This is certainly only a faint indication of the calling of the Gentiles. This last fact is not distinctly announced, the heathen as such not having been as yet named. There is a close resemblance between ver. 32 and Ob. 17, so that if the latter was the earlier prophet, we might suppose that his words had been modified by Joel. Obadiah says, "there shall not be any remaining of the house of Esau," in the day of the Lord. Joel also says, that this day shall be one of judgment to all outside of Zion, for all the heathen. But he does not mean that none of them shall escape, for he admits it to be possible that Jehovah might call some of them. Joel thus takes a step in advance of Obadiah, and indicates, though it may be obscurely, the work that should be done by later prophets.

[Pusey: Ver. 28. All flesh is the name for all mankind. The words all flesh are in the Pentateuch, and in one place in Daniel, used in a yet wider sense, of everything which has life; but, in no one case, in any narrower sense. It does not include every individual in the race, but it includes the whole race, and individuals throughout it, in every nation, sex, or condition, Jew or Gentile, Greek or Barbarian, i. e., educated or uneducated, rich or poor, bond or free, male or female. On all was to be poured the Holy Spirit. — Ver. 29. St. Peter, in declaring that these words began to be fulfilled in the day of Pentecost, quotes them with two lesser differences: "I will pour out of my Spirit" and upon My servants and My hand-maidens." The words declare something in addition, but do not alter the meaning, and so St. Peter quotes them as they lay in the Greek, which, probably, was the language known by most of the mixed multitude to whom he spake. The words "My Spirit," express the largeness and fullness of the gift. The words "of my Spirit," express, in part, that He who is infinite cannot be contained by us who are finite. The words "the servants," mark the outward condition. The words "my servants," declare that there should be no difference between bond and free.

Ver. 32. Call upon the name of the Lord. To call on the name of the Lord is to worship Him as He is, depending upon Him. The name of the Lord expresses his true Being, that which He is. For the name rendered, The Lord, expresses that He is, and that He alone is, the self-same the unchangeable; the name rendered God is not the special name of God. — F.]

[Wünsche: Ver. 28. My Spirit. The Spirit of God is the divine analogue of the spirit of man. It is the true life principle of men; the source of physical life in the world of nature, of spiritual life in the sphere of religion, of all goodness, truth, rectitude, and beauty. Whatever the human mind thinks, feels, wills, fashions, in regard to any one of these objects is, in one sense, an outflow of the Divine Spirit. The prayer that ascends to heaven from a devout heart, the self consecration, the holy enthusiasm which distinguished the prophets, and fitted them to proclaim to the people God's judgment and his mercy, — all these are expressions and gifts of the Divine Spirit. All flesh. The word is used in Heb. to denote the totality of living being on earth, beasts and men (Gen. vi. 13; vii. 15, etc.); and then in a more limited sense, for the human race. The connection shows that, here, it is taken in the latter sense. Credner, however, gives it the wider meaning so as to include the irrational animals, and refers in confirmation of his view to the prediction of Isaiah xi. 6-9, concerning the "wolf and the lamb, the leopard and the kid," etc. But this friendly union of wild and tame animals is not represented by the prophet as the result of men's enlarged knowledge of God. Man alone is the image of God; he alone is a fit organ of the Divine Spirit; he alone has the capacity to receive the gift here described, which, therefore, cannot be extended to the lower forms of animal life.

Ver. 32. As Jehovah hath said. There is no reference here to a lost prophecy (Meier); nor to an older writing of Joel (Ewald); nor to Obadiah (Keil). The meaning simply is that Joel, the person speaking, had a divine revelation of the fact, that where God's throne is, there his true worshippers shall also be. Shall call. The word has a pregnant sense, conveying the idea that the "deliverance" depends not on the worshippers of God alone, but also upon God himself. Only those whom the Lord calls or chooses, and who call upon or choose Him shall be saved. Most of the older and later expositors take "call" in a predestinative sense. The Chald. has quos dominus destinat. — F.]

THEOLOGICAL.

1. From the very first the prophets point to a great decisive Hereafter. In their being able to do this lay their strength. Living in the present, their eyes were ever turned to the future, or rather the end, the consummation of all things. Hence the power of their exhortations and promises to their contemporaries. Their influence would have been very frail and feeble, if they had not had a firm faith in a future, when the salvation of God should be fully realized.

2. Outpouring of the Spirit of God upon all flesh. It is evident from the context that the prophet himself did not suppose that this "outpouring" would extend beyond the people of Israel. This was its field (ver. 27). Here God will reveal Himself; here in the day of the Lord the judgment will take place, here all nations shall be gathered. The whole of ch. iii. shows that the prophet considered the heathen world as the enemy of God's people. He does not put the heathen on the same footing with Israel, but on the contrary he directs attention exclusively to the high position of Israel as God's people. It presupposes the conversion of the heathen, and their reception among God's people. As he nowhere predicts such a conversion, his promise of an outpouring of the Spirit upon all flesh cannot here include the heathen; even if we refer the phrase "whom the Lord shall call," to a selection of the heathen, it is all the more evident that the "all flesh" cannot include them. For the calling of individual heathen could not have the same prominence that would belong to the outpouring of the Spirit on the whole heathen world. Joel might have assumed that some called out of the heathen world would partake of the blessing given to Israel. To Israel the promise was of something not only great but new, namely, the impartation of the Spirit to persons of all ages and conditions. Pouring out as a symbol of this impartation was never before used to denote the gift of the Spirit. Thus far only individuals in particular localities had received it. The gift was, indeed, a necessary result of the covenant relation in which Jehovah stood to Israel, but hitherto his Spirit had come only on individuals, fitting them to become divine messengers. Such a limitation, however, did not accord with the true idea of God's people, which implies that they should all be partakers of his Spirit. This should be fully realized in the future. Every barrier shall be broken down, and the reception of this Spirit shall be limited neither by age, sex, nor condition. It would come in the form of prophetic dreams and visions, giving those who received it a deeper insight into divine things, and make them organs of divine revelation.

This promise, as given by the prophet, is twofold. On the one hand, it will thus be seen that Jehovah is in the midst of Israel. On the other hand, this general outpouring of the Spirit will be a preparatory warning of the coming of the day of the Lord. That day will be one of immediate and decisive manifestation of God, and its approach will be heralded by new and startling events fitted to excite in the minds of men eager expectation, and to rouse them to seek salvation before it was too late. These warnings may consist of extraordinary phenomena in the world of nature, or of similar phenomena in the sphere of mind. From the spirituality of the religion of Jehovah we might expect that occurrences of the latter class would predominate. Perhaps we may go farther and say that the object of these remarkable events, of this prophesying, of these dreams and visions, is the day of the Lord itself. It is clear that by this general outpouring of the Spirit the way would be prepared for such a result of the day of the Lord as must redound to the glory of Israel. Since Jehovah thus recognizes Israel as his people, by making them all individually organs of his revelation, He must, while blessing them, resist and punish their enemies. This double aspect of the day of the Lord, as one of judgment, and of redemption, is here very distinctly declared. The deliverance of individuals will not come to them as a matter of course. If they escape the terrors of that day, and share in the salvation of God's people, it can only be by their complying with the conditions on which it is secured.

When shall this promise of a general outpouring of the Spirit be fulfilled? From the phrase "after this," the prophet seems to have regarded it as connected with the promise given in the earlier part of the chapter. But it does not follow that he looked upon it as near at hand. The prophets often connect promises relating to the present, very closely with those pertaining to the far distant future. In this respect Joel and the later prophets agree. The latter represent the gift of the Spirit in its fullness to the covenant people, as a prominent feature of the Messianic age, or of the New Covenant. Jer. xxxii. 15; lvi. 13; Ez. xxxvi. 26; Zech. xii. 10. Hence we should, perhaps, designate this prophecy as in a general way Messianic, though Joel does not speak directly of the Messiah, and we should look for its fulfillment after the advent of Messiah. Thus St. Peter (Acts ii. 17) saw its accomplishment in the miracle of Pentecost. He expressly refers the הוֹרִידָנוּ — ἐν ταῖς ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις, to the Messianic age. He distinctly recognizes the Messiah as the mediator through whom this rich and general bestowment of the Spirit should come. Like the prophet, he understood the "all flesh," to mean, in the first instance, the covenant people, though he declares that the promise extended also to those who were "afar off." Joel only intimates that the latter will escape, but does not say, in so many words, that the Spirit will be given to them. Peter evidently regarded — as Joel did — this outpouring of the Spirit as a sign of the Day of the Lord, i. e., in the New Testament sense of the term, as a day of Parousia, and so quotes vers. 28-32. As he saw one part of the prediction accomplished, he naturally looked for the fulfillment of the other. There can be no doubt that the Apostles, at least for a time, thought that the Παρουσία, or the Coming of the Lord, was nigh at hand, and such prophecies as the one before us, would tend to confirm them in that expectation. On the day of Pentecost, Peter saw the Spirit poured out, not indeed on "all flesh," even in the limited sense of all Israel, but he was sure that the promise of it embraced the whole covenant people, and so he opens to all the prospect of the gift, on condition of repentance.

But though the wonders of Pentecost were the first and literal fulfillment of this prophecy, they by no means exhausted its meaning. The only effect of the outpouring of the Spirit recognized by Joel, is the prophetic, and on this memorable day, it certainly appeared in an ecstatic form. But we need only to look into the Epistles of St. Paul to discover that the influence of the πνεῦμα ἁγίου which Christ gives is not exhausted by such results; on the contrary, the grandest effect of it is the regeneration of the whole man. This deeper, ethico-religious conception of the gift of the Spirit, founded on the declarations of the later prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, is certainly the New Testament one. Joel's idea of the close connection between the outpouring of the Spirit and "the day," is in one sense a mistaken one, since the "outpouring" came, but not the "day," yet in another view it is perfectly correct. The two are most nearly related. With Messiah have come the ἐσχάται ἡμέραι; and the gift of the Spirit is, and will continue to be, a sign of the Day of the Lord, a proof that God is in the midst of his people, and will give them the victory over all their enemies. — Finally, we must not overlook the limits of the field of the Spirit's operations as described by Hosea. He, indeed, considered Israel alone as God's people, and that on Israel alone would the Spirit be poured out. But as we know from the New Testament that Christ's disciples are not limited to Israel, neither are God's people, so we are sure that this outpouring of the Spirit is confined to them, i. e., to the spiritual Israel, to all who, by faith, are made one with Christ. All such partake of the Holy Ghost.

[In this somewhat prolix and verbose dissertation, the author confounds two quite distinct questions, namely, What is the real meaning of the prophecy — whom does it embrace, — and when and how will it be completely fulfilled? and How far did Joel comprehend the real purport of the prophetic promises, which he was inspired to utter? This last question it is impossible to answer, because Joel has left no explanation of his prediction. We have nothing but the prophecy itself. Therefore we have no means of determining whether he took the "all flesh," as meaning simply Israel, or in its wider sense. After all, the question is one of no practical importance. The grand inquiry is, What is the meaning of the prophecy? — F.]

WÜRSSEN: Credner is clearly wrong when he says that Peter made a false application of this prophecy. No man can deny that on the day of Pentecost, the prediction of Joel began to be accomplished. We say designedly, "began to be accomplished," for although the Christian Church has been growing in divine knowledge, and has been working for the common good of all sexes, ages, and classes, more than eighteen hundred years since that day, the prophecy is not yet fulfilled. There are predictions, which have found their fulfillment in particular historical events; and there are others which embrace the entire field of humanity, and Joel's belongs to this latter class. Its complete accomplishment will be the history of the kingdom of God on earth, down to the end of time. — F.]

3. Let us now consider what the prophet teaches in regard to the condition of deliverance, in this "terrible day of the Lord." It is not sharing in those extraordinary influences of the Spirit, whose results are involuntary, but "calling on the name of the Lord," a free act, which every one who pleases can perform. There is something to be done by each individual for himself, and all are exhorted to do it. Spiritual gifts do not necessarily involve spiritual regeneration. So we find to have been the case in New Testament history, with the miraculous xaplopara, which at first predominated, but gradually disappeared, giving place to a more natural and tranquil, a purer and deeper spiritual life. The condition of deliverance is stated in ver. 32, and all are exhorted to fulfill it. External membership with the people of Israel will not, of itself, secure salvation; but the condition is one so simple and easy, so really within the power of every one, that the verse has more the aspect of a promise than an exhortation. There is no real need that any one should be afraid of the coming of the "terrible day." Its terrors may be escaped by simply calling on the Lord in Zion and Jerusalem, the place of worship. Therefore no one need ask, Where shall I find the Lord on whom I must call? for the Lord Himself has named the place of his abode.

This alone is necessary, "to call on the Lord." To do this, it is not absolutely requisite that one should belong to Israel. This is plainly taught by the words just quoted. Hence Paul bases upon them the equal rights of Jews and Gentiles? But does this exposition suit the context, in which the prophet so expressly connects the deliverance with Zion and Jerusalem? If we look carefully into the matter, we shall find that it does. Zion is the place where God has revealed Himself. Without such a revelation as that made in Zion, neither calling on the Lord, nor salvation, would have been possible. Zion then (not in the local sense) is the seat and centre of salvation; because here

God has manifested Himself. Paul knew that a Greek, simply as such, could not call upon the Lord, since he did not even know the Lord who had revealed Himself in Israel. Those who would call upon Him, as Paul teaches, must believe in Him, and this implies that He had been preached to them, and this was done by those who made known to the heathen the God who has manifested Himself in Zion. Paul denies that conformity to the Jewish law is a condition of salvation. All this shows the Apostle's deep insight into the real meaning of Scripture. His heart beat for those afar off; he feels, and discovers instinctively, that the barriers which had separated Jew and Gentile were broken down by the very prophetic word which made salvation dependent on one thing alone, a thing within the reach equally of the Gentile and the Jew. He evidently took the words "whosoever shall call," etc., in a sense large enough to embrace the whole Gentile world. On exegetical grounds, as we have seen, we are authorized though not compelled to give them this breadth of meaning. In the last clause of ver. 32 the phrase occurs, "whom the Lord shall call," and it conveys the idea that salvation is not a matter of right, but of grace alone. With regard to all who are afar off this divine call is the cause of deliverance. If they had not been thus called they must certainly have perished, so that they owe their escape solely to the gracious call of God. But it is at the same time clearly implied that this call becomes effective and saving only when the man himself turns to the Lord.

HOMILETICAL.

Ver. 28. Afterward. A prophetic word of profound meaning. When? The prophets themselves did not know. Yet these promises were, for the present, a light shining in a dark place. But what kings and prophets of old desired to see and saw not, we see, who live in the times of fulfillment. To us the Afterward has become Now. To many, it is only a Once, a Formerly. They forget that the fulfillment of these prophetic words never grows old, but has a perpetual Now, which it becomes us to comprehend and improve until the Lord comes. For as that Afterward has become a Now, in Him in whom all the promises are yea and amen, so He still points us to a more distant Afterward, when there will be nothing new in distinction from the old, except as sight is distinguished from faith, and the end from the beginning.

I will pour out my Spirit. True fellowship with God implies the participation of the Spirit of God. So long as this privilege is confined to individual communion with God, on the part of men, it must be simply an object of desire and hope, notwithstanding the means used to extend it. Blessed privilege of the New Covenant, that in Christ every one may receive the Spirit of God. All special privileges are done away; all separating walls are broken down. The lowest as well as the loftiest can now aspire to be taught by the Spirit of God, and so to become a co-worker with God. How wonderful the condescension and the grace of God! (See Gal. iii. 28.) How plain is it that the religion of the Old Testament, though itself far from attaining this end, foreshadowed it, and revealed the way to it.

[HENRY: God hath reserved some better things for us, the kingdom of grace, and the kingdom of glory, and the happiness of true believers in both. We often read in the Old Testament of the Spirit of the Lord coming like drops, as it were, upon the judges and prophets whom God raised up for extraordinary services, but now, the Spirit shall be poured out plentifully, in a full stream.

PUSEY: God alone can be poured out into the soul, so as to possess it, enlighten it, teach, kindle, bend, move it as He wills, sanctify, satiate, fill it. The prophetic word circles round to that wherewith it began, the all-containing promise of the large outpouring of the Spirit of God; and that, upon those whom the carnal Jews at all times would least expect to receive it. It began with including the heathen; it instances individual gifts, and then it ends by resting on the slaves. The order of the words is significant. He begins I will pour out my Spirit on all flesh, and then in order to leave the mind resting on these same great words, He inverts the order and ends, and upon the servants, etc. It leaves the thoughts resting on the great words "I will pour out my Spirit."

ROBINSON: A Christian even now, animated and influenced by the Holy Ghost is a wonderful being, as superior to the rest of mankind, as man is superior to the beasts of the field. But what will he be then? There have been mighty men amongst us, a Milton, a Boyle, a Newton in a former age, and some in the present, who, with the highest gifts of genius, have been endowed with eminent gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit; but who shall say in that future dispensation, to what heights of wisdom and knowledge and power man may be advanced? Every discovery in science, every progressive improvement, such as the present age has developed, are prophecies and earnest of that glorious time here promised. — F.]

Ver. 30. Show wonders. The New Covenant has brought salvation, but it also brings sifting judgments corresponding to the greatness of this salvation. The question now is, how men will deal with it; and most certain is it that God will remove everything opposed to Him and his kingdom. Hence, with the salvation in Christ, there was need of this last separating judgment. Great displays of God's grace and great judgments often go together, the latter preparing the way for the former. So was it in Jerusalem. Those who despised the kindly tongues of flame on the day of Pentecost, had blood, fire, and vapor of smoke as the symbols of destruction. So is it now. Those who quench the Spirit, despise prophecies, and give themselves up to the flesh and the world will find "that day" all the more terrible, and that their damnation slumbereth not. The best thing is to be always ready for that day of God. If we delay until it actually comes, it may be too late.

[HENRY: The judgments of God upon a sinful world, and the frequent destruction of wicked kingdoms by fire and sword, are prefaces to and pre-ages of the judgment of the world in the last day.

PUSEY: Each revelation of God prepares the way for another, until that last revelation of his love and of his wrath in the great day. — F.]

Ver. 32. Whosoever calleth. Happy they who are found watching and praying when the Lord comes. We may escape the judgment, therefore we should not despair. All that is necessary is believing prayer to God. For every one who confesses God, He will confess. But such escape we must earnestly seek for ourselves. The coming of Christ has two aspects; to the godless, it will be a day of condemnation and wrath: to believers, a day of redemption and refreshing. In Zion and Jerusalem, i. e., in the God who is there revealed, is redemption. He who believes in Christ is in Zion, for he confesses Him as the God of Zion. To Him belongs the glory of our salvation. Examine thyself to see thy real condition. The ability to stand in the judgment will come, not from any outward excellence, nor even from gracious privileges or preëminence. The remnant. God desires not to destroy, but to save. Hence his constant and gracious call to all who are afar off, to come and be saved. Even the heathen, who belong not to his chosen people, can obtain salvation. Not indeed unless He calls them; but if He does call and they yield to it through his grace, they share in the gifts of his people. Art thou among the called ones of God? Hast thou heard his call? Thou mayest be called and yet perish at last. Many are called, few chosen. God calls all, but He, in turn, will be called upon in faith.

[HENRY: This is ground of comfort and hope to sinners, that whatever danger there is in their case, there is also deliverance for them, if it be not their own fault. And if we would share in this deliverance we must apply ourselves to the Gospel of Zion, to God's Jerusalem. It is the praying remnant that shall be the saved remnant. And it will aggravate the ruin of those who perish, that they might have been saved on such easy terms. Those only shall be delivered in the great day that are now effectually called from sin to God, from self to Christ, from things below to things above.

SCOTT: The Gospel calls men in general to partake of its blessings, and of that salvation which is revealed and placed in the Church; and "whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord" Jesus, as the Son of God and the Saviour of sinners, shall be delivered from the wrath to come. This is the happy case of that remnant of every age and people whom the Lord calls by his regenerating Spirit; all things shall work together for their good; they may look forward with comfort for the day, when nature shall expire in convulsions, assured that then their eternal redemption shall be perfected. — F.]

SECTION III.

The Day of the Lord brings full Salvation to Israel and the Destruction of his Enemies.

CHAPTER III.

- 1 For behold, in those days,¹ and at that time
When I shall bring again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem;

- 2 That I will gather all the nations,
And will bring them down into the valley of Jehoshaphat;
And there will I deal with (or judge) them,² for my people, and my heritage,³ Israel.
Because they scattered them among the nations,⁴
And divided my land.
- 3 And they cast lots for my people,
They bartered a boy for a harlot,
And sold a maiden for wine,⁵ and drank it.
- 4 And, also, what have ye to do with me, Tyre and Sidon,
And all the borders ⁶ of Philistia?
Would you retaliate ⁷ upon me,
Or render me a recompense?
Soon and swiftly ⁸ will I bring your recompense on your own head.
- 5 Because ye have taken away my silver and my gold,
And have brought into your temples my goodly desirable things,⁹
- 6 And ye have sold the sons of Judah and Jerusalem to the sons of Javan,
That ye might remove them far away from their border.
- 7 Behold, I will raise ¹⁰ them up out of the place where ye have sold them,
And will return your retaliation on your own head.
- 8 And I will sell your sons and your daughters into the hands of the sons of Judah,
And they shall sell them to the Sabians, to a distant nation,
For Jehovah hath spoken it.
- 9 Proclaim this among the nations,
Declare (sanctify) a war,
Arouse the mighty ones,
Let all the men of war draw near, come up.
- 10 Beat your mattocks ¹¹ into swords,
And your pruning-hooks into spears,
Let the weak say, I am strong.
- 11 Hasten ¹² and come,
All ye nations round about, and assemble yourselves;
Then Jehovah shall bring down ¹³ thy mighty ones.
- 12 Let the nations arise and come up
To the valley of Jehoshaphat,
For there will I sit to judge all the nations round about.
- 13 Put in the sickle,¹⁴
For the harvest is ripe;
Come, tread,
For the wine-press is full,
The vats overflow,
For their wickedness is great.
- 14 Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision,
For the day of Jehovah is near in the valley of decision.
- 15 The sun and the moon are darkened,
And the stars withdraw their shining,
- 16 And ¹⁵ Jehovah will thunder out of Zion,
And from Jerusalem he will give forth his voice,
So that the heavens and the earth shall shake;
But Jehovah will be a refuge for his people,
And a stronghold for the sons of Israel.
- 17 And ye shall know that I Jehovah am your God,
Dwelling in Zion my holy mountain;

And Jerusalem shall be holy,
And strangers shall no more pass through her.

- 18 And it shall come to pass that in that day the mountains shall drop down with new wine,
And the hills shall flow with milk,
And all the river beds of Judah shall be full of water,

And a fountain shall flow forth from the house of Jehovah,
And shall water the valley of Shittim.

- 19 Egypt shall be a desolation,
And Edom shall be a desolate wilderness,
For their violence against Judah's sons;
Because they shed blood in their land.

- 20 But Judah shall dwell ¹⁶ forever,
And Jerusalem from generation to generation;

- 21 And I will avenge their blood, which I have not avenged,
And Jehovah will dwell in Zion.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 1. — Thou days, i. e., preëminently. In Heb. the personal and demonstrative pronouns sometimes take the article, thus rendering the expression all the stronger and more emphatic.

2 Ver. 2. — נִשְׁפָּטוּהָי. For the construction see Josh. iv. 2; 2 Chron. xxii. 8; Is. iii. 14; Ezek. xxxviii. 22. In the latter place נִשְׁפָּטוּ is used for עָם.

3 Ver. 2. — נִמְלִיחֵי, my peculium. The word expresses more than עַמִּי, my people. Israel is in apposition with both terms.

4 Ver. 2. — The nations, i. e., the neighboring ones. See ver. 12.

5 Ver. 3. — For wine. כֶּבֶד is here the כ of price, and according to the rule is placed after verbs of buying and selling.

6 Ver. 4. — Borders, גְּבֻלֵי, lit., circles, referring to the five subdivisions of Philistia, namely, Gath, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron.

7 Ver. 4. — Would you retaliate. Wünsche renders the clause, "Wollt ihr ein Thun mir vergelten," and adds that it is variously explained. The meaning depends on the sense attached to נָמַל. The ground sense of its radical syllable נָ is fullness, accumulation. The primary meaning of נָמַל is the same. It is used — (1) Intrans., to be full, or complete, specially of fruit, to be ripe. (2) Trans., to complete, to make full, i. e.: (a) To wean, or to take from milk (Gen. xxi. 8; 1 Sam. xxi. 24; Is. xxviii. 9). (b) To ripen with special reference to fruit. (c) To do something with the hands, i. e., to finish it. (d) To recompense what has been done by another, so that its end and aim is accomplished, — something done, in a moral sense, for which men are responsible. It is construed both with ל and על.

8 Ver. 4. — Soon and swiftly. See Is. v. 26. Pocock takes both the words adverbially.

9 Ver. 5. — Goodly desirable things. Newcome renders the phrase desirable and goodly. טִיבוֹת = not simply "good things," but "good" in a pregnant sense, optima.

10 Ver. 7. — I will raise. מַעֲרִיר. Hiph. of the intrana. עָרַר, to be hot, hence to be watchful. One Kenn. MSS. has מַעֲרִיר, I am calling, or will call them as witnesses.

11 Ver. 10. — Mattocks. אֵתֵיכָה. This was an instrument of husbandry having an edge that needed to be sharpened from time to time (1 Sam. xiii. 20). All the older versions render it "ploughshares," which Tragelles favors.

12 Ver. 11. — עֲרָשָׁה, a ἄραξ ley, perhaps used for עֲרָשָׁה or עֲרָשָׁה. The Sept. renders it εὐκαταπόρεστος. Vulg. erumpile; Gesen., Meier, and others, "hasten." For the use of the ן to show the close connection between the two imperatives, see Mic. iv. 13. Kimchi, Ewald, Meier, and others take the following נִהַרְצָה as an anom. Niphal imperative for נִהַרְצָה.

13 Shall bring down, lit., "hath brought down." What He will do is spoken of as done.

14 Ver. 13. — מִקְלָה, the sickle, from the root קָלָה; hence the dag. fort.

15 Ver. 16. — But Jehovah. וְ is here clearly antithetic.

16 Ver. 20. — יִשְׁכְּנוּ is not to be understood in a passive sense, "habitari," but actively, i. e., shall dwell in and possess the land.

EXEGETICAL.

Vers. 1-3. For behold in those days, etc. The "ב" in ver. 1 gives the reason for the thought that deliverance can be found only in Zion, in the day of the Lord, for then shall all heathen nations be judged. In those days, i. e., the days that shall come, the "afterward" of the previous chapter. The signs of the event belong essentially to the event itself; but the time is more exactly determined by the statement "when I shall bring again," etc. This distinctly shows that the object of the day of the Lord is, the deliverance of the people of God. The judgment of the heathen world is simply a means to that end. Bring back the captivity, or to return the captivity, means to make an end of it. This phrase, from the use here made of it to designate the epoch of judgment as a terminus technicus for a restitutio in integrum promised to God's people, may have been borrowed from some more ancient prophecy. The condition out of which the captivity is brought appears from the close of ver. 2. But the conclusion of the chapter shows, that the captivity is not simply to end, but that its termination involves a positively new and higher order of things. Judah and Jerusalem, i. e., Judah generally, Jerusalem specially.

Ver. 2. All nations. In the first instance, of course, all those that have offended against Israel; yet these are representatives of the heathen world in general, whose position towards God's people is essentially the same. The valley of Jehoshaphat. According to 2 Chron. xx., Jehoshaphat by the miraculous help of the Lord gained a great victory over a Gentile army, in a valley, which subsequently for this reason took the name of that king. Does the prophet here mean that valley? Keil and many others say, no. They insist that the valley of the prophet is an imaginary one, in or near Jerusalem, and is called the valley of Jehoshaphat = "Jehovah judges," because of its being the place of judgment. The valley certainly stands in close relation to Jerusalem, for in ver. 16 it is said that Jehovah, who there judges, shall utter his voice from Zion and Jerusalem. But in this case there is no need of applying a merely geographical measure. Jehovah may judge in a valley far distant from Jerusalem, and yet have his dwelling in Israel, in Zion, and Jerusalem. (See 2 Chron. xx. 15-17, where the Lord, while contending for Israel is, at the same time, regarded as being in his sanctuary in Jerusalem.) If the phrase is to be taken in a symbolic sense, it might be asked, why Joel should have fixed upon a "valley" as the place of judgment, and should have given it the name of a well-known king? He was undoubtedly thinking of the great event under Jehoshaphat. The name of this monarch was significant, and he calls the place "valley of Jehoshaphat," because he was reminded of that fortunate king who was victorious over Israel's enemies, and because of the peculiar significance of the name Jehoshaphat = Jehovah judges. By way of anticipation he tells what they have to expect, who are gathered there. To the question, does he mean that well-known valley then, we answer, yes, and no. Yes, because he evidently had in view the spot on which Jehoshaphat won his victory. No, because he as evidently goes on to describe a more than common battle fought on a spot which could be identified on no map. The multitudes gathered there are too vast to be assembled in any ordinary valley. In painting this prophetic vision there can be no doubt that Joel had in his mind the historical narrative in 2 Chron. xx. Deal with. E. V. Plead with, i. e. to charge with crime, with the design of punishing it. Taking the word in its full sense of arguing a cause, it implies that the nations argue their own cause, and attempt to vindicate themselves, though, of course they could have no ground to stand upon, since Jehovah is alone and always in the right. My people, my heritage. Therefore what the nations did to Israel must be criminal. They have scattered. The prophet here has in mind what he afterwards more fully describes.

Ver. 3. They not only scattered God's people, but treated them with the greatest contempt. This, however, is only mentioned as pars pro toto. At least in ver. 19 the prophet looks beyond what was immediately before him, and names oppressions which Israel had long before experienced, so that it is evident that he is thinking of the heathen world in general, and of its hostility to God's people. A special reference to the future Exile is not to be assumed, as this does not yet come into the prophet's horizon.

[Pusey: ver. 1. For, behold. The prophet by the for shows that he is about to explain in detail, what he had before spoken of in sum. By the word behold, he stirs up our minds for something great, which he is to set before our eyes, and which we should not be prepared to expect or believe. — Ver. 2. Valley of Jehoshaphat. It may be that the imagery is furnished by that great deliverance which God gave to Jehoshaphat when Ammon, and Moab, and Edom came against him, and Jehoshaphat appealed to God, and God turned their swords every one against the other. And they assembled themselves in the valley of Berachah (blessing); for there they blessed the Lord. 2 Chron. xx. 21. That valley, however, is nowhere called the valley of Jehoshaphat. It continued, says the sacred writer, to be called the valley of Berachah unto this day. And it is so called still. Southwest of Bethlehem and east of Tekoa are still three or four acres of ruin (Robinson, Pal., iii. 275), bearing the name of Bo-reikut (Seetzen's Map; Ritter, Erdk., xv. 635; Wolcott, Excurs. to Hebron, p. 43). The only valley called the valley of Jehoshaphat is the valley of Kedron, encircling Jerusalem on the east. The valley was the common burial-place for the inhabitants of Jerusalem. (Williams, H. C., ii. 523; Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 481. — Ver. 3. Cast lots. They treated God's people as of no account, and delighted in showing their contempt towards them. They chose no one above another as though all alike were worthless. A girl they sold for an evening's revelry, and a boy they exchanged for a night's debauch.

Wünsche: ver. 3. According to the then prevalent custom, the prisoners of war were sold as slaves. My people. We are to understand by this, not the people as a whole, but only the portion taken captive. But the mistreatment of this part of the covenant people, in the view of the O. T. prophets, was a mistreatment of the whole body. — F.]

Vers. 4-8. And also what have ye, etc. After speaking of the crimes of the heathen in general, against Israel, the prophet turns to the neighboring nations, Tyre, Sidon, and the borders of Philistia, i. e., the five small Philistine principalities. He, suddenly, as it were, remembers those who had committed such crimes against Israel as those already mentioned. The question, in fact, especially concerns them. With the genus comes the species which is included in it. In a lively description, we find ourselves in the midst of the nations (comp. ver. 11) with whom the process of pleading by Jehovah is carried on. For afterwards there is no more pleading, but a decision. They are represented as claiming to be right; but any presumptive claim of theirs to do what they had done is denied, in the first instance, by the general question, "what have ye to do with me?" a question more fully answered afterwards. Their right to inflict injury upon Israel, or to retaliate for injuries inflicted upon themselves, is denied. They are the persons on whom the retaliation shall come, and that swiftly. Vers. 5, 6 prove the righteousness of the retribution, by a reference to the crimes committed, while vers. 7, 8 declare the certainty of it. Ver. 5 alludes, without doubt, to the pillaging of Judah and Jerusalem by the Philistines and Arabians under Joram. 2 Chron. xxi. 17. They then carried off the treasures of the temple and the palaces of the city, the latter being designated as "Mine," because they belonged to those who were among God's people. The Philistines were the immediate perpetrators of the robbery, but the Phœnicians, the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon, were also involved in the guilt of it, for they bought the captives and sold them to the sons of Javan, or the Greeks of Asia Minor. In vers. 7, 8, there is a promise that these enslaved captives shall be brought home again, and that, in retaliation, the same thing shall be done to these enemies of Israel, which they have done to Israel. Jehovah will sell them into the hands of the children of Judah, who will again sell them to the Sabæans in Arabia Felix. This prophecy was fulfilled by Alexander the Great and his successors, under whom many Jewish captives were liberated and restored to their own land, while various parts of Philistia and Phœnicia were brought under Jewish rule.

[Pusey: ver. 4. What have ye to do with me. These words declare that those nations had no part in God. He accounts them as aliens. But the words convey besides, that they would, unprovoked, have to do with God, harassing his people without cause. — Ver. 5. My silver. Not the silver and gold of the temple, as some have thought. At least, up to the Prophet's time they had not done this. God calls the silver and the gold, which He through his providence had bestowed on Judah, my silver and my gold. — Ver. 6. And ye have sold, etc. This sin of the Tyrians was probably old and inveterate. As they were the great carriers of the world's traffic, so they were slave-dealers, and in the earliest times, men-stealers. The Greek antehistoric tradition exhibits them as trading and selling women from both Greece and Egypt. As their trade became more fixed, they themselves stole no more, but like Christian nations, sold those whom others stole or made captive. Even from the times of the Judges, Israel was exposed in part to the violence and fraud of Tyre and Sidon. Sisera's army came from their territory, and Deborah speaks of "a damsel or two" as the expected prey of each man in his host. In Joel, the Philistines and Tyrians appear as combined in the traffic. In Amos, the Philistines are the robbers of men, the Phœnicians are the receivers and the sellers. Probably such acts were expressly prohibited by the "brotherly covenant," or treaty between Solomon and Hiram, king of Tyre. For Amos says that Tyre forgot that treaty, when she sold wholesale the captive Israelites whom the Philistinues had carried off. The temptation to Tyrian covetousness was aggravated by the ease with which they could possess themselves of the Jews, the facility of transport, and, as it seems, their value. The wholesale price at which Nicanor set the Jews his expected prisoners, and at which he hoped to sell 180,000, shows the extent of the traffic; and their relative value, £2 14s. 9d., as the average price of each of ninety slaves in Judæa, implies a retail price at the place of sale above the then ordinary price of man. — Ver. 8. I will sell your sons — the Sabæans. Tyre was taken by Alexander, who sold 13,000 of the inhabitants into slavery. Sidon was taken by Artaxerxes Ochus, and it is said above 40,000 perished. The Sabæans are probably mentioned as being the remotest nation in the opposite direction, a nation, probably, the partner of Tyre's traffic in men as well as in their other merchandise, and who would as soon trade in Tyrians, as with Tyrians. They were, like the Phœnicians, a wealthy merchant people, and, of old, united with them in the trade of the world, the Sabæans sending forth their fleets across the Indian Ocean, as the Tyrians along the Mediterranean Sea. Three fathers of distinct races bore the name of Sheba, one a descendant of Ham, the other two descended from Shem. The Shemite Sabæans were, some descendants from Sheba the tenth son of Joktan; the others from Sheba, son of Abraham and Keturah. The Sheba of the prophet appears to have been the wealthy Sheba (descended from Joktan) near the Red Sea. They too had distant colonies whither the Tyrians could be transported, as far from Phœnicia as the shores of the Ægean are from Palestine.

Wünsche: Tyre, lit., Rock. Though Tyre was historically a younger city than Sidon, from its rapid growth and great importance as a commercial centre, it is usually mentioned first when the two cities are named together. There were two Tyres, namely, the Old, built on the main land, and destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar after a siege of thirteen years, and the New, built on a rocky island about a mile from the shore. Sidon comes from סִידוֹן, to fish. Its founders were probably fishermen. — Desirable things — Your temples. If by the first phrase the prophet means the rich adornments of God's temple, and by the latter the heathen temples, the crime here charged is the double one of spoliation and profanation. — Javan. Credner regards this as the name of a city in Arabia Felix. Hitzig places it in Jemen, and thinks it to be the same as the one mentioned Ezek. xxvii. 19. Schröder takes the word in the sense of distant, unknown nations. But it is undoubtedly the name of the Greeks of Asia Minor. — F.]

Vers. 9, 10. Proclaim this. The prophet has already spoken of the gathering of the nations in the valley of Jehoshaphat, where Jehovah will plead with them. We have heard the accusation and the sentence; and now comes the swift execution of it. Proclaim this. What? If it be Prepare (sanctify) war, and this is to be proclaimed to the heathen, those charged to bear the message should be the heralds of the heathen. But the contents of the message show that it is directed not to the heathen but to Israel. No one shall remain behind, nor feel himself weak, nor withdraw from the holy contest, which is to bring "decision." It must be considered, then, as a summons to Israel. The battle described is no common one. It is a battle, in which Jehovah Himself shall be present as a judge deciding the fate of the heathen, and helping Israel to win a glorious victory over them. The summoner is Jehovah Himself, or the prophet speaking in his name, who, in his vivid description of the contest, feels himself to be present at it. Proclaim this must, then refer to what was said before, namely: that Jehovah will recompense the heathen for their crimes against Israel, and that Israel shall be fully avenged. For the counterpart of the proposed change of the implements of peace into the instruments of war, see Is. ii. 4; Mic. iv. 3.

[Wünsche: Proclaim, lit., sanctify. The use of this word shows that this great and decisive war is a holy and a righteous one. Credner, Hitzig, Keil, and others regard this as addressed not to the Jews, but to the heathen nations, i. e., to their heralds who are, at the bidding of Jehovah, to summon these nations to a war against Israel. But on this supposition the use of the word "sanctify" is inexplicable. — F.]

Vers. 11–16. Hasten and come. Now the nations are summoned to collect speedily, as if they were about to accomplish something against Israel, while really they are rushing to their own destruction. Round about. The reference is not to the immediate neighbors of Israel, but the expression is used because God's people is regarded as holding a central position among the nations. The prophet, however, cannot think of the assemblage of the nations without offering a prayer to Jehovah that He would cause his mighty ones to come down, where the gathering occurs, in the valley of Jehoshaphat. Thy mighty ones. According to Keil they are the angels as heavenly hosts. But if in ver. 9 they are men (Keil refers that version to the heathen), they must also be men here. The idea of the angels coming from heaven to help is not Joel's. It is Israel who fights, under the command of Jehovah (comp. Judges v. 13). Thy affords no proof against this exposition, since Israel is God's people, and Israel's mighty ones are God's.

Ver. 12. Here Jehovah himself speaks, and the whole verses may, therefore, be regarded as a kind of answer to the prophet's prayer. Jehovah summons the nations to awake and to come up (אָרָא here means to ascend) to the valley of Jehoshaphat. For though the gathering place is a valley, and Israel's mighty ones go down into it from Zion, yet the heathen come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat, because, being near to Jerusalem, it is on a higher elevation than the territories (e. g., Philistia) of the neighboring nations. The reason why they are to come up to this valley is found in the meaning of the name Jehoshaphat = "Jehovah sits there to judge." He does not engage directly in the contest; He does not lead the army, but He sits on a throne to judge, — to pronounce the sentence, and to execute it by means of his mighty ones. At the same time he renders essential aid by those terrible phenomena of nature spoken of (vers. 15, 16), which mark the contest as "the day of the Lord," the result of which is the utter destruction of these enemies. How Jehovah will execute the sentence pronounced by Him as Judge, is explained in ver. 13, for the exhortation here addressed to the "mighty ones," while the two armies front each other in battle array, is given by Jehovah. This is evident from the fact that the battle is to be the execution of a deserved sentence. Hence the attack and the fight are no more spoken of, but the result simply, represented by the figure of cutting down ripe corn. Of a threshing and winnowing of the corn thus cut down, as Keil suggests, there is no hint; for with these enemies of Jehovah there could be no separating the wheat and the chaff. The only point in the figure on which attention is fixed, is the "cutting down" what had been before standing. Then comes a new and stronger simile to represent the destruction of these enemies. They shall not only be "cut off" but "crushed," or trodden like grapes in the wine-press. The overflowing "fullness of the vats" is significant (Keil denies it). It represents the general blood-shedding which shall be proportioned to the "greatness of their wickedness." The execution itself is not formally described, but it is plainly enough indicated in ver. 14. Multitudes, or as some render it "tumult." The "mighty ones" are now to engage in their bloody work, amid the uproar of battle. The noise expressed or implied is not, as Keil supposes, that of nations rushing together, for they are already assembled, and now, the moment is one of judgment, or "decision." The valley is the valley of Jehoshaphat, the "valley of decision," the phrase being immediately followed by the words "for the day of the Lord is come." This shows that what had been commanded (ver. 13) is now being accomplished, and that the contest involves the judgment and destruction of these enemies. This catastrophe is the "day of the Lord," which is attended by those awful phenomena described (vers. 15, 16), by which Jehovah displays his omnipotence, and really determines the issue of the battle. The "darkness," before noticed as a presage of "the day," now introduces it. "Thunder" = an immediate display of God's power. "Giving forth his voice," lit., "roaring," i. e., of the lion in pursuit of prey, denotes God's design to punish and destroy. Of course Joel has in his mind not an ordinary thunder-storm, but a far more terrible one. Israel had been previously threatened with a day of punishment marked by similar presages, in connection with the visitation of locusts, but it had passed away. Now, however, the storm overtakes and destroys the heathen, while Israel is not only protected by Jehovah from the judgments that overwhelm the enemies of God, but is introduced into new and far higher privileges than ever before were possessed.

[Wünsche: Ver. 12. Sit to judge. This posture of the judge was common to the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans. In Latin, sedere is often used in the sense of judicare (Liv. iii. 46); so in Greek καθίσειν. The decision of a judge made by him standing, was generally deemed to have no legal force. All nations. The "all" is limited by "round about." Hengstenberg, Keil, and others understand by it all the nations who have become in any way related to the kingdom of God, i. e., all the nations of the earth, as before the final judgment, the Gospel of the kingdom will be preached throughout the whole world. Credner supposes that the meaning of the double image used in ver. 13 is, that as songs of gladness, dancing, and other signs of joy mark the harvest and vintage, so the Jews will find the highest enjoyment in the day of judgment of their enemies. But there is no ground for supposing that the covenant people will have any such feelings.

Pusey: Ver. 13. In itself, the harvest as well as the vintage, might describe the end of this world as to both the good and the bad, in that the wheat is severed from the chaff and the tares, and the treading of the wine-press separates the wine which is stored up from the husks which are cast away. Yet nothing is said here of storing up aught, either the wheat or the wine, but only of the ripeness of the harvest, and that the vats overflow because their wickedness is great. The harvest is sometimes, though more rarely, used for destruction; the treading of the wine-press is always used as an image of God's anger; the vintage, of destruction. It seems probable then, that the ripeness of the harvest and the fullness of the vats are alike used of the ripeness for destruction. — Ver. 14. The prophet continues, as in amazement at the great throng assembling upon one another, multitudes, multitudes, as though, whichever way he looked, there were yet more of these tumultuous masses. It was one living, surging, boiling sea; throngs upon throngs, mere throngs. The word rendered multitudes suggests, besides, the thought of the hum and din of these masses, thronging, onward blindly, to their own destruction. — E.]

Vers. 17-21. And ye shall know. Jehovah, by his judgment of Israel's enemies, proves Himself to be Israel's God; and from Zion, his dwelling place, all strangers and unclean ones are banished. This is the immediate gain to Israel, but other benefits are consequent upon it (comp. Rev. xxi. 27). A time of extraordinary prosperity follows.

Ver. 18. Wine and milk flow in richest abundance. The mountains and the hills, i. e., the naturally sterile districts, become very fruitful, and as this result depends on the supply of water, the brooks shall not become dry. Valley of Shittim, or Valley of Acacias, now quite dry, — for in such a soil the acacia grows, — shall be watered by a fountain flowing from the house of the Lord, and shall become fruitful. This description, of course, is not to be taken in its merely literal sense. As the blessedness originates with Jehovah, the fertilizing stream is represented as coming from the Temple, the dwelling-place of God. What a contrast between the state of things here depicted, and the condition of the land after its devastation by the locusts!

Ver. 19. To render Israel's blessed condition the more conspicuous, the picture of the desolated heathendom is placed beside it. Egypt and Edom are specially mentioned on account of their violence against Judah's sons, namely, shedding their blood. It is uncertain, what precise instances of this are referred to. Egypt's sins were probably those of the olden time (Ex. i. 16). For that of Edom, see Amos i. 11; Ob. 10. They, however, like the Phœnicians and Philistines in another place, are here taken as representatives of the enemies of Israel. (Comp. in ref. to Edom Is. xxxiv. 63; Jer. xlix. 7; Ezek. iii. 5.)

Ver. 20. Wholly different shall be the condition of Israel. Judah and Jerusalem shall dwell forever, i. e., they shall be inhabited.

Ver. 21. While Israel is thus blessed, it will be proved that the wrong committed against him has been fully avenged, or as some take the word, annulled, i. e., by having been punished; and the all-embracing assurance is repeated, Jehovah shall dwell in Zion.

[Pusey: Ver. 18. A fountain shall come forth out of the house of the Lord. The existence of a large supply of water under the Temple is beyond all question. While the Temple was still standing, mention is made of an ever-flowing fountain under it, as well as pools and cisterns for preserving rain-water. One well acquainted with the localities says, "The pavements had slopes for the sake of a flush of water in order to cleanse away the blood from the victims. For on festival occasions many thousands of animals were slain. But of water there was an unfailing supply, a copious and natural fountain within gushing over; and there being moreover wonderful underground receptacles, in the substructure of the temple, and each of these having numerous pipes, the several streams inter-communicating." The same writer relates that, more than half a mile from the city, he was told to stoop down, and heard the sound of gushing waters underground. The natural fountain, then, beneath the Temple, was doubtless augmented by waters brought from a distance, as required by the "diverse washings" of the priests, and to carry off the blood of the victims. Whence-soever this water was supplied, it furnished Jerusalem with an abundant supply of water. The superfluous water was carried off underground to what is now "the fountain of the Virgin," and thence again to the "pool of Siloam." Thence it carried fertility to the gardens of Siloam. The blood of the victims flowed into the same brook, Kedron, and was a known source of fertility. That little oasis of verdure was a fit emblem of the Jewish people, itself bedewed by the stream which issued from the temple of God. But it made no sensible impression out of or beyond itself. Hereafter the stream, whose streamlets "made glad the city of God," should make the wildest, driest spots of our humanity "like the garden of the Lord." Valley of Shittim, or acacia-trees, is a dry valley, for in such the eastern acacia or sandal-wood grows. This wood is very strong and of incredible lightness and beauty. Of it the ark of God was made. — Ver. 19. Egypt a desolation. Brief as Joel's words are, they express an abiding condition of Egypt. They are expanded by Ezekiel, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Zechariah. But the three words of Joel are more comprehensive than any prophecy, except those of Ezekiel. They foretell that abiding condition, not only by the force of the words, but by the contrast with an abiding condition of bliss. The words say, not only that it shall "be desolated" as by a passing scourge, but it "shall pass over into that state;" it shall become what it had not been, and this, in contrast with the abiding condition of God's people. Yet when Joel threatened Egypt, there were no human symptoms of decay; the instruments of its successive overthrows were as yet wild hordes, or had not the beginnings of being. Egypt would not become barren except by miracle. Even now it recovers whenever water is applied. Nothing could desolate Egypt except man's abiding negligence or oppression. No passing storm could annihilate a fertility which poured in upon it in ever-renewing richness. Egypt is alike prolific in its people, and in the productions of the earth. Yet with these powers implanted in nature unimpaired, the population is diminished, the land half desert. Persians, Macedonians, Romans, Greeks, Arabs, and Turks, have tried their hands on Egypt. Strange that selfishness or powerlessness for good should have rested upon all; strange that no one should have developed its inherent powers. One long prosperity, and one long adversity. One scarcely broken day, and one troubled night. And that doom foretold in the mid-day of its prosperity by these three words, Egypt shall be a desolation — Edom a desolate wilderness. Its ancient capital, and its rock-dwellings long unknown, have been within the last forty years, again revealed to us. The land is almost the more hopelessly desolate, because it was once artificially cultivated. Edom was the centre of the intercourse of nations. The hill-sides, and mountains, once covered with earth and clothed with vineyards, are now bare rocks. Yet the traces of former fertility are innumerable: every spot capable of sustaining vegetable life was carefully watered and cultivated. The ancient inhabitants seem to have left no accessible place untouched. They have exhibited equal art and industry in eliciting from the grand walls of their marvelous capital, whatever the combination of climate, irrigation, and botanical skill could foster in the scanty soil afforded them. The desolation began soon after the captivity of Judah, and Edom's malicious joy in it. In Joel's time, not the slightest shadow was cast on her future. No human eye could tell that she would be finally desolate. But God said by Joel, "Edom shall be a desolate wilderness," and so it is! — Ver. 21. I will cleanse her blood. The word rendered cleansed, is not used for natural cleansing, nor is the image taken from the cleansing of the body. The word signifies only to pronounce innocent, or to free from guilt. Nor is blood used of sinfulness generally, but only of the actual guilt of shedding blood. The whole then cannot be an image taken from the cleansing of physical defilement, like the words of Ezek. xvi. 9, "then washed I thee with water," etc. Nor, again, can it mean the forgiveness of sins generally, but only the pronouncing innocent the blood which had been shed. This the only meaning of the words, falls in with the mention of innocent blood, for shedding which, Egypt and Edom had been condemned. In punishing the shedding of it, God declared the blood innocent, whose shedding He punished. — F.]

THEOLOGICAL.

1. Three topics are discussed in this chapter: the enmity of the "nations" against Israel; the punishment of the nations; and the new happiness of Israel.

(1.) The enmity of the nations against Israel. How does the prophet regard this? Is the hostility only accidental, exhibiting itself simply in some particular acts? Or has it a deeper ground, namely, in the antagonism of the nations as heathen against Israel as God's people, or the antagonism between idolatry and the worship of the true God? The mere words of the prophet would not lead us to suppose that he regarded it in the latter light. He speaks only of acts of pillage, carrying away captives, shedding of blood. Nor must we interpret ver. 5 as if the acts described were directed against the Temple as such; nor are they the necessary and exclusive offspring of heathenism. But we may and must say that these acts of injury appeared to be the outgrowth of the religious antagonism between the Gentiles and Israel. The people of Israel were God's people, and enmity against the former was in fact enmity against God's people, and God himself. That the prophet so regards it, vers. 4; 5 plainly show. This hostility of the Gentiles or nations, though in one sense accidental, really reflects an inward and profound hatred. Hence the general expression, "all ye heathen, or Gentile," although, in point of fact, Israel had been injured only by some of them. Thus Israel stands on one side, and all the heathen or Gentiles on the other, in the attitude of antagonists. What one of the latter does, they may be all expected to do, and so may be held responsible for it, inasmuch as they constitute one whole. Therefore, if Israel is to be helped, the judgment must fall on the whole heathen world. Finally, the prophet nowhere intimates that the Gentiles should be employed as God's instruments in punishing Israel for his guilt. The Gentiles alone appear as the guilty ones.

(2.) The punishment of the nations was a certain and necessary result of Israel's position as God's people. They had scattered them; they had parted their land; they had taken their silver and gold; in a word, they had thus taken God's property, and He could not allow this to go unpunished. He must stand up for his people and destroy their enemies. Though Israel is the agent in inflicting, yet the punishment comes really from the divine hand. Jehovah assembles the nations, and, in the contest between them and his people, gives, by his immediate help, the victory to the latter. This punishment involves the destruction of these enemies. The menaces relating to this point may seem unduly severe; but it is to be observed that the guilt of these nations is very aggravated, going far beyond the ordinary measure of enmity and crime, and therefore, according to the jus talionis, the retribution should be proportionate. Credner's idea that Joel here abandons himself to the feelings of unbridled revenge, is wholly groundless. Meier justly remarks against this notion, that no prophet ever describes these bloody conflicts as simply growing out of human revenge; they ever regard them as signs of that Higher Power which strikes with destruction everything ungodly. And while the later prophets do not speak of bloody phenomena such as are here described, they yet plainly intimate, that before the consummation of the Messianic age, a catastrophe involving such scenes must come, as a transition epoch, in which everything unholy, as well in Israel as in the heathen world, will be destroyed. The grand object on which all depends, and which faith accepts as certain, is the complete subjugation of God's enemies, and the complete triumph of his people. The pencil that paints this picture is, indeed, dipped in strong colors, corresponding to the energy of the divine powers which shall realize it. The idea set forth is the essential thing; the expression of it is, of course, modified by the prophet's historical relations, and the character of the times in which he lived.

(3.) Israel's new felicity. Amid the extraordinary manifestations of divine wrath connected with the destruction of the wicked, Israel is protected and realizes anew that Jehovah is his God. His land shall no more be seized by a stranger, and its remarkable fertility will be a proof that Jehovah is dwelling in the midst of it. The latter is the main thing in the promise, the productiveness of the land being simply an evidence of it. Of this the fountain issuing forth from the house of the Lord is a symbol and a pledge. Here the promise goes beyond what is merely physically possible, as do also some features of the judgment of the heathen; from which it is plain that the prophet's mind was fixed, not so much on the literal fulfillment of the prediction, as upon the general truth, that Jehovah will, in a manner eminent and unequivocal, own Israel as his people, by bestowing on him the richest blessings.

2. If now we inquire into the fulfillment of this prophecy, objectively considered, we shall quickly discover, that things took at first quite a different shape from that which Joel seems to have supposed they would. He sees in the heathen only the enemies of God's people who are to be punished, and he announces their certain punishment on account of their many acts of violence against Israel. The later prophets, on the other hand, charge God's own people with their sins, and predict judgments, which God will employ the heathen as his instruments to inflict, and which, we know, in later times they did. But there is no evidence, i. e., from his prophecy, that Joel was acquainted with this fact of the future. It is wholly unwarrantable to interpret his words (ver. 1), as if he had foreseen and foretold what later prophets announced, namely, the Exile, and the dispersion by the Romans, without giving the reason for either of these events. He does not think it possible — so far as his prophecy shows — that a divine judgment should be inflicted upon Israel. Both the internal (i. e., the guiltiness of Israel and Judah) and the external antecedent conditions of such a judgment are wanting. He knows nothing of those secular powers which brought on the exile, or at least, he does not know them as powers with whom Israel is to come into conflict. It is a false view of the nature of prophecy to suppose that events of the most distant future were revealed with equal clearness to the prophets whose experience, in a sort of intermediate way, corresponded with, or contradicted that future. According to the later prophets the glorious state of Israel is reached, after his having passed through an intermediate condition of humiliation. Joel knows nothing of such an intermediate condition. He represents the felicity of Israel as resulting not simply from the truthfulness of God, who will not utterly abandon even his unfaithful people, while He punishes them, but as a thing which they might at any time secure by penitential confession of sins, and calling upon the Lord. But there is an essential harmony between Joel and the later prophets. How then were their predictions fulfilled? The menaces against the heathen nations mentioned have been remarkably accomplished by actual historical events, particularly by Alexander the Great and his successors. But we must look for a larger and fuller accomplishment of the prophecies of Joel. It is evident that he had in his mind a grand consummation, since he connects it with the general outpouring of the Spirit and the announcement of the day of the Lord. He sees the heathen world utterly overwhelmed, while Israel enters into and holds the position of God's people. The period of conflict is passed, and that of victory and peace has come.

Now as regards the fulfillment of these prophecies, we might repeat the remarks already made respecting the later ones of Hosea. For Israel as a nation that glorious time had not yet come; nor was there any ground for the immediate expectation of it. The tenor of the prophecy would seem to indicate that it applied exclusively to Israel, because in Joel's time, Israel alone was God's people. But this view, which makes God's people and Israel as a nation identical, though sanctioned in a certain sense by the Old Covenant, has been clearly set aside by the New Covenant. While then the Jewish nation, as such, has no ground for expecting, as the Chiliasts maintain, this promised felicity, it is nevertheless certain that the promise is valid for the people of God as typified by Israel. Its fulfillment is to be looked for in a far different and more glorious way than the prophet, from his stand-point, anticipated. [Whether the so-called Chiliastic theory of the future of the Jews be true or not, there is no necessary antagonism between it and the admission, under the New Covenant, of the Gentiles to the spiritual privileges of God's people. The Jews still exist as a distinct people. And Paul certainly seems to intimate (Rom. xi. 25) that there is yet a glorious future for Israel, which shall be realized when "the fullness of the Gentiles be come in." — F.] The new Israel lives in the hope of a general outpouring of the Spirit, which was begun at Pentecost, and has been continued ever since, — of a final, complete deliverance, and a glorious victory over all its enemies; in a word, of a felicity and salvation which shall be a proof of God's immediate presence in the midst of it. Whether Joel foresaw all this, i. e., understood the full meaning of his own prediction, may be doubted; but, in the sense already explained, we can appropriate it to ourselves, as Keil remarks: "The people and heritage of the Lord is not only the Old Testament Israel as such, but the Church of God, embracing those who lived under the New as well as the Old Covenant. On it his Spirit is poured out. Jehovah's judgment of the nations for injuries done to his people is not simply the judgment of such of them, e. g., the Romans and others, that have maltreated the Jews, but the final, general judgment of all nations, of all the enemies of the Church of God. It is this fundamental truth, this glorious hope made sure by almost the oldest of the prophets, which the people of God, from the beginning, have lifted up as a standard. And hence we see in all the victories which God has granted to his people, and in all the judgments inflicted upon the heathen neighbors and enemies of Israel, a fulfillment of this promise, which again finds, as by a thousandfold refraction, a still more particular fulfillment in all the special deliverances of his children, and in all their experiences of his protection. So Luther is not wrong in regarding the rich blessings promised to Judah as identical with those revealed in the Gospel, and through it bestowed upon the Christian Church. As God's heritage, Zion experienced from the first, and continues to experience, the blessed presence and the grace of God. Still, the final, and complete fulfillment will only come with the consummation of the kingdom of the Parousia, or Second Advent of the Lord.

HOMILETICAL.

Ver. 1. When I shall bring again. God hath set bounds to everything, especially to the sufferings of his people. He determines their beginning, and how long they shall endure. Rejoice, ye faithful, the Lord shall bring again your captivity. He will deliver you from all evil, and help you to reach his heavenly kingdom.

[HENRY: Though the bondage of God's people may be grievous and very long, yet it shall not be everlasting. There is a day, there is a time, fixed for the bringing again of the captivity of God's children, for the redeeming them from the power of the grave. — F.]

Ver. 2. I will gather all nations. Though wicked men say that the Lord does not see them, they shall learn by experience that He does, in the time when He shall judge them. Ye proud Gentiles, who cease not to afflict the little flock of the faithful, know that a day of judgment is coming, when the Lord will avenge the blood of his servants. — Whom they have scattered. Those who are unjustly exiled should leave vengeance in the hands of God the righteous judge. Mark that all divine punishment, and even the final judgment of the wicked is for the sake of the godly. Behold how God takes care of his people! Therefore, be of good courage! Dost thou belong to God's people? Then He will take care of thee, though He may seem to delay doing so. God's honor will not permit his people to perish, and their enemies to triumph, for their enemies are his enemies.

[PUSSEY: Will plead with them. God maketh Himself in such wise a party, as not to condemn those unconvicted, yet the pleading has a separate awfulness of its own. God impleads, so as to allow Himself to be impleaded and answered; but there is no answer. He will set forth what He had done, and how we have requited Him. And we are without excuse. Our memories witness against us; our knowledge acknowledges his justice; our conscience convicts us; all unite in pronouncing ourselves ungrateful, and God holy and just. For a sinner to see himself is to condemn himself, and in the day of judgment God will bring before each sinner his whole self. — F.]

Vers. 3-5. They have cast lots. In a time of war terrible crimes are very common, but in due season God will punish them. — What have ye to do with me. The true Church is the heavenly Father's daughter, and Christ's beloved spouse. Therefore he who persecutes it, is persecuting God and Christ. How great the foolishness of sinners who want to plead with and defy God! O, how certainly will their defiance of Him be visited on their own head. Therefore be humble, and confess thy misdeeds, if thou wouldst escape divine punishment.

[PUSSEY: Will ye render me a recompense. Men never want pleas for themselves. Men forget their own wrong-doings, and remember their sufferings. Men, when they submit not to God chastening them, hate Him.

HENRY: My silver. Those who take away the estates of good men for well-doing, will be found guilty of sacrilege; they take God's silver and gold. It is no new thing for those who have been very civil to their neighbors, to find them very unkind and unneighborly, and for those who do no injuries to suffer many. — F.]

Vers. 1-7. The raging of the nations and their rulers is an indication of that fleshly mind which is always opposed to the kingdom of God. So long as the hope of that kingdom was confined to Israel, the hatred of the heathen was spent on Israel. When that kingdom was taken from Israel, and given to the "little flock," which "brought forth the fruit of it," that hatred was simply transferred. The world ever has sought and still seeks to divide the heritage of the Lord, and to bring to shame those who trust in his word of promise. But when God regathers his scattered people Israel, and re-establishes down-trodden Jerusalem, He will also deliver the rest of his elect, and fully recompense them for the sufferings which the world has inflicted on them.

Ver. 9. Prepare war. Peace must end when we are called on to combat the enemies of God. Then, all must take up arms. "I came not to send peace, but a sword." Through conflict to victory! through war to peace!

Ver. 10. [PUSSEY: Ploughshares into swords. Peace within with God flows forth in peace with man. Where there is not rest in God, all is unrest. And so, all which was needful for life, the means of subsistence, care of health, were to be forgotten for war. — F.]

Vers. 11, 12. Hasten and come. Behold how the Lord holds the godless persecutors of his Church in derision! Let them do what they like, his vengeance shall finally overtake them. If God be for us, who can be against us? The Lord sits as ruler, and is ever judging nations and individuals. No one can escape his judgment. He may long seem to be silent, but ever and anon He comes forth with his judgments now, the harbingers of the final and decisive one.

[HENRY: Thy mighty ones. When God's cause is to be pleaded, either by the law or by the sword, He has those ready who will plead it effectually; witnesses ready to appear for Him in the court of judgment, soldiers ready to appear for Him in the field of battle. — F.]

Ver. 13. For their wickedness is great. When the measure of men's sins is full, then execution comes. The judgments of God are then no longer delayed.

Vers. 14-16. The day of the Lord is near. Tremble ye godless, for the day is near when the Lord will judge you! Behold, the lion is already roaring out of Zion announcing your punishment. Should not that voice, which shall one day be heard by the whole earth, arouse you to repentance? To the wicked, God is a roaring lion, but to the godly a strong fortress.

As God always cared for and defended his peculiar people against the rage of their enemies, so Christ now protects his peculiar people, Christians, against the violence of their foes. He may allow them, for a time, to be persecuted, to try and perfect their faith by "manifold temptations," but, in the end, He will destroy their enemies. Examples of this have occurred in past ages; but a greater ruin awaits them. When the great and terrible day of the Lord comes, He will gather all his enemies into the valley of Jehoshaphat; He will bring them before his tribunal, and plead with them for his heritage and people, and will return upon their own heads all the evils they have inflicted upon the true Christendom.

[HENRY: The Lord shall roar. The judgment of the great day shall make the ears of those to tingle who continue the implacable enemies of God. As blessings out of Zion are the sweetest blessings, and enough to make heaven and earth sing, so terrors out of Zion are the sorest terrors, and enough to make heaven and earth shake. — The saints are the Israel of God; now in the great day (1) Their longings shall be satisfied. The Lord will be the Hope of his people. As He always was the Founder and Foundation of their hopes, so He will then be the Crown of their hopes. They shall arrive at the desired haven; shall put to shore after a stormy voyage; they shall go to be forever at home with God. (2) Their happiness shall be confirmed. God will be in that day the Strength of the children of Israel, enabling them to welcome that day, and to bear up under the weight of its glories and joys. — F.]

Ver. 17. Ye shall know. So long as believers are here below, sighing under the burden of sin, and not seeing the means of deliverance, they are apt to think that God has abandoned them.

[HENRY: The knowledge which true believers have of God is (1) An appropriating knowledge; they know that He is the Lord their God, yet not theirs only, but theirs in common with the whole Church. (2) An experimental knowledge. They shall find Him their Hope and Strength, in the worst of times. Those know best the goodness of God, who have tasted and seen it.

PUSSEY: God Himself joins on his own words to those of the prophet. Ye shall know by experience, by sight, face to face, what ye now believe, that I am the Lord your God. Your God, your own, as much as if possessed by none besides, filling all with gladness, yet fully possessed by each. — F.]

Ver. 18. In that day. Glorious are the promises to the Church of the New Covenant, but they will be completely fulfilled only in a blessed eternity. In this world God feeds us, comforts us with his Word and sacraments, consoles us with manifold blessings in Christ, but in the future world, this grace will be far more superabundant. — By the mountains are meant the kingdoms of this world, which shall flow with the wine and milk of Christian doctrine, by which a rich measure of spiritual gifts shall be imparted to men. For the Gospel is very finely compared to wine as well as milk; to wine, since it is administered to the adult to gladden his heart, and confirm his faith, hope, and love; to milk, as it is also administered to children in Christ, who, as new-born babes, desire the sincere milk of the Word. As wine comforts and strengthens man's heart, so the Word of God preserves and increases faith, and imparts consolation under sufferings. The law does the opposite, holy and just though it be. It accuses them, and threatens death; it makes them faint-hearted and despondent. But the Gospel banishes fear, by revealing a Mediator, the Son of God, and filling the soul with an assurance of the mercy of God. By rivers flowing with water, the prophet means the wonderful spread of the Gospel, and the rich fruit it will produce. As dry places are barren, and well watered ones fertile, so where the Gospel resounds, the richest and ripest fruits are produced. The Holy Spirit goes with it, imparting his own divine gifts.

[PUSK: As the fountain gushes forth from the hill or mountain side in one ceaseless flow, day and night, streaming out from the recesses to which the waters are supplied by God from his treasure-house of the rain, so day by day, in sorrow or in joy, in prosperity or adversity, God pours out in the Church, and in the souls of his elect, the riches of his grace. The love of God shall stream through every heart; each shall be full according to its capacity, and none the less full, because a larger tide pours through others. All the powers, capacities, senses, speech of the saints who confess God shall flow with a perennial stream of joy, thanksgiving, and jubilee, as of all pleasure and bliss. — F.]

Ver. 19. Shed innocent blood. How highly does the Lord esteem the death, the blood of the faithful!

[HENRY: The innocent blood of God's people is very precious to Him, and not a drop shall be shed, but it shall be reckoned for. — F.]

Vers. 20, 21. Judah shall dwell forever. The Church of the New Covenant is imperishable, for it shall be transplanted from time into eternity. Blessed Zion! in which the Lord dwells with his Word, and the gifts of his Spirit, and which He quickens by his converting and sanctifying power. Let us make here for ourselves tabernacles, and serve this great King of hearts in the obedience of faith, so that we may at last be transferred to the heavenly Jerusalem. O, the depth of the riches, of the wisdom, and of the knowledge of God! Of the riches of grace, since God, in spite of the unbelief and disobedience of his people, has not forgotten them, nor abrogated his covenant. Of the wisdom, which turns so many hindrances into the means of helping forward his own purposes. Of the knowledge which has foreseen and with absolute certainty has predicted all these things. Learn from Israel, the courageous trust thou mayest have in the mercy of God, even though thou shouldst lie beneath his heavy hand, as long as Jerusalem has lain in her ruins. Learn that the wisdom of God can never fail, nor be at fault, and yield itself in all circumstances to his wise guidance. When something happens to thee unexpectedly, and destroys some hope which you may have fondly cherished, call to mind and consider the truth, that "known unto God are all his works from the foundation of the world."

[HENRY: It is promised that the Church shall be very happy. Three things are here promised it.

1. Purity. That is put last here as a reason for the rest (ver. 21). But we may consider it first as the ground and foundation of the rest. I will cleanse, etc.

2. Plenty (ver. 18). That is put first because it speaks the reverse of the judgment threatened in the foregoing chapters. The streams of this plenty overflow and enrich the land.

3. Perpetuity. This crowns all the rest. As one generation of professing Christians passes away, another shall come, in whom the throne of Christ shall endure forever.

ROBINSON: The last days are at hand, when the wicked shall be driven away in their wickedness, and a fiery deluge of wrath shall overwhelm the earth, but they who love the Lord shall be removed, as Lot, to a mountain of safety, and like Noah, be hidden in an ark of salvation, until the desolation and the tyranny be overpassed. Wherefore, dear Christian brethren, lift up your hearts, and long for his coming, for you shall be his in that day when He makes up his jewels.

Jesus, thy Church with longing eyes
For thy expected coming waits:
When will the promised light arise,
And glory gleam from Zion's gates?

Teach us in watchfulness and prayer
To wait for the appointed hour;
And fit us by thy grace to share
The triumphs of thy conquering power. — F.]

PRAYER SUGGESTED BY THE WHOLE CHAPTER. — Great Saviour! we thank Thee that Thou wilt one day judge the enemies of Thy Church, and wilt recompense their persecutions and abominations on their own heads. Grant that their further wicked designs may not injure Thy Zion. Arise and punish them; deliver Thy faithful ones, and be their refuge and fortress amid the judgments which shall overtake the world of the ungodly. Adorn Thy Zion with the rich gifts of Thy Spirit, that it may be holy before Thee, and ever overflow with spiritual blessings. Amen.

THE PROPHET AMOS.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. The Personal Relations of Amos.

Of these we know more than we do in the case of Hosea and of Joel, and that, not merely from the superscription, the originality of which needs yet to be established, but also from the prophet's own words (chap. vii. 10-15). First of all occurs the name, אָמוֹס. It may be mentioned in passing that the fathers, ignorant of Hebrew, confounded this name with אִמֹּץ, that of the father of Isaiah, and supposed the two persons to be one and the same; but Jerome denied the assertion. The meaning of the name is uncertain, perhaps = Bearer, or Heavy. His home was certainly, according to ch. vii. 10 ff., in the kingdom of Judah. He labored indeed in Ephraim, but this was considered strange by Amaziah, who reproved it as an insolent undertaking and bade him escape to Judah, so that manifestly, he did not reside in Bethel nor anywhere in Israel. The superscription puts his residence in Tekoa, a town in the tribe of Judah, often mentioned elsewhere in the Old Testament (2 Sam. xiv. 2; 2 Chron. xi. 6, xx. 20; Jer. vi. 1; also 1 Mac. ix. 33), and said by Jerome to be some miles south of Bethlehem, where its ruins are still preserved in the modern name of Tekua.

Here, according to ch. vii. 14, Amos was a בֹּקֵר, which naturally, according to its derivation, means herdman. But the 15th verse states that Jehovah took him from following צִדְיָן, and this word signifies sheep and goats in distinction from neat-cattle, so that the term herdman must be considered as used in a wide sense and including a shepherd's office. This is confirmed by the account of Tekoa given by Jerome, who knew the holy land from personal observation, and whose statements in his preface to our prophet, are therefore not to be regarded as mere inferences from this passage. He says that the country was sandy and barren, and therefore full of shepherds who made amends for its failure to yield crops by the number of their flocks. That there were many shepherds in the place is indicated by the title, in its saying that Amos was "among the נִקְדִּיב of Tekoa" (מִתְּהִקְדִּיב meaning, perhaps, those who had gone out from Tekoa to more distant pastures). The term נִקְדִּיב occurs besides this place only in 2 Kings iii. 4, where it is applied to the Moabitish king, Meshah, who in this capacity paid to the king of Israel a yearly tribute of 100,000 lambs, and as many rams. Accordingly it signifies a sheep-master. We may therefore regard Amos as an owner of flocks, but by no means as a wealthy sheep-owner. This is determined by what he says of himself (ch. vii. 14, 16), according to which he was a shepherd, and took care of the sheep, even if they were his own. But this phrase "among the shepherds of Tekoa," may refer merely to his residence, and so indicate his employment while he was living among these persons. He further calls himself שֹׁהַמִּים, one who cultivated sycamores for his support. This tree by its sweet fruit (Pliny, N. H., xiii. 14, calls it prædulcis) which it bears abundantly, afforded to a shepherd living in the open country a nutriment both ample and easily provided. So that Amos had a competent support, although he was not rich. Accordingly, in ch. vii. 12, etc., he rejects the summons to go to Judah and eat his bread there, on the ground that he did not prophesy for bread but had a competency of his own, implying also perhaps that as a shepherd he was satisfied with simple fare.

Here now as he abode among his flocks the call of the Lord reached him to prophesy concerning Israel. For he says expressly that he was neither a prophet nor a prophet's son, i. e., a pupil of the prophets, which excludes any thought of a school in which he had prepared himself for the work, or even that he had assumed it as a calling. In obedience to the summons he repaired to Bethel, the chief seat of the idol worship, in order to announce to the careless people the divine judgment. There the priest Amaziah sought to drive him away, as a seditious person. But he boldly resisted, and made his threatening still more severe. It is not stated whether he then went away or whether he continued his prophetic function. All that we further know of him is that his discourses were reduced to writing. Later traditions of his martyrdom have no historical value.

§ 2. The Age of the Prophet.

This in substance is well settled. For the book itself names Jeroboam (II.) as the king under whom Amos prophesied in Bethel. This king ascended the throne in the fifteenth of the twenty-nine years' reign of Amaziah, king of Judah; and reigned forty-one years. He was therefore fourteen years contemporary with Amaziah, and twenty-seven years with his successor Uzziah. The title puts Amos in the last two thirds of Jeroboam's reign, since it represents him as prophesying in the days of Jeroboam and Uzziah, i. e., while they were contemporary; and this is confirmed by the statement in ch. ix. 12 that "the remnant of Edom should be possessed," indicating that the Edomite capital, Selah, had already been conquered, which took place under Uzziah's father Amaziah (2 Kings xiv. 7). The time of the prophet's activity cannot be more closely defined within these twenty-seven years; only it is certain that it did not extend over the whole period, but was confined to a certain occasion. The title indicates this by the note — "two years before the earthquake." This would give us the precise date, if only we knew the time of the earthquake; but this not being the case, we gain nothing by the statement. It only confirms the view that Amos prophesied in the reign of Uzziah, for we have every reason to believe that this earthquake was the same with the one mentioned in Zechariah xiv. 5, which is there said to have occurred under Uzziah. (As to the object of this note, see below, ch. i. 1.)

Amos was somewhat earlier than Hosea, but still the latter was his contemporary, and carried on his work (undoubtedly using his materials, see below) of announcing judgment upon Ephraim, in a still more threatening manner and with a clearer indication that Assyria was to be the instrument of this judgment. On the other hand, Amos was younger than Joel, whose writings were known to him when he composed his own, since he expressly refers to them, adopting Joel's words in his commencement (ch. i. 2), and leaning upon them in the promise with which he concludes (ch. ix. 13).

The period of Amos's ministry was one of great external prosperity for the kingdom of Israel. Under Jeroboam II. it stood at the zenith of its power. Compare the picture of the rich who seek only the increase of their wealth and luxury, and feel so entirely secure. Certainly, as this picture directly shows, there was under this outward pomp and prosperity a deep moral decay which stood in close connection with the apostasy from pure religion. In Judah the case was different, but even there matters had become worse since the time of Joel. For Amos openly complains of a contempt of God's law and an inclination to idolatry, of which we find no trace in Joel. Israel, however, had sunk deep in corruption, yet no one either perceived or was willing to learn of any danger, all were in careless security. No political signs indicated any danger from a foreign foe. The Assyrians, indeed, attracted attention, but there was no probability that they would endanger the kingdom. It was too strong for that. And as to the danger resulting from inward moral decay, that was not apprehended, because men either disbelieved in a retributive, sin-avenging righteousness, or else excluded the thought of it from their minds. At this time the simple shepherd of Tekoa was sent into the kingdom of Israel to announce to it, and especially to the house of Jeroboam, God's judgment and their own downfall, as he says, ch. vii. 15. Any one who had a living faith in God and therefore in a divine retribution, might well conclude from a glance at the defection from a true faith and worship and the prevailing moral corruption, that such a people and kingdom were on the downward road and would fare ill. But it was a long step from this to the public announcement of a certain overthrow by a foreign conqueror. Just this is found in Amos; he does not indeed name the foe, but no one can mistake who is meant. Thus he showed himself possessed of a special revelation from God, as he expressly said in ch. vii. 15. Although no one thought particularly of Assyria, for which reason he does not name it, still he already saw in that kingdom the instrument of God's vengeance and so declared.

§ 3. The Book of the Prophet.

Under the name of this prophet we have a prophetic writing in nine chapters, containing chiefly threatenings against the kingdom of Israel, to which, on account of its prevailing grievous sins, it announces a grievous infliction, even overthrow by a hostile nation. Still the book is not limited to threatenings against Israel, but at least begins with threats upon the surrounding heathen, and then, like a genuine prophetic book, concludes with the promise of a new deliverance for Israel and a splendid prosperity under the house of David.

Entering more into detail, we are to consider —

1. The first and second chapters as a sort of introduction to the particular subject.

The second verse of chap. i. repeats a menace contained in Joel iv. 16, and then the nations around Israel are taken up in order, first the heathen, Damascus (i. 3-5), Philistia (6-8), Tyre (9-10), Edom (11, 12), Ammon (13-15), Moab (ii. 1-3), and then Judah (4-5), against each of which the divine wrath is announced in short, similar sentences, even "for three transgressions and for four," and is executed by "kindling a fire" in their capitals. Then the threatening turns to Israel, at first in the same phrase as before, but soon at greater length. There is a fuller detail of the prevailing sins, oppression of the poor, and lascivious luxury, together with a gross contempt for God's favors toward them as his people (6-12); and a fuller announcement of punishment, namely, complete subjugation under an invading foe (13-16). It is thus evident that the previous denunciations were intended only to pave the way for this one, and that Israel was especially aimed at, for which reason the prophet dwells on their case. Still the threatening is here only introduced, and the judgment is declared merely in general terms; the form of its fulfillment can only be conjectured.

2. The special charges and threats follow in chaps. iii.-vi. This division contains four discourses, — the first three of which begin with a "Hear this word" — in which the kingdom of Israel, especially the great men, on account of the prevailing sins, are threatened with a divine judgment in the shape of the destruction of palaces and sanctuaries, the overthrow of the kingdom, and the carrying away of the people, unless by seeking the Lord they seize the only hope of deliverance.

(a.) In chap. iii. the chief thought is manifestly that there should be no doubt about the coming of the judgment, since the prophet who bore Jehovah's commission could not speak in vain.

(b.) Chap. iv. bases the assurance of punishment on the fact that all previous visitations of God had been to no purpose, since repentance had not ensued. The judgment therefore must come.

(c.) In chap. v. we hear the outcry at approaching calamity, intermingled with calls to seek the Lord and love the good, as the only means of escape. It concludes with a woe pronounced upon those who desire the day of the Lord, which yet for them must be a day of terror, since all idolatry is an abomination to him. Then is added in —

(d.) Chap. vi., a woe upon those who on the contrary fancy the day of the Lord to be far off and therefore persevere in their frivolity until the judgment overtakes them by means of a people whom the Lord will raise up.

After these discourses about punishment comes a new division, —

3. Chaps. vii.-ix., in which the prophet recounts certain visions in which he has seen the fate of Israel, interspersed with historical details and threats of punishment, but at last passing into the promise of a new deliverance and prosperity for Israel.

(a.) Chap. vii. First, the prophet has two visions of punishment by Locusts and by Fire, which, however, are averted at his intercession. So much the more does the third vision, of the Plumb-line, show the downfall of the kingdom, and especially of the house of Jeroboam to be irreversible (1-9). The result of this announcement is that the priest Amaziah complains of Amos to the king and proposes his banishment. But Amos boldly meets him, affirms the divine call under which he was acting, and utters a still sharper threat, aimed especially at the priest.

(b.) Chap. viii. A fourth vision represents the ripeness of the people for judgment under the image of a basket of ripe fruit. Then the prophet commences with "Hear this" (as in chaps. iii., iv., v.), a denunciation of the sins of the higher classes, who are threatened with the sore grief of a famine of hearing the word of the Lord.

(c.) In a fifth vision the prophet sees under the image of an overthrow of the temple (at Bethel) which buries all in its ruins, the utter ruin of the kingdom by a divine judgment which none can escape; since God is almighty and Israel is not a whit better than the heathen (i. 7). Yet God will not destroy it entirely, but sift it by destroying all the sinners at ease, and then raise again David's fallen tent to a new glory. Thus the book concludes with the promise of a new deliverance under the house of David, when Israel will be richly blessed, and made as great and powerful as ever before, and never again be driven out of the land.

That the book whose contents are thus outlined forms one complete whole, can scarcely be disputed. But to press the inquiry closer, it is at once evident that chaps. i. and ii. are intimately connected, and in like manner chaps. iii.-vi. belong together. But that the latter division concurs with the former to make one whole is equally clear. A menace of judgment upon Israel could not possibly be satisfied with what is said in ii. 13-16, for in that case there would be no definiteness and certainty as to what Israel was to expect. The further statements in the following discourses are a matter of necessity. Moreover, a comparison of ii. 6-8 with iii. 9, 10, v. 7, 11, vi. 4, shows a striking similarity between the sins censured in both cases. The unity of the first six chapters is then established. As to chaps. vii.-ix., no argument is needed to show their mutual coherence. But the question arises, whether they did not originally form an independent whole which a subsequent editor appended to the foregoing, or conversely made the foregoing a preface to it. There is much to favor its independent character. It differs from what precedes, both in matter as containing visions, and in form, as the prophet speaks in the first person. Notwithstanding, its close connection—at least in the state in which we now have it—with chaps. i.-vi., is unquestionable. The chief evidence of this seems to me to lie in chap. viii. 4 seq.; which bears an unmistakable relation to what is already found in chaps. iii.-vi. The reproof is the same in both. Compare the introductory words "Hear ye;" the censure of sins in viii. 4, etc., with ch. ii. 6, etc., and ch. v. 11, 12; and also, the announcement of judgment in viii. 10 with ch. v. 15. So close is the correspondence that one might be tempted to think that the latter passages were a subsequent insertion, which of course would destroy the argument for the original coherence of the whole. But we can hardly assume this theory of insertion by an editor, simply because the words, viii. 4, etc., are somewhat abrupt and do not seem to be exactly in their place. If an alteration were made, we should suppose they would have been taken away from their present place and joined to the foregoing passages, to which they seem more suited. Here applies the critical canon that the more difficult reading is to be preferred. But then it is to be observed that the conclusion, (ix. 11, etc.,) undeniably reëchoes the conclusion of Joel, and still more does ch. i. 2 connect itself with Joel. This fact shows beyond mistake that our book in its present state originated from one hand, and farther, since its beginning and its end are original, integral elements proceeding from the author himself, that we must consider the book as a complete whole, as certainly so prepared by its author.

If this be so, it follows that the prophet Amos, who in chap. vii. speaks of himself in the first person, is necessarily the composer not merely of the account of these visions, but also of the whole book. If at first we understood from the superscription that the substance of these utterances proceeded from Amos, much more must we suppose that they were reduced to writing and united with the foregoing books by him; and we must consider the superscription as prefixed to this, as it undoubtedly will, and of right ought to be, considered. That he who in ch. vii. says "I" is no other than Amos, is plain from verse 10, etc., where he is so called, but that he is here spoken of in the third person is no evidence that he is not the author. Of the portions marked with the "I," both preceding and following, he is certainly such, but we need not for that reason consider the intervening passage vii. 10-17 as inserted by another; for Hosea, in the beginning of his prophecy, in the portion (chap. i. 2) which undoubtedly is his own, also speaks of himself in the third person. Besides, the transition to the third person here is altogether simple and natural, since he was repeating what Amaziah charged against him. And having thus spoken, he continues in the same manner in the 12th and 13th verses. Moreover, since the subject relates to the personal experiences of the prophet, there is the less reason for considering it another's interpolation in a writing the rest of which was composed by Amos. No, it is Amos alone who relates what befell him in his prophesying, and then speaks of his origin and his mission, and afterwards utters a new menace against Amaziah. And this is not added as a mere matter of history, but the account of the occurrence with Amaziah bears so directly upon this speech to him that it is perfectly plain that the author of the one is the author of the other, i. e., that the prophet himself, and no one else, has produced the whole. In favor of Amos's authorship is the style, in which are manifold reminiscences of a pastoral life. (See below.) In the first instance, this proves only that the separate discourses came from Amos, but not that he composed the whole. But since after what has been said the theory of its compilation by a third person is inadmissible, the argument for Amos as the author is greatly strengthened by these peculiarities of language. Besides, we could not properly speak of "Discourses of Amos" which another person has collected together, but the book in its present form is to be considered as an original composition of its author, based upon the "discourses" he had delivered orally.

This leads to the question concerning the precise origin of the book, — which is not answered by determining that it is a consistent whole and was the work of Amos. For here, more than in the other prophets, do we need to understand the relation of the book to the public, oral activity of the prophet.

A public and therefore oral announcement of prophecies against Israel is expressly ascribed to Amos. Just for this purpose he who was originally a herdsman came forth as a prophet. The question is, What were those oral prophecies, and how were they related to our book? Ewald and Baur assume that chaps. vii.—ix. 10, contain what was originally said at Bethel, and that the first part, chaps. i.—vi. and the Messianic conclusion, are only a written statement, devised by Amos after his return from Bethel to Judah, in order to make his utterances effective for a wider circle. This view is quite plausible: for thus is most easily explained the difference in form between the first part and the second, and also, the singular interruption of the prophecies by a historical narration, ch. vii. 10, etc. One is inclined, besides, to think that the herdsman of Tekoah first received in the form of visions the divine revelation and the command, "Go, prophesy to my people Israel" (vii. 15); and that the longer discourses are an afterthought belonging to the written statement. But even if, as we shall see, there is some weight in the latter consideration, still we cannot accept the entire view as correct. The report of the three visions in chap. vii., of which two contained the prophet's intercession and a consequent respite of judgment, and only the third was a pure menace, could not possibly have provoked the interference of Amaziah against the prophet. He speaks of "all his words" which the land is not able to bear, and gives a summary of them in the 11th verse. But manifestly he here states only the point to which the words of Amos in verse 9 seemed to him to tend, and which in his view proved that he was aiming at a conspiracy. But the language of the priest presupposes that the prophet had spoken much more than the single menace contained in the third vision. Or may we assume that, even if these visions contain all that was then said in Bethel, he had yet formerly declared there the other visions recorded in chaps. viii. and ix., before Amaziah came forward against him? His coming forward would then be accounted for. But — as Baur himself rightly emphasizes, though to prove the opposite — it is not consistent to regard as supposititious the passage which now contains the historical narrative (verse 10 ff.), because it is not conceivable that it should have been interpolated here, where at first it seems to make confusion, unless it had originally belonged just to this place. This being so, "all the words which the land was not able to bear" must be found in the preceding chapters. And there is the less objection to this, since among the discourses certainly made in Bethel, there is one (ch. viii. 4 ff.) which, as was before said, is closely related to the discourses in the first part.

As there are no external grounds for limiting the discourses at Bethel to chap. vii., so there are no internal reasons. For there is here merely a threatening of punishment, but no mention of sin as the cause of the judgment, except ch. viii. 4-6, and still less any call to repentance, founded either upon God's mercies to Israel, especially the divine call of the nation, or upon earlier warnings and visitations. Yet without this we cannot conceive of a prophetic menace of punishment. Even had the prophet begun with pure threatening, yet this must afterwards at least have been accompanied with explanations and reasons; but, as has been said, these are almost entirely wanting in ch. vii. ff. But they occur in the first part, and therefore the threatening visions in the second part certainly presuppose the existence of the former. Moreover, I think the traces of oral speech in the discourses of the first part can hardly be mistaken; e. g., in ch. iv. the mention of former visitations and their inefficacy — "yet have ye not returned unto me;" or in ch. v., the warnings: "Seek the Lord;" or the reproach of empty formal worship, ver. 21, etc. The references to Joel also, e. g., ch. v. 18, may well have belonged to the oral utterances. On the other hand, we naturally do not find in our book, Amos's oral addresses either in substance or form as they were originally delivered. It was only the essential portion which he reduced to writing, and the form manifestly belongs to the prophecy only as written. It is vain therefore to attempt now to distinguish the particular portions that were spoken. They are merged in a new composition prepared in a free independent manner. But while they furnish the principal points treated, manifestly it is to the written statement that we owe the introduction in chaps. i. and ii., so far at least as foreign nations are concerned, therefore as far as ii. 5, and in like manner the concluding promise of a new deliverance in ix. 11.

The threatenings in ch. i. against other nations pave the way to the chief theme, the announcements of wrath against Israel. And then again these announcements to Israel pave the way to the promise of a new gracious visitation by which God will show that Israel is still his people.

This leads us to consider the aim and motive of the preparation of our book. Its fundamental thought, the appearance of Amos at Bethel with his testimony against Israel, does not explain why it was written. It furnished indeed the chief materials, but had the writing intended only to preserve these from being lost, it would have simply reproduced them in a somewhat free form; but it had also another aim of its own, and to reach this availed itself of the oral utterances without confining itself to them. The appearance of Amos as a prophet of wrath to Israel is sufficiently explained by the commission, "Go, prophecy to my people, Israel," but not his appearance as the author of our book. To understand this we must fix our eyes upon the portions not belonging to his personal ministry, — the introduction and conclusion, and especially the references to Joel's writings. Since Amos begins his book with the menace announced by Joel in iv. 16, and concludes it with a promise like that of Joel in iv. 18, his whole prophecy, as it were, falls between these two verses and is framed out of Joel's menace and Joel's promise. Joel, as we have before shown, knew only of a divine judgment upon the heathen in the Lord's day for the deliverance and exaltation of Judah, for when he afterwards saw the latter threatened with a judgment, he also saw it averted by repentance. This writing of Joel was widely diffused. But gradually its terms came to be perverted, and its promise of salvation was made a pretext for careless security (see ver. 18, where the day of the Lord is regarded as necessarily a day of salvation for Israel). Even among those who highly prized the prophets, the non-arrival of the threatened day of the Lord with its judgment upon the heathen, and consequently the non-arrival of the glorious salvation for Israel after that judgment, might awaken a mistrust of the prophetic declarations, and even indifference and unbelief (cf. Baur, pp. 61, 113). Therefore Amos now confirms Joel's prophecy and at the same time extends it in accordance with the altered circumstances. Both Joel's threatening and his promise remain true, but no longer so separated that the former applies only to the heathen, and the latter to Israel because of their repentance. The threatening remains true against Israel's foes, the heathen, nay, in chaps. i., ii. 5 is executed, cf. "I will not turn it away;" but certainly this is no longer the prominent feature. Judah itself has become guilty, is filled with idolatry, and is therefore threatened with a divine judgment. Especially in the kingdom of Israel, to which Joel does not allude, has sinful corruption reached so high a point that the herdsman of Tekoah is expressly commissioned to announce God's wrath to this large division of the covenant people. So little justification had Israel for their carnal confidence in their divine vocation upon the ground of Joel's prediction of a judgment upon their foes, so far was his threatening of the Lord's day of judgment from passing away, that it would certainly come to pass, only in a broader range and still more incisively, since the Lord would enter into judgment with his degenerate people, — which even Joel had, according to chaps. i. and ii., considered not improbable, and even had feared for Judah, although the degeneracy there was not so great as in Israel, but now thought that it was averted by serious repentance. But as Joel's threatening remains true, so also does his promise for Israel, especially for Judah, only it is brought about by a judgment upon Israel, so far as it had departed from God's ways, and therefore had become the sinful kingdom of Israel, — a judgment by which "a chastisement but at the same time a purification is introduced." The judgment is like a storm which overwhelms and desolates, but at the same time purifies, and therefore carries a blessing in its bosom by making room for the clearer light of the sun. Perhaps it is in reference to this that Amos begins with the words of Joel iv. 16, where the Lord's coming forth to judge is represented under the figure of a tempest, a violent convulsion of nature.

Here may be quoted the manner in which Schlier (Minor Prophets, p. 70) strikingly presents the contents of our book from this point of view: "This little book is wonderfully arranged. With a single word Joel rouses Amos; it is as it were the text of his whole prophecy, the substance of all his utterances; and what he declared was the thundering voice of God's judgment upon his people. A frightful storm comes down on Israel; we see the lightnings flashing hither and thither from one people to another till at last the gloomy storm-clouds stand over Israel and discharge themselves upon their guilty heads. But finally after fearful bursts, the tempest passes away, and the pure blue heaven comes out over the people of God. This is the sum of our prophecy. We see a storm issuing from the Lord with all his terrors, but also with all his blessing, in which it at last terminates. What Amos as a herdsman had heard and seen in the open country with his herds, he as a prophet brings before our spiritual vision with marvelous fidelity."

We have sought to deduce the aim of the prophecy from the express references to Joel. But perhaps we have an indication of its outward motive in the note of time with which the title concludes — "two years before the earthquake." If these words came from Amos himself (see on ch. i. 1), they inform us at once of the time of the composition, namely, after the earthquake, and also of the time of the public delivery of the prophecies, namely, two years before that event; thus showing that they were distinct from each other. But the presumption is natural that these words indicate not only the period but the motive of the composition, namely, the occurrence of the violent earthquake. That event announced a sore judgment from God. And just as the plague of the locusts induced Joel to sound his call to repentance, since he regarded it as the beginning of the day of the Lord, so this earthquake led Amos — not, indeed, to his predictions of wrath, for these had occurred before — but to record them at length. For he had in his oral utterances announced a heaving of the earth as an expression of God's wrath; and now the earth did heave. What then was more natural than that he should see in this a confirmation of his threat, a token of its fulfillment; and regard the occasion as an appropriate one for addressing his contemporaries in writing, as he had before done orally, in a somewhat enlarged form, especially by the introduction and the conclusion, and with a reference to Joel for the reasons already mentioned? We may even find an external reason for the close connection with Joel iv. 16 in this earthquake, since it would appear to Amos as an outward confirmation of Joel's prophecy, and he could have said to his contemporaries: You hear the fulfillment of Joel's words, how God who dwells in Zion "roars and utters his voice" — for the earthquake must have been accompanied with a tempest. God himself having thus spoken on behalf of his prophet, so much the more should a second prophet deem it his duty and his right, to confirm in the enlarged and completed form before mentioned, his predecessor's prophecies already diffused among his contemporaries, but partly misapplied and partly discredited; and in order to this end, to record and publish his own discourses.

From what has been said, the significance of our prophet plainly appears. Of fundamental importance here is Joel's work, by its precise and sharp apportionment of punishment and deliverance — the former to Israel's foes, the latter to Israel as God's chosen people. The final result is imperishable salvation and glory for God's people, and overthrow and destruction for his foes, the world. But while this ultimate issue is held fast, it is endeavored to show to God's people God's seriousness, and to set clearly in the light the distinction between the true and the degenerate members of the people, especially to give a death-blow to the false and wicked boasting in the prerogatives of a divine vocation, while there was a total failure of the character belonging to that vocation, in short, to an arbitrary appropriation of the divine grace. This step in advance is taken by Amos when he turns the avenging sword of the Spirit against Israel itself, and declares that it, just so far as it resembles the Heathen in conduct, is in like manner exposed to the divine judgment. Still he holds high the banner of hope. The judgment is one of purification. As true as it is, on the one hand, that Israel will not be spared, so true is it, on the other, that Israel will not be destroyed — that Jehovah still has purposes of mercy for this nation, who are and will remain his people.

Thus we find in Amos the prophetic theme made more profound and incisive. It cuts Israel to the quick, and so strikes the note which succeeding prophets carry on, first, his younger contemporary, Hosea, who with all the weight of prophetic earnestness and with a glance taking in at once the entire condition of the people, announces God's judgment on the kingdom as upon an unfaithful adulterous wife. And as in Amos, and still more in Hosea, the judgment does not spare Judah, so Micah and Isaiah go farther and mention Judah as especially exposed to it. But so much the more fully do they set forth the salvation which God has prepared and devised for his people. He remains faithful, his love is unchangeable; and ever clearer and more certain stands before their eyes the form of the Messiah, in whom God's love and faithfulness find their concrete expression.

The influence of the book of Amos upon the course of prophecy is shown by the use made of him, especially by Hosea. Compare Hos. viii. 14 with Am. ii. 5 (i. 4, 7, 10, 12, 14, ii. 2); Hos. xii. 10 with Amos ii. 10; Hos. xii. 8 with Am. viii. 5; Hos. ix. 3 with Am. vii. 17. The later prophets, especially Jeremiah, show a considerable dependence upon Amos: compare Jer. xlix. 27 with Am. i. 4; xlix. 3 with i. 1, 15 (xli. 6 with ii. 14); xlviii. 24 with i. 12, ii. 2; xlix. 13, 20-22 with i. 12; farther, xxv. 30 with i. 2; xxxi. 35 with iv. 13, v. 8, xlv. 2 with ix. 4, 8. But particularly in his prophecies upon foreign lands does Amos appear the forerunner of the later prophets.

As to the style of our prophet, Jerome indeed calls him "rude in speech but not in knowledge," not, however, as a reproach, but in allusion to 2 Cor. xi. 6, in order to show, as Baur says, that while as a herdsman he was not acquainted with the formal rules of rhetoric, the inward force of his mind made good the lack of outward dexterity. Compare Augustine (De Doct. Chr., iv. 7), "For these things were not composed by human industry, but were poured forth by the divine mind both wisely and eloquently, wisdom not aiming at eloquence, but eloquence not departing from wisdom." And Lowth (De Sac. Poesi Heb.) justly remarks upon the assertion that Amos is rude, ineloquent, and unadorned, "Far otherwise! Let any fair judge read his writings, thinking not who wrote them, but what he wrote, and he will deem our shepherd to be in nowise behind the very chiefest prophets; in the loftiness of his thoughts and the magnificence of his spirit almost equal to the highest, and in splendor of diction and elegance of composition scarcely inferior to any." Yes, his style is such that although we emphasize the agency of the illuminating Spirit of God, still on the other hand we must allow to the prophet no small degree of natural culture, without, however, thinking of a learned education. It was rather a cultivation originated by conversance with the Law and with the holy books, and fostered by religious instruction and a religious mind, such as would befit a man of the people to whom by all means applies the saying, It is the heart that makes eloquent. We do not refer here to the sharp, piercing seriousness of Amos, for this belongs more to the substance than the form of a prophet. On the other hand, we may point to the soaring elevation of the speech, e. g., in the delineations of God, ch. iv. 13, v. 8, ix. 5, 6; to the peculiarly bold and vivid diction, stroke upon stroke, in describing the judgments, chaps. i. and ii., or in the complaints in ch. iv. on account of the failure to repent. But as Amos has an intuitive power of individualizing his conceptions which often imparts a poetical coloring to his speech, so his style hovers between prose and poetry, and forms a peculiar kind of prophetic utterance. See ii. 6-8, 13; iii. 3; v. 16, vi. 8, 4; ix. 2, 13. Herein the diction is little distinguished by depth of thought, but so much the more does it display a transparent clearness which in many cases is increased by the symmetry of the arrangement, as in the entire introduction, and again in the fourth chapter, and in the visions. Observe also the commencement of each of the three discourses, chaps. iii., iv., and v., with the phrase "Hear ye," and the twofold "Woe," in chaps. v. 18 and vi. 1, by which the larger divisions are denoted.

When in conclusion we emphasize the imagery of the book, this leads to a more general observation. In the view of what has been said, one might doubt the composition of this work by a mere shepherd, but on the other hand it is very noticeable how reminiscences of a shepherd-life everywhere appear. Justly has Ewald remarked (Proph., i. 117): "The simple circle of country life has entirely filled his imagination; nowhere else among the prophets do we find rustic images given with such originality and vividness and inexhaustible abundance. Not merely do the numerous comparisons and particular images, but also the minutest lines of the conceptions and the expression exhibit the peculiar experience and intuition of this prophet." Of detailed instances Baur in his Commentary gives the fullest collection; of these we cite only a portion. Amos refers almost all things to the sphere of a countryman. Chaps. iv. 6-9; v. 16; iii. 15; v. 11 (country-seats of the great); ii. 8; iv. 9; v. 11, 17; vi. 6, ix. 14 (vineyards). His images also are taken from the experiences of country life. Chaps. ix. 13; i. 2; iv. 13; v. 8, 18, viii. 9 (an eclipse of the sun is to a shepherd a natural image); ii. 9, 13; iii. 4, 5, 8; v. 19; viii. 13; iii. 12; ix. 5; vi. 12. As a plain shepherd, Amos particularly dislikes the dissoluteness of luxurious cities (chaps. ii. 6; iii. 10; iv. 1; v. 10; vi. 4), especially when it is based upon usurious dealings in grain to oppress the poor (ch. viii. 8, comp. with vi. 7). Since the contemplation of the starry heavens belongs characteristically to a shepherd living in the open air, Amos prefers to represent God's majesty and power by his mighty workings in nature. Chaps. iv. 13; v. 8; viii. 9; ix. 5.

A peculiar mode of writing many words may be attributed to the fact that the author "came not from Jerusalem, the centre of the culture of the time" (Ewald), e. g., מַעֲיָה for מַעֲיָה (ii. 13), מַרְעֵב for מַרְעֵב (vi. 8), בּוֹשֵׁשׁ for בּוֹשֵׁשׁ or בּוֹשֵׁשׁ (v. 11), מִשְׁרָף for מִשְׁרָף (vi. 10), יִצְדָּק for יִצְדָּק (vii. 16). [Pusey says, The like variations to these instances in Amos are also found in other words in the Bible. On the whole we may suspect the existence of a softer pronunciation in the south of Judæa, where Amos lived; but the only safe inference is, the extreme care with which the words have been handed down to us, just as the Prophet wrote and spoke them."]

[The influence of the shepherd-life of Amos appears most in the sublimest part of his prophecy, his descriptions of the mighty workings of God. With those awful and sudden changes in nature, by which what to the idolaters was an object of worship was suddenly overcast and the day made dark with night, his shepherd-life had made him familiar. The starry heavens had often witnessed the silent intercourse of his soul with God. In the calf, the idolaters of Ephraim worshipped "nature." Amos then delights in exhibiting to them his God, whom they too believed that they worshipped as the creator of "nature," wielding and changing it at his will. All nature too should be obedient to its maker in the punishment of the ungodly, nor should anything hide from Him (viii. 8, ix. 2, 3, 5). The shepherd life would also make the prophet familiar with the perils from wild beasts which we know of as facts in David's youth. The images drawn from them were probably reminiscences of what he had seen or met with. . . . The religious life of Amos amid the scenes of nature, accustomed him as well as David, to express his thoughts in words taken from the great picture-book of nature, which as being also written by the hand of God, so wonderfully expresses the things of God. When his prophet's life brought him among other scenes of cultivated nature, his soul so practiced in reading the relations of the physical to the moral world, took the language of his parables alike from what he saw or what he remembered. He was what we call "a child of nature," endued with power and wisdom by his God. It is a mistake to attribute to him any inferiority even of outward style, in consequence of his shepherd life. Even a heathen has said, "words readily follow thought;" much more when thoughts and words are poured into the soul together by God the Holy Ghost. On the contrary, scarcely any prophet is more glowing in his style, or combines more wonderfully the natural and moral world, the omnipotence and omniscience of God (iv. 13). What is more poetic than the summons to the heathen enemies of Israel to people the heights about Samaria and behold its sins (iii. 9)? What more graphic than that picture of utter despair which dared not name the name of God (vi. 9, 10)? What bolder than the summons to Israel to come, if they willed, at once to sin and to atone for their sin (iv. 4)? What more striking in power than the sudden turn (iii. 2), "You only have I known; therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities;" or the sudden summons (iv. 12), "Because I will do this unto thee (the silence as to what the this is, is more thrilling than words), prepare to meet thy God, O Israel?" Or what more pathetic than the close of the picture of the luxurious rich, when having said how they heaped luxuries one upon another, he ends with what they did not do; "they are not grieved for the afflictions of Joseph?" — Pusey.]

AMOS.

CHAPTERS I., II.

The Superscription (ch. i. 1).

- 1 The words of Amos (who was among the shepherds of Tekoa), which he saw concerning Israel, in the days of Uzziah king of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash king of Israel, two years before the earthquake.

And he said :—

- I. The Divine Judgment is announced first against the Countries lying around Israel, then against the Kingdom of Judah, but at last remains standing over the Kingdom of Israel (chaps. i. 2—ii. 16).

- 2 Jehovah roars out of Zion,
And out of Jerusalem he utters his voice
Then the pastures of the shepherds wither
And the head of Carmel is dried up.

(a) Damascus (vers. 3–5).

- 3 Thus saith Jehovah,
For three transgressions of Damascus
And for four — I will not reverse it —
Because they threshed Gilead with iron rollers,
4 I will send fire into the house of Hazael,
And it shall devour the palaces of Ben-hadad.
5 And I will shatter the bolt of Damascus,
And cut off the inhabitant from the vale of Aven,
And the sceptre-holder out of Beth-Eden ;
And the people of Syria shall go into captivity to Kir, saith Jehovah.

(b) Gaza (vers. 6–8).

- 6 Thus saith Jehovah,
For three transgressions of Gaza,
And for four — I will not reverse it —
Because they carried away captives¹ in full number²
To deliver them up to Edom,
7 I will send fire into the wall of Gaza,
And it shall devour their palaces.

- 8 And I will cut off the inhabitant from Ashdod
And the sceptre-holder from Ashkelon;
And I will turn my hand against Ekron
And the remnant of the Philistines shall perish, saith the Lord, Jehovah.

(c) Tyre (vers. 9, 10).

- 9 Thus saith Jehovah,
For three transgressions of Tyre,
And for four — I will not reverse it —
Because they delivered prisoners in full number to Edom,
And remembered not the brotherly covenant,
10 I will send fire into the wall of Tyre
And it shall devour their palaces.

(d) Edom (vers. 11, 12).

- 11 Thus saith Jehovah,
For three transgressions of Edom,
And for four — I will not reverse it —
Because he pursues his brother with the sword,
And stifles his compassion,³
And his wrath continually tears in pieces,
And his anger endures forever,⁴
12 I will send fire into Teman
And it shall devour the palaces of Bozrah.

(e) Ammon (vers. 13-15).

- 13 Thus saith Jehovah,
For three transgressions of the sons of Ammon,
And for four — I will not reverse it —
Because they ripped up the pregnant women of Gilead,
To enlarge their border,
14 I will kindle a fire in the wall of Rabbah,
And it shall devour their palaces,
With a war-shout in the day of battle,
With a storm in the day of the whirlwind.
15 And their king⁵ shall go into captivity,
He and his princes together, saith Jehovah.

CHAPTER II.

(f) Moab (vers. 1-3).

- 1 Thus saith Jehovah,
For three transgressions of Moab
And for four — I will not reverse it —
Because it burned the bones of the king of Edom into lime,
2 I will send fire into Moab,
And it shall devour the palaces of Kerioth,
And Moab shall die in the tumult,
With a war-shout, with a trumpet-blast;

- 3 And I will cut off the judge⁶ from the midst thereof,
And will slay all his princes with him, saith Jehovah.

(g) Judah (vers. 4, 5).

- 4 Thus saith Jehovah,
For three transgressions of Judah,
And for four — I will not reverse it —
Because they despised the law⁷ of Jehovah,
And kept not his commandments,⁷
And their lies misled them,
After which their fathers walked ;

- 5 I will send fire into Judah,
And it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem.

(h) Israel (vers. 6-16)

- 6 Thus saith Jehovah,
For three transgressions of Israel
And for four — I will not reverse it —
Because they sell the righteous for money,
And the needy for⁸ a pair of shoes ;
- 7 They who pant after the dust of the earth upon the afflicted,
And pervert the way of the sufferers ;
And a man and his father go in to the same girl
In order⁹ to profane my holy name :
- 8 And they stretch themselves upon pawned clothes by every altar,
And they drink the wine of the punished¹⁰ in the house of their God.¹¹
- 9 And yet¹² I destroyed the Amorite before them,
Him who was as high as the cedars
And as strong as the oaks ;
And I destroyed his fruit from above
And his roots from beneath.
- 10 And yet I brought you up from the land of Egypt,
And led you in the wilderness forty years,
To inherit the land of the Amorite ;
- 11 And I raised up of your sons prophets,
And of your young men dedicated ones.
Is it not so, ye sons of Israel ? saith Jehovah.
- 12 But ye made the dedicated ones drink wine,
And commanded the prophets, saying, " Prophecy not."
- 13 Behold, I will press you down¹³
As the full¹⁴ cart presses the sheaves.
- 14 Then shall flight be lost¹⁵ to the swift,
And the strong shall not confirm his strength,
And the hero shall not save his life.
- 15 He that beareth the bow shall not stand,
And the swift-footed shall not save, —
And the rider of the horse shall not save his life,¹⁶

16 And the courageous one among the heroes,—
Naked shall he flee away in that day, saith the Lord.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- 1 Chap. i. ver. 6. — גָּלוּת, lit., exile; but usually concrete, exiles.
- 2 Ver. 6. — שָׁלֵם, complete, therefore in full number = all the prisoners.
- 3 Ver. 11. — וְשָׂחַת depends upon כִּל, which continues in force as a conjunction. — וְשָׂחַת, destroys = stifles his compassion = acts mercifully.
- 4 Ver. 11. — וְעֵבֶר may be rendered, and his wrath lies in wait forever, namely, to perpetrate cruelties. [So Kwald; but Kell justly objects that the verb, applied to wrath in Jer. iii. 5, means to keep, preserve, and that lying in wait is inapplicable to an emotion.] שָׁמְרָה for שָׁמְרָה, the accent being drawn back because of the tone-syllable in the following word, נִצָּח. [Ewald and Green make שָׁמְרָה a nominative absolute, and suppose an omitted maqqik in the last letter of the verb, so as to translate, "and it keeps its wrath forever."]]
- [5 Ver. 15. — מַלְכָּה. Some of the Greek versions, followed by the Syriac and Jerome, give the form Μαλχου, Met-ehom, as a proper name, but the common text is sustained by the LXX. and Chaldee, and required by the connection.]
- 6 Chap. ii. ver. 3. — שׁוֹפֵט analogous to שָׁפֵט, in i. 5, 8, is simply a rhetorical variation for שָׁפֵט.
- [7 Ver. 4. — הַתּוֹרָה = God's law, his preceptive will in general. הַדִּקּוּם = the separate precepts, whether ceremonial or moral.]
- 8 Ver. 6. — כִּי יִדְבָּר is not synonymous with כִּי, pretti, but means on account of. Fürst, Kell, etc. [Pusey and Wordsworth adopt the former view.]
- 9 Ver. 7. — לִמְעַן, not "so that," but, "in order that," indicating that the sin was practiced not from weakness or ignorance, but a studious contempt of the Holy God.
- 10 Ver. 8. — עֲנִשִּׁים: punished in money, i. e., fined, as in the margin of the Auth. Version.
- 11 Ver. 8. — אֱלֹהֵיהֶם, not their gods, i. e., idols [as Henderson], but their God.
- [12 Ver. 9. — The repetition of the personal pronoun אֲנִי, here and in ver. 10, is very emphatic, equivalent to our English phrase, "It was I who," etc.]
- 13 Ver. 13. — הָעֵרִי, to enclose, compress, crush, הַתְּחִיבֶם, Kell renders "down upon you" = crush you. [So Winzer, Gesenius, Ewald.] Fürst takes the word here and elsewhere as a substantive, meaning place, position, and renders, "I will compress your standing-place." The pressure is compared to that of a cart. According to the usual explanation, the cart is further defined as full of sheaves. But in that case it is strange that the pressure of a full cart should be used to represent the destructive crushing here intended. A more appropriate comparison is found in the pressure by which a threshing cart threshes the sheaves. It is better therefore to take עָרִיר as the object, and to refer הַתְּחִיבֶם to לָהּ עָרִירָה = the full threshing cart, since such a cart is always conceived of as heavily laden. The explanation of Fürst is forced. He supplies כִּל כִּלָּהּ, to which he refers the adjective, so as to render "upon the floor full of sheaves."
- 14 Ver. 13. — הַמְלֵאָה לָהּ, lit., "which is full in itself, has quite filled itself."
- [15 Ver. 14. — אֶבֶד מְנוּחַ. The same combination is found in Ps. cxlii. 4.]
- 16 Ver. 15. — נִשְׁאָר belongs to both members of the verse.
- 17 Ver. 16. — אִמָּץ לִבּוֹ = "the strong in his heart," i. e., "the courageous."

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. The Superscription. The words of Amos. The expression is somewhat unusual. It is customary to state the contents of a prophecy as "the word of Jehovah" which came to this one or that one, as in the first verse of Hosea, Joel, Micah, etc. Jeremiah uses the same phrase as Amos, but adds expressly, "to whom the word of Jehovah came." Here also the divine inspiration of "the words of Amos" is put beyond doubt by the addition, which he saw, for רָאָה is the technical formula to denote the prophet's immediate intuition of divine truth. His "words" therefore originated in such an intuition, and were not the outflow and expression of his own thoughts. He "saw" first what he afterwards recorded, and this seeing rested upon a divine revelation. Upon the addition to the prophet's name, who was among, etc., see the Introduction, § 1.

Upon Israel. The peculiar aim of the prophet's utterances is the kingdom of Ephraim; but this came into view only in so far as it was a kingdom of Israel, and contained a part—in extent a greater part—of the people of Israel. Besides, the threatenings extend to the kingdom of Judah, therefore to all Israel. Moreover, it must be considered that these threatenings terminate in the promise after their execution of a new glorious Israel, in which no account is taken of the existing division of the kingdom. As to the note of time in the days of Uzziah, etc., see the Introduction, § 2, where it is shown to be correct according to the contents of the book.

Two years before the earthquake. See also the Introduction. This date is not so much chronological as argumentative. It is inserted in reference to chap. viii. 8 (also ix. 5), since this earthquake occurring two years after the prophesying, was a declaration in act that God would make good the words of his servant. As to the genuineness of the entire superscription, no argument against it is to be found in the statement "who was among the herdmen," etc., and especially the expression "who was;" or if indeed this statement is not original, it might yet have been inserted in a superscription otherwise genuine. In favor of this view is the above-mentioned unusual character of the phrase "words of Amos which he saw." It is scarce conceivable that a later editor would use this expression rather than the customary one, "The word of the Lord which came," etc. If then the words "two years before the earthquake" are cited, as by Baur, as a proof of spuriousness, because if genuine the prophecy must have been written two years after Amos's appearance in Beth-el, while its whole character shows that it was written soon after that event, we answer that this latter assertion is wholly unfounded. Nothing forbids the opinion that two years, which is no great space of time, elapsed before the record was made, and besides we have before shown that the book is by no means a mere record of the oral discourse. On the other hand, even Baur himself must admit that the precise date and the peculiar form of the superscription presuppose in any event its composition not long after the prophecies were delivered. Surely he who prefixed these words did it in reference, as above stated, to its bearing upon the subject of the prophecies following. And as there is nothing against the authorship of Amos, it is most natural to think that he who suggested the reference recorded it. Besides, we have already seen (Introduction, §3) that there is reason to believe that the earthquake induced Amos to write his prophecies; indeed, he perhaps refers to it in verse 2. Certainly then nothing is more natural than to assume that he himself contributed this note of time, and thus indicated the inducement which led him to write.

Chap. i. ver. 2. Jehovah roars out of Zion, etc. Comp. Joel iv. 16. Amos connects himself directly with Joel in describing the judgments upon the heathen as enemies of God's people. For even from ver. 3, he announces the divine wrath upon all the surrounding nations. But suddenly the denunciation turns to Judah, and then to Israel, where it remains standing, so that it is plain that he aimed especially at Israel, and that the threats against the heathen which seemed to be most important, served only for an introduction to what follows. This appears even in the verse before us, since he applies the phrase borrowed from Joel differently from that prophet, namely, against Israel, for since the drying up of Carmel is stated to be the result of God's wrath, "the pastures of the shepherds," which are said to wither, are to be referred to Israel. "Woods and pastures are mentioned by Amos in accordance with his peculiar mode of characterizing the country." Or, we are to assign the "meads of the shepherds" to the pasture grounds of the wilderness of Judah, which was the prophet's home in the south, and to this Carmel stands opposed on the north, so that Amos sees the whole land from south to north withered. The "withering" means generally destruction, not to be limited to mere drought as a natural occurrence, although this is not excluded, but extending to the devastation of a foreign foe, as the later statements require.

From ver. 3 begin the threatenings against the heathen—in the way of a preface. The storm of divine wrath rolls around the outlying kingdoms, until it comes to a stand on Israel. The heathen kingdoms mentioned in their order are six: Syria (Damascus), Gaza, or rather all Philistia (ver. 8). Tyre, Edom, Ammon, Moab. These manifestly constitute two groups, three in each. For the three first are more distant from Israel, the latter nearer, as allied in origin. The ground of their punishment is stated to be their transgressions, especially against Israel; they come into view, therefore, as enemies of God's people, and as such are threatened with wrath. In the succession of the groups we see a climax of guilt, since naturally the ill-doing of a kindred people is worse than that of a foreign race. Upon this ground the question, why just these were selected, answers itself. It was these from whom Israel had severely suffered, and their guilt lay in the foreground. They are then representatives of a class; a threatening upon such grounds proclaims the guilt of a similar course of action generally—wherever it may be found.

See further, in respect to the bearing of menaces against the heathen upon menaces against Israel, in the Doctrinal and Practical Remarks.

2. Damascus—Syria, vers. 3-5. Thus saith Jehovah; for three transgressions, etc. It is peculiar that the threatenings throughout both chapters are always introduced in the same manner. The phrase "for three—and for four," is well explained by Hitzig, who says: "The number four is added to the number three, to characterize the latter as simply set down at pleasure, to say that it is not exactly three but much more." Three would be enough, but it is not limited to three. The plurality is not rigidly defined, on purpose to indicate the ever increasing number of sins. These nations therefore have incurred not a light but a heavy degree of guilt.—The לַעֲלֹא with which the threatening begins in each case repeated before the special transgression mentioned, and this latter, being a single case, seems to conflict with the preceding plurals. But in truth the commencement, having firmly asserted the plurality of the sins, may well allow the subsequent address, as it hastens from one people to another, to be content with naming a single wrong act as a flagrant example which necessarily presupposes the existence of many others. The phrase interposed in each case—I will not reverse it, i. e., the punishment decided upon—cuts off every thought of repeal, and declares the execution to be inevitable. In every case the judgment is described as a sending of fire to consume the palaces, which can mean only the fire of war, conquest, and destruction. Because they threshed, refers to the cruelty with which they crushed the captured Gileadites under iron threshing-machines. This occurred when Palestine east of the Jordan was subjugated by Hazael under the reign of Jehu (2 Kings x. 32, 33, cf. xiii. 7.—Benhadad; was it the first of that name, or the second? Probably both. Shatter the bolt, i. e., of the gate—the conquest of Damascus. The inhabitants of the valley of Aven and the sceptre-holder, i. e., prince or ruler, of Beth Eden, are extirpated.—בְּרִיתָא, lit., valley of nothingness, is probably the modern Bekaa, the valley between Lebanon and Antilibanus, of which Heliopolis (Baalbek) was the most distinguished city. בְּרִיתָא, then perhaps = בְּרִיתָא, the name of the Egyptian Heliopolis, whence the LXX. render Ἡλιόπολις; but designedly written in the former method to play upon the idol worship performed there (cf. בְּרִיתָא for בְּרִיתָא).

בְּרִיתָא, either the modern Bet-el-Ganna, not far from Damascus, or, better, the Παλαίριος, in the district of Laodicea (Ptol. v., 5, 20). The rest are to be carried away to Kir, an Assyrian province, on the banks of the River Kir, Kipos, the modern Georgia. This was fulfilled by Tiglath-Pileser (2 Kings xvi. 9).

3. Gaza — Philistia. Vers. 6-8. Gaza stands as a representative of the other Philistine states which are similarly threatened, and is named first, perhaps because it was most actively engaged in the sale of the captives (Keil). There is perhaps an allusion to the same case which Joel mentions (iii. 6). Although Joel speaks of a sale to the Grecians, and Amos of a sale to Edom, there is no discrepancy, for both occurred. Joel mentions the Greeks, because he sought to set forth the wide dispersion of the Jews and their future recall from all lands; but Amos wishes to emphasize the hatred of the Philistines, and therefore speaks of the sale made to Israel's chief foe, Edom. Why Gath is not named, does not appear. Doubtless it was comprehended under the phrase "remnant of the Philistines."

4. Tyre — Phœnicia. Vers. 9, 10. The crime here is the same as in the preceding, namely, the sale of prisoners to Edom. But it does not include carrying them away, therefore they must have bought them from others and then sold them. Hence Joel says that the Philistines sold the prisoners whom they captured to the Greeks. But the Phœnicians as a trading people may just as well have bought from others, such as the Syrians, and sold the captives thus acquired to Edom. Their sin here was the greater, because David and Solomon had made a "brotherly covenant" with the king of Tyre. The threatening in ver. 10 is limited to the commencement of what is denounced upon Damascus and Gaza. The same is true of Edom and of Judah.

5. Edom. Vers. 11, 12. No particular crimes are here charged, but an implacable hatred against Israel, which broke out in acts of cruelty. Teman is either an appellative, the South, or the name of a province in Edom (cf. Jer. xlix. 20; Hab. iii. 3; Job ii. 11; Ezek. xxv. 13). Eusebius and Jerome speak also of a city named Teman, six hours from Petra. Bozra, probably the capital of Idumæa, south of the Dead Sea, still preserved in the village of el-Buseirah in Jebel.

6. Ammon. Vers. 13-15. The fact stated here is not mentioned in the historical books of the Old Testament. Rabbah, in its full form, Rabbah of the Sons of Ammon, the capital of the Ammonites, is preserved in the ruins of Amman. The destruction here threatened is more closely defined. It will take place through a foreign conquest which is compared to a storm, indicating either its speed or its violence.

7. Moab. Chap. ii. vers. 1-3. The burning of the body into lime, i. e., to powder, indicates the slaking of vengeance even upon the dead. Nothing is said of this in the historical books, but it was perhaps connected with the war waged by Joram of Israel and Jehoshaphat of Judah, together with the king of Edom, against the Moabites. In that case the king of Edom was a vassal on the side of Israel, and the insult to him would be, at least indirectly, a crime against Israel. Kerioth is the proper name of a chief city of Moab, still preserved in the place called Kereyat. מלך is applied to Moab, considered as a person. Here also the occurrence of a battle is mentioned. Judge, used only to vary the expression, is equivalent to king, or sceptre-holder in i. 5. From the midst refers to Moab as a country.

8. Judah. Vers. 4, 5. The sin of Judah consists in apostasy from God. Their lies means their idols, as nonentities, destitute of reality.

9. Israel — the Ten Tribes. Vers. 6-16. Now in a surprising manner Israel is brought forward, and by a similar introduction placed on the same line with the others; only in place of a short statement, there is a lengthened and detailed representation of its sin, guilt, and punishment.

(a.) Israel's Sins.

Vers. 6-8. Unrighteousness in judgment is charged, ver. 6. The righteous = one who is such in the judicial sense, i. e., innocent. Money, which they had received or expected. Sell, declare guilty and punish. The sentence is called a sale because the judge was bribed. The phrase, for a pair of shoes, does not state the price with which the judge was bribed [the poorest slave was certainly worth much more than this — Keil], but the occasion of the proceeding, namely, a pair of shoes, i. e., a mere trifle, for which the poor man was in debt and for which the judge gave him up to the creditor as a slave (Leviticus xxv. 39).

Ver. 7. They who, etc. Plainly, not a new fault, but a description of the sin out of which the former sprang. Fant after the dust, etc., i. e., endeavor to bring these into such misery that they will strew dust on their heads, or that they will sink into the dust, i. e., perish. Pervert the way, etc., prepare for their embarrassments and distress. Son and father go in to the (i. e., one and the same) girl. In order to profane my holy name. The conjunction indicates that the profanation was deliberate and therefore willful. It is so called because it was an audacious violation of God's commandments. Prostitution in or near the temple itself is not to be thought of here.

Ver. 8. Every altar and the house of their God, certainly refer to the sacred places at Beersheba and Dan, but it must be kept in mind that in these Jehovah was worshipped. There is no reference to the worship of heathen deities, which indeed did not exist under Jeroboam II., for the conduct here condemned is condemned just because it took place in the sanctuary, and thus was a daring contempt of God. Pawned clothes, i. e., upper garments consisting of a large square piece of cloth, used also as a bed-covering by the poor. These were pawned, given in pledge to a creditor, by the poor. Such the law required to be returned before nightfall (Exod. xxii. 25; Deut. xxiv. 12). But instead of this, they were retained, and used as cloths on which the creditors stretched out, i. e., their limbs; and on what occasion? According to what follows, at banquets or sacrificial meals, as the connection shows. Wine of the punished, means wine bought with the proceeds of fines. Manifestly the oppression of the poor is censured also in ver. 8. It only connects with this sin that of frivolous luxury.

(b.) The sin is the more heinous because Israel is the chosen people of God.

10. Vers. 9-12. These verses recall to mind the manifestations of God's grace. He had put Israel in possession of Canaan. Here Amos mentions first the direct means by which this was done, namely, the destruction of the Canaanites, then, what preceded, namely, the deliverance from Egypt and the guidance through the wilderness. And I — emphatic, the very being whom you now treat with contempt. The Amorites are named as the strongest race of the Canaanites (cf. Gen. xv. 16; Josh. xxiv. 15); they are likened to a mighty tree, and their destruction to its complete overthrow. A similar reference to these gracious dispensations is found in Deut. viii. 2, ix. 1-6, xxix. 1-8. Further, the gift of prophecy and the institution of the Nazarites are mentioned as special favors which God had given to Israel but which they despised.

(c). The Punishment.

This is to be a crushing so severe that no one can escape. The figure of the cart is explained in Textual and Grammatical.

Ver. 14. Flight is lost to the swift = he will not have time to escape.

Ver. 16. Will flee naked = will not defend himself, but leave behind the garment by which the enemy seizes him (cf. Mark xiv. 52). The punishment threatened in ver. 13 ff. is manifestly the invasion of a superior foe. The powerlessness before him and the consequent fright are depicted in the liveliest manner.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. In Joel, prophecy quickly drops the form of a threatening against God's people which however it certainly has, and then assumes so much the more fully the character of a promise. It is altogether different with the next prophet of whom we have any written memorial, as indeed would be expected from the fact that his mission was to the ten tribes. On one side he stands connected with Joel, but on the other goes far beyond him; his message is not only the earnest calling of a degenerate people to repentance, but the annunciation of God's destructive judgments upon them. But the transition from Joel's point of view to that of Amos is worthy of consideration. The former announced a judgment upon the heathen, but in general terms. This the latter takes up with a slight allusion to Israel, but he does not expand it further until he has paved the way by a succession of threatenings upon foreign nations. He unrolls before the eyes of Israel a picture of the Divine Justice in its sure and awful march through the kingdoms. But if the people at first regard this with satisfaction because it concerns their foes upon whom they will thus be revenged, they are frightfully awakened from their security by a sudden turn in the direction of the menace. Israel itself is counted among these Gentile kingdoms, and treated in the same way. This shows that the address to Israel's foes is only an introduction; and therefore it passes rapidly from one to another, not entering into details, but content with indicating the multitude of their transgressions, and citing one only as an example of the rest. The prophet thus prepares to make the stroke which at last falls upon Israel heavier and more lasting. Were those nations punished? Not less will this one be. Did they suffer who had not received the law nor enjoyed special tokens of God's favor; far heavier will be the punishment of this people who, although chosen of God, had yet in the grossest manner despised Him and his well-known commands. The storm of divine wrath, which they had gazed at as it fell upon others, would discharge itself upon them in all its fury.

Thus does God prick the conscience of his own people by the judgments threatened upon others. They hear his voice saying, "If I thus punish others, what must I do to you?" The more generally and widely his punishment is inflicted, the less can Israel complain when it comes to them; much rather must they acknowledge it as just.

To Israel in the stricter sense an especial warning is given in the fact that the divine judgment in its circular sweep does not spare Judah, and even names this before Israel. "It should sink deep into the heart of the ten tribes that not even the possession of such exalted prerogatives as the temple and the throne of David, could avert the merited punishment. If such be the energy of God's righteousness, what had they to expect? (Hengstenberg.) That is, the ten tribes might at first hear gladly, and even feel flattered by a threatening against Judah, but so much the more surprising must it be when the same thing comes in turn to themselves. Then the matter assumes a different appearance, and they could infer from Judah's not being spared, how little they could count upon any exemption.

2. Returning to the judgments upon the heathen, the question arises, Why were they punished? One might answer without ceremony, Because of their offenses against Israel, the people of God. Undoubtedly these nations are considered as Israel's foes, and their crimes so far as specified are crimes against Israel; in part they are the same as those charged by Joel, who speaks so plainly of the hostility of the heathen toward Israel. Only in the case of Moab (ii. 1), is the fact otherwise, for here the offense stated is one only indirectly against Israel. But this shows that the relation to Israel is not the only point of view, and that the threatenings against these nations are not to be attributed solely to this cause; a view which is confirmed by a closer inspection of the sins mentioned; crushing with a threshing sledge, giving prisoners to embittered foes (Edom), forgetting the brotherly covenant, slaying a brother, stifling compassion, ripping the pregnant, displacing the landmarks, burning the bones of a corpse. These are plainly moral offenses, transgressions of the simplest laws of morals. They are therefore sins against a natural divine ordinance, not positively revealed, but manifesting itself in every one's conscience; and as such they incur a heavy guilt. The crimes of these nations then are against God and not merely against his people. So much the more necessary is it for God to punish them. — And He can do this because He is a God who controls all nations, and to whom all are subject even if they do not serve Him. Observe how self-evident this truth is to the prophet. Does not this assumed universality of the power of Israel's God imply indirectly, or at least negatively, that faith in Israel's God is destined for all? Under one God, who has power over all, all shall yet bow themselves.

3. Hence it is the more conceivable that Judah and Israel are joined so directly to the threatened heathen nations. Judah, it is concisely said, has not kept the law, in which God positively declared to them his will. To Israel, on the contrary, nothing is said here of the sin of idolatry (which indeed is presupposed), but individual offenses of a gross kind (partly of course allied with idolatry), are specified; base oppression of the poor through avarice, shameless sensuality, spending in drunkenness money wrested from the poor, and this most offensively blended with idol-worship. How this is regarded is strikingly shown by an expression at the end of verse 7 which applies to the whole series. It is, says God, a profaning of my holy name. In the view of Scripture there is a holy divine ordinance which is violated by such moral offenses. They are therefore offenses against God, "profanations of his holy name," who instituted this ordinance. Therefore the punishment is absolutely necessary. For God cannot suffer his holy name to be profaned with impunity. Upon the sins against the poor, see also Doctrinal and Ethical, 2, upon chap. iii.

4. It is remarkable that the very same threat is made against the heathen and against Judah. This is certainly not without design. Even if it were owing in the first instance to the fact that the prophet had in view one and the same means of punishment for all, namely, subjugation by a foreign foe, still the intentional uniformity suggests equally the unvarying and impartial character of God's punitive righteousness. There is no respect of persons with Him. Wherever there are sins, there inflexibly the divine wrath makes its appearance; and even if the sins are different in kind, yet where God's law whether natural or revealed, is transgressed, there a corresponding reaction of his holiness is provoked.

5. Surely the greatness of what God has done for his people weighs heavily in the scale and greatly aggravates their guilt. The fact of these benefits is the solid ground of the proceeding against Israel's sins. Those benefits are so many loud accusations, from which there is no escape. For all Israel's sins are not merely violations of a divine order, but a shameless contempt of his goodness and the blackest ingratitude; and the punishments therefore are only a righteous reversal of abused mercies. Hosea goes farther and represents the ingratitude as conjugal infidelity, since he conceives God's tender relation to Israel as a marriage bond. The infliction of punishment upon apostate Israel is thus more clearly shown to be a divine right. An approach to this view, an indication of God's loving fellowship with Israel is found in chap. ii. 2: "You only have I known," etc.

6. Along with the great blessings which founded the nation — the deliverance from Egypt, and the guidance through the wilderness, and on the other side, the giving of the law, — the institution of prophecy, and the law of the Nazarites are mentioned. "These are gifts of grace in which Israel had the advantage of other nations, and was distinguished as the people of God and the medium of salvation for the heathen. Amos reminds the people only of these, and not of earthly blessings which the heathen also enjoyed, because these alone were real pledges of God's gracious covenant with Israel, and because in the contempt and abuse of these gifts the ingratitude of the people was most glaringly displayed. The Nazarites are placed by the side of the prophets who declared the mind and will of God, because the condition of a Nazarite, although it was in form merely a consequence of his own free will in execution of a particular vow, was nevertheless so far a gift of grace in that the resolution to make such a vow came from the inward impulse of the divine Spirit, and the performance of it was rendered possible only through the power of the same Spirit. The raising up of the Nazarites was intended not only to set before the eyes of the people the object of their divine calling, or their appointment to be a holy people of God, but also to show them how the Lord bestowed the power to carry out his object" (Keil); cf. also the remarks on Hosea xii. 10, which rests on this passage in Amos.

7. Whether these threatenings against different heathen nations were fulfilled, is a question we must ask still more in the case of Amos than of Joel. For Amos not merely sees and describes in a general ideal sketch the downfall of the heathen power which then stood opposed to Israel's exaltation, but he speaks as if predicting a precise historical occurrence. Yet it is to be considered, that, as was hinted before, the threatening runs essentially in the same terms, is in fact one, and, although subjoining special features in some cases (especially i. 5, 15), yet at bottom is very general, and sets forth simply conquest and loss of independence, but by whom, is not said. Just this fate befell these kingdoms, although at different times and in different ways. Syria experienced it from the Assyrians when Tiglath-Pileser, in the time of Ahaz, conquered Damascus and put an end to the kingdom. Later, the Chaldean invasion overthrew the other nations, although the information on the point is scanty. Accordingly we are always justified in saying that these predictions were fulfilled, without necessarily affirming that it was in the sense intended by the prophet. [But this latter is a point of no moment, if the fulfillment was in the sense which the Holy Spirit intended. — C.] We must further consider that such threatenings are not absolute. They are given at a particular time, and the issue depends upon the behavior of those whom they concern. For God's purposes, and therefore his punishments are directed according to our conduct. Hence He delays his visitations, or lessens or increases them; so that what takes place at last little coincides with what the prophet had to announce in his name. Nor should the idea be wholly rejected, that these predictions came to the foreign nations themselves, seeing that they were neighbors, and were laid to heart by them just as the heathen oracles were, so that thus the state of affairs might be changed. For these announcements of punishment are to be viewed as warnings as well to the heathen as to Israel — warnings intended to be heard and regarded. That the threatening against Judah, which is of the same tenor as the others, was fulfilled by Nebuchadnezzar, is well known. But even this fulfillment does not answer exactly to what the Prophet had in view, which manifestly was a judgment closer at hand, perhaps by means of the Assyrians. Hence it is clear that Judah obtained a respite, because its condition had meanwhile improved.

[8. It is remarkable that none of these burdens of Amos are addressed to the greatest powers of the heathen world, opposed to Israel and Judah, — Assyria and Babylon. The Holy Spirit who spake by him, reserved the declaration of the destinies of these two great kingdoms for two other of the twelve minor prophets. Assyria was reserved for Nahum, Babylon for Habakkuk. There seems, therefore, to have been divine forethought in the omission. . . . The prophecies of Amos are expanded by succeeding prophets. Amos himself takes up the prophecy of Joel whom he succeeds. Joel, by a magnificent generalization, had displayed all God's judgments in nature and history as concentrated in one great Day of the Lord. Amos disintegrates this great whole, and particularizes those judgments. Joel declares that God will judge all collectively; Amos proclaims that He will judge each singly. (Wordsworth.)

[9. Pusey (p. 161), with great propriety, calls attention to the fact that the complete captivity of a population, the baring a land of its inhabitants, was a thing unknown in the time of Amos. It is true, Sesostris brought together "many men," "a crowd," from the nations he had subdued, and employed them on his buildings and canals (Herodotus, ii. 107-8). But in this and other like cases, the persons so employed were simply prisoners made in a campaign, and the sole object of the removal was to obtain slaves so as to spare the labor of the native subjects in constructing the public works. This is shown by the earlier Assyrian inscriptions, all of which speak only of carrying off soldiers as prisoners or women as captives, of receiving slaves, or cattle or goods as tribute, or of putting to death in various ways rulers and men at arms. The forced deportation of a whole people, and the substitution of others in their place, is a different thing altogether. The design of this was to destroy effectually the independence of the subject races and put it out of their power to rebel. The first trace of it we find in the policy of Tiglath Pileser toward Damascus and East and North Palestine, and afterwards it came into general use. But Amos foretold this wholesale transportation long before it occurred, and at a time when there was no human likelihood that it would occur. It must have been a divine inspiration which enabled him so clearly to predict such an unprecedented captivity. — C.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 2. The head of Carmel is dried up. Its glory has passed away, as in the twinkling of an eye. God hath spoken the word and it is gone. "All," says Van de Velde, "lies waste; all is a wilderness. The utmost fertility is here lost for man, useless to man. The vineyards of Carmel, where are they now? Behold the long rows of stones on the ground, the remains of the walls; they will tell you that here where now with difficulty you force your way through the thick entangled copse, lay in days of old those incomparable vineyards to which Carmel owes its name." (Pusey.) — Ver. 3 ff. Every infliction on those like ourselves finds an echo in our own consciences. Israel heard and readily believed God's judgments upon others. It was not tempted to set itself against believing them. How then could it refuse to believe of itself what it believed of others like itself. If they who sinned without law perished without law, how much more should they who have sinned in the law, be judged by the law. (Ibid.) — For three transgressions, etc. God is long-suffering and ready to forgive; but when the sinner finally becomes a vessel of wrath, He punishes all the former sins which for the time He had passed by. Sin adds to sin out of which it grows; it does not overshadow or obliterate the earlier sins, but increases the mass of guilt which God punishes. When the Jews slew the Son, there came on them all the righteous blood shed upon the earth from righteous Abel to Zacharias the son of Barachias. So each individual sinner who dies impenitent, will be punished for all which in his whole life he did or became contrary to the law of God. Deeper sins bring deeper damnation at last. As good men by the grace of God, do through each act done by aid of that grace gain an addition to their everlasting reward, so the wicked by each added sin, add to their damnation. (Ibid.) — I will not reverse it. Sin and punishment are by a great law of God bound together. God's mercy holds back the punishment long, allowing only some slight tokens of his displeasure to show themselves that the sinful soul or people may not be unwarned. When He no longer withholds it, the law of his moral government holds its course. (Ibid.) — Ver. 4. Devour Benhadad's palaces. What avail the pleasure-houses and palaces of the rich of this world? How soon do they turn to dust and ashes when the fire of God's wrath kindles on them? — Ver. 6. Carry away prisoners to deliver them, etc. Who so further afflicts the afflicted, shall in return be afflicted by God. Fugitives who flee to us for refuge should never be treated with hostility nor robbed of their liberty. — Vers. 7, 8. The five cities of Philistia had each its own petty king. But all formed one whole; all were one in their sin; all were to be one in their punishment. So then for greater vividness, one part of the common infliction is related of each, while in fact, according to the wont of prophetic diction, what is said of each is said of all. — Ver. 9. Remember not, etc. It is a great aggravation of enmity and malice, when it is the violation of friendship and a brotherly covenant. (M. Henry.) — Ver. 10. Fire into the wall of Tyre. Not fine buildings nor strong walls, but righteousness and honesty are a city's best defense. 2 Kings ii. 12; xiii. 14. — Ver. 11. Pursues his brother with the sword. Eleven hundred years had passed since the birth of their forefathers, Jacob and Esau. But with God eleven hundred years had not worn out kindred. . . . It was an abiding law that Israel was not to take Edom's land, nor to refuse to admit him into the congregation of the Lord. Edom too remembered the relation, but to hate him. "Fierce are the wars of brethren." (Pusey.) — Stifles his compassions. Edom "stealed himself against his better feelings," as we say, "deadened them." But so they do not live again. Man is not master of the life and death of his feelings, any more than of his natural existence. He can destroy; he cannot recreate. And he does so far do to death his own feelings whenever in any signal instance he acts against them. (Ibid.) — Ver. 13. To widen their border. The war of extermination was carried on not incidentally nor in sudden stress of passion, but in cold blood. A massacre here and there would not have enlarged their border. They wished to make place for themselves by annihilating Israel that there might be none to rise up, and thrust them from their conquests and claim their old inheritance. Such was the fruit of habitually indulged covetousness. Yet who beforehand would have thought it possible? (Ibid.) — Ver. 15. He and his princes. Evil kings have evermore evil counsellors. It is ever the curse of such kings to have their own evil reflected, anticipated, fomented, enacted by bad advisers around them. They link together, but to drag one another into a common destruction. (Ibid.) — Chap. ii. 1. Even the iniquity done to the godless, God will not leave unpunished. To rage against the bodies of the dead is sinful and horrible. Pusey justly remarks, "The soul being beyond man's reach, the hatred vented upon one's remains is a sort of impotent grasping after eternal vengeance. It wreaks upon what it knows to be insensible the hatred with which it would pursue, if it could, the living being who is beyond it. Hatred which death cannot extinguish is the beginning of the eternal hate in hell." — Chap. i. 3-ii. 3. Who shall not tremble at the judgments of God? But who shall not gain confidence against all the insolence of men, from the thought how God has judged the world? Who shall not shun all rage, cruelty, and violence, since he knows that God avenges all such sins? — Ver. 4. Because they despised the law, etc. Many other sins prevailed among the Jewish people, but by mentioning only these two, — contempt for the law and false worship, — the Lord shows that they are the most grievous, since they violate the first and great commandment, and make up the three and four, i. e., seven, the complete number of sins, the fullness of the measure of iniquity. For it is one of God's greatest benefits that He gives us his Word containing the revelation of his will and thus points the way not only to our temporal welfare but to eternal blessedness. To throw to the winds such a gift is the grossest ingratitude. From this contempt of the Word, there follows necessarily the other sin of idolatry. For a man cannot exist without a God and worship; his nature forbids it. If any one turns away from the Word in which God reveals his nature and will, he must needs devise to himself a deity and a worship which is nothing but a pernicious lie. — Despised. The prophet uses a bold word in speaking of man's dealings with God. Man carries on the serpent's first fraud, Hath God indeed said? He would not willingly own that he is directly at variance with the mind of God. It were too silly as well as too terrible. So he smoothes it over to himself, lying to himself: "God's Word must not be taken so precisely." "God cannot have meant." "The author of nature would not have created us so if He had meant." Such are the excuses by which man evades owning to himself that he is trampling under foot the mind of God. Scripture draws off the veil. Judah had the law of God and did not keep it; then he despised it. This ignoring of God's known will and law and revelation is to despise them as effectually as to curse God to his face. (Pusey.) — After which their fathers walked. The children canonize the errors of their fathers. Human opinion is as dogmatic as revelation. The second generation of error demands as implicit submission as God's truth. The transmission of error against himself, God says, aggravates the evil, does not excuse it. (Ibid.) — Ver. 5. Will send fire into Judah. So we know that a fiery stream will come forth and destroy all who, whether or no they are in the body of the Church, are not of the heavenly Jerusalem; dead members in the body which belongs to the living Head. And it will not the less come, because it is not regarded. Rather, the very condition of all God's judgments is to be disregarded and to come, and then most to come when they are most disregarded. (Ibid.) — Ver. 6. For three transgressions of Israel, etc. We see here that the idolatry of Israel was a fountain of all sorts of misdeeds, even of such as would shock a reasonable man, as the list shows; perversion of justice, oppression of the poor, unnatural uncleanness and shameless luxury. — Ver. 7. Pant after the dust. Covetousness, when it has nothing to feed on, craves for the absurd or impossible. What was Naboth's vineyard to a king of Israel with his ivory palace? What was Mordecai's refusal to bow to one in honor like Haman? Covetousness is the sin, mostly not of those who have not, but of those who have. It grows with its gains, and is the less satisfied the more it has to satisfy it. (Pusey.) — To profane my holy name.

The sins of God's people are a reproach upon himself. They bring Him, so to say, in contact with sin, and defeat the object of his creation and revelation. "He lives like a Christian," is a proverb of the Polish Jews, drawn from the debased state of morals in Socinian Poland. The religion of Christ has no such enemies as Christians. (Ibid.) — Ver. 8. They stretch themselves, etc. They condensed sin. By a sort of economy in the toil they blended many sins into one: idolatry, sensuality, cruelty, and, in all, the express breach of God's commandments. This dreadful assemblage was doubtless smoothed over to the conscience of the ten tribes, by that most hideous ingredient of all, that the "house of their God" was the place of their revelry. What hard-heartedness to the willfully-forgotten poor is compensated by a little church-going! (Ibid.) — Vers. 9, 10. And I destroyed, etc. We need often to be reminded of the mercies we have received, which are the heaviest aggravations of the sins we have committed. God gives liberally and upbraids us not with our meanness and unworthiness, and the disproportion between his gifts and our merit; but He justly upbraids us with our ingratitude and ill-requital of his favors, and tells us what He has done for us, to shame us for not rendering again according to the benefit done to us. (M. Henry.) — Ver. 11. I raised up . . . dedicated ones. The life of the Nazarite was a continual protest against the self-indulgence and worldliness of the people. It was a life above nature. They had no special office except to live that life. Their life taught. Nay, it taught in one way the more, because they had no special gifts of wisdom or knowledge, nothing to distinguish them from ordinary men except extraordinary grace. They were an evidence what all might be and do, if they used the grace of God. (Pusey.) — Ver. 12. Made them drink wine. What men despise they do not oppose. "They kill us, they do not despise us," were the true words of a priest in the French Revolution. Had the men in power not respected the Nazarites, or felt that the people respected them, they would not have attempted to corrupt or to force them to break their vow. (Ibid.) — I command the prophets, Prophecy not. Those have a great deal to answer for who cannot bear faithful preaching, and those much more who suppress it. (M. Henry.) — Vers. 13-16. When God's judgments go forth, no power, wisdom, wealth, arms, swiftness or experience, is of any avail. Because men so readily fall into contempt of God's judgments as something easy to be avoided, He at times expresses them in such terms as to show that no escape is possible. (Rieger.)

CHAPTERS III.-VI.

II. To the Kingdom of Israel, especially to its Great Men, the Divine Judgment is announced upon the Prevailing Sins, unless Men seek the Lord.

CHAPTER III.

1. As surely as the Prophet bears the Divine Commission, will God punish Israel.

- 1 Hear this word,
Which Jehovah speaks concerning you, ye sons of Israel,
Concerning the whole family
Which I brought up from the land of Egypt, saying,
- 2 You only have I known of all the families of the earth;
Therefore will I visit upon you all your iniquities.
- 3 Do two walk together
Unless they have agreed?¹
- 4 Does the lion roar in the forest
When he has no prey?
Does the young lion utter his cry out of his den
Unless he has taken something?
- 5 Does a bird fall into a trap² on the ground
When there is no snare for him?
Does the trap rise up from the earth
Without catching anything at all?
- 6 Or is a trumpet blown in a city,
And the people are not alarmed?
Or does misfortune occur in a city,
And Jehovah has not caused it?
- 7 [No;] for³ the Lord Jehovah does nothing Without having revealed his secret to his servants, the prophets.
- 8 The lion roars,
Who does not fear?
The Lord Jehovah speaks,
Who must not prophesy?
- 9 Make it heard over the palaces in Ashdod,
And over the palaces in the land of Egypt,
And say, assemble upon the mountains of Samaria,
And see the great confusions in the midst thereof,⁴
And the oppressed in the heart thereof.
- 10 And they know not to do right, saith Jehovah,
They who store up violence and devastation in their palaces.
- 11 Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah,
An enemy, and that round about the land!⁵
And he shall bring down thy strength⁶ from thee,
And thy palaces shall be plundered.

- 12 Thus saith Jehovah,
As the shepherd rescues from the mouth of the lion
Two legs or an ear-lappet,
So shall the sons of Israel deliver themselves;
They who sit in Samaria
On the corner of the couch and on the damask of the bed.⁷
- 13 Hear ye and testify to the house of Jacob, Saith the Lord Jehovah, the God of Hosts :
- 14 That in the day when I visit Israel's transgressions upon him,
I will visit the altars of Bethel,
And the horns of the altar⁸ shall be cut off and fall to the ground.
- 15 And I will smite the winter-house with the summer-house,
And the houses of ivory shall perish,⁹
And many¹⁰ houses shall disappear.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- 1 Ver. 8. — בְּיָמָיו. To meet together at an appointed time and place.
- 2 Ver. 5. — פֶּלֶא is the fowler's net, שֶׁלֶקֶט, the springs or snare which holds the bird fast. לָהּ belongs to שֶׁפֶרֶד [In order to catch a bird in the net, a spring must be laid for it.]
- 3 Ver. 7. — כִּי. Not "surely," as in E. T., a signification which it never has, but, "for," in connection with a negative implied in its relation to what precedes. Cf. Micah vi. 4, Job xxxi. 18.]
- 4 Ver. 9. — מְדֻמָּמוֹת, noise, disorder, denotes a state of confusion, resulting from a complete overturning of right, such as is expressed by שֶׁמֶרֶק, probably to be taken as an abstract, "the oppression" (of the poor) or possibly concrete, "the oppressed."
- 5 Ver. 11. — חֲזָקָה, thy strength, i. e., Samaria's.
- 6 Ver. 11. — וְהָיָה is explanatory, "and that round about the land," i. e., will come and attack it on all sides.
- 7 Ver. 12. — מִזְמָה, the corner of the divan, the most convenient for repose. דְּמִשְׁכָּן, damask, covered with a costly stuff. [Pusey and Wordsworth revert to the old view (Sept., Vulgate, Syriac, Targum), which is followed in the Authorized Version, and interpret, "and recline on Damascus as a couch," but their reasons do not seem to have much weight.]
- 8 Ver. 14. — מִזְבֵּחַ is the singular of species, and is equivalent to a plural.
- 9 Ver. 15. — Ivory houses are such as have their apartments adorned with inlaid ivory (cf. 1 Kings xxii. 39).
- 10 Ver. 15. — רַבִּים, not "large" as E. T., but "many."

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Vers. 1-2. Hear this word which Jehovah, etc. "Hear this word." This phrase is repeated at the beginning of chaps. v. and vi. It therefore shows this chapter to contain one address complete in itself. See the Introduction. Upon the whole family. Although afterwards destruction is threatened only against the ten tribes, yet here the entire race is included. The people as a whole were known and chosen of God, and therefore the punishment of sin is set forth in universal terms. Just so far as sin extends, punishment will and must come. Certainly this occurred first in the case of the ten tribes, but how little Judah could count upon being spared, has already been seen in ch. ii. 4, etc.

Ver. 2. Only you have I known. This is equivalent to "I have chosen," since the knowing expresses a relation of sympathy and love, as "the motive and the result of the election."

2. Vers. 3-8. Do two walk together, etc. The general announcement of a punitive judgment is followed — without any apparent connection with the foregoing — by a series of propositions illustrated by examples from daily life. Plainly, these perhaps proverbial phrases are here introduced only by way of comparison. They illustrate the principle that every effect has its cause.

Ver. 4. When he has no prey, refers, as Keil justly states, not to the actual seizing of the prey by the lion, but to his having it before him so that it cannot escape. In like manner, the phrase in the second clause, "unless he has taken something," is to be explained. The lion makes his capture not merely when he has seized and is rending the prey, but when it is so near that escape is impossible. [The lion, as a rule, roars most terribly when it has the prey in sight, upon which it immediately springs. Bochart.]

Ver. 5. Does the trap rise up? because lifted up by the bird flying away. Without catching, i. e. the bird.

Ver. 6. In the first member the usual order of these propositions is reversed, and the cause is mentioned first, — the blowing of the trumpet, — and the result follows. In the second, the other order is restored. In this last, similes are abandoned, and the discourse states directly what had been implied in numerous comparisons. As little as two can walk together without, etc., etc.; so little can misfortune occur in a city without the Lord's hand; or rather, as in all these cases, one thing is the result of the other as its cause, so is it here. "Misfortune" in the city is the result, the "Lord" is the cause. Even this is to be considered as a kind of proverbial speech, but it explains the subject treated of in this passage. The prophet has threatened the whole people in ver. 2, with a visitation from God. Against this the consciousness of Israel revolts, especially because the visitation is to come from God, their own God, Jehovah. Therefore the prophet proves the correctness of his declaration by these examples, in which he traces with the certainty of the strictest logic every effect to a cause, and so every misfortune in the city to Jehovah as its author (and to his punitive righteousness as the cause). If this be so, every objection is obviated. Whatever misfortune exists must be traced back to Jehovah. This however is not proved, but only illustrated, by the examples cited, which show simply that as every event has its cause, so also must misfortune; so that the question remains, Is this result to be attributed to Jehovah's activity? The answer to this is found in vers. 7, 8, which must be taken together, since it is only thus that they furnish the desired proof.

Ver. 7. For presupposes the answer No, to the foregoing questions, especially the last. No, misfortune does not occur without Jehovah's hand, for, etc. The proof in the first instance is this: Jehovah does nothing without having disclosed his "secret," i. e. his secret counsel, to his servants, the prophets. The latter is certainly not the cause, but it is the indispensable condition of Jehovah's activity, so that between the two there is a necessary connection. But this very revelation to the prophets has as an inevitable result (ver. 8), their prophesying, which again is illustrated by an example drawn from experience, the lion roars, etc. so that this prophesying is not an accidental or capricious thing, but proceeds from a causa sufficiens, which lies in Jehovah himself. Therefore the meaning is: when the prophet speaks or predicts, Jehovah has revealed it to him, and the former is the result of the latter. But if Jehovah has made a revelation to him, then what he predicts, namely, misfortune, is really impending from Jehovah. The Lord will let it come. He will not indeed in the absence of such a revelation; but wherever this occurs, it is a token that He will bring it to pass. Therefore a prophecy, a foretelling of calamity by a prophet, is a voucher — כִּי — that the calamity is from the Lord, that a causal connection exists between the two as certain as that between the things mentioned in vers. 3-6. Otherwise, the prophet could not announce such a calamity, since he announces only what Jehovah reveals to him, but must announce that. The divine origin of his prophecy is to the prophet, therefore, the basis on which he proceeds as on a certain reality, and from this he argues and proves the divine authorship of the fact which he predicts, namely, a punitive judgment. Thus is sustained the truth of the saying, that Jehovah would visit Israel. — Only in this way do we understand the כִּי in verse 7. It is therefore a reversal of the order of thought when most interpreters say that from ver. 3 the prophet is proving the divine origin of his prophecy against the objection that he spoke only from subjective influences, i. e., "as little can a prophet speak without a divine impulse as any other effect can be produced without a cause" (B. Baur). No, the prophet does not justify himself or his calling, he is sure of that; he only seeks to convince his hearers or readers that they are really to expect the judgment which he announces, and to this end he uses the fact that prophecy comes from God. —

Concerning the examples in ver. 3 ff. Baur correctly remarks, "There is no occasion to regard them as anything more than mere analogies representing the general relation of cause and effect, or to assign to each case a special reference to the prophet's thought, e. g., the two as a figure of God and the people, the lion as representing Jehovah, and the prey and the bird, the wicked, etc." Such a method leads to constrained refinements, as may be seen in Keil, in loc. The illustration of one principle by so many examples may seem somewhat tedious, but to understand it, one must consider the partiality of the Orientals for figurative and proverbial speeches, which leads them to express in these concrete forms even such an abstract truth as the relation of cause and effect. There is nothing strange, therefore, in finding such a representation coming from the herdman of Tekoa.

3. Vers. 9-15. Here the Lord's purpose respecting the sinful people is openly declared.

(a.) Vers. 9, 10. The sins. Make it heard, etc. Not only are the sins to be punished set forth, but the heathen are summoned as witnesses. This turn in the address indicates that the sinfulness is very great, enough even to surprise the heathen, and thus puts Israel to shame.

Ver. 9. Publish ye. Jehovah is the speaker, and we must regard the command as addressed to the people in these heathen lands. The palaces, i. e., those who dwell there, are to be informed, because the question concerns what is done in the palaces of Samaria. Aahdod, as part for the whole, is put for the Philistines, who were regarded by Israel as godless heathen. Egypt, "whose unrighteousness and ungodliness Israel had once abundantly experienced" (Keil). — On the mountains of Samaria, i. e. around Samaria, whence they could look into the city.

Ver. 10. They know not to do right. They do not understand it, so accustomed are they to unrighteousness. They who store up violence, etc.; evil treasures which, so far from helping, destroy them.

(b.) Vers. 11-15. Therefore thus saith, etc., יְיָ may be abstract or concrete. The latter is more probable, especially as in that case it is naturally connected with the verb יִדְּבָר, which otherwise would require Jehovah to be understood as its subject. The clause is an emphatic assertion in the form of an exclamation.

Ver. 12. In this plundering of Samaria, the great men will be able to save their lives only to the smallest extent and with the greatest difficulty. Both points are suggested in the comparison. ("A pair of shin-bones and a piece, i. e. a lappet, of the ear." Keil.)

Ver. 13. Renews the threatening and raises it still higher. There will be an utter destruction. Hear ye, etc., is addressed to the Israelites, as in ver. 1, since among even these God has those who will testify what He is going to do. They shall, when summoned as witnesses of wrong doing, announce also the punishment of Israel. House of Jacob means all Israel, i. e., the twelve tribes; even Judah should hear it so as to learn a lesson. The Divine names are accumulated for emphasis; the threat of such a God ought to make a deep impression. The visitation of Israel will begin with the destruction of the altars in Bethel, i. e., of idolatry, the religious source of the moral corruption. This is more closely defined by the cutting off of the horns, which destroys the significance of the altar.

Ver. 15. Winter houses and summer houses are primarily those of the royal family, but perhaps also those of the noblemen. — The threatened judgment, therefore, is the overthrow of Samaria, especially its palaces, with the complete extermination of the inhabitants (ver. 12).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. "Israel stands to us as a constant example both of the unsearchable riches of grace which God bestows and of the inconceivable judgments He sends upon those who receive his grace in vain." (Rieger.) Here again the bringing out of Egypt appears as the fundamental act of God's grace. It is mentioned alone, because by it as the condition of its outer and inner existence was Israel constituted the people of God. This bringing out, however, includes the guidance through the wilderness and the giving of the law. This people alone did God "know;" to them alone He stood in a relation of nearness and confidence; all others were aliens. Therefore so much the greater their guilt, and the more certain their punishment.

2. The sin of Israel, especially of the ten tribes, is apostasy, at least in the calf-worship (comp. ver. 14, chaps. iv. 4, v. 5). But that which particularly provokes rebuke and menace is, as appears by chap. ii. and the following chapters, the extreme moral corruption, which naturally is regarded as the violation of the divine commands, covetousness and luxury, and in connection therewith, the shameless disregard of the elementary duties due to our neighbors, violent oppression of the poor. This last is continually the subject of sharp censure (cf. ii. 6, 7, and subsequently iv. 1, v. 6, 11, 12, vi. 12, viii. 5, 6). The poor always stand under the especial protection of the divine law, a peculiar feature of which is its compassion for the lowly, as the Mosaic institute shows in many of its provisions. How fully the prophet was in sympathy with this trait, is shown by the fact that upon no point is he so zealous as upon the oppression of the poor. This was doubtless because such instances frequently occurred; still it is significant that instead of merely touching them and then passing on, he brings them forward and brands them with an especial stigma. "To pervert the way of the poor," as it was before expressed in chap. i. ver. 7, is, as it were, the unpardonable sin. For this reason the prophet's rebuke is addressed mainly to the great, the higher classes; but certainly not because these alone were corrupt while the lower classes needed no particular censure, although at bottom this was the fact. Are we then to recognize a democratic feature in the circumstance, and observe how a man of the people, a herdsman, feels himself called chiefly to scourge the sins of the nobles and especially those by which the humble suffered? If it is correct to assert that God called and employed him to chastise such sins, we may admit this. Only let us not ascribe to Amos that modern democratic view which reviles the higher classes because it condemns all distinctions of ranks. Rather the reverse is true of Amos. He inveighs against the sins of the great, just because their position is so important, because he knows that upon their conduct depends the weal or the woe of the community, for if corruption prevails in their circles, the foundations of the national prosperity are undermined and shaken. With equal or even greater propriety may one ascribe an aristocratic leaning to our prophet, but after a proper manner, i. e., he considers the position of the higher classes very important, but for that very reason very responsible, and holds that their rights and privileges impose corresponding duties. They have much ability, but much is also expected from them, "to whom much is given," etc. And if they mistake and abuse their position, so much the heavier is their guilt and the greater the harm they work. Their degeneracy at last brings destruction upon the whole. If then a prophet were silent, or censured only the lowly and not the high, he would be justly chargeable with servility and fear of men, which would ill agree with his call to be a witness of divine truth (cf. chap. iv. Doctrinal and Ethical, 2).

3. Misfortune as a punishment comes only from Jehovah. It comes not of itself nor is casual, but has a definite cause and author, who is Jehovah. He who chose and blessed his people, the same punishes them. Men may struggle against this truth, but still it remains incontestable. And when a doubt of the divine authorship intrudes, there comes a voucher in the words of the prophets. Before God executes anything, He reveals it to his servants, and these cannot but declare what is thus revealed. A calamity announced by them is a punishment proceeding from God.

4. The lofty significance of prophecy is strongly expressed in vers. 7, 8. The prophets are not only "God's servants" in general, but are also entrusted with "his secret," his "counsel," i. e., what He proposes respecting his people. Yes, he does nothing until He has revealed it to the prophets. Thus He, as it were, binds himself to them. Is it asked, Why? The answer is, The aim of the revelation is to secure its announcement, as it is expressly said (ver. 8), the speaking of God to his servants necessarily leads them to prophecy. The object of their utterances is simple and single, to set plainly before men the severity of God against sin, the truth of his punitive righteousness. If this is done, so to speak, in the interest of God, naturally it is still more in the interest of men. These are to learn how the matter stands with them and what threatens them, so as to take warning while there is time. And if men do take warning — for this is the implied thought, — then "God does nothing," i. e., does not carry out his secret counsel. Therefore He, as it were, puts prophecy between his "secret" and its execution, and so prophecy is justly reckoned among Israel's peculiar privileges (comp. ii. 11 and the remarks there). Well remarks Rieger in reference to the present times: "Those to whom God has intrusted the duty of bearing witness to his truth in the world now, cannot put themselves on a level with his ancient prophets, nor should they indulge any natural passion herein. Yet it is very significant that the Lord Jesus addressed to the overseers of the churches of Asia the precious testimony of his revelation, and therein the secret counsel by which God's wrath is fulfilled, and thus indicated for all time the participation of the teacher's office in the judgments of God, partly in foreseeing them, partly in foretelling them, and partly, moreover, in influencing them for good by prayer and watchfulness."

HOMEILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. Hear the word which Jehovah speaks to you. Here we learn that God's Word should be preached in such way that its hearers should recognize that it is intended for and applies to them. For when it is declared only in general terms, especially as respects God's wrath against sin, the people commonly sit and think it does not concern them but only folks in far-off lands. It should be said, Hear what the Lord says to you who sit here under the pulpit.

Ver. 2. You only, etc. — therefore I will, etc. This is a wonderful inference. We should rather expect; therefore will I spare you. But we see that the Lord is accustomed to punish those who have received much at his hands more severely than others not so favored. For his kindness is not intended to encourage us in sin, but to render us through gratitude more devoted to Him. He has chosen us in Christ that we should be holy and blameless before Him in love (Ephes. i.), but where this result does not follow, God's goodness ceases, and his punishments fall the heavier. — (W. S.)

Ver. 3 ff. The comparisons here may be practically explained as (1) teaching us what just grounds God has for his punishments. If two walk together, they must agree, but you, He says, do not agree with me, but are my foes, by your evil works, and therefore I cannot walk with you in complacency. (2) As a lion does not roar unless the prey is just before him, so my threatenings are not uttered unless I see men just ready to fall, as it were, a prey to my wrath. Of this, however, they think lightly, and deem any calamity that befalls them an accident. But (3) just as little as a bird falls into the net without a fowler, or a fowler lifts the snare without having caught something, so little does misfortune occur without God's mind and will, who does not give up his purpose but carries it out unless withheld by a true repentance. As every one fears when the trumpet announces the enemy near at hand, so should my people when my prophets announce to them judgment for their sins. These similes remind us of the divine providence in punishments. They do not fall promiscuously, but in the righteous retribution of God, who determines beforehand who shall suffer and who escape.

[Ver. 6. Does misfortune occur, etc. Evil which is sin, the Lord hath not done; evil which is punishment for sin, the Lord bringeth. (Augustine.)

Ver. 7. The Lord Jehovah does nothing, etc. God has ever warned the world of coming judgments in order that it may not incur them. As Chrysostom says, He has revealed to us hell in order that we may escape hell. He warned Noah of the coming deluge. He told Abram and Lot of the future judgment of the cities of the plain. He revealed to Joseph the seven years of famine, and to Moses the ten plagues, and to Jonah the destruction of Nineveh; and by Christ He foretold the fall of Jerusalem; and Christ has warned all of his own future coming to judge the world. God does this that men may repent; and that if they obstinately continue in sin, He may be justified in executing punishment upon them. (Wordsworth.)

Ver. 8. Who does not fear? There is cause for you to fear when God roars from Zion, but if ye fear not, the prophets dare not but fear. So Paul says, "Woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel." So Peter and John, "We cannot but speak the things we have seen and heard." Moses was not excused, though slow of speech; nor Isaiah, though of polluted lips; nor Jeremiah, because he was a child. And Ezekiel was bidden, Be not rebellious like that rebellious house. (Pusey.)

Ver. 9. Publish in the palaces, etc. "Since ye disbelieve, I will manifest to Ashdodites and Egyptians the transgressions of which ye are guilty." (Theodoret.) Shame towards man survives shame towards God. What men are not ashamed to do, they are ashamed to confess that they have done. Nay, to avoid a little passing shame, they rush upon everlasting shame. So God employs all inferior motives, shame, fear, hope of things present, if by any means He can win men not to offend Him. (Ibid.)

Ver. 10. They know not, etc. It is a part of the miserable blindness of sin, that while the soul acquires a quick insight into evil; it becomes at last not only paralyzed to do good, but unable to perceive it. Store up violence. They stored up, as they deemed, the gains and fruits; but it was in truth the sins themselves, as a treasure of wrath against the day of wrath. (Ibid.)

Ver. 11. Therefore thus saith, etc. There was no human redress. The oppressor was mighty, but mightier the avenger of the poor. Man would not help, therefore God would. Thy palaces shall be spoiled. Those palaces in which they had heaped up the spoils of the oppressed. Men's sins are in God's providence the means of their punishment. Their spoiling should invite the spoiler, their oppressions should attract the oppressor. (Ibid.)

Ver. 12. As the shepherd rescues, etc. Amos as well as Joel (ii. 32) preaches the same solemn sentence, so repeated through the prophets, "a remnant only shall be saved." So it was in the captivity of the ten tribes. So it was in Judah. In the Gospel, not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble were called, but God chose the poor of this world, and the Good Shepherd rescued from the mouth of the lion those whom man despised. (Ibid.)

Ver. 13. Hear ye and testify. It is of little avail to testify, unless we first hear; nor can man bear witness to what he doth not know; nor will words make an impression, i. e., be stamped on men's souls, unless the soul which utters them have first hearkened unto them. (Ibid.)

Ver. 14. In the day when I visit, etc. Scripture speaks of "visiting offenses upon," because in God's providence, the sin returns upon a man's own head. It is not only the cause of his punishment but a part of it. The memory of a man's sins will be a part of his eternal suffering. (Ibid.)

Ver. 14. The altars, etc. The vengeance of a just and holy God will one day certainly root out false worship.

Ver. 15. The winter-houses and, etc. What are the palaces and pleasure-houses of the wicked in the time of judgment, but a brand which kindles the wrath of the Lord.

CHAPTER IV.

2. Punishment must come, since despite all Chastisements the People will not amend.

- 1 Hear¹ this word, ye kine of Bashan,
Who are upon the mountain of Samaria,
Who oppress the poor,
Who crush the needy,
Who say to their lords,
Bring hither that we may drink.
- 2 The Lord Jehovah hath sworn by his holiness,
Behold days are coming upon you,
When men will drag² you away with hooks
And the remnant³ of you with fish-hooks.
- 3 And through breaches⁴ in the wall ye shall go out, every one before her,⁵
And be cast forth⁶ to Harmon⁷ saith Jehovah.
- 4 Go to Bethel and sin, —
To Gilgal,⁸ and sin still more !
Bring every morning your sacrifices,
Every three days your tithes.
- 5 Offer⁹ a praise-offering of what is leavened,
Call out for voluntary offerings, proclaim them !
For this liketh you,¹⁰ O sons of Israel,
Saith the Lord, Jehovah.
- 6 And I, even I,¹¹ have given you cleanness of teeth in all your cities,
And want of bread in all your places ;
And ye have not returned unto me, saith Jehovah.
- 7 And I, even I, have withheld the rain from you,
When there were yet three months to the harvest,
And have caused it to rain upon one city,
And cause it not to rain¹² upon another.
One field is rained upon,
And the field upon which it does not rain, withers.
- 8 And two, three cities stagger to one city
To drink water, and are not satisfied ;
And ye have not returned unto me, saith Jehovah.
- 9 I have smitten you with blight and with mildew ;
And the multitude¹³ of your gardens and your vineyards,
And of your fig trees and olive trees, the locust devoured ;
And ye have not returned to me, saith Jehovah.
- 10 I have sent pestilence among you in the manner of Egypt,¹⁴
I have slain your young men with the sword,
Together with the booty¹⁵ of your horses,
And caused the stench¹⁶ of your camps to ascend even into your noses,
And ye have not returned unto me, saith Jehovah.
- 11 I have overthrown among you,
As God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah,

And ye were like a brand plucked out of the burning ;
And still ye have not returned unto me.

12 Therefore thus will I do to thee, O Israel.
Because I will do this to thee,
Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel.

13 For, behold, He that formeth the mountains and createth the wind,
And declareth to man what is his thought,
Who maketh dawn darkness,
And goeth over the high places of the earth,
Jehovah, God of hosts, is his name.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- 1 Ver. 1. — שָׁמַעְתָּ for שָׁמַעְתָּה, because the verb stands first. Cf. Is. xxxii. 11.
- 2 Ver. 2. — נִשְׁמָה is Piel, as in 1 Kings ix. 11. Green's Grammar, § 164, 2. נִי pleonastic, like the Greek ἐνι, in direct address.
- 3 Ver. 2. — אַחֲרֵיתָ is not posterity (Fürst, Henderson), but remnant, "all even to the very last." Cf. Hengstenberg, Christol., i. 367.]
- 4 Ver. 3. — כִּי יָיִם is accusative of place.
- 5 Ver. 3. — נִקְּדָה, i. e., without turning to the right or the left." Cf. Josh. vi. 5-20.
- 6 Ver. 3. — הַשְׁלַכְתָּהּ, הִיא is simply the full form of the pronoun, added here to obtain a similarity of sound with the preceding verb. The Hiphil form is found in all the MSS. save one, and is defended by Hitzig, Ewald, etc., but as it is very harsh, it is better, with the LXX., Syr., Sym., Vulgate, and Arabic, to take it as Hophal (Jerome, Fürst, Kell, etc.).
- 7 Ver. 3. — הָרָמָה. This hapax legom. is not yet satisfactorily explained, although almost every possible interpretation has been given. The final letter appears to be ך local, and in that case the word indicates the place into which the fugitives are cast. But where that place is none can say; we have only conjectures, for which see Kell and Henderson in loc.
- 8 Ver. 4. — "Ghigal" is in the accusative after "go" understood from the preceding clause. "Every three days," is the literal rendering adopted by Ibn Ezra, Rosenmüller, Maurer, Kell, etc. Kimchi gives it as E. V., and is followed by Henderson. The LXX., Vulgate, and Luther agree with Ibn Ezra.
- 9 Ver. 5. — הָיָה, infin. absol. used for the imper.
- 10 Ver. 5. — "For this liketh you." This fine archaism seems preferable to the marginal equivalent of the E. V., "So ye love."
- 11 Ver. 6. — The first personal pronoun, when separately expressed in Hebrew, is always emphatic; hence the repetition in the version, "I, even I."
- 12 Ver. 7. — אֲמַסִּיר. The imperfects from here on are used as the historical present to give life to the description.
- 13 Ver. 9. — הַרְבֵּוֹת, infin. const. used as a substantive = multitude.
- 14 Ver. 10. — "In the manner of Egypt," because pestilence is epidemic in Egypt (Is. x. 24-26).
- 15 Ver. 10. — לִבְשֵׁי is usually explained: "together with the carrying away of your horses," so that even your horses were carried away. But Kell renders it concrete = the booty, so that even the horses that were captured, perished.
- 16 Ver. 10. — בְּנִחְסָם — even into your nostrils, "like as a memorial of their sins" (Hitzig).
- 17 Ver. 12. — עֹשֶׂה, may be, who turns the dawn into darkness, or, by asyndeton, who makes dawn, darkness, i. e., both. [The latter is preferred by Calvin, is expressed in the LXX., and is said by Henderson to be the reading of more than twenty of Kennicott's MSS.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Vers. 1-3. Hear this, etc. Plundering and destruction had been threatened; here carrying away is added. They who are threatened are the same as in chap. iii. The comparison to kine of Bashan, i. e., strong, well-fed, well agrees with the description of their extortions and their luxurious life in that chapter. They are compared to cows rather than bulls, manifestly because the latter figure would be too dignified for such persons as are intended. Perhaps their effeminacy is also hinted. But it is certainly wrong to understand the expression as meaning specifically the women of Samaria. For nothing characteristic of women is said of the cows, but only what had previously been said of the great in general. Nor is the phrase who say to their lords, any objection to this view; for cows have their "lords," and the term here means the king and the princes under whom the other great men are ranked. So the Targum. Jerome, Calvin, Maurer, and others.

Ver. 2. The threat is introduced by an oath. Jehovah swears by his holiness, for this perfection must desire the punishment of such an unholy life. Your remnant, what has not been dragged away with hooks. To understand this as meaning "posterity," would require us to consider two generations as included in the punishment threatened, which is a thought foreign to the context.

The breaches in the walls, are those made at the capture of the city. [There will be no need to resort to the gates, for egress will be possible in every direction. — C.] As to the much disputed Harmon, all the ancients and most of the moderns take it as a proper name, — Armenia, Rimmon, Hermon, etc. Kimchi, followed by Gesenius, Winer,

Henderson, resolves the word by a change of its first letter into the term meaning palace or citadel, and renders "will be cast down as to the palace," i. e., from it. Dr. Van Dyck in the New Arabic Bible, also takes it as appellative, and renders "to the citadel."

2. Vers. 4, 5. Go to Bethel, etc. You will not arrest this judgment by your idolatrous worship, eagerly as you may pursue that worship. Such eagerness is only an enlargement of your sins. This thought is expressed in a manner bitterly ironical by a summons to greater zeal. Gilgal was, like Bethel, a seat of idol worship (cf. on Hos. iv. 15). The whole passage is hyperbolic. "Even if you offered slain offerings every morning and tithe every three days, it would only increase your guilt."

To the same effect in ver. 5 they are told, instead of being content with unleavened cakes, to offer also upon the altar even the leavened loaves which were not required by law to be consumed (Lev. vii. 13, 14). And so with the free-will offerings. Instead of leaving these to spontaneous impulses, they in their exaggerated zeal called out for them, published them. The words, for this liketh you, make a mock of this zeal. But the mock is subsequently turned into earnest. For men surely should not persist in such love and zeal for idol worship, after God had so often punished them for it.

3. Vers. 6-11. All punishment hitherto had been in vain. This is shown in five instances, each concluding with the sorrowful refrain, and yet ye have not returned unto me, which strikingly display the love of Jehovah, who visits and punishes his people only to prevent the necessity of severer punishment.

(a.) Ver. 6. And I also, etc. To what they did, the prophet sets in opposition what Jehovah did. Cleanness of teeth, because they had nothing to eat.

(b.) Vers. 7, 8. Withheld the rain when, etc. The latter rain is meant. As this fell in February and March, while the harvest occurred in May and June, the interval was reckoned in round numbers at three months. ["This is utterly ruinous to the hopes of the farmer. A little earlier or a little later would not be so fatal, but drouth three months before harvest is entirely destructive." The Land and the Book, ii. 66.] The withholding of rain is stated as partial, in order to show more distinctly that it was a divine ordering.

(c.) Ver. 9. The third chastisement was a bad harvest, arising from a blight upon the cereal grains and the destruction of fruits by locusts.

(d.) Ver. 10. The fourth chastisement was pestilence and war. For the grievous sufferings of Israel in the latter, see 2 Kings viii. 12, xiii. 3, 7.

(e.) Ver. 11. I overthrow, etc. This manifestly does not indicate a new chastisement in addition to the foregoing, but sums them all up in a single utterance. "The comparison of the doom of Ephraim to that of Sodom and Gomorrah, is a general indication of the greatness of their punishment (cf. Is. i. 9). The way in which the destruction of the cities of the plain is spoken of, plainly refers to Gen. xix. 29, where occurs the word 'overthrow,' which became the standing phrase to describe this fearful fate (Deut. xxix. 22; Is. i. 7, xiii. 19; Jer. xlix. 18, l. 40)." (Baur.) As a brand. The emphasis does not lie on the actual escape, but on the fact that it was so narrow. The phrase vividly depicts the severity of their chastisements hitherto; so much the more inexcusable are they for not having returned to the Lord.

4. Vers. 12, 13. Therefore thus will I, etc. Thus, but how is not said. "Thus," is therefore to be regarded as a general threat, which is so much the more severe, because it is not stated what shall come, so that there is everything to fear. The punishment is indeed generally indicated in this chapter, as also in chapter iii. But the chief point of the chapter is to recall the past hard-heartedness of Israel, not to describe their punishment, since there are only brief references to the judgment already mentioned, the full description of which is resumed in chap. v. As yet it is only a threat: hence the summons, Prepare, etc., i. e., not to meet your doom, but to avert it by true repentance (cf. chap. v. 4, 6). "To give the greater emphasis to this command, ver. 13 depicts God as the Almighty and Omniscient who creates prosperity and adversity." (Keil.) "His thought" does not mean man's thought, but God's own, which He makes known by the prophets, i. e., his purpose to punish. [It seems more natural, as it is more in accordance with the uniform usage of the word חשב to refer it to man. As Pusey says, "To man, a sinner, far more impressive than all majesty of creative power is the thought that God knows his inmost soul. He declareth unto man his meditation, before he puts it into words."] Treads upon the high places = rules over all, even the highest of earth. Finally the whole is confirmed by the lofty title of God as God of Hosts.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. "This discourse (vers. 1-3) strikes at those who are in authority and practice violence at court and elsewhere. In them, unrighteousness in act concurs with great looseness in speech. The more violently men deal in matters of office and government, the more viciously do they proceed among their fellows, trying to stifle all humane feeling for others' need and all complaints at the wrong that is done. But the more frivolous their talk, the more earnest is God in his counsel and oath against them; and as they have done much for the sake of advancing and enriching their posterity, so the judgment of God strikes them with their posterity." (Rieger.)

2. "Since the prophet here attacks so severely the heads of the state, we are to consider that if a modern preacher were to do the same, it would be regarded as an insult and a calumny. But if a preacher out of a proper zeal should at times handle somewhat harshly acknowledged public offenders who can be reached in no other way, this is by no means to be deemed an unbecoming insult, for the same reproach would apply to the prophets, to our Lord Himself, and to his Apostles, all of whom often uttered severe language. When in any such case the rebuke aims only at the benefit of the persons concerned, it is not an impropriety or an outrage, but a work of love demanded by the preacher's office, which is to censure the impenitent. This must be done not only upon the lowly but upon the lofty, and indeed the more upon the latter because they do so much more harm when they act amiss." (Wurt. Bi.) It is a natural inference that such a thing should be done not in passion nor personal provocation, but really from a holy zeal against sin. But clear as the matter is so far, the more difficult is it in practice. One can only say, Let each man approve himself to God as to his inward feeling. The fear of man should not close the mouth to an open testimony against the high. But it does not follow that an open mouth is always a token of zeal for God's honor. Least of all is such a thing found in a mere copying of others, even though they be prophets. Nor should the difference between prophets and the preachers of our day be obliterated. With the courage to bear testimony must be united the courage to suffer on account of such testimony (cf. at chap. iii. Doct. and Eth. 2).

3. They who shamelessly transgress the simplest moral duties, develop along with this course a powerful religious zeal and cannot do enough in worship. An apparent contradiction, yet one confirmed a hundred times by experience; moral corruption and religious bigotry amalgamated! Yet is it altogether natural; the religious form covers over the moral nakedness and quiets the conscience; but this is certainly a horrible delusion. That it was a false worship in which the Israelites were so zealous, enhances their guilt, for it was an apostasy from Jehovah. But even a religiosity which is formally correct, may be used as a cover for wickedness, and be blended with moral corruption. Thus it is well to remember that religious zeal in itself is no proof that all is well.

4. God tries all means before proceeding to extremities. If benefits are not recognized, He sends chastisements. These in the first instance aim not at destruction, but at opening the eyes through the perception of the divine wrath so that men may repent and seek God. They are therefore as much tokens of grace as proofs of wrath. But if this aim is not reached, the forbearance of God ceases, and a decisive judgment steps forth. But this last is something extorted from God, it is against his real disposition; only with reluctance does He resolve upon it. He waits long in the hope that there will be a change and so the last step be unnecessary. Most clearly does the sorrowful love of God shine out from the vivid delineation of the prophet. National calamities, according to our chapter, are to be viewed as chastisements from God. This view does not conflict with the existence of natural causes, but recognizes God as the being in whose service these act. It sees in the course of the world, not the blind mechanism of a clock, but the work of a personal intelligent will, and considers the laws of that course as the thoughts of this will, which rules and governs the whole, the domain of the physical as well as that of the moral and spiritual, and naturally does not leave these to run on merely side by side, but puts them in constant and intimate relation and alternation with each other, so that physical life finds its highest aim in the loftier domain of moral and spiritual life. National calamities are only a lower degree of the revelation of God's wrath. Heavy as they may be, they endanger only the material conditions of a nation's life, and that in a superficial way from which there may be a recovery, but they do not imperil its essential being, which consists in its political "independence and freedom." That a nation is determined to maintain and guard this, that it considers the loss of it the last punishment from God's hand, comes forth very clearly as the prophet's view. A nation therefore should defend this against the attack of a foreign foe. But it is equally clear that where the inner conditions, piety and righteousness, no longer exist, there all pains to preserve independence are vain. God gives the power and victory to the foes. What enemies do, that God himself does through them (cf. chap. ii. 13, iii. 15). Here also there is no denial of the nearer causality, that of the human will. But while man is doing only his own will, he at the same time does the will of God, acts as his instrument, and serves his aims, which are the highest, the only absolute ones.

5. With a short but lofty delineation of God's transcendent greatness and almighty power, the prophet concludes the chapter, showing that Jehovah is one who speaks with emphasis and can execute his threatenings. It is as beautiful poetically as it is profound theologically. It exhibits an elevation and depth in the conception of God, which permits a very definite conviction as to the strength and clearness of the divine manifestation made to Israel. As thus controlling all things, God is called the God of Hosts. Observe how fond Amos is of this phrase in the vehement outpouring of indignation in the chaps. iii.-vi., cf. iii. 13, iv. 13, v. 16, 27, vi. 8, 14. Here Jehovah appears as One who towers above all creaturely existences, who rules the highest spheres of might, against whom therefore nothing can avail, around whom everything stands ready to execute his will. He is not the national God of Israel alone, but the God of the world. Hence He is not merely a natural force which builds and again destroys, but a personal God who acts according to his own "thought," which He makes known to men. And as such a personal, self-conscious, self-active being, He stands in constant relations with his personal creatures.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[Ver. 1. Who oppress the poor. He upbraids them not for fierceness, but for a more delicate and wanton unfeelingness, the fruit of luxury, fullness of head, a life of sense, which destroy all tenderness, dull the mind, deaden the spiritual sense. They did not directly oppress, perhaps did not know that it was done; they sought only that their own thirst for luxury and self-indulgence should be gratified, and knew not, as those at ease often know not now, that their luxuries are continually watered by the tears of the poor, tears shed almost unknown except by the Maker of both. But He counts willful ignorance no excuse. (Pusey.)

Ver. 2. Behold, days are coming. God's day and eternity are ever coming. They are holding on their steady course. Men put out of their minds what will come. Therefore God so often in his notices of woe brings to mind that those days are ever coming; they are not a thing which shall be only; in God's purpose they already are, and with one uniform, steady noiseless tread are coming upon the sinner. (Ibid.)

Ver. 4. Go to Bethel and sin, etc. Words uttered in bitter irony and indignation, as Ezekiel says (xx. 39), "Go ye, serve every one his idols," and our Lord, "Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers" (Matt. xxiii. 32). It is a characteristic of idolatry and schism, to profess extraordinary zeal for God's worship and go beyond the letter and spirit of his law by arbitrary will-worship and self-idolizing fanaticism. (Wordsworth.)

Ver. 5. Call out for voluntary offerings, etc. The profuseness of idolaters in the service of their false gods may shame our strait-handedness in the service of the true and living God. (M. Henry.)

Ver. 6 ff. Have given you cleanness of teeth, etc. Before, we had a thoughtful appeal to God's mercies; now his chastisements are enumerated. These are the two chief evidences of God's approach to a people, a community, a family, or even an individual, in love or in sorrow, and what fruits one or the other has borne (Rieger). [And ye have not returned unto me. By repeating this sorrowful ejaculation four times (vers. 6, 9, 10, 11), God emphatically declares the loving design of his chastisement of Israel. (Wordsworth.)

Vers. 7, 8. The preaching of the Gospel is as rain; God sometimes blesses one place with it more than another; some countries, some cities are like Gideon's fleece, wet with this dew while the ground around is dry; all withers where this rain is wanting. But it were well if people were but as wise for their souls as they are for their bodies, and, when they have not this rain near them, would go and seek it where it is to be had. If they seek aright, they shall not seek in vain. (M. Henry.)]

Ver. 9. Of what avail are judgments? Men now are as little influenced by them as Israel of old. They do not believe they are punishments, much less that they are sent for the causes assigned. They deem them accidental, or else invent other causes, and even ascribe droughts, floods, hail, caterpillars, etc., to witchcraft and sorcery, in the face of the Scripture which expressly attributes such plagues to God. (Wurt. Bible.) [Ordinarily, God makes his sun to arise upon the evil and on the good, and sends rain on the just and on the unjust, but He does not enslave himself to his own laws. There are variations, and in his Word He reveals to us the meaning of his daily variations in the workings of nature. (Pusey.)

Ver. 10. After the manner of Egypt. Israel, having sinned like Egypt, was to be punished like Egypt. One of the threatenings in Deuteronomy in case of disobedience was (xxviii. 27), The Lord shall smite thee with the botch of Egypt. (Ibid.)

Ver. 11. I have overthrown, etc. The earthquake is reserved to the last as the most special visitation, It is at all times the more terrible, because unseen, unannounced, instantaneous, complete. The ground under a man's feet seems no longer secure, his shelter is his destruction; men's houses become their graves. War, pestilence, and famine seldom break in at once. The earthquake at once buries it may be, thousands, each stiffened (if it were so), in that his last deed of evil; each household with its own form of misery; each in its separate vault, — dead, dying, crushed, imprisoned. (Ibid.)

Ver. 12. Thus will I do unto thee. God having said this is silent as to what He will do; that so Israel hanging in suspense as having before him each sort of punishment — which are the more terrible because he imagines them one by one, — may indeed repent, that God inflict not what He threatens. (Jerome.)]

Ver. 13. He that formeth the mountains, etc. This noble description of God on one hand arouses the conscience to appreciate his threatenings and renounce all vain confidence, and on the other encourages the heart to come again into communion with such a God by sincere conversion. (Rieger.) [If He be such a God as He is here described to be, it is folly to contend with Him, and our duty and interest to make our peace with Him; it is good having Him our friend, and bad having Him our enemy. (M. Henry.)]

CHAPTER V.

3. Lament for Israel. The only Safety is in seeking the Lord. Woe to the Fools who desire the Day of the Lord.

- 1 Hear this word,
Which I raise over you as a lamentation, ¹ O house of Israel.
- 2 Fallen is the virgin ² Israel, she does not rise again,
She is stretched out upon her soil, no one raises her up.
- 3 For thus saith the Lord Jehovah,
The city which goes out by a thousand ³
Shall retain a hundred,
And that which goes out by a hundred
Shall retain ten, for the house of Israel.
- 4 For thus saith Jehovah to the house of Israel,
Seek ye me, and ye shall live. ⁴
- 5 And seek not Bethel,
And go not to Gilgal,
And pass not over to Beersheba.
For Gilgal shall surely go into captivity, ⁵
And Bethel shall come to naught.
- 6 Seek ye Jehovah, and ye shall live,
Lest he break forth like fire upon the house of Joseph,
And it devour, ⁶ and there be none to quench it for Bethel.
- 7 They who turn justice into wormwood,
And cast righteousness down to the earth!
- 8 He who makes the Seven Stars ⁷ and Orion,
And turns the shadow of death into morning,
And darkens day into night;

- Who calls to the waters of the sea,
And pours them over the face of the earth,
Jehovah is his name!
- 9 Who makes desolation to flash⁸ upon the strong,
And desolation comes upon the fortress.
- 10 They hate the reprover⁹ in the gate,
And him that speaketh uprightly they abhor.
- 11 Therefore, because ye trample¹⁰ upon the poor,
And take from him a gift of wheat;
Houses of hewn stone ye have built
But ye shall not dwell in them,
Pleasant vineyards ye have planted,
But ye shall not drink their wine.
- 12 For I know that many are your transgressions,
And your sins are great,
Ye who oppress¹¹ the righteous,
Who take a bribe,
And they push aside the poor in the gate from their right.
- 13 Therefore, the prudent at this time is silent,
For it is an evil time.
- 14 Seek good and not evil that ye may live,
And that so Jehovah, God of hosts, may be with you, as ye say.
- 15 Hate evil and love good,
And set up justice in the gate;
Perhaps Jehovah, God of hosts, will favor the remnant of Joseph.
- 16 Therefore thus saith Jehovah, God of hosts, the Lord,
In all streets wailing!
And in all the highways shall men say, Alas, alas,
And they call¹² the husbandman to mourning,
And lamentation to those skilled in lamenting.
- 17 And in all vineyards shall be lamentation,
For I will pass through the midst of thee, saith Jehovah.
- 18 Woe to those who desire the day of Jehovah!
What good is it to you?
The day of Jehovah! it is darkness and not light.
- 19 As if a man fleeth before the lion,
And the bear meets him;
Or he goes into the house
And rests his hand upon the wall,
And the snake bites him.
- 20 Is not the day of Jehovah darkness and not light,
And gloom without any brightness?
- 21 I hate, I despise your feasts,¹³
And take no delight in your assemblies.
- 22 For if ye offer me burnt-offerings,
Your food-offerings I will not accept,
And the thank-offering of your fatlings I will not regard.
- 23 Take away from me the noise of your songs,
And the playing of your harps I will not hear.
- 24 And let judgment roll on like water,
And righteousness like an inexhaustible stream.¹⁴
- 25 Did ye offer me sacrifices and food-offerings
In the wilderness forty years, O house of Israel?
(No) but ye bore the tent of your king¹⁵
And the pedestal of your images,

- The star of your God,
Which ye made for yourselves.
27 Therefore will I carry you away captive beyond Damascus,¹⁶
Saith Jehovah, whose name is God of hosts.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 1. — לִירָדָה is the word used to denote David's dirge over Saul and Jonathan, 2 Sam. i. 17. It is here in apposition with דָּרָר.]

2 Ver. 2. — נִפְשָׁהּ, E. V. forsaken is quite inadequate. Targum and Vulgate have cast down, but better is the literal meaning given above — stretched out, and therefore prostrate and helpless.

3 Ver. 3. — The numerals define more closely the manner of the going forth, i. e. to war.

4 Ver. 4. — The two imperatives, by a usage common in all languages, express command and result; e. g., Latin, divide et impera.

5 Ver. 5. — There is in יִגְלֵה גִלְהָה, a play upon words which cannot be expressed in English. A similar paronomasia is suggested in the last clause, cf. Hos. iv. 15. [Pusey offers, as illustrative parallels, "Paris périra," or "London is undone."]

6 Ver. 6. — וְאֶחָדָהּ cannot be rendered as in E. V. "and devour," as if Jehovah were the subject.

7 Ver. 8. — פְּיִמָה, the crowd, is the Seven Stars or Pleiades. פֶּסֶל, the fool, but according to the old interpreters, [whom Fürst follows] the giant, is Orion. Both constellations are mentioned together in Job ix. 9; xxxviii. 31. The connection between vers. 7 and 8 is, They are acting in this atrocious way, whereas Jehovah is the Almighty and can bring sudden destruction upon them.

8 Ver. 9. — מִבְּלִי, causes to break in. [Following an Arabic analogy, Kell and Wordsworth suppose an allusion to the swiftness of lightning, expressed in the version by flash. Pusey follows Aquila and Jerome, and renders enaketh to smile. The E. V. followed a conjecture of Kimohl, and is clearly wrong, besides quite needlessly turning עָד in both members from an abstract into a concrete noun.]

9 Ver. 10. — מִיָּדָיו. Not merely a judge acting officially, but "any one who before a tribunal lifts up his voice against acts of injustice." Cf. Is. xlix. 21.

10 Ver. 11. — בּוֹשֵׁם, dx. leg., a variant orthography for בּוֹסֵם. Fürst derives it from בוֹשָׁה, i. q. בְּהֵאָה, to be loathsome, h. bad. Hiph., to bring evil upon.

11 Ver. 12. — צֹרְרִי. This and the following participle belong to the suffixes in the nouns preceding.

12 Ver. 13. — To proclaim mourning to the husbandman = to call him to mourning.

13 Ver. 21. — הַיָּמִים are the great yearly festivals. עֲצֵרוֹת is of uncertain meaning, commonly explained, feastive assemblies. Cf. Joel i. 14. [All agree that it denotes convocations in connection with religious observances, whether penitential or otherwise.] אֲרִיחַ, lit. to smell, is an expression of satisfaction, in allusion to "the odour of delight" which ascended to God from the burning sacrifice. Cf. Lev. xvi. 31; Gen. viii. 21; Ephes. v. 2.

14 Ver. 24. — אֵירוֹן. The later critics give the primary meaning as constant, abiding, and hence when applied to streams, inexhaustible.

15 Ver. 26. — The words here are difficult, since סִכְּכֻת and כִּיָּוִן are dx. leg. Perhaps they are proper names of idols, so that the adjoining words are in apposition, and we should render — Sikkuth, your king, and Chivan, your image.

So Luther, and of later critics, Fürst. The name Sikkuth (in Syriac with another pointing, כִּיָּוִן, Chevan) has been explained to mean Saturn, who indeed in Arabic is called Kaiman, but it is not certain that this did not originate from the passage before us, and therefore "it has no more worth than that of an exegetical conjecture" (Kell.) The LXX., changing the word, make out of כִּיָּוִן an idol, Ἰδωλόν (Acts vii. 43, Ἰδωλόν), the meaning of which is equally uncertain, since the name does not occur elsewhere in the LXX., or in the writings founded upon that version. Kell therefore conjectures an exchange of letters; instead of כִּיָּוִן they read דִּיָּוִן. Then the plural כִּיָּוִיִּם becomes difficult, for although Fürst says that כִּיָּוִיִּם is, like בְּלִיָּוִיִּם, used here as a singular for an idol, that is a mere assertion. Naturally then the appellative כִּיָּוִיִּם would belong to both the proper names. But that כִּיָּוִיִּם is not to be coordinated with the two preceding phrases, is plain from the omission, first of the וְ which stands before each of those clauses, and then, of the וְ by which they are closely bound together.

More probable then is the appellative view of Sikkuth and Chivan. The former from כִּכֵּן, to cover, hence a covering, a booth. So the LXX., σκηνη. (But they improperly take כִּיָּוִיִּם as a proper name, rov μολόχ.) Therefore, "tent of your king," meaning doubtless a movable shrine in which the image of the god was kept; such as, according to Herod. ii. 68, and Diod. Sic. i. 97, were used by the Egyptians. Chivan is correspondingly explained as pedestal, from כִּיָּוִן, and allied to כִּיָּוִן and כִּיָּוִן, therefore, the pedestal or framework of your images, that by which they were carried about. What follows is to be considered as in explanatory apposition, viz. the star of your god = the star who was your god. Undoubtedly even this explanation has great difficulties. [But still it is easier than the others which have been proposed, and is sustained by the sanction of Ribera, Junius, Gesenius, Hengstenberg, Kell, and Wordsworth.]

In any case we must understand by כִּיָּוִיִּם the image of a star, for the carrying it about is inconsistent with its being an actual star, — which ye have made refers either to this star-image or to "your god."

16 Ver. 27. — מִחוּלָּהּ לְדַמְשֶׁק. From a distance in respect to Damascus = far beyond Damascus.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Vers. 1-3. Lament over the fall of Israel. This word is further defined as a mournful song or dirge. The song follows in ver. 2. The virgin expresses the fact that the daughter of Israel had hitherto been unconquered (Is. xxiii. 12). This now should have an end. Vers. 3 briefly explains the dirge. Israel will perish in war even to a very small remnant.

2. Vers. 4-17. The deeper ground of the dirge; For Israel might easily be saved if they would seek the Lord, but this they will not do.

(a.) Vers. 4-6. What God desires is that they should seek Him and forsake idolatry. To live means in the first instance to remain in life, but naturally includes the whole welfare of the state, its independence, etc. Gilgal and Bethel, so far from helping those who resorted to them, should themselves perish. Beersheba, in Southern Judaea, must have been a place of idolatrous worship, to which people from the ten tribes resorted, and in so doing passed over the boundaries of their kingdom.

Ver. 6. Once more is the seeking of Jehovah declared to be the means of life, and more strictly, the means of averting the judgment. The house of Joseph = Ephraim, the whole kingdom being named from the principal tribe. Bethel, as the chief seat of worship, was the central point of the kingdom.

(b.) Vers. 7-9. By a peculiar asyndeton the two parties are placed in vivid contrast with each other; the people in their ungodly course, and Jehovah in his omnipotence, naturally with the implied thought, such a God can punish—ought to be feared.

Ver. 7. Wormwood as a bitter plant is an image of bitter wrong, as in vi. 12; righteousness therefore is conceived as a sweet fragrant plant (cf. Deut. xxix. 19). Casting down to the earth = trampling under foot.

Ver. 8. Turns the shadow of death, etc. As these words are preceded by a reference to the stars and followed by a mention of natural phenomena, they are certainly to be understood in the same way, the aim of the entire passage being to cite the obvious manifestations God thus makes of himself, in support of the foregoing threatening. The tropical explanation—"he changes the deepest misery into prosperity," does not suit here, but only the natural, literal meaning; although "the shadow of death" does not in itself signify the regularly recurring shades of night, but as, e. g. in Job xxv. 17, the appalling gloom of night. Here night in general is set forth under this point of view, and is compared with the shadow of death. For its gloom is conceived of as an image of the divine judgment, of the hiding of God's face. But in any case the energy of the divine power in turning darkness into light is rendered so much the more prominent. [Keil and Pusey prefer the figurative meaning, which indeed is more in accordance with the constant usage of קִלְקִלָּה, but is certainly unnatural in this place in view of the literal references before and after.]—Who calls to the waters, etc., can refer only to fearful inundations by waves of the sea. [The allusion to the judgment of the Flood can hardly be overlooked. Keil.]

Ver. 9. Whether the evil mentioned here is to be viewed as caused like the foregoing by manifestations of God's power in the natural world, is doubtful, but not improbable. The reference might be to an earthquake or a storm.

(c.) Vers. 10-13. They hate the reprover etc. The prophet returns to the conduct of Israel, which must be punished.

Ver. 10. "In the gate," shows that the reference is to judicial proceedings. "The reprover," therefore, and "the one speaking uprightly" cannot be understood of the prophets, however natural such reference would be on other grounds.

Ver. 11. Take a gift = do him justice only when they are paid for it. Houses of hewn stone are costly dwellings, Is. ix. 10. The threat is borrowed from Deut. xxviii. 30.

Ver. 12. Who take a bribe, may either indicate a fresh sin, i. e., taking atonement money in satisfaction for a murder, against the law in Num. xxxv. 31, or may belong to the foregoing, thus, ye who oppress (imprison) the righteous and then take a ransom, i. e., will release him only for a ransom. The former is more consistent with the prevailing use of the Hebrew term. [So Pusey and Keil; but certainly the word in one instance at least, 1 Sam. xii. 3, is used to denote any sort of bribe.]

Ver. 13. Manifestly belongs to what precedes, since it further describes the period of corruption. He who has prudence = whose counsel is wholesome, will be compelled to silence (cf. ver. 10, the upright speaker is abhorred); instead of attentive hearing he has only violence to expect.

(d.) Vers. 14-17. Once more the way of deliverance is pointed out, at least for a remnant. But for the mass, nothing is to be expected but deep sorrow on all sides.

Ver. 14. And that so . . . with you as ye say. That is, Then will that be really the case which ye now vainly imagine,—that God is with you.

Ver. 15. Set up justice, etc. = maintain a righteous administration of justice. Then possibly there may be favor for a remnant. This does not refer to the existing condition of the ten tribes as reduced by Syrian conquests, for the kingdom under Jeroboam II. had recovered its former territorial limits. The remnant refers to that which would be left in future after the great chastisement impending. See a similar allusion in reference to Judah in Joel iii. 5, and Is. vi. 13, x. 21, 23.

Ver. 16. Therefore, introducing the threat, presupposes a denunciation of sins. The entire chapter is full of this, and therefore naturally, vers. 16, 17 do not refer simply to vers. 14, 15. Yet these latter do, indirectly at least, contain a reproof. The warning implies that the warned are not seeking good, etc. But only such seeking can save, and it is only too certain that these are not doing it; therefore, etc.,—general mourning. The sense is, on every hand there will be dead to weep for. There will be repeated what happened in Egypt at the smiting of the first-born; as the words I will pass through the midst of thee, allude to Exod. xii. 12. As in the cities, so in the land, there will be such a death-wail. And they call is to be supplied before the last clause. The skilled in lamenting, are the professional wailing women who were employed at funerals.

Ver. 17. Even in the vineyards, usually the places of liveliest joy, wailing should resound. ["A vintage not of wine but of woe."—Pusey.]

3. Vers. 18-27. Woe to the confident who deceive themselves with false hopes.

(a.) Vers. 18-20. Woe to those, etc. It would be foolish to expect help from the day of the Lord.

Ver. 18. Who desire the day of the Lord. Since they fancied that the carnal Israel and the true people of God were identical, this day must of course bring to them deliverance from all distress, and also power and glory. But it is made clear that this day to them can only bring harm, can only be a day of destruction (Joel ii. 2). Therefore, should they escape one danger (from a foe), they would only the more certainly fall into another. This in ver. 19 is set forth by a figure taken from common life, the meaning of which is clear.

Ver. 20. Once more is the threatening character of the day of the Lord affirmed and repeated.

(b.) Vers. 21-27. Even with festivals and sacrifices the people do not avert the judgment. For worship, rendered as a mere opus operatum, as it is by Israel, is worthless before God, and even offensive to Him. Since the question concerns the ten tribes, we may assume from the following representation that the worship they rendered was as to ritual substantially conformed to that at Jerusalem.

Ver. 22. For. God's displeasure at the feasts, etc., arise from his dislike of the sacrifices. The construction is interrupted, the first clause having no apodosis; but this is easily supplied from the second; and the sense is, I will accept neither your burnt offerings nor your meat offerings.

Ver. 23. The singing is contemptuously called a noise of songs.

Ver. 24. Such worship, instead of averting the judgment, rather provokes its full execution. It should pour over the land, like a flowing stream. It is wrong to interpret the verse [with Pusey, et al.] as an exhortation to the people to practice judgment and righteousness. The image of a flood of waters is much too strong for such a thought; it points rather to an act of God. [Yet, one may ask, is the expression any stronger here than in the cognate passage in Isaiah xlviii. 18, "then had thy peace been as a river and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea?" But the connection manifestly favors the author's view.]

(c.) Vers. 25-27. Did ye offer, etc. No wonder that such a judgment impends over Israel. From of old they had been recreant to their God. Their present offensive worship was in reality only a continuation of the idolatry practiced in the wilderness.

Ver. 25. Did ye offer to me sacrifices and food-offerings (=bloody and unbloody oblations)? The question implies a negative answer. The people therefore are described as having omitted the sacrifices to Jehovah for forty years, which certainly could be affirmed of the race as a whole, even if there were no express statements to that effect in the Pentateuch. Still, see e. g. Josh. v. 5-7, for the neglect of circumcision. While the people thus omitted the service of Jehovah, they carried on in place of it, idol-worship.

Ver. 26. And — namely, in place of bringing me the appointed offerings — ye bore the tent of, etc. (see Text. and Gram.). The idolatry censured by the prophet here is of Egyptian origin. Certainly the worship of the sun was widely diffused there, but we cannot affirm its nature more precisely. The existence of a literal god of the stars cannot be historically sustained.

Ver. 27. After Israel's apostasy had been established from the history of their forefathers, the judgment (cf. ver. 24) is briefly described as a literal carrying away. Even more plainly does it appear that the prophet in his threatenings is thinking of Assyria as the power from which the downfall of Israel is to come. Far beyond Damascus, is only a sort of euphemism for Assyria. The conclusion is, as in the case of the preceding chapter, the phrase, Jehovah, whose name is the God of hosts, a token that here another division ends.

[The Quotation by Stephen. In Acts vii. 42, 43, the proto-martyr is represented as quoting vers. 26, 27, in terms which vary considerably from our text. The explanation is as old as Jerome. "This is to be observed in all Holy Scripture, that Apostles and apostolic men, in citing testimonies from the Old Testament, regard not the words but the meaning, nor do they follow the words, step by step, provided they do not depart from the meaning." (Quoted by Pusey in loc.) Stephen quoted from the Septuagint, because its variations, whether real or seeming, made no difference as to the force of the passage in establishing the fact that Israel in the wilderness worshipped false gods. Stephen also substitutes Babylon for Damascus in the closing clause of the quotation; but the idea is the same; for the prediction turned not upon the name, but the fact, namely, that God would scatter them into distant lands. Stephen was not guilty of an error or an inadvertence, but simply brought the prophecy, without any real change of meaning, into agreement with the historical associations of the people in relation to the Babylonish exile.]

DOCTRINAL AND MORAL.

1. The prophet himself calls this chapter a wail over the house of Israel. Now as in such a wail the existing sorrow is touchingly expanded, but with it whatever can serve for its present and future amelioration, so in this lament the terribleness of sin and of the destruction to which it leads is sadly depicted, but at the same time are interwoven warnings to seek God so that in some measure the evil may be abated. (Rieger.) It is indeed remarkable; from what has gone before one would think Israel's fate decided, that all admonition and warning were vain and nothing but punishment remained; and yet this chapter, far more than those which precede, gives admonition with a promise annexed. The sharper the threatening, the more the way of escape is pointed out, for "God desires not that any should perish." Certainly it is the only way; therefore the admonition only states more emphatically the complaint; this only can save you, but you will none of it.

2. "Seek the Lord that ye may live." Equally simple and definite are the monition and the promise. Man knows what he has to do, and what to expect. Not merely is warning given, but also promise and the reverse. The gain is certain if one fulfills the condition, but the condition is indispensable. Yet how little is asked — only to seek the Lord, — and at the same time how much! And on the other hand, how little apparently is promised — to live — and yet how much! Warning and promise therefore are connected together not merely by an outward, casual juxtaposition, but by an inward coherence. The result always follows upon the performance of the conditions; for it is the Lord from whom life and death proceed. Hence no other condition for the attainment of life can be imposed than just this, Seek the Lord; and no smaller gain can be promised to the fulfillment of that condition than this, — Life. How strong a testimony for the truth of religion is contained in a single maxim of this kind, and that one recorded in the Scriptures, even in the Old Testament! The condition imposed is in the first instance religious —

"Seek the Lord, and cleave not to idols" — (ver. 5, also vers. 25, 26), but this naturally involves also one of an ethical character. This is expressly stated, in accordance with the rigidly ethical character of the Old Testament, when afterwards (ver. 14) the demand is changed into, "Seek good and not evil" with the same promise attached — "that ye may live." Only he therefore seeks the Lord in truth, who seeks good, and vice versa. And this seeking of good is more closely defined as hating evil and loving good. Both must concur; then only is there a real seeking of good; for God does the one as well as the other. Evil must be earnestly repelled and shunned, otherwise the seeking of good lacks truth and energy; in like manner must good be grasped at, otherwise the attempt misses its aim and soon becomes fruitless. Piety must have an ethical element, must show itself by hating evil and loving good. A mere outward religiousness, however zealous in ceremonies, is worthless in the eyes of God. Amos pronounces most decidedly against a sacrificial service destitute of a corresponding disposition of heart, where the offerings and gifts are not the expression of inward devotion and obedience to God.

3. The "good" which men are to love and to do, appears here continually as rectitude, in opposition to the prevailing unrighteousness, "the turning justice into wormwood, and casting righteousness down to the earth." This is the least that can be expected, yet in another sense it is the most important, for in vain do we look for the other, and, so to speak, rarer duties from the neglecter of justice, whereas he who sincerely observes this will soon reach something farther. Justice is the foundation of social order; when it is wanting, all in the end comes to ruin.

4. "What the law could not do in that it was weak through the flesh" (Rom. viii. 3), appears clearly here as it does in the other prophets. Clearly and frankly the law declares God's will, and tells man what he ought to do; notwithstanding, sin only increases, and apostasy becomes worse. For the law cannot along with its "Thou shalt" give to man the "I will." Rather on account of his inborn depravity, its commands and prohibitions stir up the motions of sin, and lead them to a bolder outbreak. Then surely the whole curse of the law must at last light upon the transgressor; and the prophets announce this through the judgments with which they threaten the disobedient people. Thus the insufficiency of a legal position is ever more plainly set forth. The law cannot give a new heart — and this is really the question if sin is to be checked and perfect obedience secured, — but grace alone can, full and free grace. Israel had already, from the time of the Exodus, experienced many acts of grace from God, among which very properly the giving of the law itself may be ranked. But these were only benefits which address men from the outside, real benefits indeed, in which God expressed his love, but only in order thus to render his commands more acceptable. But there was wanting the peculiar, unparalleled manifestation of love which is made in Christ. He bore and suffered the full curse of the law; He took upon Himself the entire condemnation pronounced upon the transgressor. But this resulted in the largest grace to men, since He without sin took upon Himself that curse, and thus freed us from it; and through the Holy Spirit streaming into men united by faith in Him, there is created a new heart which wills what it should, which hates evil and loves good, and in which the power of the σάρξ is broken, so that "the righteousness of the law is fulfilled in us who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit."

5. Upon the day of the Lord, see Joel ii. Doctrinal and Moral, 1. The reproof which Amos utters, stands, as we may confidently assume, in close relation to Joel, i. e., refers to an abuse which had been made of Joel's announcement of the day of the Lord. It appears here again that this day is essentially one of judgment. It certainly brings to Israel as God's people deliverance from their foes, but still only in so far as they are really God's people. So far as they are unfaithful and put themselves on a level with the heathen, that day is for them one of judgment, since it brings destruction upon all that is ungodly and anti-godly. The name, Israel, therefore, gives no license. Only in this sense is the announcement made. The people saw in this desired period one that would overthrow their foes and deliver them from their present distresses, without remembering that their guilt caused these distresses, and that they deserved punishment rather than deliverance. In this view, the announcement of the last day is still gladly welcomed. Men assign the evil, the punishment, to others, especially to those by whom they suffer, but claim the good for themselves, and anticipate the end of all sorrows and the dawn of cloudless prosperity. Hence results the security which is directly opposite to the watching and praying so earnestly enjoined by our Lord. Men then may long for the day of the Lord as a day of deliverance, but let them look well to the way in which they regard it, and see that this day finds them prepared and true to the Lord, so that He may recognize them as his own. Certainly it is not to be longed for in a spirit of revenge, i. e., in the view that the quicker it comes the sooner will God's judgments fall upon a godless world. The true Christian rather appreciates the wisdom and long-suffering with which God forbears to judge, and rejoices that room is left for the conversion of God's foes, even if meanwhile he is to suffer by them. He who with carnal impatience wishes for God's judgments upon others, will experience them himself, and truly in a different way from that of God's people. Empty forms and lip-service, however zealously pursued, are no defense against the divine judgments, and no earnest of the salvation which proceeds thence for the true people of God. (See also under Homiletical and Practical.)

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL

Ver. 1. As a lamentation. God is so gracious that He not only shows us our sins, but even mourns when He must punish us for them (Luke xix. 41). The accusation before punishment becomes a lament afterwards. Did we heed God's charges, we should not need to hear his lament. [The bewailed who know not why they are bewailed, are the more miserable because they know not their own misery. Dion.]

Vers. 2, 3. God's judgments increase in severity as they go on; if the earlier and milder are fruitless, at last comes total destruction. (Pf. B. W.) [Fallen. A dirge like that of David over Saul and Jonathan, over what was once lovely and mighty but had perished. (Pusey.) God had said, How should one chase a thousand! but the blessings of obedience are turned into the curses of disobedience. As the ancient Christian poet says, If the Lord is against us, our walls become cobwebs; but if the Lord is with us, our cobwebs become walls. (Wordsworth.)

Ver. 4. Seek me and live. Four times repeated (vers. 6, 8, 14). Wonderful conciseness of the Word of God, which in two words comprises the whole of the creature's duty and his hopes, his time and his eternity. . . The object of the search is God himself. Seek me, i. e., seek God for himself, not for anything out of Him, not for his gifts, not for anything to be loved with Him. This is not to seek Him purely. All is found in Him, but by seeking Him first, and then loving Him in all, and all in Him. (Pusey.)

Ver. 5. Seek not Bethel. Israel pretended to seek God in Bethel. Amos sets the two seekings as incompatible. The god worshipped at Bethel was not the one God. To seek God there was to lose Him. Pass not to Beersheba. Jeroboam I. pretended that it was too much for Israel to go to Jerusalem. And yet Israel thought it not too much to go to Beersheba, perhaps four times farther off. So much pains will men take in self-willed service, and yet not see that it takes away the excuse for neglecting the true. — Pusey. Gilgal shall surely, etc. Literally, "the place of rolling away," so called because there God rolled away the reproach of Egypt from Israel (Josh. v. 9). "Shall be clean rolled away." This is the law of God's dealings with man. He curses our blessings if we do not use them aright. Our holiest Gilgals — our sacraments, our Scriptures, our sermons, our Sundays, — which were designed by God to roll away from us the reproach of Egypt, will be rolled away from us if we do not use them aright; and will roll us downward unto our destruction. (Wordsworth.)

Ver. 6. The same promise and the same warning, — a proof that there is no other way to life, and also that the warning cannot be given too often, alas, is so often in vain. Ye shall live. God's gracious promises must be held before sinners, lest in despair they go from sin to sin. For how can one feel genuine repentance, if he has no hope? [None to quench for Bethel. Bethel, the centre of their idol hopes, so far from aiding them then, shall not be able to help itself, nor shall there be any to help it. Pusey.] God's wrath is a consuming fire; only true repentance can extinguish it.

[Ver. 8. Seek him that maketh, etc. Misbelief retains the name God, but means something quite different from the one true God. Men speak of "the Deity" as a sort of first cause of all things, but lose sight of the personal God who has made known his will. "The Deity" is no object of love or fear. For a First Cause who is conceived of as no more, is an abstraction, not God. God is the cause of all causes. All things are, and have their relations to each other as cause and effect, because He so created them. A "great first cause" who is thought of only as a cause, is a mere fiction of man's imagining, an attempt to appear to account for the mysteries of being, without owning that since our being is from God, we are responsible creatures who are to yield to Him an account of the use of our being which He gave us. In like way probably Israel had so mixed up the thought of God with nature that it had lost sight of God as distinct from the creation. And so Amos, after appealing to their consciences, sets forth God to them as the creator, disposer of all things, and the just God who redresseth man's violence and injustice. (Pusey.) Ye who worship the stars are rebelling against Him who made them. (Wordsworth.)]

Ver. 10. Impatience at a well-meant and friendly rebuke is the mark of an evil and perverse spirit. Such rebuke should be esteemed a kindness, even a balsam upon the head. On the other hand, reproof is to be administered with discretion. (Pf. B. W.)

Vers. 11, 12. Because ye trample, etc. Men should shun the oppression of the poor. Whence comes the swift ruin of entire families? It is because the sighing of the poor before God testifies against them. (Ibid.)

[Ver. 13. The prudent is silent. So our Lord was silent before his judges, for since they would not hear, his speaking would only increase their condemnation. So Solomon said, "He that reproveth a scorner getteth himself shame." "When the wicked rise, then men hide themselves." (Pusey.)]

Ver. 15. Hate evil, etc. He hateth evil who not only is not overcome by pleasure, but hates its deeds; and he loveth good who, not unwillingly nor of necessity nor from fear, doeth what is good, but because it is good. (Jerome.) To hate evil and to love good belong together. (Rieger.) And set up justice, etc. Justice is a pillar of the state. To set it up when fallen is the duty of all men, but especially of those in posts of honor or profit. — Perhaps, etc. Temporal promises are made with an "It may be," and our prayers must be made accordingly. (M. Henry.)

[Ver. 16. Therefore saith Jehovah, etc. For the third time here as in the two preceding verses, Amos reminds them of Him in whose name He speaks, namely, the I Am, the self-existent God, the God of all things in heaven and earth, He who has absolute power over his creatures to dispose of them as He will. (Pusey.) Alas, alas! The terrible-ness of the prophecy lies in its truth. When war pressed without on the walls of Samaria, and within was famine and pestilence, woe, woe, woe must have echoed in every street; for in every street was death and the fear of worse. Yet imagine every sound of joy or din or hum of men, or mirth of children, hushed in the streets, and woe, woe, going up in one unmitigated, unchanging, ever-repeated monotony of grief. Such were the present fruits of sin. Yet what a mere shadow of the inward grief is its outward utterance! (Ibid.) Call the skilled in lamenting. The same feeling makes the rich now clothe their households in mourning, which made those of old hire mourners, that all might be in harmony with their grief. (Ibid.)

Ver. 18. Woe to those who desire, etc. A similar spirit manifested itself in those who said in Jeremiah's days, "The Temple of the Lord are these" (vii. 4), and who prided themselves on their national religious principles, but did not obey the Lord of the temple, and were therefore condemned by the Prophet. A like temper was manifested after the Captivity. The Hebrew nation was eager for the Messiah's coming to the new-built temple, but the prophets reminded them that his coming would be a day of fear and woe for the ungodly. Mal. iii. 2. (Wordsworth.)

Ver. 19. As if a man fleeth before the lion, etc. The day of the Lord is a day of terror on every side. Before and behind, within and without, abroad under the roof of heaven or under the shelter of one's own, everywhere is terror and death. (Pusey.)

Ver. 20. Is not the day, etc. An appeal to men themselves, Is it not so? Men's consciences are truer than their intellect. Intellect carries the question out of itself into the region of surmising and disputings. Conscience is compelled to receive it back into its own court and to give the sentence. Like the God of the heathen fable who changed himself into all sorts of forms, but when he was still held fast, gave at last the true answer, conscience shrinks back, twists, writhes, evades, turns away, but in the end will answer truly when it must. The prophet then turns round upon the conscience, and says, "Tell me, for you know." (Ibid.)

Vers. 21, 22. I hate, I despise, etc. Israel would fain be conscientious and scrupulous. What they offered was the best of its kind; whole burnt offerings, fatted beasts, full-toned chorus, instrumental music. What was wanting to secure the favor of God? Love and obedience. And so those things by which they hoped to propitiate God became the object of his displeasure. (Ibid.)

Ver. 23. Take away the noise, etc. Here is a warning to all who think to please God by elaborate musical services in his house; while they do not take heed to worship Him with their hearts and to obey Him in their daily life. (Wordsw.)

Ver. 24. Did ye offer unto me, etc. The ten tribes, by approving and copying the false worship of their forefathers, made that sin their own. As the Church of God is at all times one and the same, so that great opposite camp, the city of the devil, has a continuous existence through all time. These idolaters were filling up the measure of their forefathers, and in the end of those who perished in the wilderness they might behold their own. As God rejected the divided service of their forefathers, so He would their's. (Pusey.) — Unto me. This is emphatic. If God is not served wholly and alone, He is not served at all. As Jerome says, He regardeth not the offering, but the will of the offerer. (Ibid.)

Ver. 25. Which ye made for yourselves. This was the fundamental fault. Whereas God made them for Himself, they made for themselves gods out of their own mind. All idolatry is self-will, first choosing a god and then enslaved to it. (Ibid.)

Ver. 27. To break the force of the prophecy contained in this verse, De Wette says, "Although the kingdom of Israel had through Jeroboam recovered its old borders, yet careless insolence, luxury, unrighteousness must bring the destruction which the prophet foretells. He does but dimly forebode the superior power of Assyria." To which Pusey justly answers, that decay does not involve the transportation of a people, but rather the contrary. A mere luxurious people rots on its own soil and would be left to rot there. It was the little remnant of energy and warlike spirit in Israel that brought its ruin from man. In the faults referred to, they were no worse than their neighbors, nor so bad; not so bad as the Assyrians themselves, except that, God having revealed Himself to them, they had more light. God has annexed no such visible laws of punishment to a nation's sins that man could of his own wisdom or observation of God's ways foresee it. They through whom He willed to inflict it in this case, and whom Amos pointed out, were not provoked by the sins De Wette specifies. There was no connection between Israel's present sins and Assyria's future vengeance. No eastern despot cares for the oppressions of his subjects so that his own tribute is collected. As far too as we know, neither Assyria nor any other power had hitherto punished rebellious nations by transporting them. Only He who controls the rebellious wills of men, and through their self-will works out his own all-wise will and man's punishment, could know the future of Israel and Assyria, and how through the pride of Assyria, He would bring down the pride of Samaria.]

CHAPTER VI.

4. Woe to the Secure who think that the Day of the Lord is far off.

- 1 Woe to the secure ¹ in Zion,
And to the careless in the mountain of Samaria!
To the princes of the first of nations,
To whom the house of Israel comes!
- 2 Pass over ² to Calneh and see,
And go thence to Hamath the great,
And go down to Gath of the Philistines;
Are they better than these kingdoms,
Or is their territory greater than your territory?
- 3 Ye who put far off the evil day,
And bring near the seat of violence;
- 4 Who lie upon beds of ivory
And stretch themselves upon their couches,
Who eat lambs out of the flock,
And calves from the fattening stall:
- 5 Who trill ³ to the sound of the harp,
Like David, they invent string instruments,⁴
- 6 Who drink wine out of sacrificial bowls,⁵

And anoint themselves with the best oils,
And do not grieve for the hurt of Joseph.

- 7 Therefore now shall they go captive at the head of the captives,
And the shout⁶ of the revellers shall depart.
- 8 The Lord Jehovah hath sworn by himself,
Saith Jehovah, God of hosts,
I abhor the pride of Jacob⁷
And hate his palaces,
And will give up the city and the fullness thereof.
- 9 And if ten men are left in one house they shall die.
- 10 And his cousin⁸ and his burier shall lift him up,
To carry his bones out of the house,
And shall say to the one in the inmost recess of the house,
"Is there still any one with thee?" and he says, "Not one,"
Then shall he say, "Be still,
For we must not call upon Jehovah's name."
- 11 For behold, Jehovah commands, and men smite the great house⁹ into ruins
And the small house into pieces.
- 12 Do horses indeed run upon the rock,¹⁰
Or do men plough there with cattle,
That ye have turned justice into poison,
And the fruit of righteousness into wormwood?
- 13 Ye who rejoice in a thing of nought,¹¹
Who say, "With our own strength we have taken to us horns."
- 14 For, behold, I raise up over you, O house of Israel,
Saith Jehovah, God of hosts, a nation,¹²
And it shall oppress you from the entrance Hamath to the brook of the desert.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 1. — בְּחֵיִם comes from the intransitive form, and is equivalent here to its use in Is. xxxii. 9, 10, 11. Mount of Sam. Is not the object of trust (as in E. V.) but the place where the careless security is cherished. בְּחֵיִם, a Mosiac word (Num. i. 17), = specified by name, chosen, distinguished.

2 Ver. 2. — עָבַרְךָ, pass over, because the Euphrates must be crossed in going to Calneh.

3 Ver. 5. — חֲלִיטִים, Ar. Agy. perhaps = פָּרַד, to divide. According to Fürst it is here = to break out, especially in song. Kell interprets it to strew around, i. e., words, and thinks it describes the singing as frivolous nonsense. Meter renders it "to jingle." [Pusey understands it as meaning "a hurried flow of unmeaning words in which the rhythm is everything, the sense nothing." The rendering in the text, trill, is from Wordsworth.]

4 Ver. 5. — כְּלֵי שִׁיר, lit., instruments of music, seems, from a comparison of 2 Chron. xxxiv. 12 with 2 Chron. xxix. 26, 27, and 1 Chron. xxiii. 5, to denote stringed instruments. [So Kell and Pusey.] הִשָּׁב, to invent, devise.

5 Ver. 6. — מִזְרִיקִים, lit., sprinkling vessels, always elsewhere denotes bowls used in the temple service. Ex. xxxviii. 3; Num. iv. 14; 2 Chron. iv. 8.

6 Ver. 7. — מִרְיָן constr. of מִרְיָן, a loud cry, here of joy. סְרַחֲחִים as in ver. 4, the stretched out, i. e., at a banquet = the revellers. Fürst assumes a second root of the same radicals, to which he gives the meaning, to be bad, to sink, and metaph., to be corrupt, and renders here, the degenerate. [This seems quite needless.]

7 Ver. 8. — בְּאִזְנוֹ, the pride of Jacob, i. e., everything of which he is proud. הִסְגִּיר to give up, i. e., to the enemy. "The city," means Mamaria, and "its fullness," whatever it contains.

8 Ver. 10. — דֹּדְךָ, lit., uncle, here denotes any kinsman. מְסַרְפֵּן, lit., his burner. As the Israelites were wont to bury and not burn their dead, it is supposed that the multitude of corpses compelled the latter course. עֲצָמִים, bones, here = body, as Exod. xiii. 19; Josh. xxiv. 32; 2 Kings xiii. 21.

9 Ver. 11. — הַבֵּית, the singular is used indefinitely = every house, great and small. Cf. iii. 15.

10 Ver. 12. — Meier points בְּעֶזְרֵי, thus, בְּעֶזְרֵי. Does man plough the sea with oxen? [But this is a mere conjecture].

11 Ver. 13. — לֹא דָבָר a not-thing, something which does not exist, namely, the strength mentioned in the next clause.

[12 Ver. 14. — Few instances are found in Hebrew in which the object of a verb is so far removed from it, as בִּי is from מְהִיָּם. Henderson. הַעֲרָבָה is the well known Arabah, the deep and remarkable depression, now called the Ghor, which extends from the lake of Genesareth to the Dead Sea.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Vers. 1-6. A sharp censure of the thoughtless revelry of the heads of the nation. The woe points back to the similar exclamation in ch. v. 18. There a woe was pronounced upon those who mistakenly desired the day of the Lord, as if it would bring to them prosperity. Here the question is of the confident who bestowed no thought at all upon that day. Ver. 1, in Zion: shows that the rebuke includes Judah also, although the subsequent description refers especially to the great men "in the hill of Samaria." And as these are the distinguished in the nation, so the nation itself is called the first or most exalted of all nations, naturally enough, since it was the chosen, peculiar people of God. These princes are further described as those to whom the house of Israel comes, i. e., for counsel and direction. Justly remarks Hengstenberg (Auth. Pent., i. 148), that thus "the chief men were reminded that they were the successors of those 'princes of the tribes' who were formerly thought worthy to be joined with Moses and Aaron in managing the affairs of the chosen people."

Ver. 2. How high they stood, is now shown by the fact that Israel, at whose head they were placed, was not inferior in prosperity or greatness to the mightiest heathen states. [He bids them look east, north, and west, and survey three neighboring kingdoms. Calneh. (Calno in Isaiah, Calneh in Ezekiel), was built by Nimrod in the land of Shinar (Gen. x. 10) but is not mentioned again in Scripture until this place. Afterwards it became celebrated under the name of Cesiphon. Julian's generals held it impregnable, being built on a peninsula surrounded on three sides by the Tigris. Hamath the great was the capital of the Syrian kingdom of that name on the Orontes. Gath was one of the five chief cities in Philistia, and in David's time the capital of the whole country.] Than these kingdoms, namely, Judah and Israel. Others say that the prophet speaks of destroyed cities, and that the Israelites are reminded of their fate as intimating that the same was in store for themselves (so Luther). This view would commend itself to favor, were it not opposed to the fair construction of the words. It might be allowed, if the double question, are they better, etc., admitted of an affirmative answer, namely, yes they are better. But this plainly cannot be. Bauer indeed sees this, and accordingly explains thus: "Observe these heathen states. Their lot is not better, their power not greater than yours; rather they have fallen while you by God's grace still stand; if you apostatize from Jehovah, the same fate will befall you." But how could any one speak of a power which was overthrown as "not greater" than one still standing? A comparison in respect to greatness can be made only with a still existing power. [Pusey adopts Bauer's view, but Wordsworth and Keil agree with Schmoller in making the verse simply an expansion of the statement in ver. 1, that Israel is first of the nations, unexcelled by any of their heathen neighbors.]

Ver. 3 begins the further explanation of the careless security charged in ver. 1. Regarding the evil day, i. e., day of judgment as far off, they cause violence to erect its throne nearer and nearer among them. [Pusey follows Jerome, Grotius, Newcome, and others in referring the throne of violence to the rule of Assyria, which the people brought nearer to them while they were thinking to put it far off. But the former reference is much more natural.]

Ver. 4. To oppression they added luxurious sensuality (cf. ch. ii. 8; iii. 12).

Ver. 5. Like David they employed themselves in inventing musical instruments, but with a very different aim.

Ver. 6. They used the best oils, at a time when there was abundant cause for mourning in the breach, i. e., the overthrow of Joseph. [The custom of anointing was usually suspended in time of mourning, 2 Sam. xiv. 2. But these so far from grieving employed the most costly unguents.]

2. Vers. 7-10. These verses announce the punishment. The phrase at the head of the captives, contains a bitter irony. The princes should maintain their preëminence even in the procession of captives.

Ver. 8. [The oath here is like that in ch. iv. 2, except that it is by himself instead of by his holiness, but the sense is the same, for the nephesh of Jehovah, i. e., his inmost self or being, is his holiness. Keil.]

Vers. 9, 10. Ten, that is, many; but even of the many not one shall escape. This is made plainer by what follows.

Ver. 10. When on the death of the ninth, a relative comes to the house to bury the dead, he will ask the last one, the tenth, who has retired into a remote corner to save his life, whether there is any one still with him, i. e., alive. On receiving the reply, None, he calls out to him, Silence! (literally 'St), i. e., he interrupts him quickly lest he may utter Jehovah's name, and by attracting Jehovah's attention, bring down a judgment upon himself. The words, there must be no mention of the Lord's name, are spoken, not by Amos but by the kinsman, and they do not express despair but fear. The deaths mentioned occur partly by the sword and partly by famine, both in consequence of the conquest and overthrow of the city.

[Ver. 11. The For assigns the reason of the fearful destruction. It is the Lord's command, and his arm reaches rich and poor alike, "regum turres ac pauperum tabernacula."]

3. Vers. 12-14. Upon rocks can neither horses run nor man plough. What is the force of this comparison? Either the attempt to do one or the other of these things is represented as something preposterous, and the meaning is, Even so preposterous is your turning justice into poison, etc.; or it is represented as something impossible, and the sense is, Is then the impossible possible, that you turn justice, etc., and do you think you can escape unpunished, and even attain prosperity? That ye turn, etc., cf. ch. v. 7. Fruit of righteousness is said, because unrighteousness is compared with a bitter fruit.

Ver. 13. With our strength, taken, as if the whole originated with themselves. Horns, the usual symbol of strength, here = means of overcoming foes.

Ver. 14 contains Jehovah's answer to this presumption. You are rejoicing in a thing of nought, for I will, etc. At the same time this verse resumes and confirms the threat in ver. 11, which begins with the same words, "For behold!" Assyria is plainly intended by a people, but as it was still in the distance, Amos nowhere mentions it by name. Perhaps, too, the omission was designed, in order to awaken the more attention. The entrance of Hamath, was the standing term for the northern boundary of Israel, Num.

xxxiv. 8; 2 Kings xiv. 25. [For its exact place, see Smith's Bible Dictionary, Amer. ed. p. 987]. The brook of the desert, the southern boundary, is the present Wady el-Ahsi, which separated Moab from Edom at the lower extremity of the Dead Sea. [Israel's strength had of late been increasing steadily. Jehoash had thrice defeated the Syrians and recovered several cities. What he began, Jeroboam continued during a reign of forty-one years, until he had completely restored all the ancient boundaries of the kingdom. Amos here declares that the whole region of their triumphs should be one scene of affliction and woe. This was fulfilled after some forty-five years at the invasion of Tiglath Pileser. Pusey.]

DOCTRINAL AND MORAL.

1. "Israel the first among the nations." Again and again is the lofty position of Israel emphasized, i. e., its peculiar enjoyment of the divine favor, which was shown even in its outward relations, its power and influence as compared with surrounding nations. In these respects it could measure itself with any of them. This was not the highest motive of action, yet it should have sufficed to confirm them in fidelity to God. For the penalty of unfaithfulness was the loss of their position hitherto, a fall below other nations and a shameful end.

2. But alas, prosperity only led to self-will, and rendered them arrogant and secure. There is a striking picture in vers. 4-6 of an insolent, presumptuous community in which every thought of danger is drowned. The internal evils of the national life are not seen, nor is it observed how all tends steadily downward to destruction. Alas, the higher ranks here precede with their example. Instead of becoming pillars of the state by their position and culture, they help to undermine it. No wonder then that when the crash comes, they are most deeply affected and meet a frightful end.

3. The judgment which the prophet everywhere speaks of is conquest and overthrow by a foreign enemy. From this we may learn the right conception of war. It is natural to consider it a heavy calamity, since it involves the loss of fortune and life to thousands, and sometimes the downfall of entire states. But while it is true that on this account we must desire its general cessation, yet the declamations against it of the so-called friends of peace are vain, proceeding, if not always yet generally, from a mind which comprehends little or nothing of the divine government of the world. In spite of all these well-meant performances, war neither will nor can cease in this world, i. e., so long as sin still exists. For it is necessary as a means of inflicting the divine chastisement upon sin. Through it God executes the judgments which, being required by his righteousness, are therefore indispensable and irresistible, — not so much upon individuals as upon nations and states which are considered as collective persons. Such acts are either processes of purification, or when the measure of iniquity is full and the time has come, works of destruction. On this ground even a war which subjectively is altogether wrong, as a war of conquest, may still be objectively justified, in so far as it is a means of executing God's righteous wrath upon a people. On the other hand we can conceive how a war undertaken only in self-defense, and therefore righteous in itself, may yet fail of the issue one would expect. It comes as a judgment upon a people ripe for such a process, and therefore no defense avails. In other cases it does avail, and a deserved punishment overtakes the foe eager for conquest. But even then the war, by the distress it causes and the sacrifices it requires, proves a serious time of sifting for the victor. Hence it is right and proper to maintain beforehand an earnest conflict against sin, lest such a heavy scourge as war should become necessary. But when such a point is reached, it becomes Christians not to utter empty declamations against war nor womanish complaints over it, but humbly to bow beneath God's hand and patiently bear their sorrows, so that thus may spring up the fruit of a new spirit well pleasing to God. For even the destruction of a nation is so far stayed that at least "a remnant" is left to undertake a new life. And the more the kingdom of God prevails among men to the overthrow of sin, the less needful will be the frightful scourge of war; but the complete reign of peace will come only when the first earth and the first heavens are passed away and all things become new. The horrors of war may and should aid in keeping alive and intense our longing for that blissful period.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. Woe to the secure. Security and vain confidence, the common faults of man! He is blind to his danger. He reels around the abyss without perceiving it, and at last would plunge headlong, were it not that God startles him with judgments. It is this that renders such strokes necessary. They are therefore to be deemed gracious acts, since they are intended to save from a total overthrow. But alas, how many refuse to heed them! First of nations. What an honor! But so much the worse if such a divine favor is not properly recognized, so much the greater the responsibility and the guilt. [The author applies this thought directly to his own nation, in view of God's recent dealings with the German people. But surely it is equally applicable to our own favored land. If our territorial extent, our material development, our liberal institutions, our final welding together in the furnace of the war for the Union, have made us first of nations, this fact should not generate vain confidence and a stupid sensuality, but rather awaken a lively gratitude and a generous obedience to the Ruler of nations, the God of hosts.]

Ver. 2. Pass over to Calneh, etc. A comparison with others less favored than ourselves is always wise when it prompts to humility and thankfulness. "Who am I, O Lord God, and what is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto?" Alas, often all the thanks God receives for giving us more than to others, is that we forget Him the more.

[Ver. 3. Who put far off the evil day. The thought that the Lord has a day in which to judge man, frets or frightens the irreligious, and they use different ways to get rid of it. The strong harden themselves, and distort or disbelieve the truth. The weak and voluptuous shut their eyes to it, like the bird in the fable, as if what they dread would cease to be, because they cease to see it. (Pusey.) Henderson quotes a parallel from Claudian, In Eutrop., ii. 50-54.

"Sed quam cæcus inest vitæ amor! omne futurum Despicitur, quædamque brevis presentia fructum,

*Et ruit in cœtitem damni secunda libido
Dum mora supplicii lucto, serumque quod instat, Creditor."*

Ver. 5. Who trill to the sound of the harp. An artificial effeminate music which relaxes the soul, frittering the melody and displacing the power of divine harmony by tricks of art, is meet company for giddy, thoughtless, heartless versifying. Do-based music is a mark of a nation's decay, and promotes it. Like David they invent, etc. The same pains which David employed on music to the honor of God, they employed on their light, enervating, unmeaning music, and, if they were earnest enough, justified their inventions by the example of David. Much as people have justified our degraded, sensualizing, immodest dancing by the religious dancing of Holy Scripture. (Pusey.) See Bishop Sanderson, Lectures on Conscience, iii. § 13.

Ver. 6. Drink wine out of sacrificial bowls. The first princes of the tribes (Num. vii. 13 ff.) showed their zeal for God by offering massive silver bowls for the service of the tabernacle; the like zeal had these princes for their own god, their belly, using the huge sacred vessels for their compositions. Like swine in the trough, they immersed themselves in their drink, "swimming in mutual swill."¹ (Ibid.) Anoint themselves, etc. In this crisis, when the divine wrath was about to break out upon the nation, and they ought to have been sitting in sackcloth and ashes, they were curious to procure the best ointment for their own use. Roman patricians, in Cicero's days, cared only for their own fish-ponds that their tables might be well supplied with mullets and other fish, while their country was in danger of being overwhelmed with a flood; they "thought only of the cock-boat of their own fortunes when the vessel of the state was going to wreck." . . . Here is another prophetic warning for our selfish luxury. (Wordsworth.)

Grieve not for the hurt of Joseph. Joseph, the ancestor of Ephraim, the head of the ten tribes, was afflicted by his own brethren, who saw the anguish of his soul and were not moved by his tears; and when they had sold him to the Ishmaelites, sat down in heartless indifference "to eat bread" (Gen. xxxvii. 23). So their descendants, the Jews, feasted at the Passover after they had killed the true Joseph (John xviii. 28). How many dwell in ceiled houses and sing to the sound of the harp and feast on the richest dainties, and care nothing for the sorrows of Christ and his Church! (Wordsworth.)

Ver. 7. Go at the head of the captives. Preëminence in rank or wealth is often followed by pre-eminence in sorrow and shame. As the Wisd. of Sol. says (vi. 6): "For mercy will soon pardon the meekest, but mighty men shall be mightily tormented."

Ver. 8. The Lord hath sworn, etc. Our oaths mean, "As God is true and avenges untruth, what I say is true." So God says, "As I am God, this is true." God then must cease to be God if He did not hate oppression. (Pusey.)

Ver. 9. Ten righteous men in Sodom would have saved that city. Here ten were left in one house after the siege was begun, but they did not turn to God; and therefore all were taken or destroyed. (Ibid.)

Ver. 10. We must not call upon Jehovah's name. Things have come to a fearful pass when a man trembles at God's name because he fears and must fear his wrath, and hence instead of turning to Him would rather flee away. This is a frightful exhibition of the power of an evil conscience. There must be a broken heart before a man can turn in prayer for forgiveness to the God whom his sins have offended. [He who has obstinately abused the intellectual powers given him by God, to cavil at God's truth, will be forsaken by Him at last, and will not be able to utter his name. (Wordsworth.)]

Ver. 11. Jehovah commands, and men smite, etc. When a people is ripe for judgment, a human conqueror acts only as a divine instrument. God's judgment strikes equally the high and the low.

[Vers. 12. Do horses run upon rocks, etc. It is more easy to change the course of nature, or the use of things of nature, than the course of God's providence or the laws of his just retribution. They had changed the sweet laws of justice into the gall of oppression, and the healthful fruit of righteousness into the life-destroying poison of sin. Better to have ploughed the rock with oxen for food. For now where they looked for prosperity, they found not barrenness but death. (Pusey.)]

Ver. 13. Who rejoice in, etc. How striking, to rejoice in a non-thing! Yet this is the way with men. How much of that in which they trust is a mere nonentity! It seems to be something, and still is nothing. With our own strength, etc. Such is the language of arrogant self-confidence. But God alone is strength, and only through Him are we strong.

Ver. 14. I raise up, etc. No foe could ever invade us, if the Lord did not raise Him up. War, therefore, is not an accident, but a providential dispensation. [Pharaoh, Hadad, Rezon, the Chaldees, are all expressly said to have been raised up by the Lord (Ex. ix. 16; 1 Kings xi. 14, 23; Hab. i. 6).]

CHAPTERS VII.-IX.

III. *Threatening Discourses against the Kingdom of Israel in the Shape of Visions.
A Promise in the Conclusion.*

CHAPTER VII.

Three Visions. Two of National Calamities are averted at the Request of the Prophet. The Third, of a Plumb-Line, indicates the certain Downfall of the Kingdom. Attempt of the Priest Amaziah to banish Amos from Bethel: thereupon a sharper Throat, especially against Amaziah.

- 1 THUS the Lord Jehovah showed me;
And behold, He formed locusts,¹
In the beginning of the springing up of the second crop;
And lo, it was a second crop after the king's mowing.
- 2 And when they had finished eating the plants ² of the land,
Then I said, O Lord Jehovah, forgive, I pray,
How can Jacob stand,
For it is small.
- 3 Jehovah repented of this;³
It shall not take place, saith Jehovah.
- 4 Thus the Lord Jehovah showed me,
And behold, the Lord Jehovah called to punish with fire,
And it devoured the great flood,⁴
And devoured the inheritance.
- 5 Then said I, O Lord Jehovah, leave off, I pray.
How can Jacob stand,
For it is small.
- 6 Jehovah repented of this;
This also shall not take place, saith the Lord Jehovah.
- 7 Thus he showed me,
And behold, the Lord stood upon a wall made with a plumb-line⁵
And a plumb-line was in his hand.
- 8 And Jehovah said to me,
What seest thou, Amos?
And I said, a plumb-line.
And the Lord said, Behold, I put a plumb-line in the midst of my people, Israel;
I will pass by him no more.
- 9 And the high places of Isaac⁶ shall be laid waste,
And the sanctuaries of Israel shall be desolated,
And I will arise against the house of Jeroboam with the sword.
- 10 And Amaziah, the priest of Bethel, sent to Jeroboam the king of Israel, saying, Amos has conspired⁷ against thee in the midst of the house of Israel; the land is
- 11 not able to bear all his words. For thus has Amos said,
"By the sword shall Jeroboam die
And Israel shall go into exile out of his land."
- 12 And Amaziah said to Amos, "Seer, go, flee into the land of Judah; and there eat
- 13 thy bread and there mayest thou prophesy. But in Bethel thou shalt no longer
- 14 prophesy, for it is the king's sanctuary⁸ and a seat of the kingdom." And Amos answered and said to Amaziah, "I am no prophet, nor am I a prophet's son, but
- 15 I am a herdsman and a gatherer of sycamores." And Jehovah took me from following the flock; and Jehovah said to me, Go, prophesy to my people, Israel."
- 16 And now hear the word of Jehovah,
Thou sayest, Prophecy not against Israel,
And drop¹⁰ nothing against the house of Isaac.

- 17 Therefore thus saith Jehovah,
Thy wife shall be dishonored in the city,
And thy sons and thy daughters shall fall by the sword;
And thy land shall be divided by line,
And thou shalt die in an unclean land,
And Israel shall go into exile out of his land.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- 1 Ver. 1. — פֶּה points to what follows. יְהוָה has Jehovah for its subject [omitted because יְהוָה immediately preceded it. Jehovah, as usual, takes the pointing of אֱלֹהִים when יְהוָה precedes it. לִבִּי, not a plural, but a singular used collectively, is usually rendered locusts, but its precise origin is still in dispute.]
- 2 Ver. 2. — עֵשֶׂב, not grass, as in the A. V., but all vegetable growth. מִי, literally, "as who" = quærit, i. e., how? יָקָם, stand, i. e., endure. [So Kell and Furst.]
- 3 Ver. 3. — עַל-זֶמֶת = that which was threatened in the vision. קָטָן, small = weak.
- 4 Ver. 4. — הַיָּם, elsewhere the ocean, e. g., Gen. vii. 11; Is. ii. 10. In Gen. i. 2, it denotes the immeasurable deep at the beginning of the creation. חֵלֶק, not "a part," but the portion or inheritance.
- 5 Ver. 7. — מִקָּדָה, plumb-line. חֹמַת מִקָּדָה a perpendicular wall. [Furst follows the LXX., Sym., and Syr. in making חֹמַת, ἀδραμα, a pointed hook for destroying, and the wall, a pointed wall, i. e., rising up as a pinnacle.]
- 6 Ver. 9. — קִבּוּרֹת, heights used for idolatrous altars and shrines. יִשְׂרָאֵל, so also in ver. 16. Jer. xxxiii. 26; Ps. cv. 9 = Israel.
- 7 Ver. 10. — קָשֶׁר, to form a conspiracy.
- 8 Ver. 12. — מִקְדָּשׁ, sanctuary.
- 9 Ver. 14. — בִּלְלִים. Perhaps from a root meaning to nip or scratch (LXX., κνίω), because it was common so to treat the mulberry or sycamore fruit to make it ripen the sooner [or a denom. from the Arabic name for the mulberry fig. (Kell); but Furst says that in that case שֶׁקֶמֶיִם would not be added to it]. The meaning is, one that gathers figs and lives upon them.
- 10 Ver. 16. — רָטַף, to drop, is used in the sense of prophesying, also in Micah ii. 6, 11, and Ezek. xxi. 2, 7. The usage is borrowed from Deut. xxxii. 2. "My teaching shall drop as the rain."

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Vers. 1-6. The two first visions. The judgments they represent are at the prayer of the prophet averted.

(a.) Vers. 1-3. First Vision. The locusts. Thus the Lord Jehovah showed me. "Showed me" is used also in the following visions. These are thus defined to be "visions," inward intuitions, rather than mere poetical fictions. But the question arises and must be answered, What did the prophet see in the first two visions? Certainly threatening judgments. But did he see the judgments themselves, or were the transactions only a figurative representation? Did they point symbolically to the future chastisements? The latter is certainly the natural view of the third vision, and also of the fourth (chap. viii.). The plumb-line and the basket of fruit are mere symbols which are subsequently explained. In the fifth vision, also, a symbolical representation is made, although the form there is somewhat different from that of the third and the fourth. But it remains to determine how we are to regard the first two. For the prophet sees here a desolation produced by locusts and by fire. Are then these the actual judgments which threaten the people, or have they only a symbolical significance? I think we must decide for the former view. In their external form, these two differ greatly from the two following. In the latter, the prophet sees only an object, but what is to be done with it or what stroke it represents, has to be stated in words; but in the former he sees a judgment fully accomplished; why then should one look for anything farther? In that view, too, the analogy between the contents of these two visions and what we read in Joel is not to be mistaken. There also there is a plague of locusts, and then "fire" (chap. i. 19); the drought, also, is there described in words transcending actual experience, so that we must regard it as a poetical representation. Yet what is there treated of is what has actually happened, while here is something which is threatened, so that it need not offend if here the colors are higher, and we read of even an ocean dried up by the heat (ver. 4). If now in Joel locusts and fire are found in close connection, why not here also? What, too, should the locusts and the fire "signify?" It must be destruction by the foe; and yet of this it is here said that at the request of the prophet it shall not take place, while in the third vision it is said that it shall. The first two visions then must have a different object from the third. If the meaning is that the threatened infliction is twice revoked, then it is strange that the same judgment is presented in two different images. Keil therefore assigns a different meaning to each image, regards the first two visions as the more general and severe, and gives to them — although not very clearly — a scope comprehending all the past and all the future. They indicate an entire destruction except a remnant spared at the prophet's request, and the second vision points also to a judgment that falls upon the heathen world (= הָרִים). The removal of the two at Amos's request teaches that these judgments are not intended to effect the annihilation of the people of God but their purification, and the rooting out of sinners from them; and that in consequence of God's sparing grace, a holy remnant will be left. Both the following visions refer to the judgment which awaits the kingdom of the ten tribes in the immediate future.

How gratuitous is all this! Nothing of it is found in the visions themselves. What the prophet saw in the second vision is certainly not to occur; therefore the judgment upon the heathen, if it is contained there, is not to occur. Of a remnant remaining ever, not a word is said. Therefore the first vision cannot be understood differently (see below). In place of assuming an anticlimax, we must rather, since the discourse has various stages, determine the contrary. But this does not suit the symbolical view of the first two visions, for, taken figuratively, they would by no means indicate a lighter judgment than the third, but rather a complete devastation of the land. A climax is obtained only by a literal interpretation, according to which there is first a national calamity, and then a blow which overturns the state as such. The sense of the whole is that God will have patience for a time, and spare the land the plagues which it deserves. But if there be no change, and the goodness of God does not lead to repentance, forbearance will cease and the downfall come. The view that the two first visions refer to the kingdom of Judah which finds forgiveness, and only the third relates to the kingdom of Israel which is not forgiven, has much apparently in its favor, e. g., the appeal to the smallness of Jacob. Still it is to be rejected. Judah is not in question here at all. The entire chapter treats of the kingdom in the midst of which the prophet is. Were Judah meant, it would be plainly stated. Manifestly, the three visions form one series, so that it is unnatural to suppose that the two former relate to Judah, and that the third refers to something altogether different. The appeal to the smallness of Jacob admits also of being fairly applied to the kingdom of Israel. In the conduct of that kingdom the prophet finds no ground for forbearance; on the contrary, so far as this is concerned, the plagues must come. There remains, then, nothing but an appeal to the divine mercy and compassion on the ground of the smallness of Israel. Upon this motive alone can the prophet base his prayer, since no claim of merit is possible. Israel is small, is weak, in comparison with the strong hand of Jehovah; as if he would say, What would then become of him? Necessarily, he must be annihilated.

We return to ver. 1. That He, i. e., Jehovah, formed locusts, shows clearly that the infliction is due to Jehovah, without whose will they would not come, nay, would not exist at all. At the same time the prophet sees the plague in its very beginning. But this image of the locusts occurs at a period which is defined in two ways: first, as that in which the second crop springs up, and then, this second crop is that which follows the king's mowings. The meaning is, that the period is a very unfavorable one, first, because then the only further product of the year would be destroyed, and in the next place, because the early crop having already been mown by the king, the people were restricted to the second, and this was now threatened with destruction. Since nothing is now known of any right of the king to the early crop, Keil, in accordance with his figurative conception of the vision in general, maintains that the king is Jehovah, and the mowing denotes the judgments He has already decreed upon Israel. But this is plainly an inconsistent mingling of the sign with the thing signified. Even if we adopt the symbolical interpretation, still the feature mentioned in the supposed comparison, i. e., in the process taken from actual life, must have a definite meaning. For one cannot, on account of the signification of a comparison, attribute to it features which in themselves are foreign to it. Therefore we must assume a mowing of the early crop by the king, whether only as a fact in the present case, or as a custom, even if we know nothing from other sources of any such right.

Ver. 2. Plants of the land. Keil says that this does not mean the second crop just mentioned, but vegetable growth suited for the food of men. When this was devoured, the second crop of grass began to grow. But if the second crop itself had been devoured, the intercession of the prophet would have come too late. This is incorrect. The prophet sees a complete destruction of what had sprung up, and just because this image with its consequent misery stands before his eyes, he prays for the entire removal of it. "The plants of the earth," therefore mean, certainly not the second crop in particular, but all vegetable growth in general; yet in any event the grass is included. Nor can it be inferred from the conclusion of ver. 1 that this second crop was conceived of as not yet grown. Rather on the contrary it was when the locusts were formed; still we cannot assume that they at first spared it and attacked only the plants.

(b.) Vers. 4-6. Second Vision. Devouring fire = Drought. Ver. 4. "He called to contend with fire" = he called the fire in order to punish with it. The flood, etc. = even the deepest waters should be dried up by the "fire."

Ver. 6. This also, i. e., as well as the threatening contained in the first vision.

2. Vers. 7-9. The Third Vision, the plumb-line. The downfall of Israel is announced. The vision is introduced just like the two preceding, but unexpectedly has a different result. Even the symbol used — plumb-line — indicates this. But Jehovah Himself gives the explanation to the prophet, and shows that the reference is to a hostile invasion which shall certainly fall upon the kingdom as a judgment. This is the more terrible, because in such vivid contrast with the foregoing.

Ver. 7. The wall may be considered an image of Israel, which resembled such a solid, well-constructed wall, built, as it were, by Jehovah with a plumb-line. And now Jehovah comes again with a plumb-line, not however to build up but to tear down. As carefully and thoroughly as the wall had been erected, even so carefully should it be destroyed. In the midst is emphatic. The Lord's judgment strikes not an outwork, but the very centre. Like the plumb-line it turns neither to the right nor to the left, nor varies at all from its aim. No longer will Jehovah pass by = spare. This naturally refers to the previous threats which had been withdrawn.

Ver. 9. Specifies the "middle" which is to be struck by the judgment, namely, the idolatrous sanctuaries of the people, and the king's house, i. e., the monarchy, for in truth with the fall of this house, "the power of kingdom would be broken." (Keil.)

3. Vers. 10-17. Opposition to the prophet at Bethel on account of his predictions. New prophesies of wrath. Priest of Bethel is plainly the high priest in the sanctuary of the golden calf at Bethel. In the midst of the house of Israel

= in the religious centre of the kingdom, at Bethel. For it was from Bethel (ver. 13) that he was ordered away.

Ver. 11. By the sword shall Jeroboam die, cf. ver. 9; here the head of the house is named, but this was naturally included in the house itself. But the threat in the present form sounds more severely, and hence not without design is it thus recited in the accusation.

Ver. 12. Amaziah informs the king concerning the prophet, not so much in order to procure his punishment, as to justify the banishment which he proposed. But he represents it to the prophet in such a way as to effect a courteous removal. Hence the command comes in the form of good advice, — Flee, eat bread, etc. = there you may earn your bread by your prophecies. He considers prophesying a calling which Amos pursued for a living — a view against which the prophet guards (ver. 14) in his answer. For a king's sanctuary = founded by the king, clothed with regal authority. A house = seat of the kingdom = a royal capital. Therefore nothing should be said against the king! Unconscious, bitter satire on "the sanctuary," where all was decided by respect for the king, not for truth, nor for God's command.

Ver. 14. No prophet, i. e., by profession. Prophet's son, i. e., scholar, have never been trained in the prophetic schools — gatherer of sycamores refers to the direction in ver. 12. There eat thy bread. Amos says that he need not go anywhere for the sake of bread, nor did he come to Bethel or Israel for a better support. As a herdsman he had been accustomed to be content with little; that was enough for him and he sought no more. And at any moment he could return to that occupation. If he were now prophesying in Israel and acting independently, he did this not out of selfish aims, but according to ver. 15, only because he must, in obedience to a divine command. Whoever therefore would hinder this, sets himself against Jehovah. Therefore Amos announces to Amaziah the punishment he is to suffer when the judgment comes upon Israel.

Ver. 16. In return for his endeavor to stop the mouth of Jehovah's prophet, he must bear the announcement of his own doom.

Ver. 17. Wife become an harlot, to be dishonored at the storming of the city. Thy land = landed possession, unclean land = among the heathen. This presupposes his exile, and with that the exile of the whole people. The latter is expressly threatened in the conclusion; and thus is confirmed what Amaziah had charged before the king (ver. 11), although that threat was not uttered by Amos in ver. 9.

DOCTRINAL AND MORAL.

1. Divine judgments are announced by the prophets with so much boldness that men might easily attribute to them a lack of tenderness as if they had no regard to the sadness and misery certain to follow from what they announce. But how wrong this would be! They do feel and that very deeply. They seek by the announcement to prevail on men to repent while there is yet time, and thus forestall the impending judgments. Certainly, as they have intense moral convictions and firmly believe in the truth of a moral government of the world, they distinguish between a people ripe of judgment and one that is not. In the latter case they intercede with God for the people.

So pressed are they with love and desire to see the nation delivered or spared, that, although they best know the holy earnestness of God as judge, they go to meet Him and wrestle for forgiveness. Thus the reproach of a want of compassion fails to lie in the least upon them, but rather passes over to God, the Holy. But —

2. Even He is not truly liable to it. "It shall not be!" therein his mercy set itself against his justice and overcomes it. Thus it is proved the mightier. "The Lord repented" — not surely as if He would confess the unrighteousness of his threatening, but merely to express the frank, positive withdrawal of the threat. What was threatened was deserved, but still the punishment as destructive has not yet become a necessity. God can still spare. If the stroke did fall, there would be no unrighteousness in God, and also just as little, if it did not. How the case stands only He who is the searcher of hearts and the Judge of all the earth can certainly know. But men may and should presume that forbearance is possible, and therefore should intercede. Even this has its limits, and cannot be a duty under all circumstances, otherwise the conviction of a moral government of the world would grow weak. It is therefore by no means of course a mark of a godly mind, but it is to be highly esteemed when in men like the prophets who consider God's punitive righteousness a holy truth, it manifests itself as an expression of love for their fellow-men; and then, too, it is efficacious. That it has efficacy indicates its high importance. It affects the action even of God Himself, and thus conditions the destiny of men, toward whom He would have acted otherwise without these intercessions than He actually has done for the sake of them. This to be sure is a position which only a theism having full faith in a personal God can allow. But such a faith involves just this, as appears by the Holy Scriptures, which, standing on the ground of an actual theism, know nothing else than that intercession has such an efficacy, and everywhere speak of it as a matter that is self-evident. It is therefore clearly impossible to accept the Biblical theism, and at the same time deny the power of prayer. The question is then whether we will admit the latter, or deny theism, and with it religion in general which necessarily presupposes it. If any will not accept the latter alternative, then they must demand of science that, instead of affirming a conception of God drawn from the assumed impossibility of a theism which maintains a real efficiency of prayer with God, it should either correct its idea of God, or, if this be not allowed, should admit its inability to come to a satisfactory conclusion, and thus exercise a modesty, which so far from being degrading, would be honorable.

3. Impending judgments are here set forth by the prophet in visions; partly such as in themselves disclose the judgment God is about to execute; partly such as contain a symbolical action which afterwards is distinctly explained by God. The appearance of visions here is something new. But it must be admitted that prophetic speech and vision stand nearer together than would appear at first blush. Even in the prophetic word there lies in a sense what is substantially a vision, since the prophet at first "sees" what He is to announce; for which reason the prophet is called a "seer" (even in our chap. v. 12), and the prophetic speech "a vision," 2 Sam. vii. 17; Is. xxii. 5; i. 1, and the word "to see" is used simply of prophecies or prophetic utterances. If therefore Amos in chaps.

i.-vi. announces punishment in the most various forms, fire, plunder, desolation, killing, we must believe that through the divine efficiency such images presented themselves to his inner intuitions as incited him to the warnings and exhortations which he uttered through the power inwrought in him by the same Spirit. The two first visions afford us a glance into these inner processes. But no details of the judgment follow, because the threatened evil is averted by prayer. On the other hand, we must not obliterate the distinction between prophetic speech and vision. From the inward contemplation in which God revealed his will to the prophet, it was quite a step to the literal vision. In the latter there was a complete crystallization of the perception, which was not a necessity in every case, for even without it, the perception could find expression in prophetic words. Especially does the pure symbolical vision distinguish itself from the seeing which lies at the basis of all prophecy, and therefore from prophetic speech as such. Here at once the image as such is the principal thing. There is urgent need, however, of explanatory speech, so that here again, only from the other side, we encounter the mutual dependence of word and vision. But the vision is at first its own end, and because it does not speak for itself but needs explanation, it is here a vision in the literal sense. Whether we are to suppose that in such a case the prophet is always in an ecstatic state, we do not inquire. For the most part he is, in the case of a pure symbolic vision. Since in vision, the divine revelation becomes peculiarly precious to the prophet and makes a deeper impression than bare speech, the end it seeks is apparent. This aim is first upon the prophet who sees the vision. It renders the truth which is disclosed to him and which he is to announce, more vivid and impressive, so that he cannot do otherwise than set it forth just as he has not heard but seen it, whether actually or in the shape of a symbol. But the plastic form of the vision aimed also, and ultimately in a still greater degree, at impressing the hearer. When the prophet sets forth a literal vision, that is, what he has seen, the judgment he announces takes a concrete, tangible form which gives emphasis to the utterance, and thus dispels doubt and wins attention. The discourse seizes one more firmly when it is united with an image, even though it be symbolical; and in a certain sense this latter kind of image is still more impressive, because it is somewhat mysterious, and thus provokes attention to the explanation, and this again for that reason prints itself deeper on the mind, because it awakens surprise that a symbol so unpretending should have such a weight of significance. Hence the reason appears why visions make their appearance in the conclusion of our book. There was in the sense declared, i.e., not so much in fact as in form, a climax in the revelations to the prophet and therefore in the disclosure to the people. Since the direct statement of his message respecting the certainty of the judgment and the ripeness of the people for it, appeared not to be enough; at last, to leave nothing undone, these things were brought under the eye in the form of plastic visions which the prophet saw and naturally repeated to his hearers. The discourses therefore now have at least a negative efficiency in the opposition to which they aroused the priest Amaziah. (It is certainly wrong therefore to refer these visions with the narrative depending on them to an earlier period than the foregoing discourses.) Thus visions occur, as we see, in one of the oldest prophets. It may be asked, why do the other older prophets have either none at all or only faint traces of them? It is hardly a sufficient reply to refer the matter to the free action of the divine Spirit. Yet this would not be incorrect if we included with it the subjective factor in the case, since men allow that it stands in close connection with the separate individuality of the prophets. Not every one of these was equally inclined to this mode of representation, but one more than another, since a certain preponderance of the imaginative faculty, a peculiar excitability of the soul, was requisite in order to fit one for seeing visions. These are found in Amos, and we can easily see a certain natural affinity between the herd-man Amos with his quick sensibilities and the formation of outward visions. As to the visions in Ezekiel and Jeremiah, we refer to the Commentary on those prophets.

4. The centre, the heart of a nation and kingdom, is found in its sanctuaries and capital. From these proceeds its life; yes, as they are, so is the life of the whole people, either sound, or diseased, or altogether rotten. If the heart is corrupt, the blow must at last fall on this, otherwise no help is possible. The sanctuary of a nation is its chief nerve. But upon this the court, the secular government, exerts a powerful influence. If it uses this influence to subdue the sanctuary into an instrument of its own plans and thus corrupts it, the whole people is corrupted; and its guilt becomes so much the greater and God's judgment the more certain. How significant is it that the priest can oppose no contrary testimony to the prophetic word! All he can do is to denounce Amos to the king, and thus call in the secular power. Naturally enough; for he is the court-priest, and is stationed at Bethel, which is, as he says with a naïve candor, "a king's sanctuary and a seat of the kingdom." He obviously means to say something of great moment which will awe the prophet, and is not conscious of the poverty of the claim he makes for the sanctuary. As sacred it should take its authority from God, and its highest boast should be that it is a sanctuary of God. Certainly it is of no avail to root its authority in that of the great and noble, for then it becomes a mere tool of state craft. A testimony against all Cæsareopapismus, a warning to every state Church never to forget where all Church authority strikes its roots,—not in the protection of the state nor in civil privileges, but only in the Word of God; and that the highest glory even of the strongest established Church should be that it has, not the state, but God and his Word on its side.

5. "There eat thy bread!" This is certainly the main thing in the view of the idol's high-priest. He sees in office only a means of "bread." Therefore without scruple he ascribes the same view to Amos. But the true prophet repels the charge with dignity. He seeks not for money or means, he needs it not; he does not once claim the title of prophet, for he had nothing to do with the title. When he came forth as a prophet, it was not for the sake of the name or the office any more than it was for bread, but solely in obedience to God's direction. But as he did not seek reward, neither did he shun danger or persecution; he knew that the divine commission to announce wrath to a godless people involved peril, but he did not therefore forbear. He did not allow himself to be intimidated by threats. Even if men would not hear him but would try to close his mouth, he would not be silent. He must speak, because he bore a divine command.

6. Strong faith belongs to the calling of a prophet who is to announce God's punitive wrath. And not only that; but quite independent of the duty of reproof the lofty, a high measure of faith is needed in order to maintain and firmly to utter, in the midst of a degenerate race, the conviction that God still rules and will at last vindicate his honor and his law, and show Himself as Lord and Judge. This point may be weakened by a reference to the fact that the prophets did not speak of themselves but only as organs of God, and made their announcements only by virtue of their commission. But however firmly we hold the objective character of the prophetic speech, the more we regard it on this side, yes, even the more the announcement of wrath is a literal prediction of a definite form, and kind and degree of punishment; still the less are we to overlook the subjective factor in the case. The prophets were not soulless instruments of the Holy Spirit, according to the mechanical theory of inspiration, but what they had to disclose, they themselves believed and were firmly convinced of, as was certainly the case with the herdsman of Tekoa. Their predictions of punishment in the face of a prevailing religious and moral corruption testified the strength of their theocratic conviction, and the measure of their vigorous faith, which enabled them to stand unmoved and declare with all confidence, the Lord — although He so long delays, and human sin appears to triumph — will lay a plumb-line in the midst of his people Israel, or as in chap. viii., the time is ripe for judgment. Certainly there is a reciprocal action between the objective factor and the subjective, between the divine revelation and the prophet's degree of faith. That was on one side conditioned by this, but so, on the other, a higher measure of confidence of faith was the fruit and effect of the divine revelations to the prophets. But in any case the strength of any one's faith who was chosen for a prophet, rooted itself in the general revelation to and in Israel, therefore especially in that which was deposited in the holy Scriptures. This school of the Spirit, consisting in the Word of God, was, as it appears, the only school which Amos ever attended, but he showed himself a very apt scholar, he was not so much an abroas as a theodidaktos. He had such a firm conviction of the power and majesty of God, and especially of his righteousness that he was sure that He would maintain his honor and demonstrate his government. As he was thus, in the sense of 1 Cor. i. 26 ff., worthy and fit to be chosen by God for his messenger and prophet, so on the other hand that mission fully confirmed him in the assurance of faith.

[7. The latter half of this chapter (vers. 10-17) has been cited by one of the writers of Essays and Reviews, Prof. Jowett, as an illustration of his assertion that "the failure of a prophecy is never admitted in spite of Scripture and of history." But wherein is the failure here? The predictions are first, the rising against the house of Jeroboam with the sword, which was fulfilled (2 Kings xv. 10) in the slaughter of Jeroboam's son and successor by Shallum; secondly, the captivity and exile of Israel, the fulfillment of which is patent; thirdly, the terrible denunciation against Amaziah, his wife and his children, the execution of which is confessedly not recorded. But this is true of the doom pronounced upon other individuals, as Shebna (Is. xxii. 17, 18), Ahab and Zedekiah (Jer. xxix. 22), Shemaiah (Jer. xxix. 32), Pashur (Jer. xx. 6), etc. Nor is it all strange, when one considers the excessive brevity of the accounts of the later kings and revolutions. There is nothing at all impossible or improbable in the fate pronounced upon Amaziah. And "unless the execution of God's sentence upon one of the many calf-priests in Bethel is necessarily matter of history, it has rather to be shown why it should be mentioned than why it should be omitted." Surely the burden of proof lies upon the objector. — C.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[Ver. 1. And behold he formed (was forming) locusts. The very least things then are as much in his infinite mind as what we call the greatest. The same power of God is seen in creating the locust as the universe. But further, God was framing them for a special end, not of nature, but of his moral government in the correction of man. In this vision He opens our eyes and lets us see Himself framing the punishment for the deserts of sinners, so that when hail, mildew, caterpillars, or some hitherto unknown disease wastes our crops, we may think not of secondary causes but of our Judge. (Pusey.)

Ver. 2. Forgive, I beseech thee. He sees sin at the bottom of the trouble, and therefore concludes that the pardon of sin must be at the bottom of the deliverance, and prays for that in the first place. Whatever calamity we are under, personal or public, the forgiveness of sin is that which we should be most earnest with God for. (M. Henry.)

Ver. 3. The Lord repented for this. See the power of prayer! See what a blessing praying people, praying prophets are to a land! Ruin had many a time broken in, had they not stood in the breach. See how ready, how swift God is to show mercy. (M. Henry.)

Ver. 4. God called to contend by fire. Man by rebellion challenges God's omnipotence. God sooner or later accepts the challenge. If man escapes with impunity, then he had chosen well in rejecting God. If not, what folly and misery was his short-sighted choice; short-lived in its gain; its loss, eternal! Fire stands as the symbol and summary of God's most terrible judgments. It spares nothing, leaves nothing, not even the outward form of what it destroys. (Pusey.) — C.]

Ver. 5. We should pray even for those who in our judgment are worthy of punishment. We may at least implore God's mercy on their behalf. Perhaps He will forgive and grant space for repentance. He desires not the death of the sinner, but that he turn and live. On this ground they who know the mind of God, always intercede even for the worst of sinners; although if the judgment falls, they humbly adore the holiness of God's ways but do not murmur.

[Ver. 7. The Lord stood — with a plumb-line. There was so to speak an architectural design in God's work of destroying Israel no less than in his former favor in building him up. God does everything according to measure, number and weight. As one said of old, "The Deity is a perfect geometrician." (Wordsworth.)

Ver. 10. Amos has conspired, etc. Amaziah, the high-priest, thought that the craft whereby he had his wealth was endangered. To Jeroboam, however, he says nothing of these fears, but makes it an affair of state. He takes the king by what he thought to be his weak side, fear for his own power or life. Similar was the experience of Jeremiah, of our Lord and of his Apostles. And so the heathen who were ever conspiring against the Roman emperors went on accusing the early Christians as disloyal, factious, impious, because they did not offer sacrifice for the emperors to false gods, but prayed for them to the true. (Pusey.)

Ver. 11. On the supposition that Amaziah willfully distorted Amos's words, the same writer remarks justly enough, "A lie mixed with truth is the most deadly form of falsehood, the truth serving to gain admittance for the lie and to color it. In slander, and in heresy which is slander against God, truth is used to commend the falsehood and falsehood to destroy the truth." So on the latter clause, "Amaziah omits both the ground of the threat and the hope of escape urged upon them. He omits too the prophet's intercession for his people and selects the one prediction which could give a mere political character to the whole. Suppression of truth is a yet subtler character of falsehood."

Ver. 12. Go, eat thy bread. Do thou live by thy trade there, and let me live by my trade here. (Jerome). Worldly men always think that those whose profession is religious make a gain of godliness. Interested people cannot conceive of one disinterested; nor the insincere of one sincere. (Pusey.)

Ver. 13. It is the king's chapel, etc. All claims of reverence for a church simply and merely as a national establishment, independently of divine institution, are no better than these assertions of Amaziah. The first royal propounder of what is now called Erastianism was, as far as we know, Jeroboam I.; the first priestly advocate of it, as far as we know, was Amaziah. Jerome, in his note here, applies these words to the Arians who appealed to Arian emperors, supporting their dogmas, and persecuting the orthodox teachers, by the secular arm. When in the fourth century Catholic bishops of Spain invoked the power of the Emperor Maximus and would have put the Priscillianists to death, they were sternly rebuked and opposed by the saintly and apostolic bishop, Martin of Tours. (Wordsworth.)

Ver. 14. I was a herdsman. One of that class to which Abraham and Moses and David had belonged; but not rich in fields and herds, in men-servants and maid-servants, like the first; nor learned in the wisdom of the Egyptians, like the second; nor with any, the most distant intimation that he might one day be the shepherd of a people, like the third. (F. D. Maurice.)

Ver. 15. The Lord took me,—the Lord said unto me. As the Apostles, when forbidden to teach in the name of Jesus, answered, we must obey God rather than man, so Amos, when forbidden by the idol-priests to prophecy, not only prophecies, showing that he feared God bidding more than their forbidding, but boldly and freely denounces the punishment of him who endeavored to forbid and hinder the Word of God. (Jerome.)

Ver. 16. Drop nothing, etc. God's Word comes as a gentle dew or soft rain, not beating down, but refreshing; not sweeping away as a storm, but sinking in and softening even hard ground, all but the rock; gentle so as they can bear it. God's Word was to men such as they were to it; dropping like the dew on those who received it: wearing, to those who hardened themselves against it. (Pusey.)

Ver. 17. Thy wife shall be dishonored. Thou teachest idolatry which is spiritual harlotry; and thou shalt be punished by harlotry in thine own house for thy sin. (Wordsworth.) — C.]

CHAPTER VIII.

Fourth Vision: Israel ripe for Destruction. Days of Mourning threatened against the Ungodly. Afterwards a Famine of the Word.

- 1 Thus the Lord Jehovah showed me,
And behold, a basket with ripe fruit.¹
- 2 And he said, What seest thou, Amos?
And I said, A basket with ripe fruit.
Then said Jehovah to me,
"The end² is come to my people, Israel;
I will not pass by them any more.
- 3 And the songs of the palace³ shall howl
In that day, saith the Lord Jehovah;
Corpses in multitude; everywhere has he⁴ cast them forth; Hush!⁵
- 4 Hear this, ye who pant⁶ for the poor,
And to destroy the meek⁷ of the earth,
- 5 Saying, when will the new moon be over,
That we may sell grain,
And the Sabbath, that we may open wheat?
Making the ephah small and the shekel great,
And falsifying the scales of deceit;
- 6 Buying the poor for silver,

- And the needy for a pair of shoes,
 And the refuse of the wheat will we sell.
 7 Jehovah hath sworn by the pride of Jacob,
 Surely I will never forget any of their deeds.
 8 Shall not the earth tremble for this,
 And every dweller therein mourn?
 And it shall rise up, all of it, like the Nile,⁸
 And shall heave and sink⁹ like the Nile of Egypt.
 9 And it shall come to pass in that day, saith the Lord Jehovah,
 That I will cause the sun to go down at noon,
 And make it dark to the earth in clear day;
 10 And will turn your festivals into mourning,
 And all your songs into lamentation;
 And will bring sackcloth upon all loins,
 And baldness upon every head;
 And will make it¹⁰ like the mourning for an only son,
 And the end of it like¹¹ a bitter day.
- 11 Behold, days are coming, saith the Lord Jehovah,
 When I will send a hunger into the land,
 Not a hunger for bread nor a thirst for water,
 But to hear the words of Jehovah.
 12 And they shall stagger from sea to sea,
 And rove about from the north even to the east,
 To seek the Word of Jehovah, and shall not find it.
 13 In that day the fair virgins shall faint,
 And the young men, for thirst.
 14 They who swear by the sin of Samaria,
 And say, By the life of thy God, O Dan!
 And, By the life of the way of Beersheba!
 They shall fall and rise no more.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL

1 Ver. 1. — פִּיז, harvest, summer, here = summer-fruit, or gathered fruit, i. e., fully ripe, as 2 Sam. xvi. 1; Micah vi. 1.

[2 Ver. 2. — The paronomasia in פִּיז and פִּיז is marked and forcible. Cf. Esek. vii. 6.]

3 Ver. 3. — הֵיכָל here manifestly is palace, not temple.

4 Ver. 3. — הַשֵּׁלִיחַ has Jehovah for its subject (Kell). Others take it impersonally (Henderson), but Wordsworth supplies "every one" as the subject.

5 Ver. 3. — חֶסֶד is by some, as E. V., rendered as an adverb = quietly; but always elsewhere it is an interjection, and should be so considered here.

6 Ver. 4. — שִׁנְאִים, = pant after [like a dog or wild beast yelping and panting after its prey. Wordsworth]. This sense is clearly required by the second member, where שִׁנְאִים is to be supplied before לְחֶשְׁבִּיר.

7 Ver. 4. — עֲזָב. There seems no reason for departing from the textual reading here.

8 Ver. 8. — כָּאֵר is a defective form for כִּיָּאֵר (cf. ch. ix. 5), a reading which is found in many of the MSS.

9 Ver. 8. — נִשְׁקָה is a softened form for נִשְׁקָה, which is given in the Keri, and also in many MSS. Cf. נִשְׁקָה, ch. ix. 5.

10 Ver. 10. — The suffix in שְׁמִתִּיהָ refers to the following אֶבֶל [but Kell makes it refer to all that has previously been mentioned as done upon that day. So Pusey. Henderson refers it to אֶבֶל, understood.

11 Ver. 10. — The ק in כִּיּוֹם, is Capit. veritatis.

12 Ver. 12. — תִּכְעֹז. This word is used of the reeling of drunkards, of the swaying to and fro of trees in the wind, of the quivering of lips, and then of the unsteady seeking of persons bewildered, looking for what they know not where to find. Pusey.]

13 Ver. 14. — תִּיָּדָה. Meier's correction of this into תִּיָּדָה, = thy beloved, is conjectural and needless.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Vers. 1-3. Fourth Vision. The basket with ripe fruit. No more forbearance. Ver. 1. This basket is an image of a people ripe for judgment. The play upon words between the original for 'ripe fruit' and that for 'end,' indicates more, clearly the necessary result of the ripeness, namely, the downfall of the people.

Ver. 3. Songs become howlings — wherefore? The answer follows: because of the multitude of the dead. The exclamation Hush! is an admonition to bow beneath the tremendous severity of the divine judgment.

Vers. 4-14. What has been briefly expressed in vers. 1-3 is here expanded into a longer discourse, the sinful conduct of the great which makes them ripe for judgment, and the heavy penalty which they must suffer.

(a.) Vers. 4-6. Hear this, ye who, etc. A description of their wanton course. They pant after the poor and destroy the meek by grasping all property for themselves. Cf. Job xxii. 8; Is. v. 8. This is further defined in the two following verses, in which the prophet makes the men describe their own feelings and conduct.

Ver. 5. They cannot even wait for the end of the festival in order to resume their traffic. The new moon was a holiday, like the Sabbath, on which trade and business ceased. To open wheat = to open the granaries; cf. Gen. xli. 56. What Joseph did for the benefit of the poor, these did for their own advantage, making usurious gains from others' poverty. With this they united fraud; by diminishing the measure and increasing the shekel = by demanding one of greater weight than the right standard; and by falsifying the scales = using scales arranged so as to cheat.

Ver. 6. Thus the poor man was made so poor that he was compelled to sell himself either for a piece of silver which he owed, or for a pair of shoes which he had gotten and was unable to pay for. Thus he could not meet the smallest expenditure. To complete the case, only the refuse grain was sold to them, for which yet they had to pay the same as for good grain.

(b.) Vers. 7-14. Punishment of such wickedness. (1.) Vers. 7-10. Hath sworn by the pride of Jacob, i. e., by himself who was the pride and glory of Israel. "By leaving such sins unpunished He would deny his glory in Israel." (Keil.)

Ver. 8. Therefore or for this, namely, for these deeds. These are Jehovah's words, and carry out the thought of "not forgetting the deeds," by a delineation of the impending judgment. The question, Shall not, etc., is intended to forestall the idea that such things could be left unpunished. It is incorrect to refer the "for this," to the punishment as if it were intended to emphasize that. The form of the speech, i. e., the question, does not suit this view; and besides, in that case the punishment itself would be really indicated only in ver. 7, so that this unusual prominence of its impressiveness would be without a motive. The same words recur in ch. ix. 5, but there as a description of God's omnipotence, manifesting itself, however, in judgments. The earth heaves, because the Lord touches it (ch. ix. 5). The trembling of the earth as a heaving and sinking is explained by comparison with the rise and fall of the Nile.

Ver. 9. In that day, i. e., the day of the judgment, in which what has just been mentioned is to take place. In close connection with the trembling of the earth is its becoming dark: the one is not conceivable without the other. At bottom ver. 8 describes a return of the earth to its original condition of chaos — the sun go down at midday; not a mere eclipse, but a catastrophe which subverts the order of nature. [An eclipse is not the "going down" of the sun. The minute calculations of Hitzig and Michaelis, repeated and extended by Pusey, are therefore quite aside from the purpose. — C.]

Ver. 10 describes more minutely the general mourning already touched upon in ver. 8. Cf. v. 3; ch. v. 16; Hosea ii. 13. Baldness upon every head. The shaving of a bald place was a sign of mourning. Cf. Is. iii. 24.

(2.) Vers. 11-14. A new and peculiar trait in the delineation of the judgment, the bitter day. The Word of God, which men now despise, they will then long for, but in vain. Too late! This threat bears obliquely upon the insatiable avarice of those who live in luxury through their oppression of the poor. At the same time they are the persons who now will not listen to the Word of God.

Ver. 12. They stagger, because plagued by hunger and thirst. From sea to sea, indefinitely, the sea being conceived of as the end of the earth (Ps. lxxii. 8). From the north to the east = from north to south, and from east to west, i. e., to every quarter of the globe.

Ver. 13. So great is the torment of this unsatisfied hunger and thirst that the strongest succumb to it; these are individualized as the young men and the maidens; if they fail, much more the weak.

Ver. 14. The sin of Samaria = that by which Samaria sins, the golden calf at Bethel. This is the most probable explanation, because of the corresponding expression in the next clause, the god of Dan = the golden calf there. By the life of the way; by the life of, is a customary formula of swearing, here improperly used in reference to a thing. The way of Beersheba = the way by which men go to Beersheba, to the worship there. The swearing by these objects shows that the young men and maidens are worshippers of these idols and make pilgrimages to Beersheba.

DOCTRINAL AND MORAL.

1. According to our chapter the ripeness of the people for judgment is due to the violence and injustice practiced by the rich and noble upon the poor. These are peculiarly flagitious sins which call down the judgments of God. As such a statement reveals to us a degree of moral corruption which is frightful, so we learn from the severity with which the sins are rebuked and condemned, not only the spirit of justice but also the compassion which belongs to the religion of the Old Testament. It desires that every one, even the poorest, should have his rights, and even comes forward to protect the poor as such against the violence of the rich. They have a counsellor in God, who, as He protects them by the law, continues to do so by the penalties imposed upon the transgressors of the law. He does indeed bear long with those transgressors who oppress the poor, so that it may appear as if He had forgotten them; but as He owes, so to speak, the duty of sympathy with the poor and their necessities, so does He also that of forbearance with their oppressors, because He desires not the death of the sinner but rather that he would turn and live.

2. The frightful severity of God's judgments, so far from being opposed to the compassion which cares for the poor and feeble, is rather in full harmony with it. The modern polemical spirit against the Old Testament descriptions of this severity, betrays its origin too plainly; it knows nothing in truth of sin, and therefore nothing of the divine judgment upon sin. It fails to see that the love which it claims for its God, really becomes the greatest harshness, since it denies the possibility of the punishment of sinners and therefore any efficacious opposition to the unrighteousness wrought by them. Only a God who is truly terror malorum can truly be amor bonorum. Moreover we do as a matter of fact continually meet with occurrences, in detail and in gross, which undeniably are judgments upon the sins of men, and that in these there is an execution of a law of moral government, can just as little be denied. So much the more foolish then is the opposition to the so-called ferocious God of the Jews, to the retaliatory spirit of the Old Testament. Now because men do not believe that there is and must be in God, along with, or rather for the sake of, the love which He is, strictness in judgment, He is obliged to show to a race which has lost its faith in the God of the Scriptures, by actual facts, as violent as those of the year 1870, that the storms of divine wrath are not merely outgrowths of a crude, undisciplined view of life, and tokens of a low state of culture, but a reality, planted in the midst of a century claiming to itself the highest culture. When the measure is full, these storms break forth, and a hundred times over put to flight "culture," "love," and all similar watchwords of the modern spirit. Then there often comes suddenly a "shaking" of the earth, or gloom falls upon an entire nation so that it becomes dark in bright daylight, or the festivals are turned into mourning and songs into lamentations, or all loins are clothed in sackcloth, — just when men in their blind security held such things to be impossible. Yes, times of war furnish only too striking illustrations of those words of Scripture which a race, strong in the conviction of its own leadership, coolly dismisses as a coarse and antiquated rhetoric, while it passes to the order of the day. Such fearful periods compel even an unbelieving race to forebode that the final judgment may prove a reality compared with which all preceding judgments are trifles. But faith sees in these latter a divine finger-mark pointing to the former, for which reason men of God, like the prophets, continually unite with their descriptions of intermediate judgments a reference to the last great judgment; and this the more when they describe judgments which are at least relatively decisive, inasmuch as they make an end of an entire kingdom.

3. When divine judgments come and give flaming proof of God's existence to a race which has forsaken and forgotten Him, the once despised and hated word of the Lord is appreciated again. Men "hunger and thirst" for it, but often at first not in the right way. They desire as speedily as possible to hear of promises and consolations, and to these every ear is open. But it is in vain. We now need expect no new revelation from God. We have "his Word" in the Scripture. But when this is a long time despised, it follows at last that there is no one to preach it, and without a living preacher, it is finally lost. Or if it is preached, it has no power to console, and men fail to find what they seek. Thus there ensues a longing which is not satisfied. The result is otherwise only when men bow themselves in penitence under the divine threatenings as deserved, and under the divine Spirit inwardly blame themselves for their previous apostasy. But who knows whether man will find room for repentance? Before he reaches that point, while he is in the midst of his vain longing for comfort, he may be snatched away.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[Ver. 1. Thus the Lord — shewed me. The sentence of Amaziah being pronounced, Amos resumes just where he had left off before. Amaziah's vehement interruption is like a stone cast into deep waters. They close over it, and it leaves no trace. The last vision declared that the end was certain; this, that it was at hand. (Pusey.)

Ver. 2. A basket with ripe fruit. At harvest time there is no more to be done for the crop. Good or bad, it has reached its end and is cut down. So the harvest of Israel was come. . . Heavenly influences can but injure the ripened sinner, as dew, rain, sun, but injure the ripened fruit. Israel was ripe, but for destruction. (Ibid.) Rev. xvi. 18, Gather the clusters of the earth, for her grapes are fully ripe. (Ibid.)

Ver. 3. The songs shall howl. When sounds of joy are turned into wailing, there must be complete sorrow. They are not merely hushed but turned into their opposite. Just the reverse is promised to the godly: Blessed are ye that weep now, for ye shall laugh (Luke vi. 21). (Ibid.)

Ver. 5. When will the new moon be over? The Psalmist said, When shall I come and appear before God? These said, When will this service be over that we may be our own masters again?

Sin in wrong measures once begun is unbroken. All sin perpetuates itself; it is done again because it has been done before. But sins of a man's daily occupation are continued of necessity, beyond the simple force of habit and the ever increasing drowsy of covetousness. To interrupt them is to risk detection. How countless then their number! When human law was enforced in a city after a time of negligence, scarcely a weight was found to be honest. Prayer went up to God on the Sabbath, and fraud on the poor went up to God in every transaction on the other six days. (Pusey.)

Ver. 7. Jehovah hath sworn, etc. God must cease to be God, if He did not do what He swears to do — punish the oppressors of the poor. (Ib.) Wo, and a thousand woes, to that man that is cut off by an oath of God from all benefit by pardoning mercy. (M. Henry.) — C.] The evil deeds of the wicked are inscribed in a perpetual memorial before God; but the sins of believers are cast by Him into the depths of the sea so that they never again come into mind. Micah vii. 19. (Pf. B. W.)

[Ver. 8. Shall not the earth tremble for this? Those who will not tremble and mourn as they ought for national sins shall be made to tremble and mourn for national judgments. (M. Henry.)

Ver. 9. The sun goes down at noon. Sorrow is saddest when it comes upon fearless joy. God commonly in his mercy sends heralds of coming sorrow; very few burst suddenly upon man. Now in the meridian brightness of the day of Israel, the blackness of night should fall upon him. (Pusey.)

Ver. 10. Turn your feasts into mourning. As to the upright there ariseth light in the darkness which gives them the oil of joy for mourning, so on the wicked there falls darkness in the midst of light which turns their joy into heaviness. The end of it as a bitter day. There is no hope that when things are at the worst, they will mend. No, the state of impenitent sinners grows worse and worse; and the last of all will be the worst of all. (M. Henry.)

Ver. 11. Not a hunger for bread. In death and dreariness, in exile from the land of their fathers, crushed by oppressors, hearing only of gods more cruel than those who make them, how will they hunger and thirst for any tidings of one who cares for the weary and heavy-laden, one who would have man-servant and maid, the cattle and the stranger within the gates to rest as well as the prince; of one who had fixed the year of jubilee that the debtor might be released and the captive go free. O, what a longing in a land of bondage to hear of such a Being; to believe that all that had been told of Him in former days was not a dream, to have a right to tell their children that it was true for them! (Maurice.)

Ver. 12. From sea to sea, etc. Even the profane, when they see no help, will have recourse to God. Saul in his extremity inquired of the Lord, and He answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets. (Pusey.) Such is the present condition of the Jews. They roam in restless vagrancy about the world and seek the word of God; but they find it not, because they have killed the incarnate Word revealed in the written word. (Jerome.)—C.]

CHAPTER IX.

Fifth Vision. The Downfall. Not even a little Grain perishes. After the Overthrow of all careless Sinners God will raise the fallen Tent of David to new Glory.

- I saw the Lord standing at ¹ the altar,
 And He said, Smite the top ² that the thresholds may tremble,
 And dash them ³ upon the head of all,
 And their remnant I will kill with the sword;
 He that fleeth of them shall not flee away,
 And he that escapeth of them shall not be delivered.
- ² If they break through ⁴ into hell,
 From thence will my hand take them;
 And if they climb up to heaven,
 Thence will I bring them down.
- ³ And if they hide themselves on the top of Carmel,
 From thence will I search and take them out.
 And if they conceal themselves from my sight in the bottom of the sea,
 From thence will I command the serpent ⁶ and he bites them.
- ⁴ And if they go into captivity before their enemies,
 From thence will I command the sword, and it slays them,
 And I set mine eye upon them for evil and not for good.
- ⁵ And the Lord, Jehovah of hosts,
 Who toucheth the earth and it melteth, ⁵
 And all that dwell therein mourn;
 And the whole of it riseth up like the Nile,
 And sinketh down like the Nile of Egypt,
- ⁶ Who buildeth his upper chambers ⁷ in the heaven,
 And his vault, ⁸—over the earth He founded it,
 Who calleth to the waters of the sea,
 And poureth them out upon the face of the earth;
 Jehovah is his Name.
- ⁷ Are ye not as the sons of the Cushites unto me,
 Ye sons of Israel? saith Jehovah.
 Have not I brought up Israel from the land of Egypt,
 And the Philistines from Caphtor,
 And the Syrians from Kir?
- ⁸ Behold, the eyes of the Lord, Jehovah, are upon the sinful kingdom, ⁹
 And I will destroy it

- From off the face of the earth,
 Saving that ¹⁰ I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob, saith the Lord.
- 9 For behold, I, I will command
 And will shake the house of Israel among all nations,
 As one shaketh in a sieve,
 And not even a little grain ¹¹ shall fall to the ground.
- 10 By the sword shall all the sinners of my people die,
 Who say, The evil will not overtake nor reach ¹² us.
- 11 In that day will I raise up
 The fallen hut ¹³ of David,
 And wall ¹⁴ up its breaches,
 And raise up its ruins, ¹⁵
 And build it ¹⁶ as in the days of old ;
- 12 That they may possess ¹⁷ the remnant of Edom and all the nations
 Upon whom my name is called,
 Saith Jehovah who doeth this.
- 13 Behold, the days are coming, saith Jehovah,
 When the ploughman reaches to the reaper,
 And the treader of grapes to the sower of seed ;
 And the mountains drop new wine,
 And all the hills melt :
- 14 And I bring back the captives ¹⁸ of my people, Israel,
 And they build the waste cities, and inhabit them,
 And plant vineyards and drink their wine,
 And make gardens and eat their fruit.
- 15 And I plant them upon their land,
 And they shall no more be torn up out of their land which I gave to them,
 Saith Jehovah, thy God.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- [1 Ver. 1. — עַל, used with נָצַב = at or by. Cf. Gen. xviii. 2; 1 Sam. iv. 20.]
- 2 Ver. 1. — כְּפִתּוֹר = knob, h. pillar-top or capital, פֶּתַח = threshold, usually that over which one enters a building, but also = the foundation-beams in which the posts are inserted. So here.
- 3 Ver. 1. — כְּפִתּוֹרֵי for כְּפִתּוֹרִים (Green, Heb. Gr., 125, 1). The suffix ם has no exact antecedent. It cannot be referred naturally to כְּפִתּוֹרֵי, nor in order to admit of such reference should the latter word be altered to mean "projecting roof of the temple supported by pillars." It belongs to כְּפִתּוֹרֵי, and either denotes that the capital on various pillars was struck, or the thought is that one capital was dashed into many pieces. [Keil and Hengstenberg refer it to both the capitals and the thresholds or the entire building, which is greatly preferable.]
- 4 Ver. 2. — פָּרַח with פָּ = to break through into.
- 5 Ver. 3. — נָחָשׁ = water-serpent, not to be more closely defined — elsewhere called לִיָּרֶדֶן or תַּנִּינִי. Is. xxvii. 1.
- 6 Ver. 5. — יִלֵּךְ, lit. to melt; here denotes the dissolution of the earth. Others [Fürst] = to fall through fear, to quake. The latter half of the verse is that one capital was dashed into many pieces. [Keil and Hengstenberg refer it to both the capitals and the thresholds or the entire building, which is greatly preferable.]
- 7 Ver. 6. — מַעְלִיּוֹת = מַעְלִיּוֹת, Ps. civ. 8, lit., places to which one has to ascend, upper chambers, lofts.
- 8 Ver. 6. — אֶקְדָּח = רֶקֶעַ.
- 9 Ver. 8. — בָּמִם, lit., they rest upon the sinful kingdom, in order to destroy it. [Verbs and nouns expressive of anger are connected by כִּי with the object on which the anger rests. Cf. Ps. xxxiv. 17 [Hengst.].
- 10 Ver. 8. — כִּי introduces a limitation.
- 11 Ver. 9. — צֶרֶר, lit., a thing tightly bound together; hence anything solid, as a pebble or little stone (2 Sam. xvii. 18); here, a kernel or grain of corn, as opposed to the loose, dusty chaff.
- 12 Ver. 10. — חֲקִידִים בְּעַד, lit., to come between = so as to block up the way of escape. [Usage requires us to render, "to come to meet one round about," i. e., from every side.]
- 13 Ver. 11. — סֹכֶן, lit., a booth, here a hut.
- 14 Ver. 11. — נִדְרָתִי, the "close" of E. V., is better replaced by "wall" from the margin. The plural suffix in פְּרָכִי probably refers to "walls" understood. [Keil and Hengstenberg say that it indicates that both kingdoms are intended.
- 15 Ver. 11. — The suffix in חֲרִים refers to Israel understood [but others refer it to David].

16 Ver. 11. — The suffix in בְּנֵי all agree, refers to the fallen hut.

17 Ver. 12. — יִירָשׁוּ, take possession of, in reference to Num. xxiv. 18.

18 Ver. 14. — שֹׁבֵר שִׁבְרָה. Keil vainly contends against explaining this formula as meaning "to restore the captives," and insists that it = to turn a state of misery into one of prosperity. [Hengstenberg strongly maintains the latter view, which indeed in such cases as Job xlii. 10 must be admitted.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

A Fifth Vision. In the four previous visions, the Lord showed the prophet only what He was about to do; in this one the prophet sees the Lord actually engaged in executing his judgment.

1. Vers. 1-4, describe an annihilating judgment which none can escape. Ver. 1. The altar here cannot possibly denote the one at Jerusalem, in spite of all that Keil urges to the contrary. In that case the object of the vision would be one essentially different from that which is mentioned in the threatening, namely, all Israel, and would be Judah in particular, and this, without any indication of the change. There is the less reason for assuming such a change, since the chapter does not give any statement of sins as the ground of the judgment the execution of which it records. The reason of the omission is that the necessity for this judgment has been already shown in the setting forth of the sins of the ten tribes. Hence our chapter treats of a judgment upon this kingdom. That judgment has already been threatened and the grounds of it assigned, whereas one of another kind would require the reasons for it to be stated. But there is an entire lack of such reasons; for the prophet, in spite of what he says in chap. ii. ver. 4, does not consider Judah as deserving such a complete destruction of its political existence as this chapter describes. Such a judgment corresponds to the condition of things in Israel, but not at all to that in Judah so far as known to the prophet. And it by no means follows that because an annihilating stroke afterwards fell upon this kingdom, the prophet announced it here. That would be to take a very unhistorical view of prophecy. We should rather say that if he announced such a fate, he would also have described Judah as meriting it. But he does no such thing. Therefore he knows of no such corruption in Judah, regards its measure of iniquity as not yet full, and hence knows nothing of the judgment which was one day to destroy it. But in fact, had Judah's sin become so gross, and had the prophet known of it, still it would not have been noticed in this connection, because Amos is not a prophet for Judah, but only touches that kingdom lightly, for the most part passing it over wholly. And it cannot be assumed that he threatens such a destructive visitation upon Judah equally with Israel, whose desert of punishment he has set forth not only immediately before, but in a continuous series of chapters. A fundamental law of prophecy is to balance, so to speak, the sinfulness and the judgment against each other. But no such statement concerning Judah is found in our chapter. In fine, it is only by violence that the phrase, the sinful kingdom, can be understood to mean "Israel and Judah embraced in one." No, if the kingdom of Israel is so expressly and amply described as sinful and then expressly named "the sinful kingdom," then, according to all the rules of a sound hermeneutics, certainly this kingdom of Israel must be intended in the first place, and not at the same time another kingdom the sinfulness of which was not specially noticed.

Smite, according to the simplest view, is addressed to the prophet. For of angels (Keil) there is no mention here. The prophet is not to be merely a spectator, but takes part in the action. That he was not in a situation to do what is here enjoined is no objection, for the whole transaction takes place in vision. A blow which strikes the pillar-capitals so that the foundation-beams shake, is manifestly = a crash that brings the whole building to the ground. We are then to think of a temple. The shaking to the ground is only the first step; the stroke aims farther, namely, to break to pieces. Upon the head of all; the whole people is considered as assembled around the national sanctuary. What is meant, then, is a destruction, and that total. That no one can escape is expressly said afterwards, but with a change from the language of vision to that of reality. Their remnant refers to the all, and shows that it is to be understood in its full force, — should any succeed in escaping the crash of the building, even these God would slay with the sword. The universality of the destruction is also negatively set forth in the remaining clauses of ver. 1, and is still farther expanded with poetical minuteness in the three following verses. Cf. Ps. cxxxix. 7, 8.

Ver. 3. On the top of Carmel. Named partly as a mountain which is of considerable height as compared with the sea over which it rises, and partly as a point on the extreme western boundary of the kingdom. "Whoever hides himself there, must know of no other secure refuge in all the land beside. And if there be no security there, nothing is left but the sea."

Ver. 4. Even going into captivity shall not save them.

2. Vers. 5, 6. To confirm the threatening, God is described as almighty, such illustrations being cited as show his omnipotence in destroying = He who thus speaks is the Lord, who touches the earth, etc. The first two members of ver. 5 stand in close relation to what follows, and are its foundation. Inasmuch as the Lord is enthroned in heaven, he is in a condition to call in the waters of the sea, etc. (and while such devastations are wrought in the earth, He himself is untouched by them). We are not, with Keil, to think here of "a mountain of clouds," or of rain, for the inundation is plainly stated to proceed from the sea, not from rain. Nor is it natural to admit a reference to the physical fact that the waters of the sea ascend on high in vapor in order to come down again as rain. Ver. 6, therefore is not to be regarded as an allusion to the Deluge, but rather as a marine inundation, such as often occurs in consequence of an earthquake; e. g., the tidal wave in Chili in 1868.

3. Vers. 7-10. Are ye not, etc. Degenerate Israel should not rely upon their election; they are to be carried away. Still God in his grace will not destroy them wholly, but only sift them, and even the carrying away is to serve as a means to this end.

Ver. 7. This is the sharpest thing that can be said of Israel, namely, to liken them to the heathen. The "sons" of the Cushites, Ham's posterity, are as highly esteemed as the "sons" of Israel. And the bringing of Israel out of Egypt avails no more than the bringing of the Syrians and Philistines out of their former dwelling-places. Caphtor, probably, = Crete, from which, according to this statement, at least a portion of the Philistines emigrated. (Others say = Kaslubim.) In chap. i. ver. 5, it was said that the Syrians should be carried away to Kir. According to the present passage, a portion of them must have emigrated from that place.

After thus rejecting Israel's claim for impunity, Amos proceeds in ver. 8 to announce the punishment once more. It is expressly said upon whom it shall fall, namely, the sinful kingdom, which can be none other than the ten tribes, who are thus sufficiently indicated. But in the second member the threatening is mitigated; there still remains grace. The distinction between Israel and the heathen which has just been denied — denied so far as Israel made it a matter of boasting, — is again set up. The preference, however, is a matter not of merit but of grace, and exists only because God will not wholly abandon his own people. House of Jacob is not = kingdom of Judah, denoting that this should be spared; for then it would not be a limitation of the preceding threatening which was aimed at Israel. Literally the phrase is = stock of Israel; but here, according to the prophet's aim, it means simply the ten tribes, just as these have been styled in the previous chapters, "Israel," "House of Israel." The prophet does not acknowledge two nations, but throughout designedly holds in view the one people, Israel, of which the kingdom of the ten tribes is only the particularly corrupt portion; this house of Jacob, whose punishment is here in question, shall go forth from their own land, but shall not be entirely destroyed. This latter statement does not conflict with the carrying out of what is stated in vers. 1-4. For that only denies that any one can of himself escape the threatened destruction.

How we are to understand ver. 8 is set forth in ver. 9 by a significant figure. By its dispersion Israel comes, as it were, into a sieve, in which the good corn and the dust and dirt are tossed up together. Yet this is only in order to make a more speedy separation. The solid good grains remain, only the trash falls to the ground. So with Israel.

By the sword (ver. 10), shall all the sinners of my people die, — but only these. The sinners are still marked as self-secure, by the addition, who say, the evil will not overtake, etc. To the thought expressed in ver. 10 we must assign a more general scope, standing as it does at the close of the book, as including in the wide sweep of the judgment a reference to Judah. For it must be supposed that the prophet sees in the same judgment which destroys Israel the execution of the threatening against Judah in chap. ii. ver. 5, only that Judah is not visited in the same degree, i. e., one which destroys its national existence. The stroke penetrates deeply and destroys the sinners, but at the same time purifies, and thus paves the way immediately for Judah, and so for Israel in general, so far as it still exists, to a new prosperity by which it rises again into a kingdom as powerful and happy as ever before.

4. Vers. 11-15. In that day will I, etc. In the fact that the destruction is not to be absolutely total, the grace of God shines through the furious wrath of the judgment. But the grace is not limited to this negation; it advances to the positive declaration that God will magnify Israel by establishing a new condition of prosperity. This exercise of grace — so the connection of the thought proves — is not something adventitious, but is directly mediated through the action of the judgment. This judgment, just because it is so radical in its extirpation of all sinners among God's people, operates, as before remarked, in a purifying direction, and its limitation contains the condition of a new position, a new salvation, the possibility of a rich bestowment of grace. For with the removal of sinners, every reason for the divine wrath ceases, and room is afforded for such an exhibition of grace as will restore Israel to a new prosperity. Very naturally, therefore, the question is no longer about the restoration of "the kingdom of Israel," in the narrow sense of that term, for this in its separation from Judah represented apostasy from Jehovah, and a constitution exactly opposed to the true idea of a people of God. No, the divine grace shows itself in this, that after the destruction of the ungodly elements, first and chiefly in the ten tribes, but also in Judah, there arises a single but prosperous and powerful kingdom of Israel under the legitimate monarchy, which attracts to itself all the elements spared and refined by the judgment, including those which belonged to the existing ten tribes. The discourse certainly turns in ver. 11 to Judah, yet not as a separate kingdom, but only in so far as it furnishes the divinely appointed basis and point of departure for the restoration of the entire people. More than that Judah cannot be, since it is not only outwardly enfeebled and proportionately suffering, but also, in the prophet's view, contains many sinful elements and must expect the divine chastisement, through which it will become still weaker outwardly, so that its future exaltation is due only to the grace of God, who cannot let his covenant with Israel fall, cannot give up his people. This enfeebled, prostrate condition of Israel — i. e., at first Judah, but also Israel because Judah alone was the true representative of Israel — is expressed in ver. 11 by the fallen hut of David = the Davidic monarchy, and this, in a condition of real prostration. This is set forth by calling it not a palace but a "hut," and this hut a "fallen" one; and the picture is made still more vivid by the mention of breaches and of ruins. Many expositors (among them Keil) think that the phrase, the fallen hut of David, presupposes the actual downfall of the kingdom of Judah, — in connection with the execution of the threatening in the whole chapter against Israel and Judah. But apart from what was said on this view in the comments on vers. 1, the phrase itself contradicts it. For in the downfall, not only a hut, but the house in general was prostrated. The term "hut" has its appropriate meaning only when we think of something not wholly fallen but still existing, for the manner of this existence is then pointed out by the word "hut," and is still further characterized by the epithet "fallen," as also by the following expressions, "breaches," "ruins." The restoration of captives spoken of here, can therefore be no proof of the assumption that the downfall of Judah and the Babylonish exile is presupposed in ver. 11. For while a carrying away is certainly mentioned, it is from the kingdom of Israel, and the return is included in this promise, although in the first instance it refers to Judah; since the thought is that along with the renovation of Judah, as the one genuine kingdom of Israel, there is bound up the return of all the Israelites held captive in heathen lands, as a constituent of that future prosperity. But, besides, there were, independent of the exile in Babylon, captives out of the kingdom of Judah, who had been dragged away by the heathen, as we have already seen in Joel; and the prophet might therefore well suppose that there would be more, before the new period of salvation. It is not to the purpose that in the later prophets the promise of future salvation for Israel, including Judah, presupposes the foreseen destruction of the kingdom of Judah. For it is preposterous from this to infer that all had the same general view, without regard to the differences of time. Surely we cannot without ceremony transfer to the earlier prophets what belongs well enough to the later. — This fallen hut is to be raised up again, and that in such a way that the breaches shall be walled up and the prostrate ruins restored. This then is a building of the hut, and the result is that it becomes what it was in ancient times = in the days of David himself. This restoration of the former power and greatness is then expanded in ver. 13, where the term possession is an allusion to Balaam's prophecy, "And Edom shall be a possession, Seir also shall be a possession." The acquisition shall be easily made, being Jehovah's gift to his people. The remnant of Edom = what has not already been subjugated again. Edom is particularly mentioned, because while they were related to the Israelites, they were of all nations the most hostile to them. To receive possession of them is therefore a peculiar token of Israel's glory. But Israel is to gain more, even all the nations upon whom my name is called. This phrase manifestly refers in the first instance to the nations who by David were brought under the sway of God's people and therefore were called by Jehovah's name. Still the question recurs why the dependence on Israel was expressed in just this peculiar manner. It was to indicate a peculiar relation of these nations to Jehovah which was the reason of their subjugation. This indeed existed under David, but was not then fully realized. What then lay in intention and was contemplated in their conquest, actually occurs in the new and better time here brought into view. The nations shall so come under Israel's rule that they will bear the name of Israel's God, and be called his people, so that a conversion of the heathen — not of all, for the prophecy does not touch that point — but of heathen nations, is placed in prospect or at least intimated. (Upon the quotation in Acts xv. 16, and also the meaning of the promise in vers. 11, 12, see Doctrinal and Moral.) But to the future prosperity of Israel belongs not only national power and greatness, but also a rich blessing upon the land and thus upon the people (ver. 13), in fulfillment of the promise in Levit. xxvi. 5. What is there said of the action — the threshing shall reach unto the vintage, — is here transferred to the person who performs it. The ploughman reaches to the reaper, i. e., the ploughing will still continue in one place, although the reaping has begun in another, which however does not mean that the crop will grow and mature so quickly, but that so much is there to plough that it lasts to the harvest. This, at all events, is the meaning of the next clause, — The treader of grapes (will reach) to the sower of seed = the vintage will last to the sowing time, so abundant is it. The mountains drop new wine, etc. Cf. Joel iii. 18. There the hills are said to flow with milk, here the expression is stronger, — the hills melt, as it were, dissolve themselves in pure streams of milk, new wine, honey.

Ver. 14. I bring back the captives, etc. This is another essential feature in the picture of Israel's future. For when the period of judgment has once elapsed, and God in his grace brings his people to a new prosperity, its members cannot longer continue under the power of the heathen, for that would be an evidence that the state of punishment still continued. As to "the captives" thus restored, see above on ver. 11. The phrase, they build the waste cities, etc., clearly depicts the reviving activity of those who have been restored from exile to their desolated land, and the words in ver. 15, they shall no more be torn up, etc., distinctly express the final abolition of an exile. As God's direct judgments, drought, and barrenness, are to cease, so also shall the indirect, namely, desolation by a foe. Therefore they shall not merely build cities but inhabit them; not only plant vineyards, but also drink the wine (the direct reverse of chap. v. ver. 11); not only lay out gardens, but eat their fruit! And (ver. 15) especially shall the restored exiles never again be carried away by enemies. This, in immediate connection with what has just been said of the plantings which Israel is to make, is represented under the figure of a planting which shall never be torn up; at the same time with a reference to the firm "planting" formerly made by means of David, in 2 Sam. vii. 10. The higher fulfillment of this will occur only when David's fallen hut is again raised up.

DOCTRINAL AND MORAL.

1. The prophet paints in a frightful manner the vast power of the divine judgments and man's helplessness before them. God's omnipresence and omnipotence subserve his wrath; hence its energy. Nowhere can man escape Him; by no means can he protect himself; all places are accessible to God; all powers stand subject to his will. The judgment here primarily intended is one that is executed by a conquering foe. Now whence comes the crushing weight of so many conquerors, whom nothing can resist, before whom all means prove impotent? We do not understand how it is possible. Here we have the answer, here where we, as it were, glance behind the scenes. The conqueror is only the instrument of God's wrath; but this is so mighty, so irresistible, that it is no wonder that nothing can withstand the victorious foe, that every resource fails, even though it may have a hundred times in other cases brought relief and defense. If the Lord will not, all is of no avail.

2. But when the judgment is one thus executed by a foreign conqueror, it is not to be denied that the description, as indeed often in the former chapters, so especially here, transcends what usually occurs in case of a hostile invasion and conquest. It has, so to speak, an eschatological coloring. The threatened punishment is a total, final, decisive destruction of sinners. The prophet knows of none that goes beyond it. The only counterpart to it is a glorious act of grace. As surely as the latter is something definite and conclusive, so is the former. If we inquire as to the fulfillment of this threatening, confessedly one such took place for Israel in the overthrow of the kingdom. But a complete and exact fulfillment is not to be found in that event; an unprejudiced comparison shows that the prophecy transcends the experience. This fact does not show that the threatening is unfounded, but that it has an eschatological character. The prophet, indeed, sees the last decisive judgment arise, the day of the Lord (although there is no express reference to that here), but still the judgment which came historically upon the ten tribes was not this last decisive one. What he threatens against Israel was, we venture to say, farther fulfilled in the last judgment upon Israel, when Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans; but this still awaits its complete fulfillment in the last judgment at the Parousia upon the entire body of the apostate members of God's people, of whom Israel was a type. In this judgment the punitive righteousness of God will be fully revealed in its frightful universality. The threatenings, as well as the promises of prophecy, find their complete fulfillment first in the New Testament, yet not in the literal Israel, but in the people of God represented by Israel in so far as it is apostate. It is not unimportant to make this clear, in order to show the incorrectness of the popular argument, that because all the threatenings have been fulfilled in the literal Israel, therefore the promises must be so likewise; that the latter are to be taken just as strictly as the former, and hence the fulfillment of such of them as have not yet come to pass, is to be expected in Israel after the flesh.

3. But the divine judgment is not a work of absolute annihilation but of sifting, to separate the wheat from the chaff. Herein is revealed the eschatological character of these judgments, in that they are so strictly just; but since the separation of the wheat and the chaff is only relative, the sparing of those who are spared must be deemed an act of grace, and so much the more, since the sparing does not stand alone and simple, but the judgment upon the ungodly is itself a purifying work for "the righteous," and cannot remain without a wholesome influence upon them; while on the other hand it is for them a deliverance, the dawn of a new prosperity which is possible only after the consummated excision of the destructive elements which provoked the wrath of God. What Amos calls "the little grain" in the sieve is substantially that which afterwards appears as the "remnant of Jacob." But still the question with Amos was not about a still surviving remnant of the people in general when he now sees the kingdom of Israel fall, nor was it whether the whole people of God should or could go down or not. Hence the term "remnant" would ill apply to those whom he sees to be spared.

4. Israel's provocation of the divine wrath in general lay in the ungodly course it took at the founding of the kingdom of the ten tribes and ever afterwards persevered in. After the destruction of this kingdom, and after the judgment which is to fall upon Judah, although this kingdom is not to be destroyed, there no longer remains any hindrance to the blooming of a new prosperity for Israel as a whole. Therefore the prophet, since it was his commission to announce the judgment of God upon all the ungodly, but especially upon the ungodly kingdom of the ten tribes, concludes, after this commission has been fulfilled, with a promise for Israel as the people of God. Under the only legitimate monarchy, the house of David, it is by God's blessing raised out of its humiliation; its power and greatness are restored as they were in David's time; the kingdom spreads out over the heathen; the land rejoices in the richest blessings; all captive exiles return, — never again to be carried away; and the kingdom has the prospect of being established forever. It is very perverse to ask if an internal renovation is not also expressed in this exaltation. What is said in ver. 11, etc., concerning deliverance and restoration, refers only to the outward prosperity of Israel, not to its internal character; but certainly an inward renewing is presupposed, for the destruction of all sinners is, as ver. 10 shows, the only way to the promised outward restitution, its conditio sine qua non. Subjectively it is its ground and root, while objectively all results from the grace of God, who has intended prosperity and salvation for Israel as his people, and who therefore in all his judgments upon Israel aims at last at a new and so much the higher blessing, and the establishment of a complete state of prosperity. The flourishing Israel therefore is naturally to be considered as a people serving God and converted to Him, even though nothing has been expressly said on the point. Or they are considered as his members, consisting partly of those who remained faithful, partly of such as have been converted. The emphasis with which an annihilating judgment is beforehand pronounced upon ungodliness, leaves room for no other view. Such a divine blessing as is here promised, and especially its permanence, presupposes a godly life. Although Amos says nothing of a personal Messiah, yet in the wide sense we must call this prophecy Messianic, in substance if not in form, in so far as the Messiah of the later prophets is He who introduces the consummation of the people of God, and the great time of its happiness, and it is just this final completeness and glory which is here promised.

5. As to the fulfillment of the prophecy, it must be said, just as in the case of Joel, that this has not taken place exactly according to the letter, for that represents the new greatness and never-ending prosperity of the kingdom of Judah and Israel as coincident with the judgment upon the ten tribes. But although this latter event was followed by happier times for Judah, still this was not what is promised here, but in place of a flourishing exaltation of the Davidic line there followed its complete prostration along with the overthrow of the kingdom. But this, as we said above, the prophet does not take into the account. For this reason, the fair prospect of Israel's future glory has maintained and still maintains its truth and validity, as it is not a product of human wish and hope, but flows from a revelation of the Holy Spirit and rests upon a view furnished by that Spirit. Nor do we deceive ourselves when we assume that the later prophets, who also foresaw and announced the downfall of Judah, found a basis for their promises in the promise of Joel and also in that of Amos which is so closely connected with it. For if such a noble future was predicted, the downfall of the kingdom could not be final, rather, not only would a remnant be saved, but there would be a lifting up out of this deep fall, a restitution after the overthrow. Israel, as the people of God by virtue of God's covenant with them, may and indeed must suffer his judgments in case of apostasy, but so far from perishing by these, rather attains a condition of greatness and power, an enduring prosperity; this is the truth forever established and fortified by our promise. A certain fulfillment was no doubt experienced in the restoration accomplished by the Jews who returned from exile. But this was by no means "the Messianic salvation," the consummation of God's kingdom in Israel. Nor can a literal fulfillment of Amos's prophecy be sought herein, because our prophet does not take into account the facts which gave occasion for that return, namely, the overthrow of the kingdom and the exile. The Messiah came in the person of Jesus Christ. Did then the promised great salvation come? Did He fulfill our promise? Not according to the letter, since by no means did a time of new grandeur break in upon Israel after the flesh; but in place of expecting any such thing in the future and seeking there the fulfillment of the promise, we rather affirm that it has already begun with Christ's coming. For as, according to a principle before laid down, we have the true complement of the Old Testament in the New, so we see in Christ's salvation the fulfillment of the promise of a time of glory for Israel, since Israel (with Canaan) was only a type of the true people of God. What therefore was promised to Israel passes over by virtue of the new covenant to all who belong to Israel through faith in Christ and form the people of God. And we are not at all to expect a literal fulfillment of these engagements to a national Israel, and in the shape of temporal blessings on the stand-point of the Old Testament. For, if we did, it would follow that there must be a literal possession of the "remnant of Edom." But the boldest realist will hardly conclude that in the future Edom will again exist alongside of Israel. We may here appropriate in substance the observations of Keil, who says that "the raising up of David's fallen hut commenced with the coming of Christ and the founding of the Christian Church by the Apostles — (as to which we refer, e. g., only to Luke i. 32, 33, where Jesus is represented as the restorer of David's throne, and one whose kingdom shall have no end), — and the possession of Edom and of all the other nations upon whom the Lord reveals his name, took its rise in the reception of the Gentiles into the kingdom of heaven set up by Christ. . . . The land which will flow with streams of divine blessing is not Palestine, but the domain of the Christian Church, or the earth, so far as it has received the blessings of Christianity. The people which cultivate this land is the Christian Church, so far as it stands in living faith and produces the fruits of the Holy Spirit." And — we may add — so far as the Jews are converted to Christ and incorporated into the Christian community, there is "a bringing back of the captives." Still this "bringing back" is not limited to Israel after the flesh. Its fulfillment is to be sought more generally in the freedom which Christ has brought, in consequence of which believers in Him are no longer prisoners under the control of an alien power. They possess "the glorious liberty of the children of God," through their enjoyment of communion with God, — incomplete, indeed, in the first instance, just as the return from exile is not complete. But it will be through Christ. He will one day conduct all the (genuine) members of God's people out of exile and bondage into the heavenly Canaan, and no one shall ever again drive them out. But certainly this promise for the people of God first began to be fulfilled at the appearing of the Messiah and in the domain of the Christian Church. Its complete fulfillment is to be expected at the parousia of Christ; and then the spiritual blessing, the spiritual power and greatness, the spiritual freedom which the people of God now enjoy, will obtain a corresponding outward sensible manifestation. Inward prosperity will not lack that which is outward, yet in a higher sense than the Old Covenant understood it, since the distinction between the outward and the inward will in the main be done away. The hope of this final glory of the people of God has a right to nourish itself constantly from the prophecies which give such bright pictures of the future glory of Israel. So far these prophecies preserve constantly their significance for the religious life. By their confident and assured tone they greatly oppose and undermine the doubts awakened by the day of small things in which we live.

6. The opinion that our promise is fulfilled in Christ is confirmed in the New Testament (Acts xii. 15) by the Apostle James. He sees a fulfillment of the words of Amos (ver. 12) concerning the relation of the nations = the heathen, to the restored Israel, in Peter's statement of the effects of faith in Christ among the heathen, since these without being circumcised had received the Holy Spirit. He thus probably understands the phrase, "upon whom my name is called," in a pregnant sense = upon whom God has testified Himself as God, therefore as a promise of an inward relation of God to the heathen, but at bottom a promise of the bestowment of the Holy Ghost upon them. Therefore he regards the advices of Peter as a fulfillment of the prophetic utterance. This explanation does not conform to the original sense of the prophet's words (see above in Critical and Exegetical), just as the words immediately preceding are given by James in a form quite different from the Hebrew. For us the only important point is that James considers the fulfillment of this promise as beginning with Christ. But we may draw a farther conclusion. If James sees this statement of Amos concerning the heathen and their relation to Israel fulfilled in the appearance of Christ, in so far as that caused the reception of the Spirit by believers in Him, then certainly he regards the promise of the restoration of David's fallen hut as fulfilled in Christ. Although the promise, literally understood, treats of an outward restoration, a return of outward greatness to Israel as a kingdom, yet the tenor of the discourse is wholly different; James therefore, since he saw its fulfillment then occurring, could not possibly have cherished any dreams of an outward glorification of the kingdom of Israel to be expected in the future on the ground of the prophetic utterances. The only correct view is, that to him the people of God appeared in the closest union with the national Israel, and he saw Christ and his salvation as obtained in the first instance for the latter. The national Israel to him always stood in the foreground. But he saw the promises to the nation fulfilled in the spiritual blessings which proceeded from Christ. But it was inconsistent to take the prophet's promises literally in respect to "Israel," i. e., to claim them for the national Israel, and yet not to take them literally in respect to their meaning, not to understand them as holding out an earthly greatness, a national blessing; and hence both Peter and Paul went far beyond this view. But it is remarkable that James, who was so pronounced a representative of the Judaistic tendency, should regard such a promise as we have in Amos, as fulfilled, so far as regards its meaning, in the appearance of Christ and the spiritual blessings thence resulting, without even once referring it to the second coming of the Saviour. Even he therefore is a patron of the so-called spiritual interpretation of the prophecies; and if the theological explanation here finds itself in agreement with a disciple of the Lord, and him a man of strong Jewish-Christian feeling, that is a proof that it is on the right track, and has so much the more reason for disowning the doctrine of a future glorification of the national Israel as guaranteed by the prophets.

7. In relation to the promises of prophecy, we may make the same remark as before in relation to prophetic threatenings in chap. vii., sec. 6, of Doctrinal and Moral. As the prophet is not the mere instrument of revelation without will of his own, we must, while fully acknowledging the objective ground of these promises, at the same time regard them as evidences of the prophet's own strength of faith. While he at first on account of the prevailing sinfulness sees only punishment and downfall, a speedy outbreak of divine wrath, yet at the same time he holds firm as a rock the hope that the grace of God will return and a new salvation begin for the people of God. The divine promises made to Israel as the people of God are an anchor of his faith and a light to illumine the gloomy future before him, so that the final aim of the procedure remains to him immovably noble. If it is the old promises upon which his faith rests, these are reanimated and freshly confirmed by the new revelations he receives. But this occurs only when they are firmly believed, and therefore the utterance of them is an evidence of strength of faith.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. Smite the top, etc. The judgments of God when they begin are like mighty blows, which make everything tremble, if they do not altogether dash to pieces. Apostasy from God (idolatry) is that which decides the case, and at last makes the divine judgments break forth.

Vers. 2, 3. That which is our greatest confidence when God is on our side, namely, that He is everywhere present, is our terror when He is against us. [The prophet has not employed a superfluous heap of words. Every syllable is important, even though at first it may seem otherwise. The Holy Spirit designs to shake off our self-flatteries and rouse our innate torpor, that we may not think of God as of ourselves, but know that his power extends to all hiding-places. — Calvin.]

Ver. 4. And I set mine eye, etc. The eye of God upon us is our whole hope and stay and life. It is on the confessor in prison, the martyr on the rack, the poor in their sufferings, the mourner in the chamber of death, for good. What if that eye, the source of all good, rests on his creature only for evil? — Pusey.]

Vers. 5, 6. God's omniscience and omnipresence gain their whole significance from his omnipotence. But He is as certainly almighty as He is allwise and everywhere present. He commands the earth when and as He will, and it must obey Him. If He only touch it, it trembles. But no wonder that the earth obeys Him, for it is He who rules also the heaven. [This is the hope of his servants, the hopelessness of his enemies. — Pusey.]

Ver. 7. Are ye not as the sons of the Cushites, etc. Woe to him who considers what God through grace has made of him, as his own merit, and therefore boasts! God will be ashamed of him, and humble him under those over whom he exalts himself.

Ver. 8. The eyes of the Lord, etc. Nothing escapes the eyes of God; even though the contrary may often seem to be the case, yet in the end it is proven that He has seen all, and in his own time administers chastisement. Whole kingdoms as well as individuals are objects of God's attention for joy or for sorrow. Why does many a kingdom meet a frightful end? The eyes of the Lord were upon it and upon its sins, and though men were not conscious of it, finally the fact became manifest.

Vers. 8, 9. I will not utterly destroy, etc. That we do not utterly perish is due only to the goodness of God, which has no end. Who has reason to fear the divine judgments? Not those who are like wheat, but those who resemble chaff. Hence the grave question to each one; whom do you resemble? Although it often seems as if even the wheat fell to the ground, yet in the end it is shown to be otherwise. Much seems to be wheat, and is not. In the sifting power of God's judgments lies their chief significance.

Ver. 10. Who say, The evil shall not, etc. [In both destructions of Jerusalem, the people perished the more miserably being buoyed up by the false confidence that they should not perish. So too now, none are so likely to perish forever as they who say, The evil shall not overtake us. "I will repent hereafter." "There is time enough yet." "God will forgive the errors of youth, the heat of passion." "God is merciful." Thus Satan deludes thousands upon thousands to their destruction. — Pusey.]

Ver. 11. As the prophet here declares that a redeemer would come and renew the whole state of the kingdom, we see that the faith of the fathers was ever fixed on Christ; for in the whole world it is He alone who has reconciled us to God. Nor could the fallen Church have been restored otherwise than under one head. If then at this day we desire to raise up our minds to God, Christ must immediately become a mediator between us; for when He is taken away, despair will overwhelm us. Our confidence will come to nothing unless it be founded on Christ alone. — Calvin. The fallen hut. Strange comment on human greatness, that the royal line was not to be employed in the salvation of the world until it was fallen! The royal palace had to become the hut of Nazareth, ere the Redeemer of the world could be born, whose glory and kingdom were not of this world, who came to take from us nothing but our nature that He might sanctify it, our misery that He might bear it for us. Yet flesh and blood could not foresee it ere it came, as flesh and blood could not believe it when He came. — Pusey.]

Ver. 12. That they may possess, etc. No gifts of God end in the immediate object of his bounty and love. Israel was restored in order that they, the first objects of God's mercies, might win others to God, not Edom only, but all nations upon whom his name is called. — Pusey.]

Ver. 13. The mountains and hills of Judæa, with their terraced sides clad with the vine, were a natural symbol of fruitfulness to the Jews; but they themselves could not think that natural fruitfulness was meant under this imagery. It would have been a hyperbole as to things of nature, but what in natural things is a hyperbole, is but a faint shadow of the joys and delights and glad fruitfulness of grace. — Id.]

Ver. 14. And they build cities, etc. This needs no exposition, since throughout the world, amid the desert of Heathendom, which was before deserted by God, churches of Christ have arisen which for firmness of faith may be called cities, and for gladness of hope, vineyards, and for sweetness of charity, gardens; wherein they dwell who have builded them through the Word, whence they drink the wine of gladness who formed them by precepts, whence they eat fruits who advanced them by counsels. — Rupertus.]

Ver. 15. It is a promise of perpetuity like that of our Lord, Lo, I am with you alway, etc. As Jerome says, the Church may be shaken by persecutions, she cannot be uprooted; she may be tempted, she cannot be overcome. For the Lord God Almighty hath promised that He will do it, whose promise is the law to nature. — Pusey.]

Often in our time the Church of Christ seems like to David's fallen hut, but only when we look at its outward condition and the many who shun it; so far as regards the power which goes out from Christ and the blessing which He procures, it is not a fallen but a restored hut. For his blessings are not small. Happy are all who believe in Him.

But a day is coming when the Church shall triumph in the face of the world, and stand forth great and noble outwardly as well as inwardly.

"Amen, Lord, all thy Word is true!
Amen, Lord, come, complete it all!"

OBADIAH.

INTRODUCTION.

OF the author of the brief prophecy concerning the doom of Edom, which those who arranged the Canon have inserted between Amos and Jonah, we really know, with certainty, nothing except the name. This is read by the Masorah as Obadiah [עֲבַדְיָה], i. e., Servant of Jehovah, a proper name frequently met with, and which was borne also by a respectable Zebulonite of the time of Saul (1 Chr. xxvii. 19), a major-domo of Ahab (1 K. xviii. 3), a Levite under Josiah (2 Chr. xxxiv. 12), and several heads of post-exilian houses. There is, therefore, no ground for holding it, with Augusti and Küper, as a symbolic pseudonym. That, however, the pronunciation of the name offered by the Masoretes was not universal in the earliest times, is evident from the fact that the LXX. give for it, in different places, not only Obdias, but Abdias, Audias, etc.¹ What Jewish traditions report concerning the man bears the stamp of conjecture, or of fanciful invention. The oldest of these traditions identifies him with the chief courtier of Ahab, referred to above, probably because he is mentioned 1 K. xviii. 3 as a very pious man, but in so doing overlooks the fact that our prophecy grows not out of the circumstances of the ten tribes, but entirely out of Jerusalem. The others are still more capricious.

* To determine the time of the prophecy, we are left, therefore, simply to its contents, to its relations with the other prophets, and to the historical accounts of the Old Testament.

The situation in which the prophet stands is shown principally in ver. 10 ff., since vers. 1-9 contain mere prophecy ("in that day," ver. 8). Jerusalem is distressed by a hostile invasion, strangers have entered into her gates (ver. 11 c), have plundered and ravaged, so that the population have betaken themselves to a wild flight (ver. 14 b, c), have carried off many treasures (ver. 11 b), and divided the inhabitants among them by lot (ver. 11 d), to sell them as slaves to distant peoples (ver. 20 c). The Edomites have not only exhibited an unbrotherly and malignant delight in these transactions (vers. 12; 10 a; 13 b), but have actively taken part in them (ver. 11 e), have shared in the invasion of the city (ver. 13 a), in the plundering (ver. 13 c), and the mad revelry which followed (ver. 16 a), have lain in wait for the fugitives when they escaped from the city, and slain them in part, in part delivered them up to slavery (ver. 14). The catastrophe which the prophet threatens in vers. 1-9, is the punishment of Edom for these deeds (ver. 10), and with this is linked the restitution of Israel (vers. 17-21).

From this description it is obvious that the circumstances were such as presented themselves after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. That the conduct of Edom in relation to that catastrophe was thoroughly hostile, and closely similar to what is here depicted (ver. 11 ff.), is proved by the prophecies occasioned by that conduct (Ezek. xxxv. and Is. lxiii.). We might, therefore, regard the prophet as a contemporary of this event (Aben Ezra, Luther, Calovius, Tarnovius, Ch. V. and J. D. Michaelis, De Wette, Knobel, Maurer, Winer, Hendewerk²), or as one of the later Epigoni of prophecy (Hitzig, an Egyptian Jew, cir. 312 B. C.). And undoubtedly we must prefer this reference of our prophecy to every other, if it were true, as Hitzig maintains, that in the first ten verses of his discourse, Obadiah makes use of, nay, simply paraphrases the strikingly similar language of Jeremiah (chap. xlix. 7 ff.) against Edom. It is easy, in this view, to regard precisely those peculiar features in which Obadiah excels Jeremiah (ver. 11 ff.), as called forth by the immediate impression of the catastrophe, which Jeremiah had not yet before his eyes: for he spoke his prophecy in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and therefore before the destruction of Jerusalem (cf. Caspari, p. 15 ff.).

Nevertheless, concerning this use of Jeremiah by Obadiah, precisely the contrary is to be believed. Against it speaks at once the circumstance, that this very series of announcements in Jeremiah concerning foreign lands to which the passage xlix. 7 ff. belongs, shows not merely a constant use of earlier prophecies, but that Jeremiah repeatedly applies earlier prophecies, with free reproduction and expansion, to present occasions. So the prophecy against Moab, Is. xv., xvi., in chap. xlviii.; the prophecies in Am. i. 13 ff., viii. ff., in chap. xlix. 1 ff., 23 ff. Thus he has, in some sense out of his own ἐξουσία, on the principle that prophecy is spoken for all time and therefore must be applicable also to the ever-recurring present, compiled, in this series of chapters, a canon of ancient prophecy for his own time. And if, in all these passages, it is undeniable that Jeremiah has availed himself of older prophecies should he in just the one before us be the original, and Obadiah have borrowed from him?

This presumption against Hitzig's view rises to certainty when we more carefully compare the two predictions. "On comparing the two common sections with each other, we find that in Obadiah partly shorter and more rapid, partly heavier and more abrupt, partly more clear and lively than in Jeremiah" (Caspari). It cannot be denied that the cruxes interpretum offered by Obadiah, especially in vers. 3, 5, appear in Jeremiah smoothed down, and that the solitary difficulty which Jeremiah has beyond Obadiah in the word תַּלְמִידָיו (chap. xlix. 16), as against the numerous obscurities peculiar to the latter, is of no account. But it is contrary to all hermeneutical procedure to suppose that a later writer, in regard to a situation meanwhile explained, should have still darkened the clear language of the earlier one, while, on the contrary, it is a common and explainable occurrence, that the obscure prophecy of antiquity should, in the hands of the subsequent seer, who is at the same time highly skilled in discourse, become more flowing and more clear. Some, to escape this argument, feign that the obscurities of Obadiah are indications of an atomistic compilation, from a point of view arbitrarily chosen, without force and without definiteness; but the exegesis of the book will have to show that his discourse is one which bears a single burden, is animated by one independent soul.

The comparison with Jeremiah is, therefore, of no value toward the more accurate determination of the age of our prophet. On the other hand, we have the positive circumstance that the inner relationship places his prophecy entirely within the circle of view of those prophets among whom the collectors of the Canon have placed it, that is, the oldest. Of the great monarchies of the world Obadiah knows nothing. The enemies who have invaded Jerusalem are to him simply foreigners and strangers (ver. 11), and besides the Edomites he names none except the Philistines (ver. 19), and the Phœnicians (ver. 20), both of whom appear in Joel (iv. 4), as enemies of the kingdom. Aram is not so much as once mentioned, so that his horizon is still narrower than that of Amos. The two kingdoms are in existence standing firmly side by side. The southern one consists of the tribes of Judah (which inhabits the Negeb and the lowland) and Benjamin (ver. 19); the northern (Ephraim and Gilead) must yet be possessed, that a united kingdom may arise, one army of the children of Israel (vers. 19, 20, cf. Hos. ii. 2). The captives of Jerusalem are not carried away to the east, but are sold as slaves into the west, precisely as in Joel; to the Javan (Ionia) of Joel corresponds the Sepharad (Sparta) of Obadiah (ver. 20). The middlemen, who have made traffic of these slaves, are doubtless the same as those named in Am. i. 9; Joel iv. 6, the Phœnicians, whom Obadiah also (ver. 20) expressly mentions. Of a destruction of Jerusalem, moreover, not a word is said, but only of capture and ravage. And it is to be observed that the hostile attitude of Edom is by no means a state of things first produced by the Babylonian destruction, and before unheard of. In Joel also (iv. 19), and Amos (i. 11 ff.; ix. 12), precisely as here, Edom appears as an enemy of Judah, deserving double chastisement on account of his originally fraternal relation to Israel. It would be plainly incongruous to refer all these predictions just cited, and which, for the most part, wear a very distinctly historical aspect, to the incidental position which Edom occupied two centuries later in the Chaldean catastrophe; the more incongruous because, from the time of Moses onward (Num. xx. 14 ff.), the attitude of this neighbor nation toward Israel was, according to the historical Books also, hostile up to the full measure of their strength (1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. viii. 14; 1 K. xi. 14 ff.; 2 K. viii. 20, etc.).

The same is to be said of Obadiah also. As he belongs to the first period of written prophecy, not only from the correspondences above noticed, but also from the fact that the later prophets presuppose him as having gone before (cf. under the head of Theological and Ethical), nay, even expressly quote him (Joel iii. 5; ii. 32, cf. Obad. 17), he cannot have had the Chaldean destruction for his point of view, for what he says of devastation is not prophecy, but palpable, detailed description, which is plainly distinguished from the prophetic verses, and therefore relates to the past. And even if we give up the hermeneutical rule that every prophetic utterance must rise from a given historical situation, be called forth by some manifestation of God's rule in the history of the kingdom; if we concede that, irrespective of any historical occasion, and purely by the force of inspiration, Joel may have foreseen the participation of the Edomites in the destruction of Jerusalem, with all its particular features; still, it is certainly inconceivable that he should have placed this incidental circumstance so conspicuously in the foreground, while the main fact which should have naturally cast down him and his people to the ground, in the prospect of it, namely, the destruction itself, and the chief enemy, the Babylonians, were treated as such obviously familiar circumstances, mere scenery and a starting point for the threatening against Edom. Thus fall also the opinions which place Obadiah in the early times indeed (under Uzziah), but still will not give up the reference of his prophecy to the catastrophe of 588 B. C. (Hengstenberg, Hävernick, Caspari.) The event which by its iniquity has called for the judgment announced by Obadiah is, rather, one contemporary with himself, one, therefore, accomplished in the earlier times by the Edomites against Jerusalem, which he has personally witnessed, and on which the other prophets of that age also look back in the apposite passages of their writings.

When we inquire more specifically into the nature of this transaction, it is not that recorded in 2 Chr. xxv. 23 f. (Vitringa, Carpozov, Küper), nor in 2 Chr. xxviii. 5 ff. (Jäger). In both of these instances it was not foreigners who desolated Jerusalem, as Obadiah assumes to have been the case (ver. 11), but principally the Ephraimites. It is rather the capture of Jerusalem under Joram, mentioned 2 Chr. xxi. 16 f., cf. 2 K. viii. 20 ff. (Hoffmann, Delitzsch, Nägelsbach). Here we are told that the Philistines and Arabians (a collective name with the later historical writers, for the peoples living east and south of Judah), came up and carried away great treasures, and even took among the captives the princes of the royal family. This event, which harmonizes far better than the Chaldean invasion with our prophecy, inasmuch as it, like Obadiah, intimates nothing of a destruction of Jerusalem and annihilation of the national existence, but only plunder and rapine, this event alone can have been in the thoughts of Joel and Amos when they reproach the Philistines (Joel, iii. [iv.] 6; Am. i. 6 ff.) with having delivered over the captives of Judah and sold them into a foreign land. On account of this transaction the Edomites are, in the view of these prophets also, national foes.

If now, on the one hand, Obadiah coincides with them, especially with Joel, precisely in these connections, in several passages (vers. 10, 11, 15, cf. Joel iii. [iv.] 19, 3, 7, 14), and that not at all as a borrower, but as leading the way (ver. 17, cf. Joel ii. 32; iii. 5), and, on the other, Joel is to be regarded as a contemporary of Joash (877 ff.), we may, without danger of essential mistake, ascribe our prophecy to the preceding decade (890-880), falling mostly under the reign of Joram.¹ That his position in the Canon is subsequent to that of the later Joel affords no argument against this. In fact we are obliged, from the start, by Hosea's leading place in the series, to abandon the untenable hypothesis that an accurately observed chronological principle can be discovered in the succession of the minor prophets; and the exact adaptation of our prophet to Amos, ch. ix. 12, gave sufficient occasion (as Schnurrer had already perceived), for assigning to him just this place.

From this settlement of the date a beautiful and self-consistent structure of the prophecy offers itself. According to the peculiar custom of the prophets to begin with the threatening (or the consolation), and afterwards adduce the explanation of it, the discourse before us falls, first, into the announcement of the judgment (vers. 1-9), and the reasons for it (vers. 10-16); to which then the conclusion demanded by the nature of prophecy, the announcement of salvation to Israel, is appended. The language is the same throughout, and the plan rounded and complete. Thus the suppositions of Ewald and Graf (Jeremiah) fall to the ground. According to them vers. 1-9 should be regarded as the old prophetic kernel which a prophet of the exile has rewrought, completed, and adapted to the destruction of Jerusalem.

¹ In harmony with this conclusion, we may venture the conjecture, that our prophet is identical with that pious Obadiah whom, with others, Joram's father Jehoshaphat had sent out to revive the spirit of true worship in the land, by the explanation of the law (2 Chr. xvii. 7).

LUTHER: Obadiah gives no sign of the time in which he lived, but his prophecy relates to the time of the captivity, for he comforts the people of Israel with the promise that they shall come again to Zion. Especially does his prophecy issue against Edom and Esau, who cherished a special, everlasting envy against the people of Israel and Judah, as is wont to be the case when friends fall out with each other, and especially when brothers come into hatred and hostility toward each other; there the hostility knows no bounds. Therefore were the Edomites beyond all bounds hostile to the people of Judah, and had no greater joy than to look on the captivity of the Jews, and gloried over them, and mocked them in their grief and misery. How the prophets almost all upbraid the Edomites for such hateful malice, see on Psalms, cxxxvii. 7. Now since such conduct is exceedingly distressing when one, instead of comforting as one reasonably should, rather mocks the sorrowful and afflicted in their grief, laughs at them, scorns them, glories over them, so that their faith in God suffers a powerful assault, and is strongly tempted to doubt and unbelief, God sets up a special prophet against such vexatious mockers and assailants, and comforts the afflicted, and strengthens their faith with threatening and rebuke against such hostile Edomites, and with promises and assurance of future help and deliverance. That is truly a needed comfort and a profitable Obadiah. At the close he prophecies of Christ's kingdom, which shall be not in Jerusalem only but everywhere. For he mingles all peoples together, as Ephraim, Benjamin, Gilead, Philistines, Canaanites, Zarith, which cannot be understood of the earthly kingdom of Israel, since such people and tribes must be separated in the land, according to the law of Moses. But that the Jews make Zarith mean France, and Sepharad Spain, I let pass and hold nothing of it; yet let every one hold what he will.

OBADIAH.

THE PROPHECY.

1 VISION OF OBADIAH:

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah concerning Edom;¹
We have heard tidings from Jehovah,
And² an ambassador is sent forth among the nations;³
Arise ye,⁴ and let us arise against her to battle!

2 Behold, I make thee small among the nations;
Despised art thou exceedingly.

3 The pride of thy heart hath deceived thee,
Dweller in the refuges of the cliff,
His lofty habitation;⁵
Who saith in his heart:

Who will bring me down to the earth?

4 Though high,⁶ like the eagle,
And though among the stars thou set thy nest,
Thence will I bring thee down,
Whispers Jehovah.⁷

5 If thieves had come to thee,⁸
If robbers by night—
How art thou destroyed!
Would they not steal until they had enough?
If grape gatherers had come to thee,
Would they not leave gleanings?

6 How is Esau searched out!⁹
His hidden things sought up!

7 To the border have sent¹⁰ thee forth
All the men of thy covenant;
They have deceived thee, prevailed against thee,
The men that were at peace with thee;
Thy bread¹¹ have they placed as a snare under thee;
There is no understanding in him.¹²

8 Will not I, in that day,
Whispers Jehovah,
Destroy the wise out of Edom,
And understanding out of the mount of Esau?

9 And thy heroes shall be dismayed, O Teman, That¹³ every man may be cut off from the mount of Esau
By¹⁴ slaughter.

10 For the violence toward thy brother Jacob,
Shame shall cover thee,
And thou shalt be cut off forever.

11 In the day when thou stoodest opposite,
In the day when strangers took captive his army,¹⁵

- And foreigners entered his gates,
And over Jerusalem cast lots,
Thou also wast as one of them.
- 12 And [yet] thou shouldest not have looked on¹⁶ the day of thy brother, on the day of his calamity;
And not have rejoiced over the sons of Judah in the day of their destruction;
And not have enlarged thy mouth in the day of distress.
- 13 Thou shouldest not have entered into the gate of my people, in the day of their ruin;
Not have looked, thou also, on his misfortune, in the day of his destruction;
And not have laid hand on his army, in the day of his ruin.
- 14 And thou shouldest not have stood at the forks,
To cut off his fugitives;
And not have delivered up his remnant, in the day of distress.
- 15 For near is the day of Jehovah on all the nations;
As thou hast done will they do to thee;
Thy deed will return upon thy head.
- 16 For as ye have drunken on the mountain of my holiness,
All the nations shall drink continually,
And drink, and swallow down,
